"Obviously health care is a mess," says Dean Baker, a liberal economist at the Center for Economic and Policy Research, a Washington think tank. "No one's been willing to touch it, but that's what I see as front and center."

Social Security is a much less serious problem. The program currently pays for itself with a 12.4% payroll tax, and even produces a surplus that the government raids every year to pay other bills. But Social Security will begin to run deficits during the next century, and ultimately would need an infusion of $8 trillion if the government planned to keep its promises to every beneficiary.

DOJ_NMG_0088030

Calculations by Boston University economist Lawrence Kotlikoff indicate that closing those gaps — $8 trillion for Social Security, many times that for Medicare — and paying off the existing deficit would require either an immediate doubling of personal and corporate income taxes, a two-thirds cut in Social Security and Medicare benefits, or some combination of the two.

Why is America so fiscally unprepared for the next century? Like many of its citizens, the United States has spent the last few years racking up debt instead of saving for the future. Foreign lenders — primarily the central banks of China, Japan and other big U.S. trading partners — have been eager to lend the government money at low interest rates, making the current $8.5-trillion deficit about as painful as a big balance on a zero-percent credit card.

In her part of the fiscal wake-up tour presentation, Rogers tries to explain why that's a bad thing. For one thing, even when rates are low a bigger deficit means a greater portion of each tax dollar goes to interest payments rather than useful programs. And because foreigners now hold so much of the federal government's debt, those interest payments increasingly go overseas rather than to U.S. investors.

More serious is the possibility that foreign lenders might lose their enthusiasm for lending money to the United States. Because treasury bills are sold at auction, that would mean paying higher interest rates in the future. And it wouldn't just be the government's problem. All interest rates would rise, making mortgages, car payments and student loans costlier, too.

A modest rise in interest rates wouldn't necessarily be a bad thing, Rogers said. America's consumers have as much of a borrowing problem as their government does, so higher rates could moderate overconsumption and encourage consumer saving. But a big jump in interest rates could cause economic catastrophe. Some economists even predict the government would resort to printing money to pay off its debt, a risky strategy that could lead to runaway inflation.

Macroeconomic meltdown is probably preventable, says Anjan Thakor, a professor of finance at Washington University in St. Louis. But to keep it at bay, he said, the government is essentially going to have to renegotiate some of the promises it has made to its citizens, probably by some combination of tax increases and benefit cuts.

But there's no way to avoid what Rogers considers the worst result of racking up a big deficit — the outrage of making our children and grandchildren repay the debts of their elders.

"It's an unfair burden for future generations," she says.

You'd think young people would be riled up over this issue, since they're the ones who will foot the bill when they're out in the working world. But students take more interest in issues like the Iraq war and gay marriage than the federal government's finances, says Emma Vernon, a member of the University of Texas Young Democrats.

"It's not something that can fire people up," she says.

The current political climate doesn't help. Washington tends to keep its fiscal house in better order when one party controls Congress and the other is in the White House, says Sawhill.

"It's kind of a paradoxical result. Your commonsense logic would tell you if one party is in control of everything they should be able to take action," Sawhill says.

But the last six years of Republican rule have produced tax cuts, record spending increases and a Medicare prescription drug plan that has been widely criticized as fiscally unsound. When President Clinton faced a Republican Congress during the 1990s, spending limits and other legislative tools helped produce a surplus.

So maybe a solution is at hand.

"We're likely to have at least partially divided government again," Sawhill said, referring to predictions that the Democrats will capture the House, and possibly the Senate, in next month's elections.

But Walker isn't optimistic that the government will be able to tackle its fiscal challenges so soon.

"Realistically what we hope to accomplish through the fiscal wake-up tour is ensure that any serious candidate for the presidency in 2008 will be forced to deal with the issue," he says. "The best we're going to get in the next couple of years is to slow the bleeding."

Elections May Bring New Accord In Senate (WP)

By Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088031

McConnell, Reid Have History of Deal-Making

Regardless of whether Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) or Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) prevails as the Senate's next majority leader, one thing seems certain: Either one will show more interest in the institution's often obscure traditions than the departing majority leader, Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

What that means as a practical matter, however, is less certain. Some congressional scholars say it could mean greater bipartisan accord because McConnell and Reid are consummate deal-makers whose top priority is legislative achievement, whereas Frist's presidential ambitions have shadowed his comments and deeds as majority leader. But both men are also dogged by questions about financial dealings that could provide ammunition for opponents in the next Congress, which is virtually sure to be narrowly divided.

McConnell and Reid rose through the Senate ranks by mastering the rules and building strong relationships with colleagues. Both are combative lawyer-politicians who overcame childhood challenges and are now in their mid-60s. Unlike Frist, a surgeon, they are veteran practitioners of the Senate's opaque, clubby brand of politics, with no apparent desire to become president or grab television time to espouse their parties' goals.

Many senators say that either Reid or McConnell, because of their backgrounds, can lead the Senate with more skill than Frist, 54, who struggled to build winning coalitions on issues such as immigration, Social Security and the nominations of several judges and John R. Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Former senator Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.) said McConnell and Reid are tenacious politicians steeped in the Senate's ways. McConnell, he said, "is one of the sawiest political operatives that I've ever worked with." He called Reid, a former amateur boxer, "an old fist-fighter and a hell of a trial lawyer."

Each has shown an occasional independent streak. McConnell was one of three GOP senators to vote against a constitutional ban on flag desecration, which failed this year by one vote. Reid was among 14 Democrats who backed it. Reid bucks Democratic orthodoxy by opposing legalized abortion in most circumstances.

Still, both men, Simpson said, will have to play down their partisan tendencies and emphasize their desire for legislative accomplishments if the next Congress is to succeed. "It doesn't matter who the leader is if there's no outreach to the other party," he said.

Such efforts have begun. Reid phoned McConnell shortly before Congress recessed last month "to discuss his desire to work together next year on a bipartisan basis to work on the priorities of the American people," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley. He said McConnell "expressed a similar desire and willingness."

In a recent interview, McConnell said he especially hopes the next Congress will address the long-term financial needs of Social Security and Medicare. He blamed Democrats for blocking President Bush's 2005 bid to revamp Social Security. "When are we going to deal with these problems?" he asked.

Reid said last week: "If Republicans are serious about addressing this nation's fiscal problems and strengthening Social Security and Medicare, Senate Democrats are willing to reach across the aisle and get to work." But he ruled out "privatizing Social Security."

Former Senate majority leader Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.), now with a Washington lobbying firm, said that partisans and colleagues will pull Reid and McConnell in different directions and that the next Senate's fate will largely turn on how they react.

"They will be under great pressure from some in their ranks to engage in partisan combat, especially with the presidential election only two years away," Daschle said. "But regardless of who has the majority, they will also be under equal pressure to prove that they can govern."

In their combined 42 years in the Senate, McConnell and Reid have toiled energetically for their parties, raising funds and recruiting candidates while becoming personally well off. But their energies have triggered criticisms. Recent hard-hitting news articles have focused on questionable land transactions by Reid and aggressive fundraising by McConnell.

The two men say they have played by the rules and have broken no laws, and neither appears subject to a serious challenge from party colleagues. But the recent round of articles suggests that both continue to test the limits on raising and spending campaign money -- a practice almost certain to draw more scrutiny when one of them assumes the Senate's top post.

DOJ_NMG_0088032

"The no-quarter-asked, no-quarter-given atmosphere is not going to disappear after this campaign," said Ross K. Baker, a Rutgers University scholar on Congress. "Any weakness will be highlighted; any lapse will be emphasized."

McConnell, 64, who battled polio as a child, is best-known for his fierce resistance to a series of campaign finance changes generally dubbed McCain-Feingold. He argues unapologetically that politicians should raise as much money as legally possible to further their goals and attack their enemies.

His no-holds-barred approach to fundraising has endeared him to many GOP colleagues but has prompted criticism from others. Most recently, the Lexington (Ky.) Herald-Leader published a series of articles portraying the senator as an insatiable solicitor of political money from interest groups -- including tobacco companies, car makers and pharmaceutical firms -- with whom he is cozy.

The articles concluded that McConnell has raised nearly $220 million during his Senate career, and pushes so hard that even his closest allies sometimes rebel. "Are you feeling a choking sensation?" a vice president for R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. was quoted as saying in an e-mail after the senator had asked the firm for $200,000 in "soft money" to aid Republican campaigns.

McConnell defends his aggressive fundraising, equating political advocacy with free speech. "You must have money in politics, because it's the only way the candidates can get their message across," he said.

Reid, 66, has occasionally been forced to explain his involvement in transactions that mixed politics with profits. In 2003, the Los Angeles Times published lengthy articles chronicling his sponsorship of legislation that promised benefits to Nevada developers, corporations and institutions whose lobbyists included the senator's sons and son-in-law. Reid's staff later barred relatives from lobbying his office.

This month, the Associated Press reported that Reid did not disclose to Congress that he sold land in Nevada to a friend's company in 2001 and took part ownership of the firm. He collected a sizeable profit when the land was sold again in 2004. Reid, who had a hardscrabble childhood, said he had never tried to hide his ownership of the land, but later he amended his ethics reports to more fully reflect the transactions.

Reid said these issues are behind him, and he promised a new tone in Washington if Democrats take over the Senate.

Project Chugs Along With Senator's Help (LAT)

By Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

John Thune has given steam to railroad plans of an ex-lobbying client.

washington — When John Thune, a congressman from South Dakota, narrowly lost a bid for the Senate in 2002, his career followed a familiar pattern: He became a Washington lobbyist.

He soon gained as a client a little-known Midwestern railroad. The Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad Corp. may have been small, but its ambitions were not. It was seeking more than $2 billion in federal loan guarantees to help finance a major renovation of its entire rail network and an expansion into the coal fields of Wyoming's Powder River Basin.

DM&E paid Thune about $220,000 in 2003 and 2004 for his lobbying, but the loan guarantee request languished at the Federal Railroad Administration. Without the government's backing, the company said, its upgrade would not be possible.

Today, Thune is a U.S. senator. And after the South Dakota Republican helped attach a provision to last year's huge transportation bill, prospects for DM&E's $2.3 billion in loan guarantees are looking brighter.

The federal government now is in a position to approve one of the largest loan guarantees in its history, apparently the biggest since its 1980 bailout of Chrysler Corp. The transportation bill did not mention DM&E, but by raising the government's loan guarantee authority tenfold, to $35 billion, it made the railroad's request more likely to succeed.

Whatever the outcome of the DM&E aid request, the fact that a lawmaker who is a former lobbyist helped it along speaks volumes about how business sometimes gets done in Washington, where members of Congress frequently attach pet projects to broader legislation.

The DM&E project has broad support in the Upper Midwest from farmers and miners who say they need the expanded rail capacity to move their coal, corn and ethanol to market. Supporters say it would create thousands of jobs in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0088033

The project "advances a lot of federal policies that are important in different ways — energy, agriculture and transportation," said DM&E President and Chief Executive Kevin Schieffer.

Thune takes pride in helping the venture along. "The project could transform South Dakota's economy for generations," he said in a news release after the transportation bill became law.

But the railroad expansion is not without critics, foremost among them the world-famous Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., which does not want more freight trains rumbling past its hospital complex.

Some opponents also charge that such a large federal loan guarantee for one company is a classic example of pork-barrel spending, and that Thune's recent connection to DM&E makes it unseemly.

"The DM&E subsidy and its backing by a former lobbyist turned senator represents many of the things that are wrong with Washington today," said Walter Mondale, the former vice president and a former U.S. senator from Minnesota. Mondale, now a lawyer in Minneapolis, used to be a trustee of the Mayo Clinic and opposes the rail project.

Mondale sees the potential DM&E loan guarantee as a giant earmark — a funding provision, usually of a few million dollars, that a lawmaker inserts into a spending bill for the benefit of his or her constituents. The transportation bill had more than 6,000 earmarks, including the storied "bridge to nowhere" intended to connect the Alaskan mainland to an island with 50 inhabitants.

"I consider the DM&E earmark to be even more egregious," Mondale said.

Matthew K. Rose, chairman and president of Burlington Northern Santa Fe Corp., whose BNSF Railway competes in the same region as DM&E, has called the loan guarantee "bad public policy."

"If the government allows non-market-based loans of this magnitude for certain carriers," he told a conference this month, "that will have a negative effect on railroads' ability and willingness to invest private capital."

The aid package is not an actual loan and would cost the U.S. nothing if the railroad paid its lenders back. Only if DM&E were to default on its loans would taxpayers have to foot the bill.

Still, the request has run afoul of budget watchdog groups.

The National Taxpayers Union, in a report this month, noted that DM&E already had the biggest federal rail rehabilitation loan guarantee ($233 million), and said the coal fields of the Powder River Basin were already served by two bigger railroads, the BNSF and the Union Pacific.

More fundamentally, it said, "floating a taxpayer-backed credit line to a private company is simply wrong."

Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste, said the sequence of events surrounding DM&E's request and the increasing of the government's loan guarantee authority raised the question of whether "Thune is still working for the railroad."

Thune declined to comment for this article, but his staff rejected any suggestion of impropriety. Spokesman Kyle Downey called it "a desperate attempt to smear the senator."

"The senator has spent his entire professional career in this area. He has a level of expertise going back two decades," Downey said. Thune is a former South Dakota state railroad commissioner.

In any case, Thune's staff says, he was a bit player in writing the loan authority increase into the transportation bill.

But a news release issued by Thune's office last year quoted Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), a key author of the highway bill, as saying, "Sen. Thune's leadership and hard work were essential to making the [loan guarantee] provision a reality."

The accounting firm BearingPoint said in a report in May that even if DM&E were to secure the loans, the company's cash flow would fall short of the amount needed for debt repayment for at least two decades.

"The company appears to be a poor credit risk," BearingPoint said.

"We have serious concerns about the ability of DM&E to repay such a loan" — an outcome that would leave Washington holding the bag.

DM&E has dismissed the BearingPoint audit as based on incomplete information.

BearingPoint acknowledged that its analysis was imprecise because DM&E, as a privately held company, withheld financial data that publicly traded companies would have to divulge.

DOJ_NMG_0088034

The railroad company aims to replace 580 miles of old track and lay an additional 280 miles of new track with the $2.3 billion it could borrow with its loan guarantee. It intends to spend $4 billion in private funds modernizing its fleet of freight cars.

The proposal might have been clear sailing if DM&E's tracks did not run within blocks of the Mayo Clinic, which has organized a lobby called the Rochester Coalition to fight the railroad over safety concerns.

"In any category you want to look at — collisions, derailments, worker accidents — they are the least safe railroad in the country," said Rochester Coalition consultant Lawrence Mann, a Washington lawyer specializing in railroad safety.

In 2004, a DM&E train derailed when it hit an improperly aligned switch in Balaton, Minn., spilling 15,000 gallons of flammable alcohol and forcing the evacuation of 100 residents.

"If the Balaton accident had occurred in Rochester, it would have been catastrophic," said Mayo spokesman Chris Gade.

If Mayo is so concerned about safety, DM&E said, it ought to welcome the rehabilitation of track that dates back 80 years in some spots.

"From a safety standpoint," said CEO Schieffer, "it would be irresponsible not to be for this."

joel.havemann@latimes.com

Ethics Rules Send NIH Scientists Packing (AP)

By Rita Beamish

AP, October 28, 2006

Nearly 40% of the scientists conducting hands-on research at the National Institutes of Health say they are looking for other jobs or are considering doing so to escape new ethics rules that have curtailed their opportunity to earn outside income.

Most scientists say the ethics crackdown is too severe, and nearly three-quarters of them believe it will hinder the government's ability to attract and keep medical researchers, according to a survey commissioned by the government's premier medical research agency.

The tightened rules were put in place last year after NIH found dozens of scientists had run afoul of existing restrictions on private consulting deals that had enriched them with money from drug and biotechnology companies.

Outside income from such companies is now banned. NIH also is placing greater restrictions and disclosure requirements on employees' financial holdings.

"Of course we are concerned when any employees are saying they might consider leaving as a result of a change of policy," said Dr. Raynard Kington, the agency's principal deputy director. But he said in a telephone interview Friday that the survey results are muddy because they combine both those actively seeking to leave and those thinking about it.

NIH Director Elias Zerhouni, in a letter Thursday to the staff, said the survey "does suggest concerns about the impact of the regulations on recruitment and retention." But he added, "At this time we do not anticipate revisions in the regulations."

About 8,000 NIH employees, or about half the workforce, responded to the Internet-based survey.

Employee job satisfaction was high overall, the survey found. But 39% of the scientists researching disease and cures — known as tenure and tenure-track scientists — said they actively were seeking new work or considering leaving NIH because of the rules.

Overall, 3,336 NIH scientists responded to the survey, including 512 tenure and tenure-track researchers.

Among all NIH scientists, only 18% said they were trying to leave or considering it. Those who are not in the tenure group typically do not conduct research themselves and instead manage outside research conducted with NIH money by universities and other non-federal entities. They are less likely to have private consulting opportunities.

One-third of all NIH scientists said they believed the new rules will hurt NIH's ability to fulfill its mission, and most said the old rules could have been enforced better rather than tightened.

NIH officials said they now want to question former and potential employees to see how the changes influenced their decisions.

Kington highlighted a finding that nearly nine in 10 scientists reported they still intend to work at NIH a year from now. Despite rumblings of low morale, he said the scientists' job satisfaction rate of 81% reflects one of the government's most positive workforces.

DOJ_NMG_0088035

Officials also emphasized employees' belief that the new rules will boost the agency's credibility with the public. Seventy-three% of the employees who responded agreed with that, the survey found.

"We have to monitor closely and we'll continue do that, and if we show through our evaluations objective evidence of an impact on our ability to recruit and retain the smartest staff, scientific and non-scientific, that we can, then we will be the first ones to make the case for modifying the rules, but we're not there yet," Kington said.

One NIH administrator who left over the ethics rules said the agency's changes were handled poorly.

"Dedicated public servants were harassed right out of NIH. That's a disservice to us all," said Edward Maibach, the former associate director of the biggest NIH component, the National Cancer Institute. He is now director of Public Health Communication at the George Washington University. Maibach said he left the NCI nearly two years ago because new financial disclosure requirements invaded his privacy.

The changes are "a dramatic backlash," to earlier policies encouraging outside work by NIH scientists to speed practical application of scientific advances, he said.

Arthur Caplan, medical ethics chairman at the University of Pennsylvania, said tighter rules were needed but "we still haven't figured out exactly how to manage conflict of interest."

"To have a large number of the senior scientists unhappy spells trouble. You don't want them to retire or leave," he said.

"The leaders of the NIH and in Congress have to think a bit harder about giving a tiny bit of breathing room so that NIH scientists are not sent into a monastery from which they can't ever come out in the name of scientific integrity."

NASA Deciding Whether To Close A Window Into Space (WP)

By Marc Kaufman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Future of Hubble Telescope to Be Announced on Tuesday

As NASA learned when it canceled a planned shuttle mission to keep alive the Hubble Space Telescope almost three years ago, its orbiting source of jaw-dropping intergalactic images and deep insights into the early days of the universe had become something of an astronomic rock star.

The scientific and public response was overwhelming: The then-14-year-old Hubble had to be saved before its batteries and gyroscopes failed, and NASA was seriously misguided for refusing to send a shuttle crew to keep it running. This view was strongly endorsed by an expert panel convened by the National Academy of Sciences in late 2004.

Soon after, Michael D. Griffin became NASA administrator and agreed to reconsider the Hubble mission. On Tuesday, he will announce whether the telescope will be repaired or will be allowed to gradually run out of steam.

NASA said Friday that a series of events and briefings will follow the announcement at Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt -- the kind of activity that often accompanies a decision to go ahead with a big mission. But agency officials said that no decision had been reached and that Griffin will study the pros and cons over the weekend.

"Every scientist on the face of the globe, and many people in the general public, are watching this, looking forward to a decision," said Mario Livio, head of the science program at the Space Telescope Science Institute in Baltimore, which manages the Hubble's scheduling and research for NASA. "I'm cautiously optimistic, but there are so many factors involved."

For Griffin, it is a tough choice -- balancing the undeniable success of the Hubble against the equally undeniable risks to the astronauts who would fix it, as well as the unforgiving schedule of shuttle flights needed to complete the international space station.

The decision by his predecessor, Sean O'Keefe, to scrub the Hubble repair mission was made after the 2003 Columbia disaster, when it was not clear when the shuttles would get back into space.

Griffin has often said that he believes the telescope is one of the great scientific instruments of all time and that it deserves to be repaired.

"If we can do it safely, we want to do it," Griffin said at a September briefing after the successful landing of the space shuttle Atlantis. "But we have new constraints on . . . the space shuttle system. We have a new understanding of its fragility and vulnerability."

DOJ_NMG_0088036

An aerospace engineer, Griffin worked for two years in the early 1980s on issues related to the Hubble project.

Among the major constraints are that the space shuttle fleet is aging fast and that NASA is eager to finish assembly of the space station by 2010, so the three remaining spacecraft can be retired. A mission to Hubble could interfere with the schedule.

After two fatal shuttle disasters, NASA is also increasingly focused on safety and on having backup systems for crews if their spaceship gets damaged. In theory, the international space station is the standby shelter for a spacecraft in trouble, but it would be unreachable on a flight to the Hubble. That is because the orbits of Hubble and the space station are very different, and a shuttle launched to the Hubble would not have the fuel and power to shift orbits to reach the station.

As a result, the crew of a Hubble-bound shuttle has only about three weeks' time to repair any damage to the spaceship. That would hardly leave time for the final contingency, preparing and launching a second shuttle for a rescue mission.

"We've had three successful shuttle missions since Columbia, and we've learned a lot about inspecting and repairing the vehicle," NASA spokesman Allard Beutel said. "So we have a lot more capability and flexibility, but clearly some safety issues remain."

Griffin met with his top lieutenants Friday for a final discussion of whether the mission can be done safely and without too much disruption to the space station assembly schedule.

Reflecting Griffin's hope to make room for the mission, a Hubble launch has been penciled in for spring 2008, though officials say the date is a place-holder rather than a sign that a positive decision has been made.

The Hubble, which has been repaired and upgraded four times by astronauts since it was launched in 1990, has had a remarkable record of scientific breakthroughs.

Because it orbits 380 miles above Earth, away from the haze of the atmosphere, it can identify and photograph distant galaxies and matter never before examined. Astronomers have used Hubble images to fix the age of the universe at 13.7 billion years, to discover massive black holes at the center of many galaxies, and to explore a mysterious force called dark energy, which, by acting against the forces of gravity, is causing the universe to expand. Livio of the Space Telescope Science Institute said dark energy is probably the most significant issue in physics today, and losing Hubble would freeze promising research into its nature for as much as a decade.

But some believe Hubble's greatest accomplishment lies in a less rarified realm -- that it has greatly popularized astronomy with its stunning and awe-inspiring images of the universe.

Each of the four earlier Hubble repair missions included some upgrading of instruments, and a possible fifth mission would similarly increase its capacities. Two powerful -- and very expensive -- instruments have been manufactured specifically for the Hubble. They would greatly increase the telescope's ability to look deep into space and to study the chemical composition of the far-distant gas between galaxies.

Livio said the unprecedented power of the new Wide Field Camera 3 would, for instance, enable astronomers to learn about even earlier phases of the universe's formation by making observations in the infrared and ultraviolet wavelengths. The new Cosmic Origins Spectrograph will examine the subatomic baryon particles that inhabit the space between galaxies. The instruments cost $200 million and may have no other use if they cannot be delivered to the Hubble, Livio said.

If Hubble is not repaired, NASA estimates that it will probably keep working into 2008 or 2009. The James Webb Space Telescope, a replacement of sorts but with different capabilities, is scheduled to be launched in 2013.

NASA officials say the Hubble repair decision will be made on the basis of safety, engineering and scheduling concerns, but it will also say a lot about NASA's priorities. The speed-up in assembly of the space station is both because it is well behind schedule, and because NASA is eager to get out of the space shuttle business so it can focus on President Bush's initiative to return to the moon by 2020 and then explore Mars.

The costs of both the shuttle program and the new manned exploration mission are great, and NASA has said the basic science budget will grow more slowly or be cut as a result. Because the telescope is one of the gems of the NASA science directorate, some see the fate of Hubble as indicative of where the agency is headed.

"This is a terribly important decision, and it has so many political and scientific overtones," said J. Craig Wheeler, astronomy professor at the University of Texas at Austin and president of the American Astronomical Society.

DOJ_NMG_0088037

"It's very important for those who want to continue working with Hubble, important for those who want to do other space science, and it's important as an indication of that evolving balance between space science and human space exploration," he said. "And it shows that NASA has an enormous number of big issues on its plate right now."

OTHER NEWS:

It's Not The Economy, Stupid (WP)

By Jacob S. Hacker

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

In the final days of this fall's campaign, Republicans have turned to an unexpected issue: the economy. President Bush touted the nation's prosperity last week, insisting that "a strong economy is going to help our candidates."

And why not? The Dow is soaring. Unemployment is low. Inflation is tame. Gas prices are falling. And the overall economy has been growing steadily. If Americans practice what political scientists call "retrospective voting" (captured by President Ronald Reagan's famous question: "Are you better off today than you were four years ago?"), then one would think that incumbent politicians should be cruising to victory.

There's just one problem: Despite the sunny talk and favorable numbers, voters aren't happy with the economy. Though they've become somewhat more positive in recent weeks, they remain strikingly dissatisfied -- and favor Democrats by wide margins on economic issues.

Many observers have attributed the disconnect to the war in Iraq. Unhappiness over the conflict, they argue, is coloring voters' economic perceptions. Yet a similar disconnect played out in the early 1990s, when voters also felt much more negative about economic conditions than the numbers would have suggested. Then, as now, conventional economic indicators didn't seem to capture voters' fundamental anxieties -- the sense that their jobs, health care, pensions and family finances were ever more at risk.

In this climate, Republicans bragging about the economy may appear not as saviors, but as out of touch -- much as the administration appears on the other dominant campaign issue, the war in Iraq. Just as events in Iraq undermine GOP reassurances about the conflict, so anxious financial discussions in American homes help explain why Republicans are gaining so little from today's economic numbers -- numbers that once would have seemed like tickets to victory.

In the past, the link between economic conditions and election results seemed simple. Economist Ray Fair's landmark 1978 paper "The Effect of Economic Events on Votes for President" in the Review of Economics and Statistics showed that a simple forecast based on election-year economic numbers (primarily inflation and economic growth) did a remarkably good job of predicting the result of presidential elections in the 20th century.

But models such as Fair's are becoming increasingly less reliable, according to Dartmouth political scientist Joseph Bafumi in a recent paper, "The Stubborn American Voter." For example, Fair's approach overshot President Bush's margin of victory in 2004 by 6.5 percentage points. And the last president to lose an election when the raw economic numbers predicted otherwise in Fair's equation was George H.W. Bush, running for reelection in 1992.

Some analysts have described current voter angst as a hangover of economic success. "Americans have developed perfectionist standards," economics columnist Robert J. Samuelson has argued. "We expect total prosperity and are disappointed by anything less." And conservative pundit George Will recently decried the nation's "economic hypochondria" -- an entitlement mentality characterized by a low threshold for economic pain.

But the problem isn't the public -- it's the standard statistics used to judge the economy. Inflation, unemployment and economic growth all capture economic performance at a particular moment or period. Yet a growing body of theory and evidence suggests that to understand public perceptions, one should look at the security and stability of family finances over time. With that perspective, the grounds for unease suddenly look much clearer.

Consider the evidence of rising income inequality in the United States. In a path-breaking recent paper, "The Evolution of Top Incomes: A Historical and International Perspective," Thomas Piketty of Ã‰coles Normales SupÃ©rieure in Paris and Emmanuel Saez of the University of California at Berkeley have shown that the share of national income held by the richest 1 percent of Americans -- stable at about 32 percent throughout the middle decades of the 20th century -- began to rise sharply in the late 1970s and by 2002 had surpassed 40 percent. In the past few years, most income gains have gone to people at the very top of the income ladder, with middle-class Americans seeing only a small boost in their economic standing.

DOJ_NMG_0088038

Yet there's another reason for middle-class dissatisfaction. Many assume that growing income inequality means that rich people are becoming steadily richer. But virtually all income statistics are based on annual snapshots of Americans' finances, so they cannot tell us whether rich people stay rich -- or whether poor people stay poor. In other words, these statistics tell us about inequality, but not about mobility -- either up the income ladder or down it.

This is a major oversight, because there's good reason to think that our economic lives are more unstable than they used to be. Bankruptcy, for instance, is much more common today than it was just 25 years ago, and research by Elizabeth Warren of Harvard Law School -- presented in a 2003 law review article, "Financial Collapse and Class Status" -- shows that many of those who file for bankruptcy were once squarely middle class. Princeton economist Henry Farber, in his article "What Do We Know About Job Loss in the United States?" has found that the likelihood that a worker will lose a job over a three-year period has been rising -- and is now about as high as it was in the early 1980s, which saw the worst economic downturn since the Great Depression.

In my own research using the Panel Study of Income Dynamics -- a survey that has traced a large sample of Americans over time -- I've found that family incomes have become much more unstable since the 1970s; the gap between our income in a good year and our income in a bad year has expanded. Increasingly, it seems, Americans are living on a financial roller coaster.

Of course, roller coasters go up as well as down, so it's tempting to think that the net effect of economic instability is a wash. But instability causes hardship even when the "average" experience stays constant. In their seminal 1979 article "Prospect Theory: An Analysis of Decisions Under Risk," psychologists Daniel Kahneman and Amos Tversky showed that people dislike losing things they already have much more than they like gaining things they don't have -- a phenomenon known as "loss aversion." As a result, losses in income are psychologically difficult even when followed by equal or even larger gains. And, of course, it's on those downward trips that people lose their houses, their jobs, their retirement savings and other staples of middle-class life.

Loss aversion is surprisingly strong. In a recent nationwide survey by the polling firm Lake Research Partners, respondents were asked whether they preferred "the stability of knowing your present sources of income are protected" or "opportunity to make money in the future." By a two-to-one margin, Americans chose stability over opportunity.

This helps explain why Americans are so dissatisfied with the current economy. They see the overall gains, but they don't think that those gains have translated into greater security for their families, and they're worried about the risk -- whether it be the loss of a job, unexpected medical costs or some other setback. A majority of registered voters say the economy is getting better, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll last week. But more than three-quarters still say they are either falling behind or just holding steady. The actual or possible erosion of safety nets (such as Social Security, guaranteed pensions and workplace health insurance) only heightens such concerns.

Loss aversion may also help explain the muted public reception to Bush's "Ownership Society" agenda, which was shelved after his proposal for private Social Security accounts crashed and burned (though, much to the dismay of Republican candidates, Bush recently said he wants to tackle the issue again). According to polls, many voters thought they would do better with private accounts. Yet they intensely feared the risks, such as a stock-market downturn or outliving their savings.

Does all this foretell a major shift in U.S. politics, as increasingly insecure Americans demand change? Democratic pollster Nancy Wiefek thinks so. "The main political cleavage now is no longer income but risk," she said. And in Europe, according to recent studies by Harvard scholar Torben Iversen, voters appear capable of figuring out how at risk they are, and supporting or opposing specific social policies in response.

However, competitive left-of-center parties in Europe put ambitious alternatives on the agenda. In the United States, despite public unease, Democrats have talked mostly about the minimum wage and Wal-Mart, rather than trying to mobilize the risk-fraught middle class.

The continuing economic disconnect carries a clear prescription: Republicans would do better to acknowledge middle-class strains, rather than to just repeat the strong-economy mantra. In a 2005 strategy memo, Republican political consultant

DOJ_NMG_0088039

Frank Luntz put "insecurity" at the top of his list of "words that work" in connecting with voters on the economy. It still works -- but it's likely to be working for Democrats, not Republicans, on Nov. 7.

jacob.hacker@yale.edu

Jacob S. Hacker, a Yale University professor and New America Foundation fellow, is author of "The Great Risk Shift" (Oxford Univ. Press).

Where We Went Wrong (WP)

By Dick Armey

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Somewhere along the road to a "permanent majority," the Republican Revolution of 1994 went off track. For several years, we had confidence in our convictions and trusted that the American people would reward our efforts. And they did.

But today, my Republican friends in Congress stand on the precipice of an electoral rout. Even the best-case scenarios suggest wafer-thin majorities and a legislative agenda in disarray. With eight days before the election, House speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi has already begun her transition planning.

Where did the revolution go astray? How did we go from the big ideas and vision of 1994 to the cheap political point-scoring on meaningless wedge issues of today -- from passing welfare reform and limited government to banning horsemeat and same-sex marriage?

The answer is simple: Republican lawmakers forgot the party's principles, became enamored with power and position, and began putting politics over policy. Now, the Democrats are reaping the rewards of our neglect -- and we have no one to blame but ourselves.

In 1989, Newt Gingrich rose to the number two leadership position in the House after a contentious three-way race pitting young backbench conservatives such as myself, Bob Walker, Joe Barton and others against old bulls such as Minority Leader Bob Michel and other ranking members. We thought they suffered from a minority party mindset and were too accommodating of the Democrats. Out of congressional power for nearly two generations, Republicans had become complacent. Senior members of the party were happy to accept the crumbs afforded by Democratic chairmen. Life was comfortable in the minority as long as you did not rock the boat. Members received their perks -- such as travel abroad and special banking privileges -- and enough pork projects for reelection. The entire Congress lived by the rule of parochial politics.

Gingrich and I and a handful of true believers in Ronald Reagan's conservative vision set the goal of retaking the House. The "Contract With America" outlined our platform of limited government. This vision appealed to both the social and economic wings of the conservative movement; equally important, it included institutional reforms for a Congress that had grown increasingly arrogant and corrupt. The contract nationalized the vision of the Republican Party in a way that unified our base and appealed to independents. We championed national issues, not local pork projects or the creature comforts of high office.

In 1994, this vision was validated when Republicans took 54 seats in the House, eight seats in the Senate and control of both houses of Congress.

Welfare reform in 1996 only affirmed the revolution. Bureaucrats, special interests and the White House all claimed that the sky would fall if we touched this failed Great Society program, but we held firm. When you take on a sacred cow, you must kill it completely -- tinkering on the margins is ineffective. In the end, the reform proved so successful and popular that President Bill Clinton (who rejected the original bill twice) considers it one of the best ideas his administration ever had.

At one point during the welfare reform debates, a member approached me and said, "Dick, I know this is the right thing to do, but my constituents just won't understand." I told him, "So you're telling me they are smart enough to vote for you but not smart enough to understand this?" He ended up voting to pass the bill.

Yet despite such successes, we didn't learn the right political lessons. A few months before the victory on welfare, we lost the battle over the federal government shutdown of 1995, when we were outmaneuvered by Clinton, a masterful political operator. After that fight, too many Republicans apparently concluded that America wanted bigger government. This misreading was the first step on the road away from the Reagan legacy.

DOJ_NMG_0088040

We emerged as a wounded party; we stopped trusting the public; and we internalized the wrong lesson. Since the party won the majority in 1994, the GOP Conference had been consistent in requiring offsetting spending cuts for any new spending initiatives. (In fact, during the aftermath of a large Mississippi River flood, Rep. Jim Nussle even waited to find and approve offsets before moving the relief legislation for his own state of Iowa.) But by the summer of 1997, the appropriators -- rightly called the "third party" of Congress -- had begun to pass spending bills with Democrats. As soon as politics superseded policy and principle, the avalanche of earmarks that is crushing the party began.

Now spending is out of control. Rather than rolling back government, we have a new $1.2 trillion Medicare prescription drug benefit, and non-defense discretionary spending is growing twice as fast as it had in the Clinton administration. Meanwhile, Social Security is collapsing while rogue nations are going nuclear and the Middle East is more combustible than ever. Yet Republican lawmakers have taken up such issues as flag burning, Terri Schiavo and same-sex marriage.

They're fooling only themselves.

If Democrats take control of Congress on Nov. 7, they will form an accidental majority. They are not succeeding because of their principles or policy proposals, but simply because they have kept their heads down. Republicans, fearful of taking on big tasks and challenges, may be defeated next month by a party that offers nothing on the key issues of our day.

Pelosi says she would preside over a moderate Democratic majority, and has committed to raising taxes only as a last resort. But Democratic policy goals such as nationalized health care and low-interest student loans are expensive, and dozens of new spending "priorities" will crop up as soon as the election results are tallied. Democrats have promised that all new spending will be offset by tax increases, so will they raise taxes in the run-up to the 2008 race?

In essence, Pelosi will be forced to choose between a vocal base -- expecting immediate satisfaction on issues such as withdrawing from Iraq, legalizing same-sex marriage and the impeachment of President Bush -- or policies that are tolerable to a majority of Americans. That's quite a dilemma: appeasing a base that has been hungry for political revenge since 2000 and 2004, or alienating moderate and swing voters.

Pelosi has stated that House committee chairmen will be chosen by seniority. This could backfire on the Democrats, because members from the most consistently partisan districts are usually the ones who stick around the longest. Chairmen have the power of the subpoena; Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), the would-be judiciary chairman, has already drafted articles of impeachment for Bush, while others are calling for investigations on the war in Iraq and the federal reaction to Hurricane Katrina. A revenge-hungry Democratic majority, substituting political grudge matches for serious policy, will not remain a majority for long.

How can the Republicans respond?

The leadership must remember that the modern conservative movement is a fusion of social and fiscal conservatives united in their belief in limited government. The party must keep both in the fold. Republicans also need to get back to being the party of big ideas. The greatest threat to American prosperity today is a catastrophic fiscal meltdown resulting from long-term entitlements. Democrats have already lined up behind the solution of raising taxes and reducing benefits. But Americans want more freedom and choice in education, health care and retirement security. Republicans -- too busy dreaming up wedge issues to score cheap points against Democrats -- have lost sight of their broad national agenda.

The likely Republican losses in next week's elections will not constitute a repudiation of the conservative legacy that drove the Reagan presidency and created the Contract With America. To the contrary, it would represent a rejection of big government conservatism. When we get back to being the party of limited government, putting a national agenda ahead of parochial short-term politics, we will again be a party that the American voters will trust to deal with the serious challenges facing our nation.

The 2006 midterm elections will be a success for the Democrats. Republicans will have to manage their own disappointment. Fingers will be pointed, and various villains will be fashioned out of recent events. But the plain fact is that Republicans have been setting the stage for this outcome for nearly a decade, running from themselves and their own principles. We will not find ourselves by conforming to the status quo, but by returning to our Reagan roots.

When we act like us we win. When we act like them we lose. Let's win.

darmey@freedomworks.org

Dick Armey, the House majority leader from 1995 to 2003, is currently chairman of the think tank FreedomWorks.

DOJ_NMG_0088041

Return Of The Yellow Dog (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

In a remarkable editorial on Wednesday, the New York Times endorsed Diane Farrell for Congress from a district in Connecticut.

Who is Diane Farrell? I have no idea, and the Times seemed to have not a lot. After eight years as first selectman of Westport, the paper noted somewhat desperately, "she has a better understanding than most legislators of the impact of federal mandates and tax policy on local government." By contrast her opponent, Christopher Shays, has held the seat for almost 20 years and been endorsed by the Times "in every race in which he has faced a serious opponent" -- until now.

Shays is a Republican, but not excessively so. He's moderate in policy and in temperament. In fact, he's just the kind of Republican that the Times ordinarily likes to dig up and endorse to prove that it's not blindly Democratic. And they still like him: "[W]e have admired his independence and respected his leadership."

Yet the Times decided to "strongly endorse" Shays's opponent, entirely because she's a Democrat. Or rather, because she is not a Republican: "Mr. Shays has been a good congressman, but not good enough to overcome the fact that his re-election would help empower a party that is long overdue for a shakeup."

One of the axioms of small-d democratic piety in this country is that you vote for the person and not the party. People just love to say, "I evaluate each candidate on his or her own merits" -- even when it's not true.

But this year does seem to be different. You hear people say -- though rarely as forthrightly as the Times -- that they are voting for the party and not the person. The Republican candidate for the Senate or House may be saintlike in general, no worse than muddled on the war in Iraq and good on stem cell research. She may never even have met Jack Abramoff.

Meanwhile, the Democrat may be a grotesque hack just inches from indictment, whose views on Iraq are equally muddled with less excuse (since loyalty to the president is not a factor). Nevertheless, these New Yellow Dogs are voting for the Democrat, simply out of anger at or frustration with the Republican Party.

The term "yellow dog Democrats" used to mean someone who would vote for any Democrat over any Republican, even if the Democrat were a yellow dog. In recent decades there has been no such person, but this year the dog might have a shot.

And for those who might feel sheepish (to introduce another animal) about voting the party line, my advice is: Relax. There is nothing wrong with voting for the party rather than the person. In fact, there is even nothing wrong with blindly voting for the Democrat (or, I suppose, the Republican) even if you know nothing else about him or her.

In other democracies, such as Britain, this person-not-the-party piety is not just unknown; it would be hard to comprehend. Whatever Burke may have said, a member of Parliament is your representative. He or she runs on a party platform promising various things, and if that party wins a majority of seats it "forms a government." You would be silly to vote for the person and not the party. The party's views are what counts. The person's views are almost irrelevant.

Even under the American arrangement, there is nothing ignoble about voting the party line. It is an efficient way to minimize your information costs. A candidate's party affiliation doesn't tell you everything you would like to know, but it tells you something. Indeed, it tells you a lot -- enough so that it makes sense to vote your party preference even when you know nothing else about a candidate. Or even vote for a candidate you actively dislike.

True, people might question your sanity if you were to declare that you were voting for the Democratic Party agenda. The what? If there's anything worse than ignoring that famous elephant in the room, it's imagining a donkey that's not in the room. Even so, a vote for the Democrat is a vote against the Republican. And voting "no" to a record of failure is more important for the functioning of democracy than voting "yes" to any number of promises about the future.

It was not Newt Gingrich's Contract With America that caused the great Republican sweep of 1994: It was disgust, skillfully nurtured by Republicans, with the Democratic-controlled Congress.

Disgust for Congress is higher than ever. But this time around, at least until recently, the disgust has seemed to be less partisan. The Democrats were not as ruthless or as skilled about associating the sins of Congress with the party that controls it.

So what do you need? Permission? You've got it. I give you permission to vote for -- or against -- the party and not the person. And don't forget to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0088042

kinsleym@washpost.com

What Democrats Would Do (WP)

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Their agenda is a hodgepodge of good ideas, bad ideas and no ideas.

PERHAPS, AS President Bush says, it's too early for Democrats to be "measuring their drapes" in congressional leadership offices. But with it looking increasingly as if Democrats, after 12 years in the minority, will take over the House at least, it's worth looking at their stated agenda -- "A New Direction for America" -- for a glimpse at what a Democratic majority might entail.

On national security, the House Democrats' plan offers more goals than details. Who could disagree with promises to "eliminate Osama Bin Laden, destroy terrorist networks like al-Qaeda, finish the job in Afghanistan and end the threat posed by the Taliban" or "redouble efforts to stop nuclear weapons development in Iran and North Korea?" But the hard part -- on which Democrats offer no details -- is how that is to be done.

On Iraq in particular, the agenda calls for "the responsible redeployment of U.S. forces," with "Iraqis assuming primary responsibility for securing and governing their country." Again, what's missing are the details of what "responsible redeployment" might look like. "Insist that Iraqis make the political compromises necessary to unite their country and defeat the insurgency," the Democrats say. Okay, what if that insistence doesn't yield the desired result?

As to another piece of the security agenda, energy independence, the Democrats assert that they will "achieve energy independence for America by 2020 by eliminating reliance on oil from the Middle East and other unstable regions of the world" -- a super-sized version of Mr. Bush's pledge to "replace more than 75 percent of our oil imports from the Middle East by 2025." The Democratic plan for doing this -- tax credits and research funds -- sounds remarkably like the Bush approach, down to increased use of switch-grass ethanol. Unlike the president, the Democrats rightly frame energy independence as an environmental as well as national security issue; like the president, they're unwilling -- for the obvious reason that they don't want to be branded as tax-raisers -- to recommend a carbon tax.

The agenda is heavy on ideas -- raising the minimum wage, letting the government negotiate Medicare drug prices -- that may have more popular appeal than real-world impact, though we agree it's past time for the minimum wage to go up. Other proposals sound good but are bad policy. Screening 100 percent of cargo containers at the point of origin would be expensive, time-consuming and impractical. The vow to "prevent outsourcing of critical components of our national security infrastructure -- such as ports, airports and mass transit -- to foreign interests that put America at risk" is more Dubai ports demagoguery.

Making the first $3,000 of college tuition tax deductible would be a wasteful way -- albeit one that resonates with voters -- of ensuring affordability if Democrats don't impose an income cutoff; none is mentioned in the proposal. The laudable pledge to lift the ban on federal funding for embryonic stem cell research passed the Republican-controlled House and would almost certainly again face a presidential veto.

The Democrats promise a return to "pay as you go" budget discipline, something that is sorely overdue. But the agenda does not then explain how to pay for a raft of new spending and tax credits, from cutting college loan interest rates in half to doubling funding for basic research to giving a $1,000 match to middle- and working-class families that contribute at least that much to a retirement account.

The agenda is best on outlining a specific new ethics package (though it's questionable whether even a Democratic-controlled Senate would be willing to go along) and promising a legislative process that is more open and fair to the minority. It's weakest in what it doesn't say about how to tackle the looming surge in entitlement spending. Predictably, Democrats renew their vow not to "privatize Social Security in whole or in part"; equally predictably, they are silent about what, precisely, they would do to put Social Security and, even more important, Medicare on a sustainable and affordable course. Also unmentioned are trade and immigration, issues on which the party, as well as voters, are divided.

Campaign documents are, almost by definition, gauzy things -- long on poll-tested rhetoric and short on specifics. Elections aren't the best time for politicians to be playing up sacrifice and hard choices. House Democrats say their document isn't meant to be a comprehensive menu, just an indication of priorities. But Democrats will need to do better than what they've proposed in 2006 if they are given the chance to govern in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0088043

Running Against The Boogeyman (LAT)

Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Jonathan Chait: Party of ideas? Not the GOP

WHEN Republicans explain their strategy for the upcoming election, the two phrases they always use are "referendum election" and "choice election" — and the latter is how they want to frame this year's vote.

A referendum election is one in which voters make their decision on the basis of whether the party in power deserves to stay there. From the Republicans' point of view, that's very bad because almost everybody believes they have failed miserably.

A choice election, on the other hand, is one in which voters weigh the two parties against each other. That kind of election gives the Republicans a fighting chance. The subtext of a choice election is: We may have screwed everything up, but the other party is worse. That's how President Bush won reelection.

In principle, the Republicans are right about this. Democracy is a process of compromises and imperfect choices. Asking the voters to compare the two sides is the right thing to do. The trouble is, that isn't really what the Republicans want to do at all.

How do I know this? Because the Democrats running for the House of Representatives actually have an agenda. Republicans aren't saying why the Democratic agenda is wrong, or why their own is better. They're just ignoring it.

If you're like most people, you probably have no idea what that agenda is. Let me list it:

• Put new rules in place to break the link between lobbyists and legislation.

• Enact all the recommendations made by the 9/11 commission.

• Raise the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour.

• Cut the interest rate on federally supported student loans in half.

• Allow the government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients.

• Broaden the types of stem cell research allowed with federal funds.

• Impose pay-as-you-go budget rules, requiring that new entitlement spending or tax cuts be offset with entitlement spending cuts or tax hikes.

Republicans disagree with all these items. Indeed, the reason these items are on the Democratic agenda is that Republicans in Congress have blocked them from coming up for a vote. So where's the Republican rebuttal?

Now, I'm not saying that the GOP needs to hold some Oxford-style intellectual debate. But shouldn't the party offer some rebuttal?

You know, "Raising the minimum wage would kill millions of jobs," or, "Pay-as-you-go budget rules will require tax hikes or cuts in your Medicare benefits," or, "Why should we waste billions of dollars preventing terrorist attacks that haven't even happened yet?" These are just some off-the-cuff suggestions. I'm sure Republican political consultants could do better.

My point is, we're not even getting a debate about a caricature of the Democratic position, let alone the actual one. Instead, we're getting things like this: GOP Rep. John Hostettler of Indiana is running an ad warning that if Democrats take power and California Democrat Nancy Pelosi becomes House speaker, she "will then put in motion her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda, led by Barney Frank, reprimanded by the House after paying for sex with a man who ran a gay brothel out of Congressman Frank's home."

What is the homosexual agenda? The ad does not say. (Apparently it involves raising the minimum wage and cutting the interest rate on government-backed student loans. I can just see it if the Democrats win — all those gay Wal-Mart employees, cackling with glee as they use their fat $7.25-an-hour salaries to pay off their suddenly puny college debts.)

Which is my point. Republicans don't want an actual choice election, they want to run against a mythological Democratic Party so frightening that the voters overlook all the GOP's failures.

Not all the Republican campaigns are as vicious and mindless as Hostettler's. But nearly all of those campaigns are trying to run against a boogeyman. They raise the specter of a radical Democratic agenda, but they refuse to say what they don't like about that agenda. And there's a good reason for that: It's popular.

Racism Enters The Races (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0088044

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

The ads may not be overt, but across the country campaigns are trying to tap into a vein of fear and bigotry.

IT'S THAT TIME of year. A nip is in the air, the football season is nearly halfway over, the holidays are almost upon us and right on schedule — just before the Nov. 7 elections — the airwaves are full of racially tinged politicking. Republicans and Democrats, Northerners and Southerners alike, are attempting to tap a vein of voter fear and bigotry.

Commercials clearly pandering to prejudice, such as the infamous 1988 Willie Horton spot that painted Gov. Michael S. Dukakis as soft on crime and Sen. Jesse Helms' 1990 ad blaming affirmative action for taking jobs from white men, are yesterday's style. Today's is all about suggestion.

In Massachusetts, white Republican Kerry Healey, in a contest for governor with black Democrat Patrick Deval, is running a commercial that shows a nervous white woman being stalked. It ends with: "Deval Patrick, he should be ashamed — not governor," alluding to Deval's support for a rapist he believed was not guilty until a DNA test proved him wrong.

The spot is filmed from the perspective of the would-be attacker, and viewers are divided on what they see. Is the camera a stand-in for Deval? For black men in general? For attackers regardless of race?

Then there is the appalling flier recently put out by Democrats attacking Georgia Gov. George Ervin "Sonny" Perdue. It shows a photograph of a civil rights marcher being beaten to the ground by a white officer with the caption: "Remember this? Their last attempt to stop us from voting." Beneath is a photo of Perdue, the state's white governor, signing a voter identification bill into law, and the words: "Their current attempt to stop us from voting. Don't let the Bush/Perdue Republican Mafia take away our vote!"

Requiring an ID to vote is hardly the equivalent of racial disenfranchisement, but the ad taps into the anguish of the civil rights period and smears it all over the Republican leadership — without, of course, actually calling them baton-wielding racists.

The most masterful of the genre is the television spot in Tennessee targeting Harold Ford Jr. Ford is a black Democrat running for the Senate against Republican Bob Corker, and the commercial ends with a bare-shouldered blond urging Ford, a bachelor, to call her.

Ford admitted that he attended a Super Bowl party sponsored by Playboy, and social conservatives in Tennessee might be offended by this regardless of anyone's race. So isn't the issue fair game? Probably. And would it be better or worse for the ad's sponsors to insinuate that Ford's flirting must be with a black Playboy hostess instead?

Context provides the moral thicket. Consider that when South Carolina finally repealed its Constitution's ban on interracial marriage in 1998 — 31 years after the U.S. Supreme Court struck down such laws — almost half of white voters voted to keep it in place. These ads and commercials themselves may not be overtly racist, they just hope you are.

On Campaign Stop, Bush Rallies Loyalists (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Indiana Event Kicks Off Stretch-Run Appearances for Embattled GOP Candidates

SELLERSBURG, Ind., Oct. 28 -- After months of fundraising, President Bush plunged into retail politicking for the first time this campaign season, telling a raucous crowd of several thousand Republican partisans on Saturday that the Democrats would raise taxes and retreat from Iraq if they win control of Congress next week.

The cheers were deafening inside the packed gymnasium at Silver Creek High School here when Bush emerged beaming, with his blue shirt-sleeves rolled up, alongside endangered Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R-Ind.).

The crowd interrupted the president repeatedly with loud applause and chants of "USA! USA!" as he cast the Nov. 7 midterm elections as a decisive turning point in the affairs of the country.

"The outcome of this election will determine how much money you have in your pocket," Bush shouted, his voice seeming to crack at points. "The outcome of this election will determine whether this government does its most fundamental job, and that is to protect the American people."

Bush has devoted considerable time and energy raising money for GOP candidates around the country, but Saturday's event represented the first time he has tried to rally grass-roots Republican voters. White House officials have said the new campaign finance law restricting the use of unregulated campaign contributions for such events has made it harder for candidates to stage such rallies.

DOJ_NMG_0088045

But Bush has also had to be careful about where to go, since in many states and congressional districts his presence could work against GOP candidates. Democrats have aired television ads targeting an assortment of Republican candidates by showing footage of them with Bush, whose popularity has slid markedly in the last year.

With 10 days to go until the election, Bush said Saturday he was going to "sprint to the finish line," and rallies are planned in the coming week in Georgia, Texas, Nevada and Montana, where incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns (R) is in a desperate battle to save his seat. White House officials are hoping the president's visits will energize GOP voters, a key factor in their assessment that they can still retain their congressional majorities.

In an interview Friday, White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten indicated Bush will not back away from his sharp focus on national security, and discounted polls suggesting the administration may be driving away independent voters with its policy on Iraq.

"The Iraq war has been a strain on this country for good reason. Nobody should like seeing on the screen the losses that we and the Iraqis are suffering there," Bolten said. "But I think when you vacillate on the principles you believe in, you end up alienating your base without winning the middle."

Bolten said that Bush remains undeterred from his basic approach to governing.

"A lot of the winning and losing here is going to be done in individual races that have almost nothing to do with the national policies," he said. "Clearly this is going to be a very close election for control. And there's a number of Republican seats now in jeopardy because of the Foley scandal, Bob Ney. . . . I don't think that actually implicates the fundamental policy or political strategy. I don't expect either a defeat or a repudiation."

Following the Indiana rally, Bush flew to South Carolina for a Republican National Committee fundraiser and a spirited rally with troops at Charleston Air Force Base.

Indiana, a heavily Republican state, is shaping up as a critical battleground in next week's elections, with at least three GOP incumbents high on the Democrats' target list. In the 9th District, which includes Sellersburg and other southern parts of the state, Sodrel ousted Democratic incumbent Baron Hill by 1,425 votes in 2004. He now faces a fierce rematch with the former high school basketball star.

Many high-profile figures of both parties have been here on behalf of the candidates, with former president Bill Clinton appearing for Hill and first lady Laura Bush and Vice President Cheney helping Sodrel raise campaign funds. Sodrel told the crowd Saturday that he was "proud to stand" with the president.

Hill used Bush's visit to attack Sodrel as a "rubber stamp for the administration."

In Washington, meanwhile, Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) reacted sharply to Bush's latest attacks on Democrats, saying that this Halloween the Bush administration was "running its national security policy like a Charlie Brown special" and was disguising the "scary facts" about the war.

Although the Indiana crowd was wild in its enthusiasm, at least one backer of the president voiced some anxiety about Iraq. Samantha Grimm, a registered nurse, said she "absolutely" supports the president on the war but asked: "When is it going to be over -- when do you say enough is enough?"

Bush reprised familiar themes about taxes and the war. However, he employed a new rhetorical device, as he once again accused congressional Democrats of repeatedly trying to block his anti-terrorism policies. Democrats say they simply want to carry out such policies while safeguarding rights.

"In all these vital measures for fighting the war on terror, the Democrats in Washington follow a simple philosophy: Just say no," Bush said. "When it comes to listening in on the terrorists, what's the Democratic answer? 'Just say no.' When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democrat answer?"

"Just say no," the crowd replied.

Bush Rallies Base To 'Just Say No' (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

DOJ_NMG_0088046

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

SELLERSBURG, Ind. -- President Bush yesterday yelled himself hoarse in his first public political rally of the 2006 election campaign, whipping thousands of supporters into chants of "USA!" as he criticized Democrats for being weak on national security and anxious to increase taxes.

Swooping into a Republican stronghold that on Election Day will be an early harbinger of whether Republicans hold control of Congress, Mr. Bush led the crowd in a chant that gave new meaning to an old Reagan-era slogan.

"The Democrats in Washington follow a simple philosophy: Just say no," the president said.

"When it comes to listening in on the terrorists, what's the Democratic answer? Just say no. When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democrat answer?" Mr. Bush asked.

"Just say no!" the crowd shouted.

"So when the Democrats ask for your vote on Nov. 7, what are you going to say?"

"Just say no!" the audience replied.

With just nine days to go before the midterm elections, the White House has settled on a simple strategy: Turn out the base.

Yesterday's rally in the Ohio River Valley was aimed at boosting Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel, who is in a tough re-election battle with former Rep. Baron Hill. It was the first of Mr. Bush's nearly 90 political events this season that was open to the public. The latest poll shows Mr. Hill opening up a double-digit lead on Mr. Sodrel, who won the seat in 2004 by fewer than 1,500 votes. The president beat Sen. John Kerry in 2004 with 59 percent of the vote in this southern Indiana district.

Mr. Bush has spent the past few weeks visiting other districts he won handily in 2004, but where Republican candidates are struggling to hold on to conservative voters.

Last week, Mr. Bush raised funds for a Republican in Sarasota, Fla., where the president beat Sen. John Kerry by a 13-point margin in 2004. Even though Republicans outnumber Democrats 2-to-1 in the district, the party's candidate, car salesman Vern Buchanan, trails his opponent by 11 points in the latest poll.

The White House views a handful of races along the borders of Indiana, Kentucky and Ohio as pivotal to holding control of the House.

"The Ohio River Valley is the problem," a senior administration official said last week on the condition of anonymity. "I think we've got three seats really at risk."

Rep. John Hostettler, an incumbent whose district is in the southwestern part of Indiana, is trailing by seven points in the most recent poll. Several candidates in Ohio, including Rep. Steve Chabot, whose district borders Kentucky, are locked in tossup battles.

In Kentucky, another handful of races in districts along the river could determine who controls Congress. Rep. Anne M. Northup, who recently split with the president by calling for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, is in a tossup race. Rep. Geoff Davis, the Republican running in a district that in 2004 delivered a 27-point victory for Mr. Bush, cannot pull away from his opponent, former Rep. Ken Lucas.

"If we lose three and [zero], it's going to be a very close-run thing, but we'll probably keep the House. ...That is to say, lose two or three in Indiana and lose none in Kentucky," the administration official said. "If it's two and [zero], we'll keep the House. If it's two and one, it's going to be a very close-run thing."

The White House knows the stakes in the Ohio River Valley: First lady Laura Bush, former first lady Barbara Bush and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, have all made recent visits to Clark County, Ind. Press secretary Tony Snow drops into nearby Jeffersonville tomorrow.

Yesterday's presidential visit to Clark County, the first since Lyndon B. Johnson stopped here in 1964 to dedicate a post office, sent this tiny town into a tizzy. Residents lined the streets awaiting the motorcade, and businesses along Indiana Avenue posted "Welcome President Bush" signs.

The 4,000 supporters packed into a high school gymnasium remained on their feet throughout the president's 33-minute speech. They booed whenever Mr. Bush mentioned Democrats such as "the member from California, the ranking leader, the minority leader in the House, who wants to be the speaker ...."

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, he said, claims to "love tax cuts."

"Given her record, she must be a secret admirer," he said. Ticking off a list of votes the San Francisco liberal has cast against tax cuts, he broke the crowd up when he leaned into the microphone and shouted: "If this is the Democrats' idea of love, I wouldn't want to see what hate looks like."

Afterward, as the crowd filed out of Silver Creek High School, David Blocker of Elizabeth, Ind., said he "loved the speech."

The owner of a trucking company, who was wearing a shirt that said, "W -- Still the President," said he supports Mr. Bush's war on terrorism.

But Annette Dailey, a part-time UPS worker, said she will cast her vote against Mr. Sodrel, based on the president's Iraq policy.

"I've got three little boys, and I'd really like to see us get out of the role of being the world's bully," she said inside the family room of her home, which bore a yard sign for Mr. Hill. "I'm worried that 15 years from now, when they're of age, we're still going to be at war. I'd like for us to get back to where we take care of our own country first."

A Warm Welcome For Bush The Campaigner, In Indiana (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

SELLERSBURG, Ind., Oct. 28 — In an appearance that amounted to his first traditional campaign rally of the election season, President Bush on Saturday told wildly cheering supporters here that Democrats did not want to investigate, prosecute or even detain terrorists and had no plan for Iraq.

And, introducing a relatively new line in his election-year stump speech, Mr. Bush criticized the "activist" New Jersey Supreme Court's ruling this week that same-sex couples were entitled to the same legal rights and benefits as heterosexual couples.

"We believe that marriage is a union between a man and a woman and should be defended," Mr. Bush said, reminding the crowd of his two conservative Supreme Court appointees, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. "I will continue to appoint judges who strictly interpret the law."

Aides said Mr. Bush's appearance on Saturday was the first of many planned for the final days before the Nov. 7 election, as he pivots from the role of fund-raiser in chief to that of cheerleader in chief.

For Mr. Bush, it was a return to the kind of campaigning he likes best. He gave his speech in rolled-up shirtsleeves, standing before an ecstatic crowd packed into a high school gymnasium. They waved pompoms and held signs that said "Welcome to Bush Country" or simply "W," and hooted their support with deafening enthusiasm. Their cheers nearly overwhelmed the shouts of an antiwar demonstrator, whose protests were barely audible, and occasionally drowned out the president.

Mr. Bush went onstage with Representative Mike Sodrel, one of three Indiana Republicans facing tough Democratic opposition this year. The president's list of Democrats' deficiencies included their votes against the administration's program to wiretap phone conversations of terrorism suspects without warrants and their opposition to trying terrorism suspects in special military tribunals without habeas corpus.

"In all these vital measures for fighting the war on terror, the Democrats in Washington follow a simple philosophy: Just Say No," Mr. Bush said, borrowing the line from Nancy Reagan's 1980s campaign against drugs. He continued that theme in a call-and-response with the crowd, asking, "When it comes to listening in on the terrorists, what's the Democratic answer?"

"Just say no," the audience answered.

"When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democratic answer?" Mr. Bush asked.

"Just say no," the crowd of roughly 4,000 answered.

"When the Democrats ask for your vote November the seventh, what are you going to say?" Mr. Bush asked.

"Just say no," the crowd replied.

Democrats and some Republicans in Congress have pushed for greater restrictions on the president's authority to order wiretaps without warrants. Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said they had called for a more solid legal foundation in trying terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0088048

Mr. Manley said the president was practicing “the politics of fear and smear.”

“Of course we want to listen to and detain terrorists,” Mr. Manley said. “We just don’t want to give the president a blank check.”

Continuing his national security theme, Mr. Bush left here for South Carolina to attend a rally for troops at the Charleston Air Force Base.

To a crowd of hundreds of servicemembers gathered on the tarmac, Mr. Bush gave a streamlined version of his stump speech, removing direct mention of Democrats or the coming election, and appeared to direct criticism at the opposition.

“I know some in America don’t believe Iraq is the central front in the war on terror — that’s fine, and they can have that opinion,” Mr. Bush said. “But Osama bin Laden knows it’s the central front in the war on terror.”

And he offered words for those who have lost loved ones in the war.

“I make them this pledge,” he said. “We will honor their sacrifice by completing the mission, by defeating the terrorists and laying the foundation of peace for generations to come.”

Mr. Bush has not set aside his fund-raising duties entirely. On Saturday evening, he appeared at a private event for the Republican National Committee on Kiawah Island, a resort community off the coast of South Carolina, that organizers said raised about $1 million.

In Campaign Mode, Bush Takes On Dems (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

SELLERSBURG, Ind. (AP) — President Bush, campaigning aggressively ahead of the high-stakes Nov. 7 elections, said Saturday Democrats should not be trusted to control Congress because they have no idea how to win in Iraq.

"I want you to think about the Democrat plan for success. There isn't one," Bush told thousands of energized Republicans packed into a high school gymnasium. "They are in agreement on one thing — they will leave before the job is done, and we will not let them."

The rally was aimed at boosting GOP Rep. Mike Sodrel, facing former Democratic Rep. Baron Hill for the third time in a rural southern Indiana district so evenly divided between the parties that each man has won once.

Before leaving Washington, the president spoke for 50 minutes with Iraq's prime minister, seeking to ease recent tensions over a U.S. plan for benchmarks for reducing the violence.

Until the Indiana campaign stop, all of Bush's approximately 90 political events in the 2005-2006 election season were fundraisers with donors willing to pay a high price to see him.

The rally was the president's first free appearance and came in the final stretch of an election that will determine whether Republicans retain their majorities in the House and Senate.

The president has five more rallies scheduled so far through Thursday, in Texas, Montana and Nevada, and two in Georgia.

Later Saturday in South Carolina, Bush spoke to troops on a tarmac at Charleston Air Force Base, repeating his full-throated defense of his Iraq policy in a speech that was stripped of its earlier partisan jabs. But the appearance created potent images, as Bush, surrounded by troops in camouflage, strode into his audience's view from between hulking C-17 cargo planes as soaring music blared.

"It's a hard fight," the president said of Iraq. "And we've got a lot of brave citizens of ours in the midst of the fight. But we have a plan for victory."

The president also raised money for the Republican National Committee at a resort and spa on picturesque Kiawah Island. That fundraiser and one with Vice President Dick Cheney on Friday night, also on Kiawah, were expected to bring in $1 million total.

At the Indiana rally, a large group of protesters gathered across the road. But inside the steamy gym, the president basked in the reception. The screaming, foot-stomping audience frequently drowned out his words with applause, chants and cheers.

He was interrupted several times by people calling for the troops to come home, but supporters countered with "USA" chants.

DOJ_NMG_0088049

Bush — his sleeves rolled up, a wide grin on his face — gave out hugs and handshakes, cuddled babies passed up to him over the crowd and waved at his supporters. The wear of the campaign season showed in his voice, which sounded as if it might soon give out.

To support his claim that Democrats are offering no clear alternative to his leadership on Iraq, the president noted some Democrats have urged an immediate pullout of U.S. troops from Iraq, while others have advocated a specific date by which all American soldiers will come home or cutting off money for the war.

"Five years after September the 11th, too many Democrats still do not get it," Bush said. "The best way to protect the homeland is to find the enemy and defeat them overseas."

A new Associated Press-AOL News poll that found likely voters — angry at Bush and citing Iraq and the economy as their top issues — overwhelmingly prefer Democrats over Republicans. The poll found voters think Democrats would do a better job on Iraq by a 15-point margin.

And though Democrats have not coalesced around one Iraq strategy, the president's talk of benchmarks, tactics and goals has been criticized as also not clear. Bush refuses, for instance, to say what the consequences would be for the Iraqi government if it does not meet benchmarks.

"Since 2003, President Bush has laid out nine different plans for victory in Iraq, none of them serious and none of them workable. And most seriously, this incompetence has hindered our ability to fight international terror," said the Democratic candidate for Senate in Virginia, Jim Webb. A decorated Vietnam combat veteran whose son is on active duty in Iraq, Webb was selected to speak for his party in delivering the weekly radio response to Bush.

In recent days, a feud between the Bush administration and the Iraqi government has put the White House on the defensive and undermined the president's attempt to put a new face on his much-criticized Iraq strategy. After the videoconference, Bush and al-Maliki issued a joint statement saying they were "committed to the partnership."

Bush has taken lately to pleading with voters not to see the election as a done deal, trying Saturday to prevent GOP complacence with criticism of Democratic votes against his controversial proposal for detaining, interrogating and trying suspected terrorists

"In all these vital measures for fighting the war on terror, the Democrats in Washington follow a simple philosophy: Just say no," he said.

"So when the Democrats ask for your vote on November the 7th, what are you going to say?" Bush yelled. "Just say no!" the audience yelled back.

Also Saturday, on a conference call aimed at boosting Republican turnout, Bush told 3,000 local-level Republican activists of his electoral confidence.

In his speech, Bush stuck to his theme that Democrats would raise taxes if they gain control of Congress. "They want to get in your pocketbook," he said. "We're not going to let them."

Bush Picks His Battles In Friendly Country (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske And James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

The president is in public campaign mode for Republicans -- and making sure to go only where he's wanted.

At his first campaign rally this election season, President Bush on Saturday galvanized supporters in a packed high school gym by pledging to oppose gay marriage, a theme Republican candidates have revived in the wake of a New Jersey court ruling in favor of gay couples.

"Activist judges try to define America by court order," Bush told the crowd of 4,000 at Silver Creek High School, flanked by Rep. Mike Sodrel (R-Ind.), who is running for reelection. "Just this week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage. We believe marriage is the union between a man and a woman."

At that, the raucous crowd went wild, shouting "USA," stomping their feet and shaking dozens of red, white and blue pompoms.

DOJ_NMG_0088050

The New Jersey Supreme Court last week ruled that gay and lesbian couples in that state should have all the rights and benefits of marriage; the justices left it up to legislators to decide whether to call such partnerships marriages or civil unions. Same-sex marriage was a motivating issue for social conservatives in the 2004 election, but has been overshadowed in this year's campaign by the war in Iraq.

Constitutional amendments banning same-sex marriage will be on the ballot in eight states this November, including South Carolina, which Bush visited late Saturday to greet troops and attend a campaign fundraiser outside Charleston.

Bush has appeared at private fundraisers for individual candidates, but now is launching a string of five preelection public rallies in the next four days. He's speaking out on tax cuts, national security and same-sex marriage while playing to his base of conservative Republicans in such strongholds as Sellersburg, Statesboro, Ga., and Sugar Land, Texas.

With Republican control of Congress at risk, the president's visits and tone could determine the fate of a handful of close races.

Besieged Republican candidates have distanced themselves from the president in recent debates, TV ads and closed fundraisers as his approval rating remained below 40% this month. It has become increasingly difficult for the party to take advantage of the office of the president, GOP strategists say.

Democrats in Maryland, Missouri and Pennsylvania have launched ads that remind voters of their opponents' support for Bush.

"Michael Steele: Right for Bush, wrong for Maryland," says one of the latest TV ads from Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, which features Lt. Gov. Steele praising Bush at the 2004 Republican National Convention. Steele is challenging Cardin.

On Friday, Democrat Jerry McNerney invited Bush to return to California's 11th District and campaign for Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Tracy), whom the president visited last month, because he "reminds voters that both Bush and Pombo are satisfied with the lack of ethics and integrity in Congress." McNerney is trying to unseat Pombo.

Bush's travel schedule was plotted last week based on where he could do the most good for candidates who are in close races in Republican areas, said Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto. Sodrel won his southern Indiana district two years ago by 1,425 of 283,000 votes. The president carried the district that year with 59% of the vote.

"He's going to tight races where we think his presence can help put a guy over the line," Fratto said.

The campaign landscape has changed dramatically since the midterm election of 2002, when Bush's approval rating was 64%. Back then, Bush targeted battleground districts for large, boisterous rallies.

But he has been more low-key this campaign season. At a Thursday fundraising rally in Michigan that brought in $700,000 for the Senate campaign of Mike Bouchard, a catering hall smaller than a high school gymnasium was less than half full.

Bush is to focus on red states during the coming week in the hope of drawing crowds and boosting beleaguered Republican House campaigns in states he won by large margins in 2004.

"That's where he's more useful," said Charles Black, a Republican strategist close to presidential advisor Karl Rove.

In a blue state like Pennsylvania, a presidential visit could hurt Republican Sen. Rick Santorum more than it helps, Black said. The state is home to 600,000 more Democrats than Republicans, voter registration records indicate.

"To win, [Santorum] needs to get all the Republicans and some of the Democrats. Well, the president's influence is good on the Republicans but could work against him among Democrats, so why put him there?" Black said.

Bush plans to campaign Monday in Sugar Land, where former Rep. Tom DeLay was a political fixture for more than a decade — more evidence of the degree to which Republicans are struggling. DeLay carried 63% of the vote two years ago and Bush won 64% in 2004. But the former House majority leader abandoned his reelection bid and resigned his seat after former aides pleaded guilty in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

The president is also scheduled to make repeat visits Monday and Tuesday to two Georgia districts, starting with a rally Monday in Statesboro for Max Burns, a Republican seeking to unseat incumbent Democratic Rep. John Barrow.

The district is so Republican, and so pro-Bush, that even Barrow is airing television ads that proclaim: "I agree with George Bush."

On Thursday, Bush is to hold a rally in Billings, Mont. — he won the state with 59% of the vote two years ago — then stop in Nevada.

DOJ_NMG_0088051

Bush will probably make 20 stops before election day to help House candidates, possibly in Ohio, North Carolina, Iowa, Indiana and Florida, according to GOP strategist Scott Reed.

"In this phase of the game, it's about winning a day in the news, and a visit by the president will about guarantee you win the day," Reed said.

He called Bush's agenda "a last-minute flurry to limit the losses … and keep the House from going Democrat."

molly.hennessy-fiske@
latimes.com
james.gerstenzang@
latimes.com

Hennessy-Fiske reported from Indiana and Gerstenzang from Washington.

Partisan Rhetoric Even In Wartime Sets Bush Apart (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

President Bush and Republicans in many of the nation's key races are presenting divergent, even contradictory, visions of how Washington should operate after next week's election.

Around the country, GOP incumbents and challengers alike are running against the relentless partisan conflict that defined the final years of Bill Clinton's presidency and have colored virtually every day of Bush's.

From House members such as Christopher Shays in Connecticut to Sens. Jim Talent in Missouri and Mike DeWine in Ohio and Senate challengers in Maryland, New Jersey and Tennessee, Republicans almost everywhere are presenting themselves as flexible and independent problem solvers who will reach across party lines to build consensus on difficult issues.

Bush is moving in the opposite direction. As he often does when he's under political pressure, he's accentuating the disagreements between the parties and presenting the differences in the starkest possible terms. He's displayed that instinct most clearly in the highly charged way he has framed the debate over Iraq and the war on terrorism.

Bush now routinely labels Democrats "the party of cut-and-run." At a recent Republican fundraiser, Bush went much further. "The Democrat Party … has evolved from one that was confident in its capacity to help deal with the problems of the world to one that … has an approach of doubt and defeat," he declared.

Bush has absorbed his share of body blows from Democrats criticizing his management of the war. But tagging his rivals as the party of "defeat" is nonetheless extraordinary language for a commander in chief to use in a political campaign.

Other wartime presidents have been much more reluctant to argue that only their party was committed to success. Consider the way President Johnson approached the 1966 elections as the Vietnam War was escalating. To begin with, Johnson spent most of that October away from the campaign, on a 17-day tour of Asia that included Vietnam.

Then, at a news conference just before election day, Johnson dismissed the idea that congressional losses for the Democratic Party would affect either the thinking of the North Vietnamese or America's support for the troops in the field. If Republicans gained seats, he continued, "They may talk, and argue, and fight, and criticize, and play politics from time to time, but when they call the vote on supporting the men … in the Senate it will be 83 to 2 and in the House it will be 410-5."

In 1942, the first election after Pearl Harbor, President Franklin D. Roosevelt was even more emphatic about separating war and politics. Roosevelt spent much of that fall visiting defense facilities on a tour during which he barred press coverage and insisted on being accompanied by Republican as well as Democratic local officials. When the chairman of the Democratic National Committee suggested that a GOP takeover of the House would be bad for the country, Roosevelt publicly rebuked him.

Even President Nixon displayed more restraint during the 1970 midterm election. Nixon barnstormed the country asking voters to elect members of Congress who would support his war policy. But he took pains to avoid claiming that only his party wanted to win. "This is not a partisan issue," Nixon declared that October at a rally for a Texas Republican Senate candidate named George H.W. Bush.

Can that Bush's son succeed with his more polarizing strategy? It depends on how success is defined. His sharp attacks on Democrats could rally the conservative base enough to maintain a slim Senate majority by holding GOP seats in enough right-leaning states, such as Missouri and Tennessee. Though it seems much less likely, it might even help the GOP hold enough Republican-leaning House seats to eke out a tiny majority in that chamber.

DOJ_NMG_0088052

But even if Bush succeeds, such a result still will measure how much he has retreated from his hopes of building a broad majority coalition. From Connecticut to Colorado, he is facing enormous resistance this fall from voters outside his bedrock base of conservatives and Republicans. In polls, he now looks less like the president of all the people than the champion of a single faction.

In the latest Gallup poll, just 28% of independents and 24% of moderates approved of Bush's job performance. His support among Democrats and liberals registered in the single digits. In Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg polls last week of four states Bush carried in 2004 — Ohio, Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia — only majorities of Republicans and conservatives said the country should continue on the course he's set out. In each case less than one-third of independents, and less than one-fifth of moderates, agreed. Don't even ask what Democrats and liberals think.

Even if Republicans hold one or both congressional chambers, future presidential candidates in both parties are likely to question a political strategy that generates so much division. Matthew Dowd, the senior strategist for Bush's 2004 reelection campaign, says the smart candidates for 2008 will learn more from the politicians this year pursuing common ground.

Example A may be California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, whom Dowd is advising. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, is heading for a convincing victory in the biggest blue state of all by offering a hybrid left-right agenda that bridges the ideological differences Bush routinely inflames. Schwarzenegger "is going to win primarily because of his leadership style over the last year: bipartisan, consensus, let's not look at things as an ideology," Dowd predicts. "It should send a signal to anybody running in '08."

More immediately, the response to Schwarzenegger and the other candidates promising reconciliation should tell Bush and lawmakers in both parties that after November's vote, America wants them to put aside their own war long enough to find a new direction in Iraq and more consensus on stubborn problems at home.

ronald.brownstein@latimes.com

Ronald Brownstein's column appears every Sunday. See current and past Brownstein columns at http://www.latimes.com/brownstein .

Iraq War's Unpopularity Sours Many Voters On The Republicans' Swagger (BOS)

By Susan Milligan

The Boston Globe, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- They strode into Washington talking tough and wearing cowboy boots. One warned of faceless terrorists who "drive taxi cabs in the daytime and kill at night." Others linked homosexuality to bigamy and incest. Together, they unapologetically froze out the minority Democrats on Capitol Hill.

Now, the Republican Party's chief swashbucklers are a politically endangered species. Lawmakers who have been running Washington with a strong hand and even stronger rhetoric are themselves scrambling for reelection in Senate races in Pennsylvania, Montana, and Virginia.

Republicans built and expanded their majorities with a commanding style and tough stances on terrorism and other issues, a leadership style many voters found appealing in a post-9/11 world, analysts say. And the GOP is still hoping to hang on to some critical seats by portraying Democrats as weak-kneed and soft on terrorism.

But the increasing unpopularity of the Iraq war is making some voters tire of the defiant demeanor showcased by the majority party in recent years, analysts say -- a special problem for those whose political style most resembles President Bush.

"The less successful the war has been, the less plausible it has been for Bush to be stomping around in his cowboy boots," said Ralph Whitehead , a professor at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. "The plausibility of Bush's electoral swagger as the campaigner-in-chief for his party depends to some extent on the plausibility of his military swagger as commander-in-chief of his country's presence in Iraq."

House and Senate leaders are suffering too, from a voter backlash against the "hubris" of the GOP majority, said Marshall Wittmann , a former staffer to Republican Senator John McCain who now works for the Progressive Policy Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0088053

When the nation was united in the drive to find Osama bin Laden -- "dead or alive," as Bush vowed -- Americans were attracted to the hard-line talk of Washington's Republican leaders. But with bin Laden still at large and the death toll mounting in Iraq, some voters are opting for candidates favoring a less rigid approach.

Several of the party's most outspokenly partisan lawmakers have already been forced out of office. Former House majority leader Tom DeLay , the Texas Republican and onetime exterminator who brazenly -- and very successfully -- marginalized Democrats in the House, is now out of his job and facing a trial for allegedly misdirecting campaign funds.

Representative Bob Ney , who pleaded guilty to corruption charges, said he will quit his Ohio seat. And California's swaggering former Representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham -- who once warned that Senator John F. Kerry of Massachusetts would become a "Jane Fonda commander-in-chief" -- is now in prison for taking bribes.

President Bush's approval ratings are running about 40 percent, while Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld -- whose irascible nature charmed much of Washington five years ago, making him a model of an alpha male, now faces frequent demands for his resignation, including from Republicans in close election campaigns.

California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger -- who once called his Democratic opponents "girlie men" -- has dialed down his rhetoric since he lost several statewide referendums and is now widely favored to win reelection Nov. 7.

But several sitting senators who have defined Washington's swaggering Republican are fighting to keep their jobs. Two-term Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum, who chairs the GOP Conference in the Senate and who once was considered a contender for his party's 2008 presidential nomination, is now trailing badly in the polls against Democrat Bob Casey Jr.

Santorum's blunt rhetoric against abortion and homosexuality won him points among Christian conservatives, but his comments about working women and gays have come back to haunt him this year. His comments to the Globe last year blaming Boston's "liberalism" for the Catholic church sex abuse crisis has also hurt him in some swing communities, analysts said, but Santorum has not toned down his demeanor.

"With Santorum, there's no warm. It's hot or cold with him," said Jon Delano , a political scientist at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh. Added Whitehead: "He's gone from talking to his base to yelling at his base. He's not talking to any swing voters."

Senator George Allen , too, is facing a tough fight for reelection. The cowboy-boot-wearing Allen, with his penchant for Confederate memorabilia, has been a mainstay of the GOP's conservative base. But a series of gaffes this year have damaged him.

Since then, Allen has softened his demeanor somewhat, noting in a CNN interview that his recently discovered Jewish heritage has reinforced his commitment to equality. "I have been a leader for fighting against anti-Semitism and intolerance, but now it's personal," Allen said.

In Montana, Senator Conrad Burns is in an uphill fight against Democrat Jon Tester. Burns -- who once referred to Arabs as "ragheads" -- this year called his house painter "a nice little Guatemalan man," and said the United States is under threat from terrorists who "drive taxi cabs in the daytime and kill at night," prompting criticism from Muslims.

Howard Reiter , a political science professor at the University of Connecticut, said female voters especially are being turned off this year by the tough-talking Republicans, accounting for a substantial gender gap in some close races.

And the mere fact that Republicans have controlled both chambers of Congress and the White House for most of the last six years has made voters less patient with the politicians' style, Delano said. What sounded like confidence and decisiveness in past campaigns now seems arrogant, he said.

"I think people are tired of division and partisan politics," Delano said. "And because Republicans are running the show, they bear the brunt of the blame, fairly or not."

Democrats Push To Counter G.O.P. In Turnout Race (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088054

VINITA PARK, Mo., Oct. 28 — Democrats are pushing into high gear this weekend a sharply expanded campaign to get their voters to the polls, even as some party leaders expressed anxiety that Republicans would again out-organize them in the approximately 20 House and 3 Senate races that both sides agree will determine the outcome of the midterm elections.

After two national elections in which Republicans' sophisticated get-out-the-vote operation helped them triumph over their opponents, Democrats have invested heavily in catching up.

The success of that effort could be crucial to their hopes on Nov. 7. Notwithstanding polls that show broad Democratic strength, control of Congress appears to rest on a relatively few races in which the candidates are separated by razor-thin margins. Those are precisely the kinds of races where turnout efforts can make a difference, and the Republicans' track record on getting their supporters to the polls in districts they focus on is a primary reason that the White House continues to express confidence that it can at least limit Democratic gains this year.

Howard Dean, the Democratic national chairman, said Friday that he was confident that a swell of enthusiasm among Democratic voters, combined with what he characterized as despondency among Republicans, would push Democrats to victory, an assessment that even some Republican strategists said they shared. But in an interview, Mr. Dean said that Republicans continued to have a clear superiority in identifying voters they can persuade to vote for their candidates and then getting them to cast ballots.

"I think we've closed the gap, but I don't think we are there yet," Mr. Dean said. "It's going to take some time. I think we could match them in 2008, if everything goes right, in voter turnout."

Other Democratic leaders disputed Mr. Dean's view, saying they were increasingly confident about their party's ability to achieve parity, and perhaps regain its dominance, against the Republican get-out-the-vote machinery. Democrats pointed to evidence of what the party's $35 million in spending on turnout programs, nearly matching Republicans, has given them in tight races like the Senate campaign here in Missouri, where Senator Jim Talent, a Republican, won office in 2002 by just 21,000 votes.

But Democratic Party leaders acknowledged structural shortcomings that could continue to give Republicans the advantage. Republicans have spent the past three years building a detailed national database of voters, including their voting history and consumer data that the party has used to predict their political leanings and identify the issues that most motivate them. The Democrats' voter list is not as expansive or comprehensive, though Mr. Dean said he hoped that would be repaired by the next presidential election

And while Republicans have centralized their turnout operation under the Republican National Committee, Democrats have been forced to maneuver within a fractured system involving a series of different committees and private groups, sometimes working at cross purposes, from district to district across the country.

"These other groups are calling: stem cell research, labor unions," said Charlene Zeni Connolly, 57, a retired teacher who was making calls near here recently on behalf of Claire McCaskill, the Democratic candidate for Senate. "People are getting really irritated. They are saying, 'If you call again, I won't vote for her.' "

For all that, evidence of newfound Democratic attention to getting out the vote, an area of politics where the party once dominated, was on display here and in other parts of the country this week as turnout operations, many in the making for nearly two years, began to unfold their final 10-day plans.

For two cold and rainy hours the other night, Brendan Fahey, 27, a two-time Iraq war veteran, led a team of three Democratic workers on a door-knocking mission through a trim, middle-class neighborhood of two-family brick homes in this city northwest of St. Louis. They careened from house to house — holding street maps and a computer-generated list of likely supporters gleaned from two years of market research, telephone calls and earlier visits — as they executed the final stages of a plan began when Democratic Party strategists opened offices here 15 months ago.

In Florida, the campaign of Ron Klein, a Democrat challenging Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr., a Republican, made a final telephone canvass of voters who live in the state but spend the summers elsewhere, typically thousands of miles outside Mr. Shaw's district in Southern Florida, to make sure they were returning to their winter homes by Election Day or had voted by absentee ballot. As part of the "Snowbird Program," the Klein campaign said it had tracked down the Northern addresses and telephone numbers of thousands of Democratic and independent voters in anticipation of this week.

Through it all, Republicans have shown no sign of backing off, matching Democrats door for door and telephone for telephone.

"Do you want a lawn sign?" Tom Applewhite, 20, a St. Louis University student working for Mr. Talent, asked a woman who answered a door near here after she promised that she would indeed vote for Mr. Talent.

Mr. Applewhite, who had guided a squad of Republican volunteers for a relatively early afternoon tour to avoid the misstep of upsetting St. Louis Cardinals fans by banging on the door in the middle of the World Series games, went to his red Chevrolet pickup and returned with a "Talent for Senate" sign.

On Saturday, while in Indiana, Mr. Bush held a conference call with 300 Republican activists from around the country, to fire them up going into the final week, said Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman.

The emphasis on this fundamental element of campaigns came as the two parties made final, frenetic decisions about where to put advertising money and other resources, with Democrats trying to expand the playing field and Republicans building defenses around what they hope will be enough House and Senate seats to cling to control of Congress. Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to win the House, a prospect of which they are increasingly confident, while facing the tougher task of winning 6 seats to capture the Senate.

Emboldened by polls showing rising public unhappiness with Republicans, Democrats tried to open new fronts in some unlikely places, including Kansas, where Nancy Boyda, a Democrat, is challenging Representative Jim Ryun, who is seeking a sixth term. The race is so overlooked nationally that some Democratic officials in Washington joked they would not have been able to name the Democratic challenger before this week.

Republicans said they saw no evidence that Mr. Ryun was in trouble and suggested that Democrats were trying to rattle them. Still, the Republican Party began running advertisements to defend five more incumbents, in states including Colorado and New York, who are showing signs of slipping. And President Bush on Saturday began another series of swings into what had been solidly Republican territory to help generate more enthusiasm and raise money to help pay for the late advertising and voter turnout push.

In his assessment of his party's get-out-the-vote apparatus, Mr. Dean said he thought Republicans did have an advantage by running a centralized operation. He said that after the election he intended to call the leaders of the House and Senate Democratic committees "to try to build a relationship the way the Republicans do it."

He added, "I don't admire anything that Republicans have done to this country, but I greatly admire their election model, and that's what we intend to build, if not surpass, by 2008."

Mr. Dean's assessment that Democrats are still being outpaced by Republicans stood in contrast to the views offered by leaders of the House and Senate Democratic committee, some of whom have clashed with Mr. Dean about basic party-building strategies this year.

"We believe we are now equal to them," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is heading his party's campaign to take back the Senate. Referring to the Republican triumph in 2004, Mr. Schumer said: "We saw what they did and we said we can't be caught again that way. From the outset, we put a very large effort into this."

Karin Johanson, the executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that given the efforts of her committee and labor unions, "I think we are in very good shape right now."

Republicans said they noted, with concern but not surprise, that Democrats had taken lessons from them. "Democrats are smart, and they have learned from what we are doing," said Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee. "But I certainly think we learned a lot from what they did in 1998 and 2000."

Still, Republicans are hardly sanguine going into this election storm, even with the backstop of a get-out-the-vote operation.

Some party strategists, speaking on the condition of anonymity in offering a critique of their own operation, said they were worried that the Republican demoralization would sap some of the energy from the program, discouraging the final-weekend surge of volunteers that they found during happier campaigns. By contrast, Democrats are getting help this year in recruiting volunteers from an arena that has more often taunted Democratic officialdom, bloggers and groups like the A.F.L.-C.I.O. and MoveOn.org, which has started sophisticated Internet-based turnout operations that rival what even some party committees are doing.

DOJ_NMG_0088056

"We're in about 40 districts right now," said Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org. Mr. Pariser said his group had trained 70,000 people to use its Web-based program to call prospective Democratic voters on lists that MoveOn.org had assembled.

The two parties are planning to spend around $70 million on turnout operations, according to interviews, and in the process, they are expanding the very nature of what voter turnout means.

Republicans are using their phone callers not only to find supporters but also to push Republican lines of attacks, calculated to reflect the messages these same voters are presumably seeing in television advertisements or by watching Mr. Bush on the news. In recent days, Republicans working telephone banks were instructed to say that a Republican victory was crucial to holding down taxes and protecting the nation's security, the two messages that have proved particularly effective with Republican base voters.

Democrats, who have dutifully studied Republican successes in 2002 and 2004, have used consumer, demographic and polling data to predict the political leanings of infrequent voters. Here in Missouri, for example, canvassers are more likely to talk to single women about health care.

Because of Mr. Talent's narrow victory last time, Republicans and Democrats landed here hard and early this campaign, and both sides think that is what will make the difference in a race that could well determine which party controls the Senate next year.

"They are proud of their turnout operation," Ms. McCaskill said. "They think they have a machine-like operation in the Republican Party. They are just pouring money into it."

As Elections Near, Dueling With Dollars (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Party Operatives Try To Influence Races

John Lapp, a 35-year-old Democratic strategist in charge of spending $60 million to defeat Republicans, had reason to feel aggressive. Internal party polls late last week showed 30 GOP House incumbents tied or behind. Armed with that information, Lapp approved a series of television ads attacking Rep. Jim Ryun, a Republican from a conservative corner of Kansas who suddenly looked a lot more vulnerable than before.

A few blocks away on Capitol Hill, Carl Forti, with a similar budget to protect the GOP majority, was playing defense. His own polls showed a growing number of House Republicans in serious trouble. Forti, 34, had little choice but to buy ads to protect suddenly at-risk Reps. Charles Bass (N.H.) and John R. "Randy" Kuhl Jr. (N.Y.).

Lapp and Forti make dozens of decisions like these every day, and the outcomes will only grow in importance during this final full week of the 2006 campaign. Betting right could well decide who controls the House after the Nov. 7 midterm elections, and by how many seats, according to strategists in both parties.

Forti and Lapp run the independent expenditure arms of their parties' campaign committees, the place where many of the negative ads that voters are seeing are financed, produced and strategically placed on television stations across the country. In the final days of the campaign, they will easily outspend the candidates themselves in many of the most competitive House races. They will decide the final images that many voters see in this campaign. Warning for the fainthearted: Most of the ads will be dark and accusatory.

One bad call could make or break a House race, officials in both parties said. There is no precise formula for determining the smartest choices. There are only polls, historical trends, anecdotal evidence and instinct, all of which can be flawed. Operatives in both parties described the process by which these decisions are made, in most cases on the condition that they not be quoted by name.

At the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, where Lapp works, officials are more confident than ever that they will gain a minimum of 18 seats, three more than they need for a majority, and possibly more than 40 if they catch a bunch of breaks in the remaining nine days. Expectations have evolved from simply winning a majority to setting the stage for a blowout.

DOJ_NMG_0088057

The committee recently commissioned polls in almost 20 "bubble districts" that once looked difficult to win but now appear within reach. These include the open seat in Nevada's 2nd District and the one held by Rep. Gil Gutkneckt (R-Minn.). Lapp's team has polls showing Democrats close in all the races.

Over at the National Republican Congressional Committee, where Forti operates, officials said they see the situation as less bleak than they did a few weeks ago, immediately after the Mark Foley page scandal broke.

Based on polling, Republican strategists say a half-dozen seats, including open seats in Colorado, Arizona and Ohio, appear unwinnable. Six other races, including one for the seat held by Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), are looking dire but not hopeless.

Most worrisome, GOP strategists say, is that 20 or more additional Republican incumbents are essentially tied or holding very small leads -- a danger zone for a sitting member of Congress in a tough political environment. This has left Forti and colleagues in survival mode.

A look at recent expenditures by the NRCC reveals the wide range of seats Forti must find a way to win. In a two-day period last week, the committee paid for polls in 14 races. Ten of those surveys were in districts of Republican incumbents, including previously safe seats such as that of Rep. Mark Edward Souder in Indiana.

It is Forti's job to decide whom the NRCC can save.

Under campaign law, the independent organizations are prohibited from coordinating with candidates they assist. There are limits to the discussions Forti and Lapp can have with even their bosses, as well as with other staffers on campaign committees. This leaves both with enormous power.

Forti ran the NRCC's independent expenditure effort in the previous two election cycles. He maintains a spartan staff, relying on his own campaign know-how as well as the legal guidance of NRCC general counsel Don McGahn.

At the White House, such strategists as Karl Rove have boasted publicly that Republicans' superior program for turning out voters -- which exceeded expectations in 2002 and 2004 -- will work again to save them from defeat Nov. 7. But a senior Republican operative involved in party planning said the GOP's turnout operation can usually make a decisive difference only in races decided by about one percentage point. Moreover, the operative said, it is difficult to set up turnout operations during the homestretch of races that Republicans previously did not expect to be so competitive, such as Souder's. "It is easier to move financial resources than human resources," the operative said.

So Forti is moving the financial resources around to improve his odds, sometimes for reasons that are not obvious to outsiders. (He declined to comment on party strategy.)

The NRCC, for instance, is spending money to win the open seat vacated by Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), who has been indicted, and to defend Rep. John N. Hostettler (Ind.), despite what polls and operatives suggest are fading prospects for victory in both races. "It forces them to spend money," said a GOP strategist familiar with endgame planning.

Most of the time, spending is a more straightforward investment in self-preservation. Republicans late last week started running ads to defend Bass and have already spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to protect Rep. Richard W. Pombo (Calif.). Democrats have bought television time in both districts.

"If they go anywhere, we will just follow them in," the GOP strategist said. Republicans on Capitol Hill are more concerned about Pombo than Bass.

The calculations change by the day. Republicans had all but written off Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.) a few weeks ago after Democrats ran ads highlighting allegations from his former mistress that he had tried to strangle her. But GOP polling now shows the race tightening after an appearance by President Bush increased to 70 percent from 50 percent the percentage of conservatives who said they were excited about turning out to vote for the incumbent. Democrats said their polls still show Sherwood being clobbered.

"Republicans are playing a game of whack-a-mole while we are expanding the number of races in play by the day," Lapp said.

Lapp -- who was picked for the job after a three-minute first-time meeting with DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) in 2004 -- has slowly expanded the number of seats Democrats are targeting, but not as broadly and quickly as some strategists would like. Lapp runs a much larger operation than Forti; it includes a personal team of opposition researchers. He is called a "maniac, but in a good way," by Bill Burton, a longtime DCCC colleague.

DOJ_NMG_0088058

Lapp, like Forti, lives on polling these days. He reviews a half-dozen new polls each day and can turn data into an on-air ad within 24 hours.

But there is more to smart spending than voter surveys.

In Washington's 5th District, Lapp is running ads hitting freshman Rep. Cathy McMorris despite the strong Republican tilt of the district. That's because ad time in the Spokane media market, which covers almost the entire district, is relatively inexpensive, allowing the DCCC to fund a week of ads for just over $300,000. It is a cheap bet, even for a long shot.

But Lapp is not running ads against Rep. Jean Schmidt (Ohio) who, despite woeful reelection numbers, benefits from the high price of television time in the Cincinnati market. This decision could save Schmidt's job, strategists in both parties say.

The DCCC is set to launch an ad against Rep. Ron Lewis in Kentucky's 2nd District with what one operative described as "guilt money," after committee officials played a major role in persuading state Rep. Mike Weaver to challenge the incumbent.

Lapp also plays mind games. Because both parties have a staff member who monitors potential ad buys, Lapp will spend time calling television stations to inquire about ad buys he never plans to make -- just to confuse or intimidate Republicans.

Most times, the calls are for real. Take Illinois' 6th District, where Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth (D) is running low on cash in her race against state Sen. Peter Roskam. The DCCC recently stepped in, raising its commitment to $2.7 million in the costly Chicago media market in hopes of keeping her chances alive in the last week.

Howard Wolfson, who sat in Lapp's chair during the 2002 election cycle, said knowing where to spend and, as important, where not to spend is by far the most difficult part of the job.

"Where Republicans choose to defend and where Democrats choose to attack are critically important," he said.

Research database editor Derek Willis contributed to this report.

Can Bush Cross The Aisle? (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

With all the parsing that was needed to make sense of President Bush's convoluted explanations of his Iraq policies during last week's lengthy news conference, it's not surprising that another question -- on another topic -- received little notice.

It was, in the president's judgment, "a tricky little question" that Stephen Dinan of the Washington Times asked -- one that seemingly caught him by surprise.

"With a Republican Congress," Dinan said, "you failed to achieve three major goals of your second term: Social Security reform, a tax code overhaul and a comprehensive immigration bill. Why shouldn't Americans give Democrats a chance to work with you on those issues, especially when divided government seemed to work in the late 1990s on the budget?"

When the president recovered from his surprise at the question from the conservative newspaper's correspondent, he went into his familiar, assertive, told-you-so mode. "First," he said, "I haven't given up on any of those issues. I've got two years left to achieve them. And I firmly believe it is more likely to achieve those three objectives with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate. And I believe I'll be working with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate."

Bush went on for four paragraphs spelling out his belief that Republicans would defy the pollsters and pundits and win the Nov. 7 election, segued into a rap about the joys of electioneering and wound up by telling the questioner, "Anyway, thanks for asking about the campaign."

At no point did he venture within six feet of the original question -- and it's not hard to see why. He's not yet ready to think of Democrats except as opponents.

But the premise of Dinan's question is historically correct. It was the combination of a Democratic president, Bill Clinton, and the Republican Congress elected in 1994 that finally got a grip on budget deficits and produced the only balanced budgets of modern times.

DOJ_NMG_0088059

It was not a smooth or easy process; indeed, in 1995, the first year after the Republican takeover of the House and Senate, the budget negotiations collapsed and government shut down for a few days amid bitter partisan recrimination.

But both sides were chastened by the experience. When Clinton was reelected with a Republican Congress in 1996, he and House Speaker Newt Gingrich cut the deal the next year that moved the budget out of the red for the first time in 29 years.

They discussed a similar fix for Social Security, using some of the new surplus to ease transition costs to a reformed system. But then Monica happened, and all bets were off.

What are the chances that divided government could also be productive in the final two years of the Bush presidency? Better than might be imagined -- especially given the president's agenda.

Comprehensive immigration reform? The bill embodying most of what the president wanted was co-sponsored by Republican John McCain and Democrat Ted Kennedy. On the vote for passage, Democrats were 38 to 4 in favor, Republicans 32 to 23 against. Clearly, the president's best allies on immigration are on the Democratic side.

Tax reform? Well, the last major successful reform of the code took place in 1986, when Republicans controlled the White House and the Senate and Democrats held the House. Instrumental in its passage was Democrat Bill Bradley, then a senator from New Jersey. Last week Bradley was back in Washington to support another Democratic senator, Ron Wyden of Oregon, who offered an open invitation to Bush to join in moving forward a long-overdue cleanup of the tax code.

Social Security reform, the third of the president's objectives, will be politically difficult no matter which party controls Congress. For most Democrats, the president's proposal to carve out room for individually owned accounts is a nonstarter. But if Bush is willing to do what his ally, Sen. Bob Bennett of Utah, suggested long ago and postpone private accounts until steps are taken to solve the system's long-term fiscal problems, he may find the Democrats ready to listen to his other ideas for reform.

None of this would be easy, and all of it would require a new willingness on Bush's part to open himself to genuine negotiations with the next Congress. But the rewards for the country could be very large.

davidbroder@washpost.com

Poll Puts Maryland Democrats In The Lead (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Matthew Mosk, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Races Are Much Closer, GOP Candidates Say

A strong Democratic tide in Maryland threatens to swamp Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s reelection bid and bolsters the party's efforts to retain control of an important U.S. Senate seat, according to a new Washington Post poll.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) held a 10 percentage point lead over Ehrlich, and Democratic Senate nominee Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin had a similar advantage over Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele among likely voters in the Post poll, which was conducted last Sunday through Thursday. The leads were well beyond the survey's three percentage point margin of error.

The poll of 1,000 voters showed that the state's overwhelmingly Democratic electorate is highly disturbed about national issues -- extremely critical of President Bush, more upset about the war in Iraq than voters in the rest of the country and eager to shift power in Washington from the Republican Party.

Those strong feelings are a heavy weight for Ehrlich and Steele, who four years ago claimed the state's top offices for the GOP for the first time in nearly 40 years and have tried to foster a Republican resurgence in the state.

Steele, whose campaign to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D) has sought to play down his past Republican activism and project an independent image, doesn't do much better in the poll with Democratic voters than Republicans who have gone before him. His appeal to fellow African Americans has not swayed that group.

In the governor's race, those surveyed did not seem to view the contest as a referendum on Ehrlich, unlike most reelection campaigns. A majority of voters had a favorable opinion of the governor and said they believe he has done a good job. Nevertheless, one in five of those who approved of Ehrlich's performance as governor said they would vote for O'Malley.

Ehrlich's support among Democrats was half of what exit polls showed it to be four years ago, and voters who described themselves as political moderates returned to the Democratic fold, the poll showed.

DOJ_NMG_0088060

The Republican candidates disputed the poll, saying it was too different from recent polls that they had seen that showed the races much closer.

"It is a dead heat, and Michael Steele is gaining ground every day," said Doug Heye, Steele's campaign spokesman.

Ehrlich's campaign was especially dismissive of the findings.

"It is simply unrealistic to think that a governor with approval ratings as high as this, who has provided record education funding and cut crime around the state is losing by 10 points to the mayor of the deadliest city in the country," said Bo Harmon, Ehrlich's campaign manager.

Harmon also called the poll's demographics "wildly skewed" since the results reflected few undecided voters. Nearly all the likely voters gave their opinion on how they would cast their ballots if the election were held the day they were interviewed. In a follow-up question, about 15 percent of each candidate's supporters said there was a chance they could change their minds by Election Day.

The poll is not a prediction of Election Day but a portrait of the Maryland political landscape completed 12 days before voters go to the polls. Last-minute developments, campaign spending, get-out-the-vote efforts and enthusiasm for the candidates all could affect the final results.

Especially important will be the African American turnout, which heavily favors Democrats. Blacks make up 28 percent of Maryland's adult population and 25 percent of likely voters in the poll, but some strategists wonder whether the actual turnout will be that high.Invading Ehrlich Territory

Ehrlich's hopes rest with voters such as Patrick Aldrich, a 39-year-old account manager from Owings Mills in Baltimore County.

"I just find his manner down-to-earth and real. He's not the typical politician," Aldrich said last week, as his 2-year-old son squawked in the background. "His views are things that I agree with."

White, male, parent, in a suburb distant from Washington -- Aldrich represents the kind of voter with whom Ehrlich connected four years ago when he defeated then-Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend (D).

But O'Malley, whom the poll shows leading 55 to 45 percent, has cut into Ehrlich's support among such voters and draws strong allegiance from groups that have traditionally supported Democrats but that strayed four years ago.

"These results show that Marylanders want new ideas to help their families, not more dirty tricks and misleading attack ads from a desperate politician," said Hari Sevugen, O'Malley's communications director. "They want a governor who will fight for Maryland families, not one who will fight for the special interests and George Bush."

O'Malley retains support in the overwhelmingly Democratic Washington suburbs, and he also cuts into Ehrlich's previous strongholds in the counties surrounding Baltimore, according to the poll. O'Malley has a 26 percentage point advantage among women, who narrowly supported Townsend four years ago. Many of those who described themselves as moderates abandoned the Democrats in 2002; O'Malley has a 15 percentage point advantage among moderates in the current poll.

The poll continued to show Ehrlich with relatively high favorability ratings and job approval numbers, and unlike in a Post poll in June, a majority of Marylanders now believe that the state is headed in the right direction.

Respondents were just as likely to describe O'Malley as honest, a strong leader and someone with a vision for the state's future. Voters also said they thought O'Malley would do as well as Ehrlich confronting the issues of crime, taxes and the state economy and gave him a slight advantage on the issue they said was most important for the next governor: public education.

O'Malley was seen as more likely to understand "the problems of people like you" and had a nearly 2 to 1 advantage on "working effectively with the state legislature."

Ehrlich has bombarded the state with ads that skewer O'Malley's leadership of Baltimore, blaming him for the city's failing schools and high crime rate. But voters' views of how things are going in Baltimore did not change from the Post poll in June, and of those who said O'Malley had changed the city, 44 percent said it was for the better, as opposed to 9 percent who said he'd made things there worse.

Just as then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening's unpopularity at the end of his tenure hindered Townsend four years ago, Ehrlich seems to suffer from the national political climate. Although 75 percent of the voters said Bush would not be a factor in the governor's race, nearly 20 percent said one reason for their vote for governor would be to express opposition to Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0088061

Henry Evans, 60, a postal carrier from Prince George's County, said he has no problem with the way Ehrlich has done his job but is backing O'Malley. "My reason is that Governor Ehrlich has supported the president and what's going on in Iraq," Evans said. "I'm against that."Factoring In Bush

The issue is more pronounced in the Senate race, where nearly one in three voters in the poll said their opposition to Bush would be a factor.

Nearly six in 10 likely voters said they "strongly" believe the war in Iraq was not worth fighting, far higher than other Americans, according to a Washington Post-ABC poll this month, and 53 percent of Marylanders polled said it would be a good thing if control of Congress switched from Republican to Democrat, as opposed to 21 percent who said it would be a bad thing.

National GOP leaders have invested more than $1 million in Steele's campaign, in part because they view his effort as a critical first step in any broader attempt to break the virtual lock on the African American vote that Democrats have held.

Steele has tried to present himself as a different kind of candidate with his out-of-the-box campaign advertisements, criticisms of both political parties and such high-profile supporters as hip-hop recording mogul Russell Simmons and Cathy L. Hughes, the Radio One founder and chairwoman.

But Democrats have sought to link Steele with Bush -- who has a 6 percent approval rating among African Americans surveyed. Steele has support from 14 percent of black voters, not significantly higher than the support Ehrlich is receiving, the poll shows. Overall, Cardin leads Steele 54 to 43 percent, with independent candidate Kevin Zeese receiving 1 percent of the vote.

"Michael Steele's problem is that . . . he's a Republican at the absolute worst time in the world for a politician to be a Republican," said David Bositis, an expert on black voting patterns at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies.

Steele's spokesman Heye disagreed: "Michael Steele's message is resonating with African American voters. . . . His message of opportunity, hope and bringing change to Washington has resonated and is continuing to resonate with African American voters."

But Kenneth Kirby, 52, a former airline worker from Annapolis who is black, said he supports Cardin because he's a loyal Democrat. He said he stopped considering Steele "after I learned he was, essentially, a Bush appointee."

Steele gets more than 90 percent of the Republican vote and leads among independents, but, like Ehrlich, he has made little headway among the half of the voters who identify themselves as Democrats. Statewide, 55 percent of voters are registered as Democrats.

Cardin has maintained strong support in spite of projecting a somewhat bland persona during much of the campaign. Likely voters said they consider him the more honest and trustworthy of the two and the one more likely to share their values.

"Michael Steele's attempts to hide his support for the Bush agenda have failed," said Oren Shur, Cardin's spokesman.

But one aspect of Steele's folksy television ads has resonated with voters: He is considered by twice as many voters to have the more appealing personality.Closing the Gap

The poll's depiction of where the race stood between last Sunday and Thursday presents a hefty burden for the two Republican candidates, said Paul S. Herrnson, a political science professor at the University of Maryland, College Park.

"It's really hard for a candidate to close a double-digit lead in two weeks, particularly if the candidates are already very well known," Herrnson said.

Still, some variables could change the dynamics during the closing weeks. The biggest is turnout. The two Republicans could close the gap if fear about the validity of the state's voting system depresses turnout, or if African Americans -- the most Democratic of voting groups -- aren't enthusiastic about the race.

The Post poll showed that based upon answers to questions such as certainty to vote, enthusiasm about the candidates and interest in the races, about 25 percent of the "likely voters" would be African American.

That is numerically higher than past exit polls have shown: In the past seven elections for president, Senate and governor, the estimate of black voters ranged from 19 percent to 24 percent. But even if the black turnout is as low as it was in the 2002 election -- 22 percent, according to exit polls -- Cardin and O'Malley would still hold leads, although they would be narrower.

Another factor is the financial advantage Ehrlich apparently holds, according to the most recent financial statements the gubernatorial candidates have submitted. As of last week, O'Malley had $600,000, and Ehrlich had more than $2 million left to spend during the campaign's closing days.

DOJ_NMG_0088062

And one sign of the Ehrlich campaign's get-out-the-vote effort is the record number of absentee ballots that have been requested. Almost as many have been requested by Republicans as Democrats, despite the huge registration differences.

Polling director Jon Cohen and database editor Dan Keating contributed to this report.

Steele Hits Cardin For Paying Lip Service To Black Voters (WT)

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele yesterday made an unscheduled appearance at the NAACP state convention and criticized Democratic U.S. Senate nominee Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin for paying only lip service to black voters.

"I'm tired of listening to leadership that fails to deliver," Mr. Steele, Republican nominee for senator, said after Mr. Cardin listed statistics showing inequalities for blacks, including their elevated high school dropout rate.

"I'm tired of hearing people quote statistics of our communities and over the 20 years that they have served in Congress have done nothing," said Mr. Steele, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland. "I'm tired of leadership that fails to lead, but blames and name calls and points fingers."

Mr. Cardin, a 10-term congressman, later told The Washington Times the criticism would not stick to his campaign. "My record speaks for itself," he said.

Mr. Cardin told the leaders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People that returning a Democrat to Maryland's Senate seat would help the party take control of the chamber and challenge President Bush's policies.

"Mr. Steele does not like to be identified with George Bush, but he was recruited by George Bush," he said. "He brought George Bush into Maryland for fundraising. He agrees with George Bush's agenda."

Mr. Steele had not been scheduled to participate in the forum, but he decided to after Mr. Cardin skipped a debate Thursday sponsored by the NAACP branch in Charles County.

Mr. Cardin has been criticized for missing the debate because the move might have offended black Southern Maryland voters, and also for stumbling and stammering through a televised debate Wednesday. Their next scheduled -- and perhaps final -- debate before the Nov. 7 election takes place this morning on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Mr. Steele blasted Mr. Cardin for helping gut the state teacher pension system as House speaker of the General Assembly, voting in Congress against prison-sentencing reform and failing to address school problems in his congressional district.

"I've spent an academic year taking school buses, taking classes and teaching classes in our public school system," Mr. Steele said. "Mr. Cardin, have you visited Frederick Douglas High School, have you been to Carver High School, have you been to Fairmont Heights High School in Prince George's County? We've missed you, sir."

Green Party nominee Kevin B. Zeese and write-in candidate Lee Young also participated in the 45-minute forum. Each candidate gave an opening statement and had one minute to respond to questions from the audience.

Black voters could decide the election. They account for about 40 percent of Democratic voters in Maryland, where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans nearly 2-to-1. Mr. Cardin has struggled to woo black voters amid criticism that the state Democratic Party blocked the candidacy of former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume, who narrowly lost the primary despite Mr. Cardin spending about $3 million more on his campaign. Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black voters has helped make his party competitive in the state for the first time in a generation.

Candidates from other Maryland races also spoke at the forum, including Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican seeking re-election, and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic challenger.

O'Malley Assails Ehrlich On Race (WP)

By John Wagner, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley accused Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. yesterday of using racially "coded, charged language" when talking about Baltimore's schoolchildren and accused the Republican incumbent of pursuing policies unfriendly to African Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0088063

The broadside by the Democratic challenger came during a candidate forum sponsored by the NAACP in Baltimore that also drew contenders in the U.S. Senate race and other contests.

Ehrlich, who entered the room after O'Malley had finished speaking, offered no direct response from the podium, instead listing the African Americans he has appointed to key positions and the programs he has supported. Afterward, he called the mayor "uniformly negative."

The pointed remarks underscored the importance of black voters in an election nine days away.

O'Malley hammered the governor for his past assertion that "multiculturalism is bunk," accused him of working to strip the NAACP of its tax-exempt status and said Ehrlich has been "talking out of both sides of his mouth" about Baltimore's arrest policies -- delivering different messages to white and black audiences.

"Our current governor of Maryland declares over and over and over again that multiculturalism is bunk, that history has shown that a multicultural people can never thrive and survive," O'Malley said. "Obviously, the governor does not come to Baltimore City very often. We are a multicultural city in a multicultural state in the strongest and greatest multicultural nation ever created on God's multicultural planet."

Ehrlich took a very different tack minutes later when he took the stage, by which time O'Malley had left for a funeral. Ehrlich ran through a list of 15 African Americans, starting with Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, whom he has appointed in the past four years.

He followed that with a list of such initiatives as construction projects at historically black colleges and universities, changes to minority business contracting rules and the renaming of Baltimore-Washington International Airport to honor Thurgood Marshall.

"And we have more to do, and thank you for your attention," he concluded, then walked off stage.

Asked later what he thought of O'Malley's message, Ehrlich said: "He's uniformly negative. I just got up and talked about the successes of our administration."

Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver said O'Malley was "trying to create a division that doesn't exist between Governor Ehrlich and Maryland's black voters."

Marvin "Doc" Cheatham, president of the Baltimore NAACP, bemoaned the animosity between the candidates.

"The mayor and the governor have both failed us and our children because they have not come together," he said in an interview. "They need to set aside the politics."

Exchanges between the Senate candidates, who shared the stage, also grew testy at times.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D) argued that Steele would do President Bush's bidding. Steele (R) responded that Cardin's long tenure in politics has left him out of touch.

Cardin said their biggest policy difference was on the Iraq war. "I opposed the war in Iraq four years ago," Cardin said. "Michael Steele to this day believes it's the right thing to do."

Steele later said that a lack of international involvement in Iraq had made it "a mess" and cautioned against pulling out too soon. "We need to focus on bringing our troops home but be mindful of the Iraq that we leave behind," he said.

O'Malley's remarks came after Ehrlich has spent months airing ads about Baltimore's low-performing schools. O'Malley has expressed frustration with the tactic, noting that scores are improving, particularly in younger grades. Yesterday's remarks were his most spirited thus far.

"Why is he spending so much money belittling the progress of our people, talking in coded, charged language about those city kids and those city schools, as if the children of our city are not blessed with the same brains that God has given the children in every part of our state?" O'Malley asked.

O'Malley also brought up a 2001 letter that Ehrlich, then a congressman, sent to the IRS asking the agency to follow up on a request for an investigation of the NAACP's tax-exempt status. Ehrlich's fundraising chief, Richard E. Hug, was among several Republicans who made the request.

"Rather than work to bridge the divide, he decided to use his wealthy and influential friends like Dick Hug to try to influence the IRS to shut down the NAACP," O'Malley said yesterday.

The mayor criticized Ehrlich's veto of legislation increasing the minimum wage and said Ehrlich's record on promoting use of African American contractors is "abysmal" -- something Ehrlich aides strongly dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0088064

For Zeese, Third-Party Campaign Is Not A Matter Of Odds (WP)

By William Wan, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

It was early in the morning, and already you could hear the edge creeping into Kevin Zeese's voice.

The night before was supposed to be the crowning moment for him, a chance to ignite his struggling campaign for U.S. Senate. The night before, he had finally pushed his way into a rare three-way debate in Baltimore.

The next morning, however, he woke to find a sharp dose of reality waiting at his doorstep. Newspaper headlines recounted a heated debate between Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Democrat Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin. The front-page photo in The Washington Post, Zeese angrily pointed out, had cut him out of the picture entirely. His name wasn't mentioned until the 11th paragraph.

And so, he turned to his computer, as he often does in such moments, and began sending messages out into the Internet ether -- e-mails and postings expressing his frustration, anger and, most of all, his urge to fight the establishment.

It's a tough world for independent candidates such as Zeese, pleading for attention only to be treated as a crazy Quixote tilting at the windmills, rationing campaign funds that look like crumbs compared with your opponents', and dreading that pesky question that dogs you at every turn: Do you really expect to win?

But for this role, Zeese is uniquely qualified. He has spent his life fighting for the impossible.

For 26 years, he worked as a lawyer trying to legalize marijuana and end the war on drugs. In 2004, at a point when Ralph Nader's own Green Party refused to support him, Zeese signed up to become Nader's spokesman.

Now Zeese, 51, is running an uphill campaign of his own and looking to win, he insists. But can he?

That is missing the point entirely, his parents say. "With Kevin, it's always been a question of right and wrong," said his father, Charles, 74.

Born in Queens, N.Y., into a middle-class family, Zeese grew up as the stubborn son of a public school teacher and an intensive-care nurse. In elementary school, after a music teacher refused to acknowledge the accordion as a wind instrument, Zeese marched to the library and came back armed with books to prove his teacher wrong.

"We were called to school a lot," said his mother, Barbara, 74.

His father tells this story: When Zeese was about 9, he took his younger brother's most valuable baseball card and tore it apart. "He was always pushing his siblings to be better, and he told Mark, 'You'll never be known or famous collecting baseball cards. You have to do something more important.' "

Zeese has spent his entire life looking for that something. "I tend to take on tough causes," he said. "If it's easy, it's not worth doing, because someone else will do it."

For years he was a registered Democrat. But in 1996, disillusioned with President Bill Clinton, Zeese cast a vote for Libertarian Harry Browne.

In 2000, he voted absentee for Nader, then rushed to Michigan to campaign for Vice President and Democratic candidate Al Gore -- a mistake he swears he will never repeat: "I wasn't fully committed. I was hedging my bets, falling into the trap of lesser evilism."

When he finally committed, Zeese discovered the ultimate windmill: an uphill struggle with high stakes, fierce arguments and issues clearly divided, at least in his eyes, between right and wrong.

Last year, he courted and united several parties, becoming, according to his campaign, the first candidate in U.S. history to represent the Libertarians, Greens and Populists. The alliance is crucial, Zeese said, for him to have any prayer at electability.

Even now, however, the numbers suggest that may be a difficult, perhaps impossible, goal.

It's hard to measure Zeese's support. (He is rarely included in polls and earned less than the margin of error in the most recent.) The voter registration numbers look just as bad. Democrats make up 55 percent of Maryland's voters; Republicans about 29 percent. Altogether, the Greens, Libertarians and Populists make up less than half of a percent. Even adding in every unaffiliated voter in Maryland, the total hovers around 14 percent.

To make matters worse, Zeese has raised about $70,000 -- a drop in the bucket compared to Steele and Cardin's millions.

DOJ_NMG_0088065

So Zeese and his supporters have focused on gaining access to debates. A debate, after all, means free air time, guaranteed media presence and a chance to reach hundreds of thousands of voters.

Appearing on stage with Steele and Cardin would also give Zeese's candidacy an air of legitimacy, the appearance of equal footing. Without that come the questions: Isn't a vote for you a wasted vote? Isn't a vote for you a spoiler vote?

His answer: There is nothing to spoil. Zeese, who is liberal on many issues, calls Cardin and Steele equally bad choices. "People have grown up listening to a lie," he said. "The two parties give you a choice of A or B. But it's a false choice, because there's really a C."

So what does "C" represent?

For Zeese, it means addressing the "real issues," including the war in Iraq, the deepening gap between the wealthy and the poor and the need for a national health care plan.

But most of all, it means ending "corporate control of government." Corporate influence is the most common target of his tirades. It is also, scholars say, a pervasive theme among third parties, who see politics less about left and right and more as clean versus corrupt.

Both of Zeese's opponents have acknowledged the problem of corporate influence. In television ads and speeches, Cardin and Steele have positioned themselves as outsiders -- independent from corporate influence (although both have accepted donations from corporate interests) and from their own parties (although Steele has served as state Republican chair and Cardin has voted largely with his party).

If voters could see all three of them side by side, Zeese reasoned, then they would see what a real independent looks like. If only he could get into a debate.

This month, in an old gothic Baltimore church, Zeese finally got his wish. He took to the stage with Steele, who had the polished look of a businessman, and Cardin, who was working his typically calm countenance into an angry scowl.

Zeese -- with his legs splayed and his hands running through his hair -- appeared more policy wonk than politician.

On Iraq, while Steele fumbled a vague response and Cardin talked about international efforts, Zeese called for an immediate withdrawal in four to six months. When Steele talked about empowering black entrepreneurs and Cardin opposed tax cuts, Zeese talked of making higher education free and overhauling the income tax system.

When the debate ended, Cardin was encircled by a crowd of reporters, almost crushing him. Others made a rush for Steele, who had slipped quietly out the back. Zeese's supporters tried hard to steer reporters toward him. One chatted with him briefly but left when he spotted Cardin. Another approached only to pose the spoiler question. Zeese, nonetheless, looked invigorated. "A slugfest, don't you think? Cardin hitting Steele. Steele hitting Cardin. Me hammering both."

The enthusiasm stayed with him through the night, as he drove back to Takoma Park in his hybrid car, and into the morning, when he picked up his newspaper and began to read with anger. By late morning, he decided an obvious winner had emerged. "It was such a clear, decisive victory," he said. "I don't think there's any question who won the debate last night. Do you?"

Researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

Webb Defends Novels Against Attacks (WP)

By Tim Craig And Michael D. Shear, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Allen Has Crossed a 'Line That Should Never Be Crossed,' Candidate Says

Virginia U.S. Senate candidate James Webb yesterday delivered his strongest criticism of incumbent Sen. George Allen of the fall campaign, vigorously defending himself against Allen's charges that he wrote sex-laced passages in his fiction novels.

He called on voters to reject what he called the "smear tactics" of Allen and his campaign, who released excerpts Thursday from Webb's novels to the Drudge Report Web site and said the writings were lurid and inappropriate for a man seeking to serve in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0088066

"The fish rots from the head down," Webb (D) said, referring to his belief that Allen (R) is responsible for his campaign staff's tactics and has now shown his true character. "Our government should no longer be in the hands of a group of unprincipled, small-minded, power-hungry character assassins."

Allen, speaking to reporters near Richmond yesterday after winning the endorsement of the National Rifle Association's political action committee, said Webb's career as an author of fictional works was part of his record.

"My record as a United States senator is an open book. My opponent has a record as well," Allen told reporters. "He, in his advertisements, points out that he's an author, that he's a writer of books. That's part of his record. These passages in his books are part of his open record. I'll let the people of Virginia be the judge as to whose record they are more comfortable with."

Allen's attack is the latest twist in a nasty, close campaign that is central to the Democrats' hopes of retaking the Senate.

Webb, joined at a rally in Fairfax County by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) and former governor Mark R. Warner (D), said that the Allen campaign is belittling his life as a soldier and the service members who study his works. Kaine and Warner predicted that Allen's late campaign maneuver would backfire.

With some of the most forceful language he has used on the campaign trail, Webb said he was proud of his writing because it reflects the things he saw as a combat Marine in Vietnam and later as a journalist reporting on war-torn regions such as Beirut in the early 1980s.

The one-time boxer charged that Allen, the son of a former Washington Redskins head coach, has lived a life of privilege as a "a pampered public official." Allen, who did not serve in the military, was a college football player at the University of Virginia and spent one summer working on a ranch.

"When George Allen and his campaign take some small excerpts from my novels and not only criticizes them but uses them to question my ethics, my profession, my character, that is a line that should never be crossed," Webb said at Edgar Allen Poe Middle School in Annandale.

"I have lived in the real world, and I have reported the real world in my writings. I started working when I was 12 years old, and I fought in a brutal war. I saw its ugliness while George Allen was hanging out at a dude ranch," Webb said at a get-out-the-vote rally attended by about 300 people.

Allen said he spent time at a "real ranch" in Winnemucca, Nev., well after the end of the Vietnam War.

On Friday, Webb, a former secretary of the Navy, said Allen's sister, Jennifer, wrote a book that included descriptions of her brother's harsh physical treatment of her. Allen said yesterday, "Her book is a novelization. . . . I didn't write those passages in my sister's book."

Kaine drew comparisons to his campaign last year against Republican Jerry W. Kilgore, who aired a TV ad saying Kaine opposed the death penalty even for people like Adolf Hitler. "It's the same kind of nonsense," Kaine said. The Republicans "never know when to stop. They always go over the top, and it always backfires."

Warner noted that Republican Sen. John McCain, an Allen supporter, has praised Webb's novels. "All they do is smear, smear, smear," Warner said of the Allen campaign.

Allen said he stood by his release of Webb's racy book passages, saying that they are an indication of what Webb will do.

"Not just me, but others find those passages to be demeaning to women," Allen said. Allen's campaign also has released a 1979 magazine article by Webb questioning women in combat and saying a Naval Academy dormitory was "a horny woman's dream."

Yesterday, House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith (R-Salem) called Webb's writings "disrespectful and demeaning." Del. Terrie Lynne Suit (R-Virginia Beach) said Webb's books were "not suitable for children and, frankly, many adults."

Webb has apologized for the magazine article, saying he used needlessly harsh language. But Webb made no apologies yesterday for his novels, among which are "Lost Soldiers," "Something to Die For," "A Sense of Honor" and "Fields of Fire."

Webb said yesterday that "Fields of Fire," a novel about the Vietnam War, has been on the Marine Corps reading list for 20 years and is the "most-taught piece of literature regarding the Vietnam War" on college campuses. He said that a "A Sense of Honor" is published by the U.S. Naval Institute, an independent organization that produces books about the military, and added that the book frequently is read by service members.

Interviews with voters yesterday suggested that Allen's attack may reinforce what people already think about Webb.

DOJ_NMG_0088067

Donald L. Boswell, 55, director of law enforcement for the state Department of Motor Vehicles, said it was fair for Allen to criticize Webb's books. "He did freely choose to write," said Boswell, who was at the NRA event near Richmond. "I think holding him accountable for that is the same as holding Hollywood and the movie industry accountable for the movies they produce."

At Webb's rally in Annandale, Joan Brookshire said Allen was engaged in the "sleaziest campaigning. I now feel like knocking on every door in Virginia," said Brookshire, 75, of Alexandria. "Why would they use excerpts like this out of books that are classics?"

Also yesterday, Webb gave a Democratic response to President Bush's weekly radio address, saying he opposed the war before it began. A Democratic Congress, he predicted, would demand from Day One that Bush find "a real way forward in Iraq."

Allen traveled through the Shenandoah Valley before ending his day at the rally outside Richmond with the NRA.

Allen "is someone who Virginia gun owners and sportsmen know, like and trust," said Chuck Cunningham, the NRA's federal affairs director and chairman of Sportsmen for Allen. The NRA's political action committee has given an A rating to Webb and an A-plus rating to Allen.

Webb Defends Sexual Explicitness Of His Novels (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

Virginia U.S. Senate candidate James H. Webb Jr. said yesterday that incumbent Sen. George Allen crossed the line when he used salacious excerpts from his wartime novels to question his character and respect for women.

"I've lived in the real world, and I reported the real world in my writings," Mr. Webb, a Democrat, told about 300 people at the Edgar Allan Poe Middle School in Annandale.

His remarks came after the campaign of Mr. Allen, a Republican, issued a press release Thursday highlighting the excerpts, which include apparent father-son incest, an acrobatic young stripper and the homosexual behavior of prison guards in Vietnam.

The Allen camp said the novels portrays women as "servile, subordinate, inept, incompetent, promiscuous, perverted or some combination of these."

Mr. Webb, joined yesterday by fellow Democrats Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner, responded by reading reviews that praised his novels as masterpieces and described him as "a moral philosopher of the military ... when fiction seems to find it harder and harder to address moral issues."

"I have written what I have seen, and that is the duty of a writer -- to help people understand the world around us with all of its beauty and all of its flaws," said Mr. Webb, a Vietnam veteran and former U.S. Navy secretary.

Chris LaCivita, an Allen campaign spokesman, said Mr. Webb's response showed he was becoming "unhinged."

"George Allen's record as governor and U.S. senator has been an open book for years," he said. "Now that Jim Webb's books have been opened, he can't take any scrutiny."

The Allen campaign's decision to introduce the excerpts, in a close race that will be decided Nov. 7, angered Democrats and disappointed at least one Republican.

"It's so dirty," Michelle Malkin, a conservative columnist, said on Fox News. "It looks desperate. It looks pathetic, and it looks so immature. ... This is fiction."

However, others saw the excerpts as further proof that Mr. Webb does not respect women.

"Sadly, the degrading manner in which women are depicted in his novels fits a larger pattern that is evident in his nonfiction writings as well," said state Delegate M. Kirkland Cox, Colonial Heights Republican.

This is the latest salvo in a race muddied with character attacks. Mr. Allen's 20-plus years of public service and Mr. Webb's push for economic fairness and opposition to the Iraq war have often been lost amid the attacks.

The race started devolving in August when Mr. Allen was videotaped calling an Indian-American volunteer for the Webb campaign "macaca." He also faced accusations he used the "N-word" in the 1970s and stumbled over questions about his Jewish heritage.

DOJ_NMG_0088068

Mr. Webb yesterday said he could have used the situations against Mr. Allen, but has chosen not to because they are "not relevant to what I'm trying to do."

Mr. Webb has faced criticism for an article he wrote in 1977 that questioned a woman's place at the U.S. Naval Academy.

It appeared Mr. Allen would refocus his campaign on his record when he pledged in a rare statewide address Oct. 2 to spend the final five weeks of the campaign talking about the issues that matter most to voters.

"The Allen campaign has made smear tactics the centerpiece of their entire effort," Mr. Webb said. "If you want to find accountability for this, remember that the fish rots from the head down."

Mr. Webb yesterday also used the weekly Democratic radio address to criticize President Bush and his supporters, such as Mr. Allen, for what he regards as botching the Iraq war. "With the right leadership, the situation in Iraq is solvable, in a way that will increase stability in the Middle East and reduce the threat of international terrorism," he said.

The Senate Race In Connecticut (NYT)

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

The Congressional elections are very much about America's problems in Iraq. But the campaigns have shed little light on exactly what should happen next. Nowhere is that more true than in Connecticut. The two leading candidates, Ned Lamont and Joseph Lieberman, have clear disagreements over whether invading Iraq was a good idea in the first place, but grow much fuzzier when the question of future strategy comes up.

Mr. Lieberman, a three-term Democratic senator now running as an independent, talks about the threat of Islamic terrorism. Mr. Lamont, who beat Mr. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, reminds voters what a mess the invasion created. When it comes to the next step, Mr. Lieberman seems to mimic the Bush administration's proposal to stay the course (while no longer mentioning that toxic phrase) with new tactics. Mr. Lamont is close to the Senate Democrats (minus Mr. Lieberman) who demanded a timetable for withdrawal without being too firm on what that ought to entail.

No one expects legislators to dictate military tactics. But what we need from the next crop of elected officials in Washington is a willingness to face reality, to choose from among difficult options and have the courage to be honest with the public about the consequences. On those points, Mr. Lamont is by far the better candidate.

Two months ago, Connecticut's Democratic voters sent Mr. Lieberman what should have been a jarring wake-up call when they rejected him for Mr. Lamont, a relative newcomer. We have been waiting to see what lessons the state's best-known politician took from his defeat, and from the daily evidence of the deterioration of the situation in Iraq.

We wanted to see a capacity for growth and change in Mr. Lieberman. The country is full of Republicans who now realize the Iraq invasion was a disaster, either in its basic concept or in its execution. The most honorable of them are in agony over what has happened. Mr. Lieberman, who had not only continually defended the administration's Iraq policy but also attacked Democrats who criticized the president, had more cause for soul-searching than most.

But instead of re-evaluating his own positions, Mr. Lieberman blamed his constituents for failing to notice that he had offered some negative comments about the conduct of the war, too, mainly when he was running for the Democratic nomination for president in 2004. He did not protest when Dick Cheney said that people who voted for Mr. Lamont were giving comfort to "Al Qaeda types." His only reflection seemed devoted to a re-examination of the rules for getting back on the ballot.

Since his primary defeat, Mr. Lieberman has run a well-packaged campaign built around his self-assigned bipartisan image — "It's not about politics," say his ads. But it is very much about politics — from the flood of special interest campaign donations that has been running Mr. Lieberman's way to the old Karl Rove lesson that political winners never admit to error.

We are living in perilous times. Being able to work with the opposition party — Mr. Lieberman's claim to fame — is hardly a sign of moral courage when the opposition party controls the White House, Senate and House of Representatives. President Bush did not need Mr. Lieberman's persistent support on Iraq when he had the deference of his own party members in Congress. What the country needed — and what Connecticut had the right to expect — was for Mr. Lieberman to risk some of his bipartisan clout to call attention to the way Iraq was spiraling out of control.

The fatal problem with Mr. Lieberman's candidacy is not that he was wrong about the invasion, but that he has not shown any capacity to grow and change. Suggesting that getting rid of Donald Rumsfeld might be a good idea is hardly a breakthrough at a time when the secretary of defense's supporters are pretty much limited to the president and members of the Rumsfeld family.

DOJ_NMG_0088069

Mr. Lieberman has changed his tone but not his underlying conviction that he has been right all along. He and Mr. Bush are still on the very same page, encouraging the American people to believe that there is a happy ending for American involvement in Iraq, and that all it takes is the perseverance to keep marching toward the end of the rainbow.

Ned Lamont has run a far less polished campaign than Mr. Lieberman, but the more we see of him, the more impressed we are by his intelligence and his growing sophistication about the issues facing the nation. He is very much in the Connecticut mold of basically moderate, principled politicians, and his willingness to take on Mr. Lieberman when no one else dared to do it showed real courage and conviction. He would make a good senator. More important, he has the capacity to continually become a better one. We endorse Ned Lamont for Senate.

A Senate Race Riding On Cash Flow (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

HARTFORD, Oct. 27 — While Senator Joseph I. Lieberman may have lost the Democratic primary to a novice politician, his bid in the general election has come with all the financial advantages of a major party candidate and an 18-year incumbent.

Meanwhile, his financial prowess has prompted his opponent, Ned Lamont, to dig deeper into his pockets, putting $12.7 million into the campaign so far.

Mr. Lieberman, who has run for national office twice, has tapped into millions of dollars from the networks of major Republican and Democratic donors, as well as from business groups and lobbyists who have rallied around him, and several out-of-state independent groups who do not coordinate directly with the campaign.

The hotly contested Senate race has quickly become the most expensive in the state's history, with Mr. Lieberman spending $11.5 million and Mr. Lamont spending $8.6 million through the end of September.

And there is no sign of slowing down. There have been fund-raising meals for Mr. Lieberman several times a week. Mr. Lamont, a cable executive from Greenwich, Conn., has twice contributed $2 million to his campaign in the last two weeks. Late Friday, the Lamont campaign said that he would lend an additional $2 million toward the election effort.

Mr. Lieberman, who has kept up a brisk fund-raising schedule since losing the primary in August, has been able to deftly use his experience and career ties all over the county at a time that he needs it most to battle for his seat in the Senate. At the same time Mr. Lamont, who hoped for considerable financial support from major Democratic donors, has struggled somewhat to match Mr. Lieberman's resources.

In August, Mr. Lamont's advisers said they expected to spend roughly $6 million in the general election, but that number was quickly eclipsed. Mr. Lieberman raised that amount in just more than a month, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission. He has raised a total of $14.8 million, another record for a campaign in this state.

Advisers to Mr. Lamont say they made a decision not to focus on fund-raising efforts, using the events more as political rallies.

Last week, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton played host to a fund-raiser for Mr. Lamont at a home on the Upper East Side. Earlier this year, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV played host to an event on Mr. Lamont's behalf.

The campaign has also worked with Mr. Lamont's longtime friends in Greenwich to organize a "Republicans for Lamont" fund-raiser.

As of the end of September, roughly 70 percent of Mr. Lamont's money has come from his own pocket.

Filings show there are far more Republican donors rallying to the side of Mr. Lieberman, who has crisscrossed the country and raised about $5 million since losing the primary, campaign finance records show.

Prominent Republican donors listed in Mr. Lieberman's campaign filings are Joseph Allbaugh, one of President Bush's close advisers during the 2000 campaign, and Don Nickles, the former assistant leader in the Senate. Several outside groups, known as 527s, have also rallied to Mr. Lieberman's side.

DOJ_NMG_0088070

The Connecticut Issues Project, which is sending out mailings praising Mr. Lieberman for his work on the submarine base in Connecticut, is being financed largely by out-of-state donors who typically give to Republicans. The Free Enterprise Fund, which is running ads against Democrats in several other states, has also run television ads criticizing Mr. Lamont's business.

Each campaign has tried to use the source of financing as a line of attack, with the Lieberman campaign accusing Mr. Lamont of trying to buy the election, while the Lamont campaign has said Mr. Lieberman's support from prominent Republicans is a sign that he is too chummy with the White House.

The latest sparks came early this week, when the Lamont campaign filed a complaint with the Federal Election Commission about nearly $380,000 the Lieberman campaign listed as "petty cash" to pay for volunteers in the final two weeks of the primary. Tammy Sun, a spokeswoman for Mr. Lieberman, said the money was used to pay for young workers used in the field operation in the last days of the campaign.

By law, a campaign must keep a journal of petty cash payments of less than $100, but it is not required to make the contents of the journal public. Ms. Sun declined to allow reporters to examine the journal, saying there is no evidence of wrongdoing.

Several campaign finance experts said that while the expenditure was an unusually large sum of money to be listed as petty cash, it would be legal as long as each of the payments was less than $100.

Bloomberg Raises Cash For Lieberman (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

HARTFORD, Connecticut (AP) -- If Sen. Joe Lieberman wins a fourth term on November 7, it's a safe bet New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg will be high on his thank-you list.

Bloomberg, a Republican who shares Lieberman's independent streak, is playing a prominent role helping to raise money for the Democratic senator, the Lieberman campaign said Saturday.

The mayor has also dispatched several campaign operatives to Connecticut to help Lieberman reach GOP and independent voters as the race closes. Lieberman is running as an independent after losing to wealthy businessman Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary.

"The mayor has been extremely generous personally in being willing to help us raise money," Lieberman spokesman Dan Gerstein said.

Bloomberg appeared at a major Chicago fundraising event for Lieberman recently. He will campaign with Lieberman on Monday in Stamford, greeting commuters and formally endorsing him. Bloomberg will also host a fundraiser next week at his home, Gerstein said.

Bloomberg operatives are helping to build Lieberman's get-out-the-vote effort, which is targeting a mix of Democratic, Republican and independent supporters.

Because of Lieberman's independent status, he cannot rely on his party's organization to help him identify voters and get them to the polls.

"We're leveraging the very relevant experience of the Bloomberg operation to help us in what can charitably be described as a unique situation," said Gerstein.

The Bloomberg team has valuable experience identifying such voters in New York City, which is considered Democratic turf, said Gerstein.

"They have a fine-tuned understanding of how to reach across party lines," said Gerstein. "Mayor Bloomberg is a very independent-minded leader with broad appeal who was operating in a very Democratic electorate."

Bloomberg also is backing Connecticut Republicans Gov. M. Jodi Rell and Rep. Christopher Shays, who is locked in a tough re-election fight.

Lamont, who founded a cable television company, has put more than $14 million of his family's money into his campaign, including a $2 million loan he made to the campaign on Friday, his campaign confirmed.

Lieberman enjoys a double-digit lead in the latest statewide polls. Republican Alan Schlesinger trails far behind in the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0088071

Waterfront Project Reflects 2 Images Of A Senator (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski And Ray Rivera

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

BAYONNE, N.J. — Senator Robert Menendez is not directly involved in building the new waterfront development that will soon rise here in the shadow of the Statue of Liberty. But his influence can be seen throughout it.

The project, which occupies the 437-acre site of the abandoned Military Ocean Terminal, is being built with the help of nearly $30 million in federal funds that Mr. Menendez secured using his trademark policy expertise and aggressive politicking. His work provided the seed money for a plan to produce movie studios and shops, marinas and waterfront parks, and 6,600 homes.

The project has also produced considerable work for some of his chief political supporters.

The first major contract to develop the site went to a company that hired a Menendez friend and political confidant, Donald Scarinci, to lobby for it. That developer later took on Mr. Menendez's former campaign treasurer, Carl Goldberg, as a partner. Bonds for a portion of the project were underwritten by Dennis Enright, a top campaign contributor, while Kay LiCausi, a former Menendez Congressional aide and major fund-raiser, received lucrative work lobbying for the project.

Mr. Menendez said he had no role in securing the contracts for any of his friends. But the project, known as the Peninsula at Bayonne Harbor, nonetheless displays the two contrasting images of Mr. Menendez — one a fiery advocate who brings home federal aid for his constituents, the other a political empire builder who detractors say pushes too much largess toward his friends.

Whether the considerable clout wielded by Mr. Menendez in Congress is matched by cronyism, or worse, at home, has become one of the central issues in the Senate race he is waging against State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., his Republican challenger.

Republicans have portrayed Mr. Menendez as a modern-day political boss, presiding over an apparatus not of union stewards, ward heelers and precinct captains, but of lawyers, developers and lobbyists who fill his campaign coffers.

In a year when Republican candidates are on the defensive, Mr. Kean's steady attacks on Mr. Menendez's ethics have made the New Jersey race one of nation's closest and nastiest. A defeat here, where Democrats have not lost a Senate race since 1972, would endanger the party's hopes of winning control of the upper chamber.

Mr. Menendez brushes aside the questions about his ethics as "guilt by geography," a reference to his rise in politics in Hudson County, where the reputation for machine politics and official mischief is notable even by New Jersey standards. Mr. Menendez asserts that in 32 years in political office he has never once used his power to steer a contract to an ally.

Mr. Menendez's supporters say the attacks are simply a way for Republicans to avoid talking about issues he has campaigned on, including Iraq, terrorism and stem cell research. "Those are the things that matter to people, which Senator Menendez is far superior on, both in his knowledge and in his ability to articulate," said State Senator Bernard Kenny, chairman of the Hudson County Democratic Organization.

Even Mr. Menendez's critics concede his success in bringing federal transportation and environmental funds to the state while serving in the House for 13 years. That money helped revitalize blighted communities in his district, particularly a stretch along the Hudson that has come to be known as New Jersey's Gold Coast.

It should not be odd then, Mr. Menendez says, that developers and business leaders have expressed their approval by contributing to his campaigns.

"If someone agrees with your policy goals, is it surprising that they would support you?" he said in a recent interview. "What are they supposed to do? Give to someone who opposes their vision?"

A Land of Scandal

In many ways Mr. Kean has tried to turn the election into a referendum on Hudson County and its checkered political history.

The densely packed county was once a destination for generations of Irish, Italian and Cuban immigrants, including Mr. Menendez's parents, drawn by low rents and the promise of work in the factories and shipyards that stared across the harbor at the New York City skyline.

Today, the county functions almost like New York's sixth borough, as young professionals, families and banking firms flee to cities like Hoboken and Jersey City in search of rents that are lower than in Manhattan.

But while the county's demographics have shifted, and many of its communities have gained new vibrancy, its reputation for corruption has endured. It was here that Frank "Boss" Hague, Jersey City mayor from 1917 to 1947, famously declared "I am the law," while ruling over a machine that controlled governors, judges and United States senators. When he died, he had a net worth of $10 million though his salary never eclipsed $8,000 a year.

In the 1980s, after an onslaught of corruption cases hit the county, The Jersey Journal declared in a headline, "No Hudson officials indicted today."

These days, the political power structure is less influential and more decentralized than in the past. The taint of scandal continues, however. Since 2002, about 20 public officials, including former County Executive Robert Janiszewski, have been indicted or convicted of corruption charges.

But Mr. Menendez, who grew up in Union City, says he is proud of his roots and of the way that he fought his way up, unlike his opponent, the scion of a famous New Jersey political family who was appointed to his first posts in the State Assembly and Senate.

In fact, Mr. Menendez's reputation as a tenacious infighter was born challenging the political establishment. In 1981, as a young lawyer serving as school board secretary, he became a government witness after discovering that the mayor, William V. Musto, who had been both mentor and father figure to him after his own father committed suicide, was diverting school funds to organized crime.

To many, the act was seen as a shameful betrayal, stirring so much resentment that Mr. Menendez said he took to wearing a bulletproof vest during the trial. When he made a bid to run against Mr. Musto for mayor, fliers filled the streets depicting him as a plump bird in a cage, with the caption, "Once a canary, always a canary."

Mr. Menendez lost the election, but four years later he ran again and won, becoming the state's first Hispanic to be elected mayor.

He went on to become the first Hispanic elected to the State Assembly, the State Senate and, in 1993, the first to represent New Jersey in the House of Representatives, where he rose to be the third-ranking Democrat. Jon S. Corzine appointed him to finish out the final year of his Senate term after Mr. Corzine was elected governor in 2005.

In Washington, he has become a respected voice on issues like immigration and transportation, and a staunch defender of liberal causes like stem cell research and abortion rights. He has also broken with his party to support deregulation of the financial services industry, a growing force in the New Jersey economy, and his devout opposition to Fidel Castro has won him near folk-hero status, and generous campaign contributions, in South Florida.

But critics from both parties say that some of Mr. Menendez's most ardent battles have been fought to preserve his own power, and protect government contracts of his patrons.

"If you're going to cross him or his people, you're in for the fight of your life," said William O'Dea, a Democratic freeholder from Hudson County who has clashed with Mr. Menendez over the apportionment of county contracts.

A Friend's Good Fortune

Perhaps no one has done more to foster Mr. Menendez's political success than Mr. Scarinci, a childhood friend who has stood by him from the days when he was battling Mr. Musto, and before. And few have benefited more from that success: among Mr. Menendez's first acts as Union City mayor was to name Mr. Scarinci city attorney.

Mr. Scarinci has since contributed more than $250,000 to state Democrats and helped raise millions more; he and his wife and members of his law firm have contributed more than $40,000 to Mr. Menendez's Congressional campaigns since 1997. As his chief campaign fund-raiser, Mr. Scarinci was so closely associated with Mr. Menendez that many elected officials came to view him as the congressman's emissary.

As he raised money for Mr. Menendez and helped him navigate the treacherous currents of Hudson County politics, Mr. Scarinci also won millions of dollars in state and local contracts for his law firm, many of them with government entities over which Mr. Menendez and his allies hold immense influence.

DOJ_NMG_0088073

For example, after Mr. Menendez was named to head Gov. James E. McGreevey's transition team, he lobbied vigorously to help Mr. Scarinci win a legal contract with the Casino Reinvestment Development Authority, according to three officials familiar with the appointment. Mr. Scarinci's firm has made $2.8 million from that contract since 2002.

Mr. Scarinci does not deny that his firm has benefited from his political activity.

"It's not the political connections as much as you're involved," he said in an interview earlier this year. "So when they win, you're not going to hire some stranger, you're going to hire someone you're comfortable with, someone you trust."

Mr. Menendez insists that he has never helped Mr. Scarinci get or keep a contract, except when he was mayor and it was his duty to appoint legal counsel.

But in 1999, Mr. Menendez led a fierce recall effort against his former protégé, Mayor Rudy Garcia of Union City, because, Mr. Garcia says, he had fired Mr. Scarinci as city attorney. Mr. Menendez says it was because Mr. Garcia wanted his job in Congress. Whatever the cause, there was no mistaking who won: Mr. Garcia resigned as mayor in 2000, and his successor promptly rehired Mr. Scarinci.

Mr. Scarinci was forced to sever his ties with the campaign last month, after the release of audio tapes recorded in 1999 in which he is heard advising a client who held a lucrative psychiatric contract with Hudson County to hire another physician as a "favor" to Mr. Menendez.

The psychiatrist with the contract, Oscar Sandoval, who is being sued by the county for allegedly bribing Mr. Janiszewski, the former county executive, to win contracts in the first place, said in an interview that Mr. Scarinci's message was clear: hire Mr. Menendez's friend or risk losing the contracts.

After the tapes were released, Mr. Scarinci issued written statements denying Dr. Sandoval's allegations and insisting that his dealings with him were never directed or requested by Mr. Menendez.

True or not, the tapes have provided fodder to Mr. Kean, who in ads has promised to free New Jersey from "the clutch of corruption."

In September, United States Attorney Christopher J. Christie also subpoenaed the records of a Hudson County social services agency that leased a building, for $300,000 over nearly 10 years, from Mr. Menendez while, as a House member, he helped it win millions in federal financing. Mr. Kean has used the subpoenas to assert that Mr. Menendez is under criminal investigation, which Mr. Christie's office has never confirmed. Mr. Menendez denies that he is under investigation and says that the House Ethics Committee's legal counsel cleared the deal.

Questions About Contracts

Mr. Menendez's involvement in the Bayonne project began in the mid-1990s, as he fought to save the base, which provided 2,500 jobs and was Bayonne's largest employer. Once that fight was lost, he began a new battle for federal financing necessary to transform the site into a thriving addition to the local economy — including $11.6 million from the Army for environmental cleanup, $7 million in Defense Department funds to stabilize the shoreline, and $3.2 million for road improvements to make the area more accessible to the New Jersey Turnpike.

Project officials say that Mr. Menendez had no role in awarding contracts and that without his support the development would never have gotten off the ground.

But the board created to oversee the project, the Bayonne Local Redevelopment Authority, was appointed by one of his allies, Mayor Joseph V. Doria Jr. The selection process for a developer — which was based not on price but on the subjective assessment of the redevelopment authority — was also led by people who are Menendez allies.

And the redevelopment authority's first executive director was Nicholas A. Chiaravalloti, a lawyer who had once worked in Mr. Scarinci's office. After assembling the contract specifications for the project, Mr. Chiaravalloti left in late 2002 to accept a job on Mr. Menendez's Congressional staff.

Dozens of companies expressed interest in the development, and two submitted detailed written proposals. The new executive director, Nancy Kist, who had worked as Mr. Doria's legal counsel before being appointed to the authority, said she forwarded both proposals to the board.

DOJ_NMG_0088074

But at least one board member remembers seeing only the plan submitted by Fidelco Bayonne Realty — Mr. Scarinci's client. Two principals of the second group, George Figliolia, president of BG Builders, and Angelo Cali, a co-owner in Cali Futures, said they were never asked to give a presentation.

Maria Karczewski, who served on the seven-member board from 2002 until this January, said the Fidelco offer was the only one presented, though she said she did not believe Mr. Menendez had an influence on that decision. Three other board members said they recalled a presentation by Fidelco but could not recall whether they had seen the second one.

In public hearings, Ms. Kist urged the board to accept Fidelco's proposal because it included movie and television production facilities as well as housing, and also gave local officials a voice in shaping the project.

But some city officials said that once Fidelco hired Mr. Scarinci, it was clear who would get the contract.

"People knew that Menendez was running the show because he brought all the federal money," said City Councilman Anthony Chiappone, a rival of Mr. Doria who said he is frustrated that he and others have been excluded from the decision-making process. "And everyone in Hudson County politics know that Scarinci is his No. 1 guy, so any contractor who hires him gets treated like they have Menendez's seal of approval."

Steve Kalafer, a principal in Fidelco, said he hired Mr. Scarinci's firm because it had a long track record of getting waterfront development projects through Hudson County's maze of legal and governmental regulations.

"In every community there's one firm that has the experience and credibility with the local governing agencies to get projects done," he said. "I didn't bother to interview any other firm because I didn't want to try and reinvent the wheel."

Mr. Kalafer said that Fidelco's decision to bring Mr. Menendez's former campaign treasurer, Carl Goldberg, into the project as a partner in 2005 was based on his track record as a developer rather than any political connections. He said that Mr. Menendez played no role in Fidelco's decision to hire Mr. Scarinci or team up with Mr. Goldberg.

"Other than a smile and an occasional passing comment like, 'how's the project going?' I've never had any discussions with the senator about it," Mr. Kalafer said.

Royal Caribbean Cruises, one of the development's first tenants, hired a former Menendez staffer and fund-raiser, Kay LiCausi, who was vice chairwoman of the Hudson County Democratic Organization, to lobby for state and federal support.

Ms. LiCausi left her job on Mr. Menendez's staff in 2002, but she has maintained a close relationship with the congressman, who has acknowledged helping her get more than $200,000 in lobbying work for campaign committees over which he controlled or had strong influence. He has also recommended her for other lobbying work, which he compared to writing a reference letter for any deserving former employee.

In August 2004, just months after Royal Caribbean hired her, paying her more than $180,000 over the next two years, Mr. Menendez announced the first of two appropriations totaling $9.5 million to repair shoreline and extend a berth for the company's huge cruise ships.

Mr. Menendez said in an interview last week that Ms. LiCausi's role with the firm did not affect his actions, and that he did not consider it a conflict of interest to be obtaining tax dollars for companies who hire his own fund-raisers as lobbyists.

"If these people, these companies have success, that's their own initiative," he said, adding that several of the contractors involved in the project have never contributed to him or hired any of his supporters.

Royal Caribbean also hired Dennis Enright, a top contributor to Mr. Menendez, to underwrite a $16.5 million bond issue to help pay for terminal repairs.

A Royal Caribbean spokesman said the company never discussed the hires with Mr. Menendez, and that Ms. LiCausi and Mr. Enright were chosen because they were the best people for the job. Ms. LiCausi and Mr. Enright did not return repeated phone calls seeking comment for this article.

Mr. Menendez says that he is being held to a different standard because of where he comes from, saying that Mr. Kean has accepted campaign contributions from government contractors, and asserting that his opponent would never have received his first Assembly and State Senate appointments without his family's considerable "political muscle."

"You do that when you come from Hudson County, it's called bossism," Mr. Menendez said. "But I guess when you come from my opponent's background, it's just leadership."

DOJ_NMG_0088075

Caution Prevails In Last TV Debate (MCA)

By Richard Locker

Memphis Commercial Appeal, October 29, 2006

Ford, Corker sidestep controversy, criticize attack ads

NASHVILLE -- Democrat Harold Ford Jr. drove home his message for change while Republican Bob Corker emphasized his "Tennessee life" and values in Saturday night's final televised debate of Tennessee's U.S. Senate race.

Neither unveiled new themes in their meeting at Vanderbilt University. And some attacks that dominated the previous two debates in Memphis and Chattanooga were absent.

But the negative TV attack ads of the past three weeks surfaced at the end of the face-off as veteran WTVF-TV anchor Chris Clark asked both to comment.

"I was a little surprised to see the smut and the slime coming into my living room during family time," Ford said of two ads sponsored by the Republican National Committee. One featured a bare-shouldered blond woman saying she had met Ford at the "Playboy party" and asking him to "call me."

Corker said he didn't like the ads and that he asked his national party to remove them. He asked Ford to join him in calling for all ads not put up directly by the two candidates' campaigns to cease. But he said after the debate that the national Democratic Party is spending $2.7 million on ads compared to $813,000 by the national GOP over the last two weeks.

The two sparred most pointedly over tax and spending issues. Corker charged that Ford had voted 78 times to raise taxes during his 10 years in the House -- to which Ford responded that he had never voted for a final federal budget bill that was not balanced.

Ford in turn said Corker had raised taxes three times as mayor of Chattanooga, and he tried to link Corker to the state income tax that former governor Don Sundquist proposed. But accusing Ford of "taking liberties with the facts throughout the campaign," Corker said the income tax didn't surface until more than 21/2 years after he stepped down as Sundquist's finance commissioner and returned to Chattanooga.

The two also responded to audience questions, prescreened by the League of Women Voters, on illegal immigration, Social Security, health care, the minimum wage, the federal deficit, human rights and how to deal with North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

Ford said President Bush should appoint "three emissaries" -- former senator Howard Baker, former secretary of state Madeleine Albright and former Georgia senator Sam Nunn -- to deal with North Korea and former secretary of state Colin Powell to work with the Iraqi government on a new strategy there.

Corker said he believes the six-party diplomatic talks underway over North Korea "are very healthy" but its neighboring countries should take a more active role in persuading North Korea's leaders to back down on nuclear weapons.

Ford used several of the questions to say that Corker's GOP has been in control of Congress and the White House for the last six years but has done little to resolve the nation's problems.

Both said Social Security must be made solvent. Corker said he would favor allowing younger workers to set up private accounts with a portion of their Social Security taxes but only after Social Security is "made structurally sound."

Ford said, "I think Social Security should go first to people who need it the most -- people who have worked 30 to 40 years who have earned it should get it before" others more affluent. He renewed his call for a program in which every newborn gets $500 deposited in a special account at birth that he, she or anybody can contribute to and which can be used only for college , a down payment on a house or retirement.

"This race boils down to a very simple premise," Ford said. "If you like what has gone on in Washington for the last six years, you don't want to vote for me ... (But) if you believe your children deserve a better America than we have today, I'm asking you to vote for me. I'm not going to be a parrot for anyone in Washington other than you."

Corker emphasized the dominant theme of his campaign's biographical TV ads, that he has the experience and Tennessee values to represent Tennesseans in the Senate. "I've lived a Tennessee life. I grew up in Tennessee, went to public schools, graduated from UT ...

DOJ_NMG_0088076

"This is not a referendum," Corker said. "This is a choice between two individuals who could not have led a more different life and who have had different life experiences. I think you want someone who thinks like you think, someone who has the ability to solve complex problems."

Political Theater And The Real Rick Santorum (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

Every poll suggests that Rick Santorum will lose his race to return to the U.S. Senate. That's probably good news in Pennsylvania's bobo suburbs, where folks regard Santorum as an ideological misfit and a social blight. But it's certainly bad for poor people around the world.

For there has been at least one constant in Washington over the past 12 years: almost every time a serious piece of antipoverty legislation surfaces in Congress, Rick Santorum is there playing a leadership role.

In the mid-1990s, he was a floor manager for welfare reform, the most successful piece of domestic legislation of the past 10 years. He then helped found the Renewal Alliance to help charitable groups with funding and parents with flextime legislation.

More recently, he has pushed through a stream of legislation to help the underprivileged, often with Democratic partners. With Dick Durbin and Joe Biden, Santorum has sponsored a series of laws to fight global AIDS and offer third world debt relief. With Chuck Schumer and Harold Ford, he's pushed to offer savings accounts to children from low-income families. With John Kerry, he's proposed homeownership tax credits. With Chris Dodd, he backed legislation authorizing $860 million for autism research. With Joe Lieberman he pushed legislation to reward savings by low-income families.

In addition, he's issued a torrent of proposals, many of which have become law: efforts to fight tuberculosis; to provide assistance to orphans and vulnerable children in developing countries; to provide housing for people with AIDS; to increase funding for Social Services Block Grants and organizations like Healthy Start and the Children's Aid Society; to finance community health centers; to combat genocide in Sudan.

I could fill this column, if not this entire page, with a list of ideas, proposals and laws Santorum has poured out over the past dozen years. It's hard to think of another politician who has been so active and so productive on these issues.

Like many people who admire his output, I disagree with Santorum on key matters like immigration, abortion, gay marriage. I'm often put off by his unnecessarily slashing style and his culture war rhetoric.

But government is ultimately not about the theater or the light shows of public controversy, it's about legislation and results. And the substance of Santorum's work is impressive. Bono, who has worked closely with him over the years, got it right: "I would suggest that Rick Santorum has a kind of Tourette's disease; he will always say the most unpopular thing. But on our issues, he has been a defender of the most vulnerable."

Santorum doesn't have the jocular manner of most politicians. His colleagues' eyes can glaze over as he lectures them on the need to, say, devote a week of Senate floor time to poverty. He's not the most social member of the club. Many politicians praise family values and seem to spend as little time as possible with their own families, but Santorum is at home almost constantly. And there is sometimes a humorlessness to his missionary zeal.

But no one can doubt his rigor. Jonathan Rauch of The National Journal wrote the smartest review of Santorum's book, "It Takes a Family." Rauch noted that while Goldwaterite conservatives see the individual as the essential unit of society, Santorum sees the family as the essential unit.

Rauch observed, "Where Goldwater denounced collectivism as the enemy of the individual, Santorum denounces individualism as the enemy of the family." That belief has led Santorum in interesting and sometimes problematical directions, but the argument itself is a serious one. His discussion of the philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre, for example, is as sophisticated as anything in Barack Obama's recent book. If Santorum were pro-choice, he'd be a media star and a campus hero.

The bottom line is this: If serious antipoverty work is going to be done, it's going to emerge from a coalition of liberals and religious conservatives. Without Santorum, that's less likely to happen. If senators are going to be honestly appraised, it's going to require commentators who can look beyond the theater of public controversy and at least pretend to care about actual legislation. Santorum has never gotten a fair shake from the media.

DOJ_NMG_0088077

And so after Election Day, the underprivileged will probably have lost one of their least cuddly but most effective champions.

GOP Hopes Fade For Taking District Bush Calls Home (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

WACO, Texas -- Texas Republicans spent much of this year thinking they had a good chance to defeat an eight-term Democrat in this central Texas congressional district.

Today, Republican Van Taylor's campaign in the 17th District, though well-funded, seems bogged down. Several polls indicate that incumbent Chet Edwards, 54, will easily retain the seat he has held for 16 years.

The Republican Party promised to campaign heavily for Mr. Taylor when he won the primary in March. He was told he could expect money, rallies featuring party stalwarts and national press exposure.

For the Republicans, Mr. Taylor seemed like the perfect fit.

The 10-year Marine veteran who served in Iraq seemed likely to blend in perfectly with the pro-military constituency that permeates this area near Fort Hood.

Some local conservatives also saw an excellent opportunity to rid themselves of an embarrassing situation -- a Democrat representing President Bush, whose Crawford ranch is in the district.

"It's an embarrassment," said M. A. Taylor, the McLennan County Republican chairman, who is not related to the candidate. "This area overwhelmingly supports the president and is overwhelmingly Republican, and yet we have a congressman who supposedly represents our interests. It is nothing short of personally humiliating."

But something happened along the way that turned the odds against Mr. Taylor.

Mr. Edwards refused to attack Mr. Bush, unlike most Democrats across the country, and he has spoken about his efforts to protect the Waco VA hospital and to fight for the military.

He reminds voters that he is a member of the Appropriations Committee and is the top-ranking Democrat on its military quality of life and veterans affairs subcommittee.

"In a Congress where committee assignments really make a difference, the fact that I am the ranking member on the committee that funds the VA health care system has given me the experience and insight into the political process and the VA system itself," Mr. Edwards said at a recent debate in College Station.

Meanwhile, Mr. Taylor tells voters he served two tours in Iraq as a captain with the 4th Marines, 3rd Recon Battalion, and comes from a long line of soldiers, dating back to the Civil War.

The race has not been cheap. According to Congressional Quarterly's Political Money Line, Mr. Taylor has raised almost $2 million, while Mr. Edwards has raised more than $2.8 million, among the most of any Democrat running for Congress.

Though Mr. Edwards has used much of his campaign war chest to promote past service, Mr. Taylor has attacked the Democrat as a "career politician," a man out of step with "family values" in the district.

Some of Mr. Taylor's television ads have been called "fanciful" or less than fair. In fact, "some of his attacks on Edwards' voting record are simply not true," said Gary Halter, professor of political science at Texas A&M University.

As the criticism of Mr. Taylor's campaign increased, the excitement from Republican leaders in Washington has cooled.

The National Republican Congressional Committee canceled $1.5 million in television ads it had scheduled to run in the waning days of the campaign, but the Taylor campaign is still fighting.

"We're prepared to win this race," said Mike Spellings, a campaign spokesman. "We're confident voters are responding to his message."

Democrats Aim To Regain Majority Of Governors (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

Democrats are quietly poised to win a majority of the nation's gubernatorial offices in the midterm elections next week, as most of the attention focuses on the battle for control of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0088078

Republicans currently hold 28 gubernatorial seats. However, a number of them are in what are considered liberal states that appear to have stronger Democratic candidates than in recent years.

According to the latest polls, Democrats could win in eight states: Alaska, Colorado, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, Nevada and Ohio.

"It's a volatile climate out there," said Bernie Campbell, communications director for the Democratic Governors' Association (DGA). "A combination of things is working in our favor -- voter confidence in Democrats and building on the past accomplishments of our current governors."

Gov. Bill Richardson, New Mexico Democrat, said during a recent appearance in Washington that his party is benefiting from a bounce in the polls because of voter dissatisfaction with President Bush and Congress. Mr. Richardson, the president of the DGA, is far ahead in his own re-election campaign.

Republican governors who are running competitive races in the so-called "blue" states this year have been successful by embracing a more independent agenda and distancing themselves from the administration.

"The issues environment has been challenging for Republicans," said Phil Musser, executive director of the Republican Governors Association (RGA).

Mr. Musser cited gubernatorial races in California and Oregon as evidence that Republicans can still buck the national trend working against others in their party. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is leading his Democratic opponent, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, in the polls. In Oregon, Republican nominee Ron Saxton is running a surprisingly close race against incumbent Gov. Theodore R. Kulongoski.

"You still need the core base, but it's less about ideology and more about being pragmatic," Mr. Musser said of their success.

Some Republicans have complained privately that the White House has focused too much on maintaining a majority in Congress and has virtually ignored Republican gubernatorial races, both in fundraising and in appearances by Mr. Bush and other leading party figures.

"They gave up on us a long time ago," said one source, who asked to remain anonymous because of a continued involvement in Republican campaigns.

"The top priority has been Congress," Mr. Musser acknowledged, "especially early in the cycle."

However, he said that the RGA has raised $20 million for its races this year and has an estimated $6 million to $7 million advantage over the DGA.

A significant part of that money will be used to get voters to the polls on Election Day. "Money is critical to it," he said.

Novice Stands Her Ground On Veterans' Turf In Alaska (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

WASILLA, Alaska — Voters have not elected a woman as governor of Alaska in 47 years of statehood, and just a few months ago, before she trounced Gov. Frank Murkowski in the Republican primary, Sarah Palin was hardly known outside this growing suburb of Anchorage.

Now Ms. Palin, 42, has a sizable lead in most polls over Tony Knowles, a former Democratic governor who has survived in a conservative state by working closely with the powerful oil industry and cultivating ties across party lines.

Her secret?

"She's a suburban mom," said Dan Newman, the pastor of Wasilla Christian Fellowship, one of several evangelical churches here, and a Palin supporter. "It's almost the opposite of what you'd expect from Alaska."

Ms. Palin, the former mayor of Wasilla, stands out in a state that has seen few fresh faces in politics. She is untainted by government scandal and unburdened by political debt. She is a conservative Christian who opposes abortion. She runs marathons. She fishes. She hunts.

"We always have a choice," Ms. Palin, who was an infant when her family moved to Alaska so her father could take a job teaching school, said in an interview. "We can go backwards and be real negative or we can go forward and be positive."

DOJ_NMG_0088079

Still, political analysts say Ms. Palin is not a lock to win.

Mr. Knowles has been able to keep the race competitive, in part by questioning whether Ms. Palin has the experience to lead a state where voters measure politicians on issues as wide-ranging as energy exploration, aerial wolf hunting and subsistence fishing in the arctic bush.

Mr. Knowles, 63, tries to sell his experience, having served eight years in the governor's office in Juneau, leaving in 2002 because of term limits. He also casts Ms. Palin as provincial.

More specifically, Mr. Knowles has suggested that Ms. Palin lacks the backbone and skills to negotiate with oil companies to build a new natural gas pipeline, something they agree is critical for the state economy as oil production declines on the North Slope. About 85 percent of the state's general revenue comes from taxes on the oil industry and many people view the new gas pipeline as Alaska's next natural resource boom.

Ms. Palin is portraying herself as a needed outside agent of change at a time when the Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating links between Republican leaders in the Legislature and a major player in the oil industry. The tactic worked well in the August primary, with only 19 percent of voters supporting Governor Murkowski's bid for a second term.

Two of the three members of the state's Congressional delegation, Senator Ted Stevens and Representative Don Young, have been in office for a total of 71 years. The third, Senator Lisa Murkowski, has been in office since 2002 in the seat her father held for 22 years before that.

Ms. Palin's rise to prominence has come in part by turning the spotlight on the failings of her party. She accused one of her fellow members of the Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission of misusing his office to do political work.

Some of the accusations proved true, but Ms. Palin was striking close to home. The person she accused was Randy Ruedrich, the chairman of the state Republican Party.

Mr. Ruedrich, who says he and the party are actively supporting Ms. Palin in the election, has refused her suggestion that he should resign.

"When Ms. Palin becomes governor she will be a member of my 90-member executive committee," Mr. Ruedrich said in an interview. "I have one vote and she has one vote in that 90-member body."

Adding to the party tension is the candidacy of Andrew Halcro, who was a Republican during his two terms in the State House and is running for governor as an independent. The three candidates have appeared together frequently in forums and debates around the state. While Mr. Halcro, 42, trails far behind the others, he receives coverage in the news media, and opinions differ on whether he will draw more voters from Ms. Palin or Mr. Knowles.

Dreams of a new economic boom in natural gas development have dominated the race for all three candidates.

Mr. Knowles talks confidently about the benefits of squeezing as much as 100 trillion cubic feet of natural gas deposits from the North Slope through a 48-inch pipeline for decades into the future. He says the project, estimated to cost more than $20 billion, could give the rest of Alaska's economy time to diversify, a long-sought goal many say was overlooked during the oil rush of the 1970s and 1980s.

Mr. Knowles said the gas pipeline, which could take 10 years just to build, would provide money to improve state education. Noting a rise in average temperature in the state, he also said Alaska could position itself as "a research center for climate change and how to deal with it."

Some economists have said that the state has already increased the tourism and cargo shipping industries, and they say that a gas pipeline, while a boost for the state, would not have the same kind of impact as the Trans-Alaska oil pipeline.

"I'm not going to say that booms and busts are gone forever, but we're a little less susceptible now," said Neal Fried, an economist with the Alaska Department of Labor.

Still, nearly every Alaska resident recently received an annual dividend check from oil production. This year the amount was $1,106.96, and the belief that the state's natural resources will remain its economic backbone is deeply held, whether the resource was gold a century ago or gas in the future.

The gas pipeline seems to take on particular urgency in an election year, just as it did four years ago when Governor Murkowski, then a senator, returned from Washington. He has worked for more than two years but failed to strike a deal.

DOJ_NMG_0088080

Ms. Palin, like Mr. Knowles, said she wanted the state to expand negotiations beyond BP, Exxon Mobil and Conoco Phillips, the three oil companies with which Governor Murkowski has been negotiating.

But Ms. Palin also recalled that the pipeline was a topic of discussion when she was a child and said that Mr. Knowles is being "disingenuous" when he says urgently that he wants pipeline proposals on his desk in the governor's office by Jan. 31, 2007.

New Governor's Name Is ... Crist. Or Davis. The Race Remains Too Close To Call. (STPETE)

By Adam Smith

St. Petersburg Times, October 28, 2006

Republican Charlie Crist may be trouncing Jim Davis in money and sheer number of TV commercials, but a new St. Petersburg Times poll shows Davis remains solidly in the game as Election Day looms.

The poll found Attorney General Crist leading Democratic U.S. Rep. Davis by six percentage points, 48 percent to 42 percent, with 10 percent of voters still undecided. Independent voters stand to tip the election Nov. 7, with one in five still unsure between the two.

"I would not put my hand in my pockets and place a heavy bet on either one of these candidates. I think it's too close to call," said pollster Rob Schroth. "I think on Election Day, it's going to be close."

The Oct. 22-25 statewide telephone survey of 800 voters was conducted for the St. Petersburg Times by Schroth/Eldon & Associates, which usually works with Democrats, and the Polling Co., which typically works with Republicans. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

"The fact that the governor's race is still in play shows that Florida is still a red and blue state - more of a purple state," said pollster Kellyanne Conway of the Polling Co.

Crist is clearly better positioned, but both candidates head into the final stretch with some advantages.

For Davis, who has been unable to afford nearly as much TV advertising as Crist, anti-Republican sentiment is a big help. More than four in 10 Davis supporters said they're backing him mostly because of his political party or because they don't trust or dislike his opponent.

"As far as politicians go Charlie Crist is probably not that bad, but on the other hand he's a Republican, and right now I'm not too happy with the Republican Party," said 57-year-old Wes McKenzie, a county employee from St. Petersburg who has no party affiliation and has already voted for Davis.

Crist, though, is winning over about one in five Democrats, while Davis is backed by about one in 10 Republicans. The attorney general also is effectively tied with Davis among independents, and was leading 47 percent to 42 percent among woman. Democrats typically need an advantage in both those groups to win statewide.

What's more, the voters surveyed this week also trusted Crist slightly more than Davis to improve public schools, stand up to special interests and handle hurricane insurance reform. All are centerpieces of Davis' campaign message.

"I want to vote for Crist because he says he's going to try to do something about property taxes and insurance, so hopefully he's not lying," said 59-year-old Republican nurse Barbara Martin of Cape Coral, who has heard little about Davis.

Crist was leading Davis in every region except Democrat-rich South Florida, where the Tampa congressman leads 55 percent to 38 percent. Ground zero for the race is Tampa Bay, home of both Crist and Davis, and the attorney general leads there 48 percent to 40 percent.

In increasingly Republican Hillsborough County, Davis' home county, Crist has a 12 percentage point lead. In Crist's home county of Pinellas the attorney general leads by six percentage points.

"I don't think Davis has done very well for us in Congress and in Washington, so what makes you think he's going to do better as governor," asked David Hammons, a retired Democrat from Largo. "Crist seems like he wants to do what's right for the people."

Republicans in Florida have a far better voter mobilization operation than Democrats, but the poll points to potential trouble spots for Crist in energizing the conservative base.

DOJ_NMG_0088081

A social moderate who is ambivalent on restricting abortions and espouses a "live and let live" philosophy, Crist had a smaller lead in conservative North Florida, 47 percent to 37 percent, than Republicans typically expect. A small majority of voters who described themselves as born again Christians backed Crist.

"You have to wonder if there's still some doubt about whether Charlie Crist is a true conservative," said pollster Tom Eldon.

That's precisely the concern of 31-year-old Shane Abbott, a Republican pharmacist from the Panhandle town of De Funiak Springs. For the first time, he may skip voting in the governor's race.

"I can't feel good about voting for either one of them," Abbott said. "Morally, ethically , I see no Christian values or a large lack of Christian values."

The poll found Florida voters, if not happy with the way things are going in their state, then at least far happier with Florida's direction than the country's.

They were evenly divided when asked whether things are moving in the right or wrong direction in the Sunshine State.

Davis made history in picking the first African-American running mate, former state Sen. Daryl Jones, but the poll found no evidence that's helping Davis. Democrats in Florida typically win nine of 10 African-American votes, but the St. Petersburg Times poll found 69 percent of black voters with Davis and 16 percent with Crist. Fourteen percent were undecided.

Among Hispanic voters, another heavily coveted voter group, Crist led 59 percent to 32 percent. But the margins of error for both minority groups are high - plus or minus nearly 10 percent for African-Americans and nearly 11 percent for Hispanics.

The strikingly different takes of African-American and Hispanic Floridians highlight the nuances of the state's diverse electorate.

"Florida can really teach a lesson for the rest of the country as a bellwether in terms of not muddying together the so-called 'minority vote,' " Conway said.

So how would the pollsters advise the candidates to finish off the race for the Governor's mansion?

Crist, they said, needs to closely ally himself with popular outgoing Gov. Jeb Bush. And, Conway suggested, he should probably avoid becoming too negative in his campaign given that he has been winning over Democrats, independents and women who are likely to be alienated by attacks on Davis.

Davis, on the other hand, needs to ramp up attacks on Crist to raise doubts about him among swing voters, which could be tough given Davis' limited resources. The pollsters also said Davis should work to mobilize African-American voters and stress his opposition - and Crist's support for - how the unpopular FCAT test is used in Florida.

Times staff writer Joni James contributed to this report. Adam C. Smith can be reached at 727893-8241 or asmith@sptimes.com

Politician Disputes Waitress' Claim (LAT)

From Times News Reports

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Five-term U.S. Rep. Jim Gibbons, the GOP gubernatorial candidate, said he'd be willing to take a polygraph to prove he did not assault a Las Vegas cocktail waitress.

Chrissy Mazzeo, 32, has said Gibbons pushed her up against a wall at a Las Vegas restaurant Oct. 13 and made a sexual advance while he and a prominent GOP operative were walking her to her truck. Gibbons, 61, says she tripped and he caught her, then walked away.

She called police that night but withdrew her complaint the next day, saying she had been threatened and pressured by someone claiming ties to the Gibbons campaign.

Winning Women? (NYT)

By Alexandra Starr

The New York Times Magazine, October 29, 2006

Darcy Burner has never held public office — the former Microsoft project manager is just 35 — but nonetheless she appears to have a good shot at becoming the first Democratic representative from Washington's Eighth District. The timing of her bid is propitious: in this scandal-saturated election year, her lack of political experience may be a boon. And the fact that Burner is an adept fund-raiser has fueled her quick rise. There's another, slightly more intangible factor at play, too: Evergreen-state residents are accustomed to female leadership. "You don't have the hurdle of convincing voters that women can do the job when the models include people without a Y chromosome," Burner told me recently. And in fact, Washington is the only state in the nation where both senators and the governor are women.

DOJ_NMG_0088082

The West has always been known for "breaking the bonds of custom," as the historian Fredrick Jackson Turner put it. That has provided opportunities to enterprising men, but women have left their mark as well. In politics, they've become a fixture to an extent not seen even in liberal bastions like Massachusetts. Women have resided in Arizona's gubernatorial mansion for nearly a decade. Neighboring California's two senators are female, as is nearly a third of that state's House delegation. And the November elections could sweep more Western women into office. State Senator Dina Titus, Democrat of Nevada, is waging a campaign for governor, headlining an almost all-female ticket. Gabrielle Giffords is favored to win Arizona's Eighth District for the Democrats. And one of the most tightly fought races in the country — a showdown between a four-term representative, Heather Wilson (Republican of New Mexico), and Attorney General Patricia Madrid — will send a woman to Congress no matter which party prevails.

While plenty of Republican female stars — like former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor — got their starts out West, most of the region's female candidates for high office this year are Democrats. Representative Rahm Emanuel of Chicago, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, says that regional and national trends make Democratic female candidates ideal standard-bearers. "Education, the environment and livability issues are coming to the forefront in that part of the country, and these women speak to the changing nature of the region," he says.

To be sure, these candidates will not win or lose their races on the basis of their sex alone. Talent on the stump, credentials and fund-raising will be decisive. The fact that they have the opportunity to make their case, however, speaks to Western states' receptivity to women in public life. That legacy dates back to the pioneer era and was partly born of necessity. The agricultural model of the ranch — unlike, say, the Southern plantation — often demanded that the sexes work side by side. Western states were the first to grant female suffrage, and allowing women access to the ballot was followed by electing them to high office: the first U.S. congresswoman hailed from Montana, the first female state senator from Utah.

To this day, political parties in Western states tend to be more open to women than the networks that reign in parts of the East Coast. "The process for getting on the ballot isn't as transparent in states with entrenched machines," says Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. She points to her home state, New Jersey, where county chairmen — and they are almost always men — often determine who will run. "In part because those decisions are generally made behind closed doors, it makes it harder for women to get involved," Walsh says. Indeed, the Garden State and Massachusetts — two states with strong machines — have all-male Congressional delegations, despite their progressive political leanings.

Of course, even this year, some of the Western women challengers will fall short. Incumbents aren't shoo-ins, either. Senator Maria Cantwell, a Washington State Democrat, is facing a tough re-election challenge. Nevertheless, given the region's more transparent political parties and history, it is well poised to retain its status as an incubator of female leadership. That may bode well for Senator Hillary Clinton if she decides to make a bid for the presidency. She would have trouble carrying states in the South, but if Western voters extend their embrace of female leadership to the highest levels of government, a promotion from the Senate to the White House could be within her reach.

Candidates, Parties Target Web Audience (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Increasing numbers of people looking for political news are going online - with more than a third now saying they check the Internet for such information.

That group is more likely to be younger, better educated and male than the population in general, an Associated Press-AOL News poll found.

DOJ_NMG_0088083

While 35 percent say they go to the Internet for political updates about campaigns and candidates, that number grows to 43 percent of likely voters - and they tend to be more liberal than conservative.

With midterm elections less than two weeks away, the online audience is getting deluged with e-mail and election updates from the news, campaign and political Web sites.

Those who use the Web point to the convenience, the wide variety of information and the range of intense emotion available.

The poll found that four in 10 men search the Web for political news compared to three in 10 women. About four in 10 of those under age 50 search the Web for political news, compared with fewer than two in 10 of those 65 and over. And more than half of those with college degrees look to the Web for politics, compared with a third of those who have some college and fewer than one in six with a high school education or less.

The most popular destinations are the news sites, with nine of 10 in the online political audience saying they go to news sites. Just over a third go to candidate's sites and almost half check out political sites.

The number who go online has grown from about a fourth in this country six years ago, according to the Pew Research Center. Fewer than half of those who go online are regular users of the Web for political news.

While the online browsers go to a wide variety of sites, they overwhelmingly trust what they see on the news sites,

Seven in 10 said news sites are the most trustworthy, according to the poll of 2,000 adults taken Oct. 20-25. It has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 2.5 percentage points, larger for subgroups.

Mental Health Reform, Please (WP)

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Virginia's mental health laws are stuck in the past.

VIRGINIA OFFICIALS are taking some encouraging steps aimed at fixing the state's broken mental health system, but this much-needed effort has come under attack. The assault is misplaced.

Increasing numbers of mentally ill people in Virginia end up on the streets, in court or in jail, instead of in treatment, where they belong. Chief Justice Leroy R. Hassell Sr. of the Virginia Supreme Court has launched a commission to revamp state mental health laws, including the state's outmoded criteria for civil commitment, which provide emergency treatment only when people are an "imminent danger" to themselves or others. Justice Hassell wants those laws examined, with the hope of presenting "reform legislation" to the 2008 General Assembly.

At a recent hearing, however, Sen. Kenneth W. Stolle (R-Virginia Beach) warned the court not to overstep its role by getting involved in policy. According to the Richmond Times-Dispatch, Mr. Stolle, chairman of the Senate Courts of Justice Committee, said he didn't think judges should "tell us how we should deal with mental health." Justice Hassell should be applauded instead of criticized. Judges see firsthand the impact of untreated people on the criminal justice system and the inadequacy of laws that deal with the problem. Their advice to lawmakers is invaluable.

There is a precedent, too. In the 1990s, family violence was spotlighted as an issue by then-Chief Justice Harry L. Carrico, and reform followed.

Coincidental with the state effort, Fairfax County, through its so-called Beeman Commission, is analyzing its own mental services during a time of increased need and dwindling resources. These two efforts highlight Virginia's desperate situation and the need for solutions.

Islam, Terror And The Second Nuclear Age (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times Magazine, October 29, 2006

I.

For nearly 50 years, worries about a nuclear Middle East centered on Israel. Arab leaders resented the fact that Israel was the only atomic power in the region, a resentment heightened by America's tacit approval of the situation. But they were also pretty certain that Israel (which has never explicitly acknowledged having nuclear weapons) would not drop the bomb except as a very last resort. That is why Egypt and Syria were unafraid to attack Israel during the October 1973 Yom Kippur War. "Israel will not be the first country in the region to use nuclear weapons," went the Israelis' coy formula. "Nor will it be the second."

DOJ_NMG_0088084

Today the nuclear game in the region has changed. When the Arab League's secretary general, Amr Moussa, called for "a Middle East free of nuclear weapons" this past May, it wasn't Israel that prompted his remarks. He was worried about Iran, whose self-declared ambition to become a nuclear power has been steadily approaching realization.

The anti-Israel statements of the Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, coupled with Iran's support for Hezbollah and Hamas, might lead you to think that the Arab states would welcome Iran's nuclear program. After all, the call to wipe the Zionist regime from the map is a longstanding cliché of Arab nationalist rhetoric. But the interests of Shiite non-Arab Iran do not always coincide with those of Arab leaders. A nuclear Iran means, at the very least, a realignment of power dynamics in the Persian Gulf. It could potentially mean much more: a historic shift in the position of the long-subordinated Shiite minority relative to the power and prestige of the Sunni majority, which traditionally dominated the Muslim world. Many Arab Sunnis fear that the moment is ripe for a Shiite rise. Iraq's Shiite majority has been asserting the right to govern, and the lesson has not been lost on the Shiite majority in Bahrain and the large minorities in Lebanon and Saudi Arabia. King Abdullah of Jordan has warned of a "Shiite crescent" of power stretching from Iran to Lebanon via Iraq and (by proxy) Syria.

But geopolitics is not the only reason Sunni Arab leaders are rattled by the prospect of a nuclear Iran. They also seem to be worried that the Iranians might actually use nuclear weapons if they get them. A nuclear attack on Israel would engulf the whole region. But that is not the only danger: Sunnis in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere fear that the Iranians might just use a nuclear bomb against them. Even as Iran's defiance of the United States and Israel wins support among some Sunnis, extremist Sunnis have been engaging in the act of takfir, condemning all Shiites as infidels. On the ground in Iraq, Sunni takfiris are putting this theory into practice, aiming at Shiite civilians and killing them indiscriminately. Shiite militias have been responding in kind, and massacres of Sunni civilians are no longer isolated events.

Adding the nuclear ingredient to this volatile mix will certainly produce an arms race. If Iran is going to get the bomb, its neighbors will have no choice but to keep up. North Korea, now protected by its own bomb, has threatened proliferation — and in the Middle East it would find a number of willing buyers. Small principalities with huge U.S. Air Force bases, like Qatar, might choose to rely on an American protective umbrella. But Saudi Arabia, which has always seen Iran as a threatening competitor, will not be willing to place its nuclear security entirely in American hands. Once the Saudis are in the hunt, Egypt will need nuclear weapons to keep it from becoming irrelevant to the regional power balance — and sure enough, last month Gamal Mubarak, President Mubarak's son and Egypt's heir apparent, very publicly announced that Egypt should pursue a nuclear program.

Given the increasing instability of the Middle East, nuclear proliferation there is more worrisome than almost anywhere else on earth. As nuclear technology spreads, terrorists will enjoy increasing odds of getting their hands on nuclear weapons. States — including North Korea — might sell bombs or give them to favored proxy allies, the way Iran gave Hezbollah medium-range rockets that Hezbollah used this summer during its war with Israel. Bombing through an intermediary has its advantages: deniability is, after all, the name of the game for a government trying to avoid nuclear retaliation.

Proliferation could also happen in other ways. Imagine a succession crisis in which the Saudi government fragments and control over nuclear weapons, should the Saudis have acquired them, falls into the hands of Saudi elites who are sympathetic to Osama bin Laden, or at least to his ideas. Or Al Qaeda itself could purchase ready-made bombs, a feat technically much less difficult than designing nuclear weapons from scratch. So far, there are few nuclear powers from whom such bombs can be directly bought: as of today, only nine nations in the world belong to the nuclear club. But as more countries get the bomb, tracing the seller will become harder and harder, and the incentive to make a sale will increase.

II.

The prospect of not just one Islamic bomb, but many, inevitably concentrates the mind on how Muslims — whether Shiite or Sunni — might use their nuclear weapons. In the mid-1980's, when Pakistan became the first Islamic state to go nuclear, it was still possible to avoid asking the awkward question of whether there was something distinctive about Islamic belief or practice that made possession of nuclear technology especially worrisome. Most observers assumed that Islamic states could be deterred from using nuclear force just like other states: by the threat of massive retaliation.

DOJ_NMG_0088085

During the last two decades, however, there has been a profound change in the way violence is discussed and deployed in the Muslim world. In particular, we have encountered the rise of suicide bombing. In historic terms, this development is new and unexpected. Suicide bombing has no traditional basis in Islam. As a technique, it was totally absent from the successful Afghan jihad against the Soviet Union. Although suicide bombing as a tool of stateless terrorists was dreamed up a hundred years ago by the European anarchists immortalized in Joseph Conrad's <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="130290;147096;43433;133169;43434;109253;109292">"Secret Agent," it became a tool of modern terrorist warfare only in 1983, when Shiite militants blew up the U.S. Marine barracks in Lebanon. </object.title>

Since then, suicide bombing has spread through the Muslim world with astonishing speed and on a surprising course. The vocabulary of martyrdom and sacrifice, the formal videotaped preconfession of faith, the technological tinkering to increase deadliness — all are now instantly recognizable to every Muslim. And as suicide bombing has penetrated Islamic cultural consciousness, its list of targets has steadily expanded. First the targets were American soldiers, then mostly Israelis, including women and children. From Lebanon and Israel, the technique of suicide bombing moved to Iraq, where the targets have included mosques and shrines, and the intended victims have mostly been Shiite Iraqis. The newest testing ground is Afghanistan, where both the perpetrators and the targets are orthodox Sunni Muslims. Not long ago, a bombing in Lashkar Gah, the capital of Helmand Province, killed Muslims, including women, who were applying to go on pilgrimage to Mecca. Overall, the trend is definitively in the direction of Muslim-on-Muslim violence. By a conservative accounting, more than three times as many Iraqis have been killed by suicide bombings in the last 3 years as have Israelis in the last 10. Suicide bombing has become the archetype of Muslim violence — not just to frightened Westerners but also to Muslims themselves.

What makes suicide bombing especially relevant to the nuclear question is that, by design, it unsettles the theory of deterrence. When the suicide bomber dies in an attack, he means to send the message "You cannot stop me, because I am already willing to die." To make the challenge to deterrence even more stark, a suicide bomber who blows up a market or a funeral gathering in Iraq or Afghanistan is willing to kill innocent bystanders, including fellow Muslims. According to the prevailing ideology of suicide bombing, these victims are subjected to an involuntary martyrdom that is no less glorious for being unintentional.

So far, the nonstate actors who favor suicide bombing have limited their collateral damage to those standing in the way of their own bombs. But the logic of sacrificing other Muslims against their own wills could be extended to the national level. If an Islamic state or Islamic terrorists used nuclear weapons against Israel, the United States or other Western targets, like London or Madrid, the guaranteed retaliation would cost the lives of thousands and maybe millions of Muslims. But following the logic of suicide bombing, the original bomber might reason that those Muslims would die in God's grace and that others would live on to fight the jihad. No state in the Muslim world has openly embraced such a view. But after 9/11, we can no longer treat the possibility as fanciful.

Raising the question of Islamic belief and the bomb, however, is not a substitute for strategic analysis of the rational interests of Islamic governments. Like other states, Islamic states act on the basis of ordinary power politics as much as or more than on the basis of religious motivation. Pakistan, which tested a series of warheads in 1998, at the height of tensions with India, has not used its atomic power as a tool of the faithful in a global jihad. The proliferation operation spearheaded by the nuclear scientist — and sometime Pakistani national hero — Dr. Abdul Qadeer Khan appears to have been based on a combination of national interest and greed, not on religious fervor. Khan found buyers in Iran and Libya, but also in decidedly non-Islamic North Korea. (In a twist much stranger than fiction, Saddam Hussein apparently turned down the offer.)

Some observers think that Iran, too, wants the bomb primarily to improve its regional position and protect itself against regime change — not to annihilate Israel. According to this view, Iran's nuclear push reflects a drive to what is sometimes called national greatness and might more accurately be defined as the ability of a country to thumb its nose at the United States without fear of major repercussions. A televised pageant hastily arranged to celebrate Iran's atomic program in April of this year featured traditional Persian dancing and colorful local garb intermixed with make-believe vials of enriched uranium. To an Iranian audience accustomed to decoding official symbols, these references were nationalist, not pan-Islamic. (They were also subtly subversive of the mullahs: singing and dancing are not favored forms of expression in the clerical enclave of Qom.)

DOJ_NMG_0088086

But at the same time, Ahmadinejad has emphasized Iran's pan-Islamic aspirations to act on behalf of Muslims everywhere. An emerging nuclear power needs friends. Right now Iran wants to reduce, not promote, division between Sunnis and Shiites — and promoting broader "Islamic" interests by going after Israel is one way to lessen Sunni fears about Iran's rise. Ahmadinejad has put his money where his mouth is, providing Hezbollah with medium-range missiles — though apparently not chemical warheads — to use against Israel. The nationalist language he has sometimes used at home may be a cover for sincerely held pan-Islamic ends — a version of the old revolutionary strategy of making nationalist claims in order to attract the support of those fellow Iranians who do not respond well to Islamist ideology. That it is convenient for Iran to emphasize Islamic unity does not mean that at least some of its leaders do not believe in it as a motivating goal.+

It is common among foreign-policy realists to suppose that a country acting on nationalist motives is easier to deter than a country moved by religious ones. There is no especially strong evidence for this assumption — plenty of nationalist regimes have done crazy things when they logically should have been deterred — but the claim has a common-sense ring to it. Nationalists care about peoples and states, which need to be alive to prosper. It is a basic tenet of nationalism that there is nothing higher than the nation-state itself, the pinnacle of a people's self-expression. Religious thinkers, on the other hand, believe almost by definition that there is something in heaven greater than government here on earth. Under the right circumstances, they might sacrifice lives — including their own — to serve the divine will as they interpret it.

III.

We urgently need to know, then, what Islam says about the bomb. Of course there is no single answer to this question. The world's billion-plus Muslims differ regarding many aspects of their 1,400-year-old religious tradition. Furthermore, nuclear weapons are a relatively new technology, unforeseen by the Prophet and unmentioned in the Koran. Nevertheless, contemporary Muslims are engaged in interpreting their tradition to ascertain how and when nuclear power may be used. Their writings, contained in fatwas and treatises that can be found on the Web and in print, tell a fascinating and disturbing story.

The Islamic discussion of nuclear weapons is profoundly intertwined with a parallel discussion of suicide bombing that is also taking place in the Muslim world. Suicide bombing and nuclear weapons typically kill without discrimination, murdering soldiers or civilians, men or women or children. And using nuclear force against another nuclear power can be suicidal, in the broad sense that retaliation may destroy the nation that attacked first. Beyond these commonalities is the fact that the rise of suicide bombing is driving a historic reconsideration of what might be called the Islamic ethics of violence. To consider Islam and the bomb today must thus inevitably draw us into the complex legal and political thinking of those Muslim authorities who justify the use of force.

The story starts with traditional Islamic law. The Shariah never followed the Roman adage that in war the laws are silent. Because jihad is a pillar of Islam, and because in Islam God's word takes legal form, the classical scholars devoted considerable care to identifying the laws of jihad. In common with the just-war doctrine developed in Christian Europe, the law of jihad governed when it was permissible to fight and what means could lawfully be adopted once warfare had begun. There were basic ground rules about who was fair game. "A woman was found killed in one of the battles fought by the Messenger of God," runs a report about the Prophet Muhammad considered reliable and binding by the Muslim scholars. "So the Messenger of God forbade the killing of women and children." This report was universally understood to prohibit the deliberate killing of noncombatant women and children. Some scholars interpreted it to mean that anyone incapable of warfare should be protected and so extended the ban to the elderly, the infirm and even male peasants, who as a rule did not fight. Muslims living among the enemy were also out of bounds. These rather progressive principles were broadly accepted by the Islamic legal authorities, Sunni and Shiite alike. For well over a thousand years, no one seriously questioned them.

Such black-and-white rules were well suited to the hand-to-hand or horse-to-horse combat characteristic of limited medieval wars. A few quirky challenges did arise, and the Muslim lawyers had to deal with them. The great theologian and jurist al-Ghazali, who wrote in the 11th and 12th centuries and was widely noted for his revival of religious piety and his skepticism of secular philosophy, dealt with the problem of human shields. He ruled that if the enemy drove captured Muslims before him, the Muslim army could still fight back, even if it might mean killing some of those Muslims. The reason he gave was that "we know that the law intends minimizing killing." There was also the catapult — precursor of artillery and air power — which was capable of sending a burning projectile into a populated city, where the resulting fire might kill women or children. Authorities differed on whether that tactic was permissible. Some disallowed the catapult when children or Muslim captives were in the city. In support, they cited a verse from the Koran that reads, "Had they been separated clearly, then We would have chastised the unbelievers among them with a painful chastisement." According to this school of thought, the "separation" of permissible targets (i.e., non-Muslim men) from impermissible targets is the precondition for a general attack. Another school of thought, by contrast, permitted the use of the catapult regardless of collateral damage in order to serve the general interest of the Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0088087

No law can exist for a millennium without being broken, and there are scattered historical reports, mostly from Christian chroniclers, of Muslim forces acting outside the bounds of lawful jihad, without the authorization of the scholars. Men were always considered legitimate targets, and Muslim armies sometimes slaughtered them just as Muslims could be slaughtered by their enemies. Remarkably enough, though, the legal principles of jihad protecting women, children and fellow Muslims survived well into the modern era, when the secular regimes of the Muslim world began to fight according to secular ideas. The World War I Armenian genocide, which took place in the last, secularizing gasp of the declining Ottoman Empire, was the first really substantial systematic violation of the ban on killing women and children in recorded Islamic history. In the bloody 20th century, when mass exterminations took place in Europe, Africa and Asia, Muslim states had a relatively better record, marred of course by Saddam Hussein's gassing of the Kurds. And there have been the genocidal killings in Darfur in this new century. Even these horrific events, however, were not dignified by the claim that they were permitted under the law of jihad.

IV.

The last two decades have seen a challenge to this Islamic tradition of warfare under law, a challenge driven mostly by the attempt to justify suicide bombing despite its evident inconsistency with Islamic tradition. On the subject of suicide, the Koran could hardly be clearer: "Do not kill yourselves; for surely God has been merciful to you." Faced with this explicit text, the solution of the militant Islamist ideologues has been to avoid the category of suicide altogether and to treat the bomber as a martyr rather than as one who has taken his own life. This interpretation is not very convincing in historical terms: martyrdom classically meant that another person killed the Muslim warrior, not that he pushed the button himself. Nevertheless, many Muslims now seem to find the argument convincing. Even among rather secular Muslims, it has become standard to refer to suicide bombers as martyrs.

The killing of women, children and Muslim men, however, has proved harder to explain away as a permissible exercise of jihad. The reaction to 9/11, which has (so far) been the high-water mark of suicide bombing, illustrates the nature of the difficulty of reconciling suicide bombing with Islamic law. One problem concerns the offensive nature of the attack at a time when the United States was not at war with any Muslim entity. Offensive jihad requires the authorization of a legitimate Muslim leader, absent on 9/11. A more serious concern was the obvious reality that the 9/11 attacks were certain to kill — and did kill — women, children and Muslims, all in direct contravention of classical jihad principles. Since the whole point of 9/11 was to announce and embody jihad on the international stage, the attacks quickly became the centerpiece of a high-stakes debate about whether they did or did not qualify as legitimate acts of jihad.

In the immediate aftermath of 9/11, it was sometimes asserted in the West that there were no Muslim voices condemning the attacks. This was never true. Prominent Muslim scholars expressed their disapprobation in public arenas like television and the Internet. These included senior Sunni scholars like the grand mufti of Saudi Arabia and the head of Al-Azhar, in Egypt, nominally the flagship institution of Sunni higher learning — who gave a news conference. More popular figures, like Al Jazeera's resident cleric, Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi, explained that Islam "considers the attack on innocent human beings a grave sin." Shiite scholars also spoke out, including Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the supreme leader of Iran.

The position of the Muslim scholars and observers who condemned the 9/11 attacks was simple and consistent across the Sunni-Shiite divide: this was not jihad but an unlawful use of violence. Offensive jihad was prohibited in the absence of formal authorization by a Muslim leader. But even if the attacks could somehow be construed as defensive, the perpetrators of 9/11 broke the rules with their willingness to kill women and children. In confident and insistent tones, these critics cited the classical scholars and insisted that nothing in Islamic law could justify the tactics used by Al Qaeda. Ayatollah Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah, the Lebanese cleric whose spiritual authority is recognized by Hezbollah, gave an interview to the Beirut newspaper Al Safir in which he asserted that given their impermissible choice of targets, the 9/11 bombers were not martyrs but "merely suicides."

DOJ_NMG_0088088

At the same time, it is important to note that in 2001 few prominent Muslim scholars — the Saudi grand mufti was the main exception — condemned the use of suicide bombings in all circumstances. Fadlallah approved the attack on the U.S. Marines in 1983 and, according to the United States, played a role in ordering it. Qaradawi, whose television presence gives him reason to stay within the Islamist mainstream, distinguished the 9/11 attacks from the permissible defensive jihad of the Palestinians. He was happy to praise a God who "through his infinite wisdom ... has given the weak a weapon the strong do not have, and that is their ability to turn their bodies into bombs as Palestinians do." Qaradawi has also repeated the common view that the killing of Israeli women is justified on the grounds that all Israelis must serve in the military, and so no Israeli is a true noncombatant: "An Israeli woman is not like women in our societies, because she is a soldier."

The equivocation by Muslim scholars with respect to the technique of suicide bombing reflected the reality that throughout the Muslim world, Palestinian suicide bombers were by 2001 identified as martyrs dying in a just cause. This, in turn, was the natural outgrowth of the decades before suicide bombing, when Palestinian terrorists were applauded for killing Israeli civilians, including women and children. Given that embracing Palestinian suicide bombing had become a widespread social norm, it would have been essentially unthinkable for an important Muslim scholar to condemn the practice without losing his standing among Muslims worldwide. In the Islamic world, as in the U.S. Supreme Court, the legal authorities cannot get too far away from their public constituency without paying a price.

What happened, in other words, is that without the scholars paying too much attention to the question, the killing of Israeli women and children had become a kind of exception to the ordinary laws of jihad. Opportunists like bin Laden then began to widen the loophole to include new victims. With respect to the unauthorized nature of his offensive jihad, bin Laden asserted that in fact the attacks were defensive, since in his mind the U.S. was occupying the sacred soil of Saudi Arabia — just as Israel was occupying the Muslim land of Palestine. Once all of Saudi Arabia was placed on a par with the holy cities of Mecca and Medina, traditionally closed to non-Muslims, the presence of American soldiers anywhere on the Arabian Peninsula (even if their presence was with the permission of the Saudi government) could be depicted as a profanation, a violation of the Prophet's deathbed directive to "banish the pagans from the Arabian Peninsula."

Bin Laden was embroidering on the theories of his onetime mentor Abdullah Azzam, the intellectual godfather of Al Qaeda. Azzam was a Palestinian Islamist who made his way to Afghanistan via Saudi Arabia and established the so-called Bureau of Services to channel Arab youth into the Afghan jihad. As Azzam trod his personal path from Palestinian militancy to universal pan-Islamic jihadism, he wrote an influential treatise called "Defense of Muslim Lands." In it, Azzam argued that not a single hand span of Muslim territory anywhere could ever be ceded to the enemy "because the land belongs to Allah and to Islam." Though Azzam would never have acknowledged it, his account of the divine ownership of Muslim lands was probably influenced — unconsciously, to be sure — by religious-Zionist claims about the holiness of the Land of Israel.

When it came to the killing of civilians, bin Laden's thought developed more gradually. In early pronouncements, before 9/11, he spoke as if the killing of women and children was inherently an atrocity. "Nor should one forget," he admonished an interviewer in 1996, "the deliberate, premeditated dropping of the H bombs [sic] on cities with their entire populations of children, elderly and women, as was the case with Hiroshima and Nagasaki." After 9/11, however, the argument changed. Now bin Laden began to suggest that American civilians were fair game. He could not argue that like Israelis, all Americans were subject to mandatory military service. Instead he proposed that because "the American people are the ones who choose their government by their own free will," and because they "have the ability and choice to refuse the policies of their government," attacks on American civilians were justified. Voting was now playing the role for Americans that military service played in the case of Israelis: the active step transforming civilians into fair game.

Such an appeal to collective responsibility was, however, pretty weak in Islamic legal terms. It might suffice for bin Laden's videotaped self-justifications, and it might salve the consciences of potential jihadis hoping to join the rank and file of Al Qaeda. But it would never satisfy serious students of classical Islamic law, who found the 9/11 attacks problematic from an Islamic legal perspective.

In Saudi Arabia in particular, radical Muslim scholars with much more learning than bin Laden have sought to develop legally persuasive justifications for civilian killings. Probably the most sophisticated effort from a legal standpoint is a document titled "A Treatise on the Law of the Use of Weapons of Mass Destruction Against the Unbelievers," written in 2003 by a brilliant

DOJ_NMG_0088089

Saudi dissident named Sheik Nasir bin Hamad al-Fahd. (Fahd, a theorist rather than an activist, is currently back in prison, as he has been off and on for almost a decade.) The treatise begins with the assumption that the world's Muslims are under attack. But how are today's Muslims supposed to defend themselves, given their military inferiority? Fahd's response is that, if they have no other choice, they may use any means necessary — including methods that would otherwise violate the laws of jihad. "If the unbelievers can be repelled . . . only by using" weapons of mass destruction, then "their use is permissible, even if you kill them without exception."

Lest his argument prove too much, Fahd tempers it by the claim that the Muslims fighting the jihad may not inflict disproportionately more harm on the enemy than the enemy has inflicted on them. That raises the question of the extent of American guilt. "Some Brothers have added up the number of Muslims killed directly or indirectly by [American] weapons and come up with a figure of nearly ten million," the treatise states. This total, Fahd concludes, would authorize the use of weapons of mass destruction to kill 10 million Americans: indeed, "it would be permissible with no need for further [legal] argument." (The number is never explained or analyzed, and you might assume that it was meant to correspond very roughly to the population of New York.)

Fahd's arguments sit uneasily with the classical Islamic discussions of the laws of jihad. The classical Islamic law never explicitly says that women and children may be intentional targets if it is the only way to win the jihad. It does not allow violations of the law just because the enemy has broken the rules or killed many Muslims. So the treatise must fall back on whatever evidence it can muster from the classical sources that seems to modify the basic rules. The catapult rears its head and is cited as precedent for nonspecific killing. The right to fight even when Muslim hostages may be killed is brought out as proof of the permissibility of collateral damage when there is no other choice.

The legal arguments in use here are stronger than bin Laden's makeweights, but they, too, would probably not be sufficient on their own to justify the deviation from the legal traditions of jihad wrought by today's jihadis. The notion that it's right because it's necessary is doing the real work, and old-fashioned legal arguments are following along. It is no accident that the argument from necessity has been so prominent in modern Western writing about modern warfare in general and the nuclear bomb in particular. If the technology of mass destruction can be exported, why not the justification that comes with it?

Within the world of radical Islam, there are those who believe that the erosion of the laws of jihad has gone too far. There are reports of difficulty recruiting foreign candidates for suicide missions directed at Iraqi civilians. The debate about how jihad may be prosecuted is not over by any means. But it is an unavoidable fact that the classic restrictions on the killing of women, children and Muslims in jihad have been deeply undermined in the last decade.

V.

If the Islamic laws of war are under revision, or at least the subject of intense debate, what does that mean for the question of the Islamic bomb? The answer is that the expanding religious sanction for violence once thought unacceptable opens the way for new kinds of violence to be introduced and seen as legitimate in turn. First Israeli women and children became acceptable targets; then Americans; then Shiites; and now Sunnis of unstinting orthodoxy. It would seem that no one is out of bounds.

It is therefore now possible to imagine that the classical Islamic principles governing war would not be applied even by a self-consciously Islamic regime deciding when and if to detonate a nuclear device. The traditional ban on killing women, children and fellow Muslims would have gone a long way toward banning most potential uses of nuclear power by a sincerely Islamic state actor. As those prohibitions have eroded, the reassurance that might be afforded by a state's Islamic commitments has waned.

This means that a nuclear Islamic state would be at least as willing to use its weapons as a comparable non-Islamic state. But would an Islamic state be prepared to take the jihad to the enemy even if it would result in what amounts to collective suicide through the destruction of the state and its citizens? If the leaders of Iran or some future leaders of a radicalized, nuclear Saudi Arabia shared the aspiration to martyrdom of so many young jihadis around the world, might they be prepared to attack Israel or the United States, even if the inevitable result were the martyrdom of their entire people?

The answer depends to a large degree on whether you consider Islam susceptible to the kind of apocalyptic, millennial thought that might lead whole peoples, rather than just individuals, into suicidal behavior. It is important to note that for all his talk of the war between civilizations, bin Laden has never spoken of the end of days. For him, the battle between the Muslims and the infidels is part of earthly human life, and has indeed been with us since the days of the Prophet himself. The war intensifies and lessens with time, but it is not something that occurs out of time or with the expectation that time itself will stop. Bin Laden and his sympathizers want to re-establish the caliphate and rule the Muslim world, but unlike some earlier revivalist movements within Sunni Islam, they do not declare their leader as the mahdi, or guided one, whose appearance will usher in a golden age of justice and peace to be followed by the Day of Judgment.

DOJ_NMG_0088090

From this perspective, the utter destruction of civilization would be a mistake, not the fulfillment of the divine plan. Even the most radical Sunni theorists of jihad invoke a passage from the Koran according to which civilization itself — "the crops and the cattle" — must not and cannot be destroyed completely. Bin Laden might seem to have few qualms about killing millions of Americans or other Westerners. He might well use a nuclear device if he gambled that there would be no enemy for the United States to bomb in retaliation. But even he might not be prepared to unleash a global nuclear conflagration on the expectation that a better order would emerge once many millions of Muslims and infidels died. (Bin Laden has called for Muslims to acquire nuclear weapons, and in the 1990's reportedly tried to acquire them himself — but there is little hard evidence that he has made subsequent efforts in that direction.)

With respect to Shiite eschatology, there is greater reason for concern. Iran's Shiism is of the "Twelver" variety, so called because the 12th imam in the line of succession from the Prophet disappeared into a state of occultation — or being hidden — from which he is expected to return as the mahdi. Ayatollah Khomeini played on the messianic overtones of this belief during the Iranian revolution, in which some of his followers went so far as to hint that he might be the returning imam. Moktada al-Sadr's Shiite militia in Iraq is called Army of the Mahdi. Recently, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, contributed to renewed focus on the mahdi, by saying publicly that the mission of the Islamic revolution in Iran is to pave the way for the mahdi's return, and by visiting the mosque at Jamkaran, on the outskirts of Qom, where, according to one tradition, the vanished imam was last seen. Some reports suggest that youth religion in Iran in increasingly focused on veneration of the vanished imam.

Islam has a vision of the end of days, with wars between the faithful and the tribes of Gog and Magog (Yuj and Majuj in their Arabic incarnation). Twelver Shiism is, at its core, an eschatological faith, focused on the ultimate return of the imam-mahdi, who will restore the Shiites to their rightful place and redeem their generations of suffering. Since the vanished imam is by tradition a human who has never died, but remains in occultation, he is also believed to affect the course of events even from his hidden place. And Shiite tradition fills in the picture of the mahdi's return with an elaborate account of signs that will herald the event, including advance messengers, earthquakes and bloodshed.

But belief in redemption — even accompanied by wars and death and the defeat of the infidels — need not translate into a present impulse to create a violent crisis that would precipitate the messianic situation. Like their Jewish counterparts, Shiite religious authorities have traditionally sought to resist speculation about the imminence of a messianic return. Shiite messianic thought is less focused than its messianic Christian counterpart on generating global crisis and letting God sort things out. Khomeini himself believed that the mahdi's advent could be hastened — but by social justice, not by provoking war. This put him on the activist side of Shiite teaching about the mahdi, much as he was also an activist about the exercise of worldly power by the mullahs. A popular revolutionary slogan urged the imam's coming but asserted that Khomeini would govern alongside him.

Other Shiite thinkers, by contrast, take a more fatalist stance, and prefer to believe that the mahdi's coming cannot be hastened by human activity — a view that corresponds loosely to Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani's belief, with regard to Iraq and elsewhere, that the clerics should not themselves govern. One small, semi-secret Iranian organization, the Hojjatiya Society, was banned and persecuted by Khomeini's government in part for its quiescent view that the mahdi's arrival could not be hastened.

Ahmadinejad is not the only or even the most important player in Iran's nuclear game. The supreme leader, Ayatollah Khamenei, still makes the ultimate decisions on armaments and other matters, and there are numerous factions in the country with opposed interests and ideology and goals. Nevertheless, Ahmadinejad has in some respects succeeded in making the nuclear issue his own, and as a result his personal views about the end of days have been the subject of much speculation and innuendo, inside Iran and out. The Mideast scholar Bernard Lewis, in a recent Wall Street Journal column, hinted darkly and without much evidence that Ahmadinejad might be planning a nuclear attack on Israel for the Night of Power (this year it fell on Aug. 22), when the Prophet Muhammad made his mystical journey to the Furthest Mosque, associated in tradition with al-Aqsa in Jerusalem. Rumors, possibly spread by Ahmadinejad's enemies, have tied him to the outlawed Hojjatiya — a link mistakenly interpreted outside Iran as evidence that he might want to bring back the imam by violence, rather than that he might prefer to wait piously and prepare for the imam's eventual return on his own schedule. It is of course impossible to gauge the man's religious sensibilities perfectly. Yet the relative absence of a contemporary Shiite trend to messianic brinkmanship suggests that Ahmadinejad's recent emphasis on the mahdi may be interpreted more in terms of an attempt to summon Khomeini's legacy and Iran's revolutionary moment than as a desperate willingness to bring the nation to the edge of war. When Ahmadinejad invoked the mahdi in his now-famous letter to George Bush, he seemed to be using the doctrine in ecumenical terms, emphasizing the Islamic tradition that Jesus — revered as a prophet, though not as the Son of God — will return alongside the mahdi and govern in tandem with him.

DOJ_NMG_0088091

So although a renewed Shiite messianism does create some cause for concern about the potential uses of an Iranian bomb — in particular because it suggests that Ahmadinejad may be more a utopian than a realist — it is almost certainly a mistake to anticipate that Iran would use its nuclear power in a way that would provoke large-scale retaliation and assured self-destruction. Iranian leaders have been more than ready to sacrifice their own citizens in large numbers. During the Iran-Iraq war, major efforts went into recruiting young boys to the Basij militias, which were then sent to the front lines on what were essentially suicide missions. Religion played the central part in motivating the teenage soldiers, and it is reasonable to believe that religion helped salve the consciences of those who ordered these children into battle. Yet even this discounting of the value of human life — in a war started by Saddam Hussein, not by Iran — fell short of voluntarily putting an entire nation at risk. Ahmadinejad surely understands the consequences of using a nuclear bomb, and Shiite Islam, even in its messianic incarnation, still falls short of inviting nuclear retaliation and engendering collective suicide.

VI.

These worries about an Islamic bomb raise the question of why we trust any nation with the power that a nuclear capacity confers. Why, for instance, do we trust ourselves, given that we remain the only nation actually to have used nuclear weapons? The standard answer to why we keep our nuclear bombs — a response developed during the cold war — is that we must have the capability to deter anyone who might attack us first. The promise of mutually assured destruction was its own kind of collective suicide pact, albeit one supposed to scare both sides out of pushing the button. That is why, throughout the heyday of the unilateral disarmament movement, critics of this justification pointed out that our threat was only credible if we were, in fact, prepared to kill millions of civilians in a rapid act of retaliation. If this kind of killing was morally unjustified, went their argument, then the threat to use it was also immoral.

The truth is that we hold on to our nuclear capability not only as a matter of deterrence but also to maintain our own global strategic position. If we do not want Islamic states — or anyone else for that matter — to have a nuclear capability, it is not necessarily because we consider them especially likely to bring on their own destruction by using it. It is, rather, that we do not want to cede some substantial chunk of our own global power to them. This principle — if it is a principle — lies behind the general strategy that is embedded in the international nuclear-nonproliferation treaty. Everybody involved understands that if any government got a chance to acquire nuclear power before the other treaty members had a chance to notice and impose sanctions, it would jump at the opportunity.

So the nonproliferation regime is not and could never be based on some principle of international fairness. But it does not follow that the United States and its allies should simply accept the development of nuclear technology by just anyone. It should be relevant to our deliberations that a particular candidate is our enemy. When it comes to Islamic states, there is serious reason to worry that, both now and in the immediately foreseeable future, popular anti-American sentiment is especially likely to play an important role in the shaping of foreign policy. Over the next quarter-century, it is conceivable and certainly desirable that Islamism and anti-Americanism may be unlinked. But we must be honest and acknowledge that in the short term at least, the U.S. democratization strategy has done almost nothing to reduce Islamist anti-Americanism, whether Shiite or Sunni — this despite the fact that the same strategy has benefited Islamists across the region by allowing them to run for office and enter government.

Much of the reason for this close linkage between Islamism and anti-Americanism comes from Iran. As an enemy of the United States, which has worked consistently against American interests, Iran is in a category by itself, most nearly matched by

DOJ_NMG_0088092

North Korea, the other still-standing member of President Bush's axis of evil. In this, Iran's motives have been primarily Islamic-ideological, not pragmatic.

For many years under the shah, Iran was a natural American ally — precisely because it was Shiite and non-Arab, and uncomfortably close to the Soviet Union and its fantasy of a warm-water port. Even after the 1979 revolution and the hostage crisis, it is possible that the United States would have eventually reopened relations with an avowedly Islamic Iran had the government softened its anti-Americanism. The United States has never made secularism a condition of friendship. It has been fully prepared to support Islamic states like Saudi Arabia, and even used religion to cement the anti-Communist alliance during the cold war. The Iraqi Shiite Islamists have been willing to work alongside the Americans, and the United States has in return treated them as its allies, democratically chosen by the Iraqi electorate.

Islamist anti-Americanism is the direct legacy of Ayatollah Khomeini's success in marrying Islamic faith to anti-imperialism — making "Death to America" into a religious chant, not just a political slogan. Of course the United States was hardly blameless. It did everything it could to open itself to the imperialist charge, including, in Iran, backing the famous 1953 countercoup that removed from power Iran's first democratically legitimate prime minister, Mohammed Mossadegh. Contemporary Islamists can also point to America's continuing hypocritical support of regional authoritarian regimes.

Iranian-rooted Islamist anti-Americanism has worked far better than its designers might have imagined, spreading to Sunni Islamists who have little love to lose for Iran. The marriage of Islamism and anti-Americanism will probably be considered by history as the most significant consequence of the Iranian revolution. Anti-Americanism has become a staple of Islamist sermons and Web postings, an effective tool for drawing to the movement angry young people who might not naturally be drawn to religion. Bin Ladenism, in this sense, owes much to the Iranian revolution even though Al Qaeda was never Iran's direct ally. United States support for Israel has always been an important part of the argument for Islamist anti-Americanism, but today it is by no means a necessary component. If U.S. support of Israel were to weaken, the American presence in Iraq and elsewhere in the gulf would easily substitute as a basis for hatred.

The United States therefore has strong reason to block its enemy Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons — not simply because Iran will seek to become a greater regional power, as any nation might do, but because the Islamic Republic of Iran as currently constituted is definitionally anti-American. There need not be a direct threat of Iranian first use against either the United States or Israel for this reason to weigh heavily. A nuclear Iran will be a stronger and more effective enemy in pursuing anti-American policies under the banner of Islam. That will not change until the Iranian state abandons either its Islamic identity or its association between Islam and anti-Americanism. Iran's eagerness to acquire nuclear capacity need not be a result of a particularly Islamic motivation, but if and when Iran does have the bomb, its enhanced power and prestige will certainly be lent to policies that it conceives as promoting the Islamic interest.

Whether force, negotiation or some combination is the right path to take to keep Iran from going nuclear is of course a hugely important question. It turns on many uncertain facts, like the true progress of Iran's nuclear program and how much it can be affected by air attack; Iran's capacity and will to retaliate against an attack; whether there is any chance Iran would respond to negotiations; and the ability of the United States to withstand any retaliation while 150,000 U.S. troops are in Iraq. As we have recently learned in Iraq, it is not enough to think you have a good reason to go to war — you must also have a realistic understanding of the practical and moral costs of things going horribly wrong. Any choice, though, must be made against the backdrop of the reality that the Islamic government of Iran is not only unlikely to collapse soon — it is also very unlikely to become less anti-American in the near future.

The same, unfortunately, is true of the world's Islamist movements, for whom anti-Americanism remains a rallying cry and a principle of belief. Perhaps the promotion of democracy in the region, pursued consistently by the United States over the long term, might someday allow the rise of leaders whose Islamism is tempered by the need to satisfy their constituents' domestic needs — and who eschew anti-Americanism as wasteful and misguided. Iraq was the test case of whether this change could occur in the short term. But we failed to make the experiment work and gave Iraq's Islamist politicians, Shiite and Sunni alike, ample grounds to continue the anti-American rhetoric that comes so easily to them. In the wake of our tragic mismanagement of Iraq, we are certainly a generation or more from any such unlinking of Islamism and anti-Americanism, if it is to occur at all. And Islamism itself shows no signs of being on the wane as a social or political force.

DOJ_NMG_0088093

That means that the best we can hope for in nuclear Islamic states in the near term is a rational dictator like Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan, who sees his bread buttered on the side of an alliance with the West. Such rulers can be very strong and can bring stability, but we also know that their rule (or reign) promotes Islamist opposition, with its often violent overtones. When such rulers die or otherwise fall from power, the Islamists will be poised to use the international power conferred by nuclear weapons to pursue their own ends — ends for now overwhelmingly likely to be anti-American.

None of this is inherent in the structure of Islam itself. Islam contains a rich and multivocal set of traditions and ideas, susceptible to being used for good or ill, for restraint or destruction. This interpretive flexibility — equally characteristic of the other great world religions — does not rob Islam of its distinctiveness. An Islamic bomb would not be just the same as the nationalist bomb of a majority-Muslim state, nor would it be the same as a Christian bomb or a Jewish one. But its role in history will depend, ultimately, on the meaning Muslims give it, and the uses to which they put their faith and their capabilities. In confronting the possibility of the Islamic bomb, we — Muslims and non-Muslims alike — need to remember that Islam exists both as an ideal system of morals and values and as a force that motivates actual people living today, with all the frailties and imperfections that make us human.

Iran Sounds An Awful Lot Like Iraq (LAT)

By Jon Sawyer, Jon Sawyer Is Director Of The Washington-based Pulitzer Center On Crisis Reporting. He Has Reported

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

There is a disturbing sense of déjà vu in Washington's actions and rhetoric.

AN EMBATTLED president, a Congress distracted by a sex scandal, looming midterm elections — and yet overwhelming agreement, with scant debate or publicity, on fateful legislation that set the nation on a path to war.

It happened eight autumns ago, when three-quarters of the House of Representatives and every single senator voted for regime change in Iraq.

Has it happened again, on Iran?

Four weeks ago, Congress enacted and President Bush signed the Iran Freedom Support Act, a resolution very much in the spirit of the 1998 Iraq Liberation Act. It mandates sanctions against any country aiding Iran's nuclear programs, even those to which that country is legally entitled under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The new law got virtually no coverage in the congressional rush to adjourn and amid the controversy surrounding e-mails between Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and teenage boys serving in the House page program. It has been overshadowed since by North Korea's explosion of a nuclear device and the world's debate about how to respond.

But if the confrontation over Iran's alleged nuclear weapons program ends in war — initiated by this administration or the next — you can bet this law will be cited as proof that Congress was onboard all along.

The congressional action isn't the only sign of déjà vu. Recent months have seen the creation of an "Iran directorate" at the Pentagon, using some of the same personnel as the Office of Special Plans, the shadowy Pentagon outfit led by former Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Douglas J. Feith that was accused of massaging raw intelligence on Iraq to make the case for war look far more solid than in fact it was.

Iran has now supplanted Iraq as the greatest single threat to the United States, according to the National Security Strategy released earlier this year. Articles in the New Yorker and Time describe an accelerated rate of contingency military planning in an environment in which many senior officials — on the military and civilian sides — consider war with Iran more a question of when rather than if.

As in the run-up to the Iraq war, there are assertions of a broad consensus of experts' views that Iran is intent on developing a nuclear weapons capability; and, just as in 2003, there are muted voices questioning how definitive the evidence is. (The most recent National Intelligence Estimate found that Iran's progress toward weapons capability was actually slower than previously thought, and Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte says that, in his view, Iran is still four to nine years away from having the bomb.)

Once again, U.S. officials are discounting the work of U.N. weapons inspectors on site, and, once again, those inspectors — and the agencies for which they work — are saying that the best way to contain the nuclear threat is to keep them in place.

DOJ_NMG_0088094

"People confuse knowledge, industrial capacity and intention," Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, told Newsweek magazine in an interview last week. "A lot of what you see about Iran right now is assessment of intentions."

He and other IAEA officials warn that the Bush administration's hard-line suspicions of Iran could make reading those intentions even harder. Tehran has already suspended IAEA access to some nuclear facilities and could expel the international inspectors entirely. It happened in Iraq in 1998 — and the vacuum that followed made possible ever-more speculative estimates as to Iraq's imagined progress toward fielding weapons of mass destruction.

The run-up to possible war is also marked, yet again, by the absence of firsthand knowledge of the enemy.

The war to topple Saddam Hussein came 12 years after the rupture of diplomatic relations, with U.S. policymakers dependent on questionable exile groups long removed from direct knowledge of conditions inside the country. In the case of Iran, the gap is longer still — nearly 27 years since Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini seized power.

Assistant Secretary of State R. Nicholas Burns announced earlier this year that State Department diplomats would be based in Dubai and elsewhere in the Middle East and Europe to monitor Iran, in a move he likened to Riga Station, the Latvian capital where, during the 1920s and 1930s, diplomats such as George Kennan kept tabs on the Soviet Union. The effort comes late. As Burns himself acknowledged, as recently as early last year, "there were exactly two people focusing full time on Iran" at the State Department.

To be sure, war with Iran is nowhere near as inevitable as the neoconservative proponents of aggressive action would make it appear. The U.S. military is mired in Iraq. The combination of vast oil reserves and 70 million people make Iran a formidable adversary, one that has shown itself more than willing to rely on groups such as Hezbollah or Hamas to wage terrorism on the United States, Israel and allied nations. Here at home, meanwhile, public opinion surveys show little appetite for another go at preventive war.

In the face of those hurdles, and the acknowledged gaps in proven facts, it is remarkable that the neoconservative handmaidens of the Iraq war are so assertive on Iran, as to the inevitability of war and the rightness of waging it.

Last April, the Weekly Standard ran an article nearly 8,000 words long laying out the case for war, why diplomacy and sanctions are doomed to fail and why letting Tehran actualize its nuclear weapons potential would be more threatening to the U.S. and to the world than the consequences of whatever it takes — even land invasion on the scale of Iraq — to prevent that from happening. The article's author was Reuel Marc Gerecht, a former CIA Middle East specialist and resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute who has a record of being articulate, confident and — in the case of Iraq — wrong.

An issue brief that Gerecht wrote for the American Enterprise Institute in August 2002 predicted that the U.S. invasion of Iraq would likely prompt "simultaneous uprisings" by freedom-seeking Iranians. A November 2002 column dismissed concerns that war with Iraq would destabilize the Middle East. "The one truly unsettling thing a second Persian Gulf war might unleash," Gerecht wrote, "is Iraqi democracy." In February 2003, he brushed aside concerns that the Iraq war might inspire acts of terrorism by Muslims in Europe. "The coming war in Iraq," he wrote, "will probably diminish, not enhance, the odds that young Muslim males will become holy warriors…."

But at a time when a majority of Americans have turned against the Iraq war, when Bush's long advantage on national security issues is under fire and when Democrats dream of wresting control of not just the House of Representatives but the Senate too, the most extraordinary parallel to the pre-Iraq-war environment is that so many Democrats have given the administration a vote on Iran that amounts to yet another blank-check endorsement of U.S. unilateralism — even as diplomats struggle in New York to craft a multilateral approach to Iran.

Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Los Angeles) voted for the Iran Freedom Support Act. So did House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.). So did all but 21 members of the House and every member of the Senate, which approved the measure by unanimous voice vote.

The law they backed codifies existing U.S. sanctions against Iran — and extends those sanctions to any countries or companies deemed to have aided Iran in the development or acquisition of nuclear weapons or of "destabilizing numbers and types" of advanced conventional weapons. It states the sense of Congress that the United States shall not enter into any form of cooperation with the government of any country that so aids Iran, unless and until Iran has suspended all uranium enrichment-related and reprocessing-related nuclear activity and has "committed to verifiably refrain from such activity in the future" — even though such activities are permitted under the terms of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

DOJ_NMG_0088095

Democrats who voted for the measure were at pains to distinguish it from the Iraq Liberation Act, noting, for example, that the legislation specifically rejected military aid to opponents of Iran's current government, and that it calls for Iran's "democratic transformation," not regime change. Among those who favor both, however, this is seen as little more than a wink and a nod.

Michael Ledeen, an American Enterprise Institute scholar, has beaten the Iran war drums for years. He told the House International Relations Committee in testimony last March that he was untroubled that the new law stops short of explicitly calling for regime change. "People are just afraid of coming out and using the language," he said. "You cannot have freedom in Iran without bringing down the mullahs, so what are we talking about?"

In 1998, the Clinton administration went along with the Iraq Liberation Act reluctantly, fearing that the law's stark anti-Saddam Hussein line would tie its hands. Republican leaders were demanding a tough line, and Democrats, facing midterm elections in the shadow of President Clinton's pending impeachment, were eager to go along.

For all its bellicose rhetoric on Iran, the Bush administration appeared to have similar reservations about the Iran Freedom Support Act. It staved off congressional action for more than a year, contending that mandatory sanctions would short-circuit the delicate diplomacy of taking Iran to the U.N. Security Council. To critics within the administration, the law raised the specter of U.S. unilateralism at a moment when Washington needed allies more than ever.

The administration eventually gave in to congressional insistence on tough talk — not just from Republicans but from Democrats, the latter seizing the chance to draw a foreign policy red line while at the same time assailing Bush for wasting lives and dollars in Iraq.

Smart politics? Most Republicans and most Democrats appear to believe that it is — that it's a good idea to take Iran off the table, to make sure it doesn't figure as an issue in the Nov. 7 elections. It's reminiscent of the decision many of them made before the midterms in 1998 and again in 2002, when the bipartisan vote authorizing use of force against Iraq made the looming war almost a nonissue in that year's midterm elections.

Maybe this time, on Iran, someone will yet decide that it's worth taking the debate to the people.

Russia Led Arms Sales To Developing World In ’05 (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 28 — Russia surpassed the United States in 2005 as the leader in weapons deals with the developing world, and its new agreements included selling $700 million in surface-to-air missiles to Iran and eight new aerial refueling tankers to China, according to a new Congressional study.

Those weapons deals were part of the highly competitive global arms bazaar in the developing world that grew to $30.2 billion in 2005, up from $26.4 billion in 2004. It is a market that the United States has regularly dominated.

Russia’s agreements with Iran are not the biggest part of its total sales — India and China are its principal buyers. But the sales to improve Iran’s air-defense system are particularly troubling to the United States because they would complicate the task of Pentagon planners should the president order airstrikes on Iran’s nuclear weapons facilities.

The Bush administration has vowed a diplomatic solution in dealing with Iran. But as United Nations diplomats argue over potential sanctions against Iran for its nuclear ambitions, Russian officials have expressed reluctance to vote for the most stringent economic sanctions, partly owing to Moscow’s extensive trade relations with Tehran.

Russia’s weapons sales to China also worry Pentagon planners. Although China has joined the United States in partnership to press for a resumption of six-party talks to end North Korea’s nuclear weapons program after its recent test, Taiwan remains a potential flash point between Beijing and Washington.

Thus, China’s ability to refuel its attack planes and bombers to enable them to fly farther from Chinese soil could require the United States Navy to operate even farther out to sea should the United States military be called to deal with a crisis in the Taiwan Strait. That would have an impact on the range and number of air missions of United States Navy aircraft launched from carriers.

DOJ_NMG_0088096

Details of the specific weapons deals in the global arms trade last year are included in an annual study by the Congressional Research Service that is considered the most thorough compilation of statistics available in an unclassified form. The report was delivered to members of Congress on Friday.

Among other arms transfers described in the study was a statistic that a single, unnamed nation — but one identified separately by Pentagon and other administration officials to be North Korea — shipped about 40 ballistic missiles to other nations in the four-year period ending in 2005, the only nation to have done so. Transfers of these weapons are prohibited under international agreements to control the trade of ballistic missiles.

United Nations sanctions passed earlier this month after the North Korean nuclear test include a new and specific ban on trade or transport of ballistic missiles and missile parts to or from North Korea.

The report, entitled "Conventional Arms Transfers to Developing Nations," found that Russia's arms agreements with the developing world totaled $7 billion in 2005, an increase from its $5.4 billion in sales in 2004. That figure surpassed the United States' annual sales agreements to the developing world for the first time since the collapse of the Soviet Union.

France ranked second in arms transfer agreements to developing nations, with $6.3 billion, and the United States was third, with $6.2 billion.

The leading buyer in the developing world in 2005 was India, with $5.4 billion in weapons purchases, followed by Saudi Arabia with $3.4 billion and China with $2.8 billion.

The total value of all arms sales deals worldwide, when counting both developing and developed nations, in 2005 was $44.2 billion.

The Russian sales in 2005 included 29 of the SA-15 Gauntlet surface-to-air missile systems for Iran; Russia also signed deals to upgrade Iran's Su-24 bombers and MIG-29 fighter aircraft, as well as its T-72 battle tanks.

"For a period of time, in the mid-1990s, the Russian government agreed not to make new advanced weapons sales to the Iran government," wrote Richard F. Grimmett, author of the study by the Congressional Research Service, a division of the Library of Congress. "That agreement has since been rescinded by Russia. As the U.S. focuses increasing attention on Iran's efforts to enhance its nuclear as well as conventional military capabilities, major arms transfers to Iran continue to be a matter of concern."

Russia also agreed in 2005 to sell China eight of the IL-78M aerial refueling tanker aircraft, according to the study.

In 2005, the United States led in total arms transfer agreements, when deals to both developed and developing nations are combined. The total was $12.8 billion, down from $13.2 billion in 2004.

The report charted no blockbuster military sales deals by the United States in 2005, and the total in many ways was reached by sales of spare parts for weapons purchased under previous contracts.

France ranked second in total sales, with $7.9 billion, up from $2.2 billion in 2004. Russia was third when sales to developing and developed nations were combined, with $7.4 billion, up from $5.6 billion in 2004.

The study uses figures in 2005 dollars, with amounts for previous years adjusted to account for inflation.

Report: U.S. Mulls Defenses For Tokyo (AP)

By Hans Greimel

AP, October 29, 2006

The U.S. is considering deploying its advanced Patriot missile defense system near Tokyo after North Korea's recent missile and nuclear tests, a newspaper reported Sunday.

Washington unofficially informed the Japanese government it is considering putting Patriot Advanced Capability 3 surface-to-air interceptor missiles around Yokota Air Base in Tokyo's western suburbs and around Yokosuka Naval Base, south of the capital, the Nihon Keizai newspaper reported without saying how it got the information.

The added defenses would cover critical U.S. military installations on the outskirts of Tokyo.

The move would be part of a previously announced U.S.-Japanese effort to deploy PAC-3 missile defense systems around the country as the two allies look for ways to counter what is seen as a growing threat from neighboring North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0088097

North Korea alarmed the region in July by test firing several missiles, including a long-range model believed capable of striking the western U.S. Earlier this month, the isolated communist country sparked global outrage by its first-ever test of a nuclear bomb.

Analysts doubt North Korea's ability to accurately deliver atomic weapons atop its missiles. But after the missile test, the U.S. and Japan announced plans to deploy the Patriots, which are designed to destroy ballistic or cruise missiles and aircraft.

U.S. military officials have already confirmed that the first batch of equipment for the PAC-3 missiles arrived in Okinawa in southern Japan, where the bulk of U.S. forces in the nation are stationed.

The Patriots would be used as a last resort if Standard Missile-3 interceptors fired from U.S. and Japanese ships fail to knock out incoming missiles, the report said.

U.S. May Deploy Patriot Missiles (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

The United States is considering deploying its advanced Patriot missile defense system near Tokyo after North Korea's recent missile and nuclear tests, a Japanese newspaper reported today.

Washington unofficially informed the Japanese government that it was considering the surface-to-air interceptor missiles around two U.S. bases, Yokota Air Base in Tokyo's western suburbs and Yokosuka naval base, south of the capital, the Nihon Keizai newspaper reported.

The move would be part of an ongoing U.S.-Japanese effort to counter what is seen as North Korea's growing threat.

U.S. Jobs Shape Condoms' Role In Foreign Aid (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

EUFAULA, Alabama — Here in this courtly, antebellum town, Alabama's condom production has survived an onslaught of Asian competition, thanks to the patronage of straitlaced congressmen from this Bible Belt state.

Behind the scenes, the politicians have ensured that companies in Alabama won federal contracts to make billions of condoms over the years for AIDS prevention and family planning programs overseas, though Asian factories could do the job at less than half the cost.

In recent years, the state's condom manufacturers fell hundreds of millions of condoms behind on orders, and the federal aid agency began buying them from Asia. The use of Asian-made condoms has contributed to layoffs that are coming next month.

But Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, has quietly pressed to maintain the unqualified priority for American-made condoms and is likely to prevail if the past is any guide.

"What's wrong with helping the American worker at the same time we are helping people around the world?" asked the senator's spokesman, Michael Brumas.

That question goes to the heart of an intensifying debate among wealthy nations about to what degree foreign aid is about saving jobs at home or lives abroad.

Britain, Ireland and Norway have all sought to make aid more cost effective by opening contracts in their programs to fight global poverty to international competition. The United States, meanwhile, continues to restrict bidding on billions of dollars worth of business to companies operating in America, and not just those that make condoms.

The wheat to feed the starving must be grown in United States and shipped to Africa, enriching agribusiness giants like Archer Daniels Midland and Cargill. The American consulting firms that carry out antipoverty programs abroad — dubbed beltway bandits by critics — do work that some advocates say local groups in developing countries could often manage at far less cost.

The history of the federal government's condom purchases embodies the tradeoffs that characterize foreign aid American-style. Alabama's congressmen have long preserved several hundred factory jobs here by insisting that the United States Agency for International Development buy condoms made here, though, probably in a nod to their conservative constituencies, most have typically done so discreetly.

DOJ_NMG_0088098

Those who favor tying aid to domestic interests say that it not only preserves jobs and supports American companies, but helps ensure broad political support for foreign aid, which is not always popular.

On the other hand, skepticism of foreign aid is frequently rooted in the perception that the money is not well spent. Blame often falls on corrupt leaders in poor countries, but aid from rich nations with restrictions requiring it to be spent in the donor country can also reduce effectiveness.

The United States government, the world's largest donor of condoms, has bought more than nine billion condoms over the past two decades. Under President Bush's global AIDS plan, which dedicates billions of dollars to fight the epidemic, a third of the money for prevention must go to promoting abstinence. But that leaves two-thirds for other programs, so the federal government's distribution of condoms has risen, to over 400 million a year.

Over the years, Usaid could have afforded even more condoms — among the most effective methods for slowing the spread of AIDS — if it had it bought them from the lowest bidders on the world market, as have the United Nations Population Fund and many other donors.

Randall L. Tobias, who heads Usaid, declined through a spokesman to be interviewed on this topic. His predecessor, Andrew Natsios, sought to weaken the hold of what he sometimes called a cartel of domestic interest groups over foreign aid. He tried, for example, to persuade Congress to allow the purchase of some African food to feed Africa's hungry. Congress killed that proposal last year and again this year.

Hilary Benn, Britain's secretary of state for international development, said in an interview that in 2001 his country untied its aid from requirements that only British firms could bid for international antipoverty work.

"If you untie aid, it's 100 percent clear you're giving aid to reduce poverty and not to benefit your own country's commercial interests," he said.

In recent years, most of the low-end condom business has moved to Asia, including Australia-based Ansell, which used to have plants in Alabama. American makers cannot compete with Asia on price — unless they have the federal contract.

The last American factory making condoms for Usaid sits anonymously in a pine-shaded industrial park here in Eufaula. Inside a modern, low-slung building owned by Alatech Healthcare, ingenious contraptions almost as long as a football field repeatedly dip 16,000 phallic-shaped bulbs into vats of latex, with the capacity to turn out a billion condoms a year.

The equation of need is never straightforward. Africa's need to forestall its slow-motion catastrophe of AIDS deaths is vast. But there is need here, too.

Most of the 260 people employed at this factory and the company's packaging plant in Slocomb are women, some the children of sharecroppers and textile factory workers, many of them struggling to support families on $7 to $8 an hour.

The most vulnerable among them — single mothers and older women with scant education — are the most fearful of foreign competition. All feel the looming threat.

"It's cheaper, yeah," said Lisa Jackson, 42, a worker in the packaging plant. "But we Americans should have first choice. We need our jobs to stay in America. We got to feed our families. I just wish it had never come to sending manufacturing jobs overseas."

From 2003 to 2005, Alatech and one other company making condoms for Usaid fell behind on their orders, agency officials said. Last year, the other company went bankrupt. So Usaid ordered condoms from Asia, the first of which were shipped last year. With only a single American company still in line for the federal contract, agency officials are wary of ruling out Asian suppliers.

At such moments in the past, Alabama's politicians have come to the rescue of the state's condom industry. This time was no exception.

Senator Richard C. Shelby, a Republican on the Appropriations Committee, had a provision tucked into the 2004 budget bill requiring that Usaid buy only American-made condoms to the extent possible, given cost and availability. His spokeswoman, Kate Boyd, said the agency did not tell him it was worried about the relative cost of American and Asian-made condoms.

Senator Sessions wrote Usaid a letter last year saying it should purchase condoms from foreign producers only after it had bought all the condoms American companies could make, noting it was "extremely important to jobs in my state."

DOJ_NMG_0088099

Usaid assured the senator in writing that it "remains committed to prioritizing domestic suppliers."

On the strength of that, Alatech bought the more modern Eufaula plant from its bankrupt rival. Without the government contract, the company's president, Larry Povlacs, said, Alatech would go out of business.

In interviews, agency officials were noncommittal about whether they would halt all purchases in Asia. Condoms made there cost around 2 cents each, opposed to about 5 cents for those made here.

"At the end of the day, it's all a political process," Bob Lester, who recently retired after 31 years as a lawyer at Usaid, said of such decisions. "The foreign aid program has very few rabbis. Why make enemies when you don't have to?"

Duff Gillespie, a retired senior Usaid official who is now a professor at the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health, said that over the years officials at Usaid raised the prospect of foreign competition to tamp down what he called "the greed factor" of Alabama condom manufacturers.

But whenever the staff pushed to buy in Asia, Alabama politicians pushed right back.

During the Reagan years, the offices of two Alabamans, Representative William Dickinson, a Republican, and Senator Howell Heflin, a Democrat, caught wind of one such move. Mike Houston, chief of staff to Senator Heflin, recalled being tipped off by Mr. Dickinson's chief of staff.

"He says, 'Well, A.I.D. is going to buy condoms from Korea,' " Mr. Houston recalled. " 'The reason is they can get three condoms for the price of one that they're paying us.' " Mr. Houston said he asked in amazement, "You mean we're making rubbers in Alabama?"

The congressmen's staffs threatened to introduce amendments to require that condoms be made in America. The agency backed off.

Further attempts to open up bidding proved fruitless. Representative Jim McDermott, a Democrat from Washington State, had seen the devastation of AIDS firsthand in the 1980s as a State Department medical officer in Africa. But he said he could not break what he called the "stranglehold" of Alabama congressmen on the condom rules.

In the mid-to-late 1990s, Representative Sonny Callahan, a Republican from Alabama, served as chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee that shaped Usaid's budget. Brian Atwood, who headed Usaid in those years, said no administrator "in his right mind" would have tried to cut Alabama out of the condom contract at a time when many Republicans were deeply hostile to foreign aid.

Then in 2001, after decades of negotiation, the United States and other wealthy donor nations reached a nonbinding agreement to open at least some foreign aid contracts to all qualified bidders. Included were those for commodities bound for the world's poorest nations.

Usaid decided the agreement did not apply to condoms since some went to more advanced developing countries. Alabama's manufacturers kept the condom business once again.

William Nicol, who heads the poverty reduction division of the Development Assistance Committee at the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a group of economically advanced countries, scoffed at Usaid's interpretation. "That's rubbish," he said in a telephone interview.

The condom companies' inability in recent years to fulfill Usaid's orders accomplished what the gentleman's agreement did not: the entry of Asian competitors.

Usaid has asked Alatech to make 201 million condoms next year, less than half of this year's order, and ordered another 100 million made in Korea and China.

Come Nov. 15, Alatech will lay off more than half its work force. Those jobs fell victim to Usaid's smaller orders for condoms, foreign competition and automation.

The reactions of these workers ranged from philosophical to panicked.

One, Garry Appling, a 41-year-old single mother, has worked before as a $6-an-hour cashier at Krystal, the fast food restaurant, and another at $7.15 an hour in a chicken processing plant. She said her 10-year-old daughter, Anterria, worries that she will have to go back to the chicken plant, a place so cold and wet Ms. Appling often fell ill.

But even facing her own impending job loss, Ms. Appling took a moment to empathize with the women making condoms on the other side of the world.

DOJ_NMG_0088100

"We need a job — I guess they do, too," she said, during a brief pause from feeding condoms into an intricate, rotating, whooshing machine that tested them for holes. "It's sad.

"At the same time, the United States can't just keep helping overseas. They've got to help us, too."

Fueling U.S. Adversaries (WT)

By David R. Sands, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

Special Report

These are flush times for some of America's most determined adversaries.

Exploiting tight global energy markets and soaring gas prices in recent years, leading energy producers around the globe are using their export windfalls to challenge U.S. interests, intimidate U.S. allies and, in some cases, bankroll terrorist and insurgent groups fighting U.S. forces.

Major producers such as Venezuela, Russia and Iran have teamed up with emerging energy consumers -- notably China -- in an "axis of oil" to frustrate U.S. foreign-policy objectives, according to Flynt Leverett, a former top Middle East adviser in the Bush administration, and Pierre Noel, a research fellow with the French Institute of International Relations.

"The political consequences of recent changes in global energy markets are posing the most profound challenge to American hegemony since the end of the Cold War," the two concluded in a recent survey in the journal National Interest.

Even Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a veteran of both Bush administrations and a longtime foreign-policy scholar, conceded earlier this year she underestimated the ways the "energy question" distorted international relations.

"I can tell you that nothing has really taken me aback more as secretary of state than the way the politics of energy is -- I will use the word 'warping' -- diplomacy around the world," she told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in April.

"It has given extraordinary power to some states that are using that power in not very good ways for the international system, states that would have otherwise have very little power," she said.

Andrei Illarianov, top economic adviser to Russian President Vladimir Putin before resigning last year in protest at the government's anti-democratic policies, said reform at home and cooperation with the West both declined sharply as the Kremlin seized control of the country's biggest energy companies.

"The correlation was very direct," said Mr. Illarianov, now a research fellow at the Cato Institute, a Washington-based libertarian think tank.

While oil prices have retreated from the mid-July record of $78 a barrel, the current $57-a-barrel price remains far above the levels of just a few years ago.

The result: hundreds of billions of dollars swelling the coffers of regimes hostile to the United States.

Mr. Noel, in a talk last week, said the idea of a direct link between terrorism and oil is "simplistic," saying it was not likely that a different U.S. energy policy and drastic reductions in American energy imports from the Middle East would make a dent in terrorist-financing networks.

Iran aside, he added, none of the countries that have most recently obtained nuclear weapons, from India and Israel to North Korea, relied on oil money to fund their research programs.

Still, some of the main problem countries on the U.S. diplomatic horizon all have one thing in common: deep energy pockets.

• Iran's Islamist regime, sitting on the world's third-largest known oil reserves and second-largest natural-gas reserves, so far has dismissed U.S.-led efforts to sanction and isolate its economy over its suspected nuclear-weapons programs.

Even before this year's surge in prices, Iran was earning $30 billion more annually from its oil exports alone compared with a decade ago, according to the D.C.-based Institute for International Economics.

The windfall has not only allowed hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to boost social spending at home, but to finance groups considered terrorist by the State Department, such as Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and Hamas and Islamic Jihad in the Palestinian territories.

DOJ_NMG_0088101

GlobalSecurity.org, which tracks international terrorist groups, said Hezbollah was founded by Iranian agents in the early 1980s and the group "receives substantial amounts of financial, training, weapons, explosives, political, diplomatic and organizational aid" from both Iran and Syria, putting Tehran's annual assistance at between $25 million and $50 million.

Iran is also widely thought to be the source of the wads of cash Hezbollah leaders were distributing to followers in the aftermath of this summer's 34-day war with Israel.

• Analysts also see oil as the lubricant enabling Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez to conduct an outspokenly anti-American foreign policy as head of the world's fifth-largest oil exporter.

Planning Minister Jorge Giordani said last week that oil revenues for the state-owned energy company have soared from $9.84 billion in 2003 to $33.5 billion so far in 2006, with transfer payments from the oil sector to the government up 65 per cent in the past two years.

The flamboyant Mr. Chavez has used the petrodollars to finance a foreign policy sharply at odds with Washington -- even though the United States is Venezuela's single biggest oil-export market.

He has openly promoted leftist political allies in Bolivia and other Latin American countries, subsidized the ailing economy of Cuban dictator Fidel Castro and recently conducted an expensive global lobbying campaign in a failed bid to win a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

The State Department's annual global terrorism survey concluded it was "unclear" whether any of Venezuela's oil wealth had made its way to leftist guerrilla groups fighting the U.S.-backed government in neighboring Colombia. But the report found Caracas' cooperation in the global war on terror "negligible."

Mr. Chavez "persisted in public criticism of U.S. counterterrorism efforts, publicly championed Iraqi terrorists, deepened Venezuelan collaboration with state sponsors of terrorism such as Cuba and Iran, and was unwilling to deny safe haven to members of Colombian terrorist groups," the State Department report found.

• Sudan began exporting oil only seven years ago, but energy riches have left it largely indifferent to outside critics of its brutal campaign against rebel groups in the country's western region of Darfur, a campaign the U.S. government has formally labeled a "genocide."

Despite a decade of U.S. sanctions and pressure on investment by international energy companies, Sudan's economy grew by 8 percent in 2005 and is expected to expand by 12 percent this year -- almost entirely because of oil exports. Sudan is now sub-Saharan Africa's third-largest oil producer, trailing only Nigeria and Angola.

Khartoum has had no difficulty financing its army and Arab militias known as the "Janjaweed" in the Darfur conflict. Former Finance Minister Abda Yahia el-Mahdi recently told the New York Times that 70 percent of the government's oil revenues are devoted to defense and to arms manufacture.

Mr. Leverett and Mr. Noel say the Iran and Sudan cases illustrate another way the "axis of oil" distorts global politics and frustrates U.S. foreign-policy goals.

Major energy importers such as China, they say, shield hostile governments from U.S. pressure.

With a veto as a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, China has acted as a brake on U.S. plans for tough action against Iran and Sudan. China's state energy companies are busy locking up supplier deals and joint oil-field development projects.

"China's search for oil is making it a new competitor to the United States for influence, especially in the Middle East, Central Asia and Africa," the analysts say.

A report from a Council on Foreign Relations task force on U.S. energy policy chaired by former Energy Secretary James R. Schlesinger and former CIA chief John M. Deutch concluded earlier this month that competition among major importers will only increase, harming U.S. influence.

"Large oil consumers have tended to become especially focused on securing supply and ignore the effects of their investments on corruption and mismanagement," the task force found. "In Sudan, for example, despite civil war and widespread human rights abuses, the Chinese government and its oil enterprises are funding extensive oil supply and infrastructure projects."

DOJ_NMG_0088102

Energy clout is even playing a growing role in the sectarian tensions dividing Iraq and the Middle East. Plans for greater autonomy for Iraq's warring regions have foundered over the basic fact that most of the country's oil wealth is found in provinces dominated by Iraq's Kurds and Shi'ite Muslim Arabs -- leaving Sunni Arabs out in the cold.

Mamoun Fandy, an influential Arab newspaper columnist and a professor of Middle East Studies at the National Defense University, said the region's leading Sunni governments fear a loss of major oil-producing assets with the rise of Shi'ite political movements linked to Iran.

Even in strictly Sunni Saudi Arabia, many of the country's most productive fields are found in the eastern part of the country inhabited by the country's small Shi'ite minority.

"It sometimes seems that every place you find an oil well, there is a Shi'ite standing by it," he said.

Accentuating the trend of mixing oil and politics is the increasing clout of state-owned national oil companies, or NOCs, most under close supervision of their parent governments, in global energy markets.

NOCs hold nearly three-quarters of the world's proven oil reserves.

The largest private firm on the list of oil-reserve giants -- ExxonMobil -- now ranks only 12th in the world in known reserves, far behind the state-owned oil companies of Saudi Arabia, Russia, Mexico, Venezuela, Iraq and Iran.

The transforming power of oil and natural gas can be seen clearly in the evolving foreign policy of Russia.

In the 1990s, when global oil prices plummeted, the near-bankrupt government of then-President Boris Yeltsin posed few challenges to U.S. and Western European foreign-policy goals, including the expansion of NATO to Russia's doorstep and the bombing campaign against Serbia, Moscow's ally, in the 1999 Kosovo war.

After 2000, the Kremlin under President Vladimir Putin first moved to bring Russian energy firms such as Yukos under its direct control, and used the money and market clout to revitalize Russian foreign policy.

In talks with the European Union and the countries on its border that are dependent on Russian oil and natural gas, Moscow has not been shy about advertising its new clout.

"It is the ultimate weapon they can use against us," said Nikoloz Rurua, deputy chairman of the committee on defense and security in Georgia's parliament.

Add Mr. Leverett and Mr. Noel: "Moscow is using its market power to push back against the United States in arenas where it perceives U.S. infringement on its interests."

Just last week, Russian newspapers reported that Ukraine -- target of a brief cutoff by Moscow last winter -- was being asked to make political concessions in return for a new natural-gas supply deal with Russia.

The concessions included slowing Ukraine's drive to join NATO and linking Ukraine's bid to join the World Trade Organization to Russia's own stalled application.

"I would say quite openly that we need to synchronize the negotiation process of our countries on WTO," Russian Prime Minister Mikhail Fradkov said after a meeting Wednesday to conclude the deal with his Ukrainian counterpart, Viktor Yanukovych.

But Ukrainian opposition leader Yulia Tymoshenko denounced the natural-gas deal as "treason" and warned Ukraine was losing its independence from Russia.

Chirac's Last Act: Lion In Winter, Wolves All Around (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 28 — From afar, Jacques Chirac is the embodiment of France. Charming, debonair, skilled in the national art of social discourse, France's president since 1995 seems to be gliding toward retirement and a respectable place in history.

But here at home, he has been under unrelenting — indeed unprecedented — attack, so much so that the newspaper Libération has named "Chiracophobia" as "the new national sport."

The assaults have crescendoed since Mr. Chirac suffered what has been called a mild cerebral attack a year ago, focusing on his age, his leadership and his legacy. The newspaper Le Monde described him as "the absent one" and even suggested that he consider resigning.

DOJ_NMG_0088103

A TNS Sofres poll this month gave him an approval rating of 24 percent, up from 16 percent last July, but still making him the most unpopular French president since the firm began presidential polling in 1978.

The disillusionment with Mr. Chirac is not only personal but also a reflection of the dread among the French public that their nation has lost its glory abroad and its way at home. That feeling is especially acute on the anniversary this week of the brutal unrest that gripped several suburbs a year ago.

Widespread criticism that little has changed to improve the plight of the country's underclass underscores a larger point: that Mr. Chirac's 1995 campaign promises to "mend the social fracture" in France and reduce unemployment, among other things, have been unfulfilled.

The most recent bludgeoning came on two evenings this week, in a four-hour documentary of his political career that aired on France 2 television — the first time an assessment of a sitting president has been shown on public television in prime time.

France's political elite — many of them onetime friends and colleagues of Mr. Chirac — lined up to tell stories about his thirst for power, his betrayals, his opportunism and his policy U-turns that have earned him the nickname "the Weathervane."

"A sort of political Don Juan, more preoccupied with the conquest or the preservation of power than by its execution," said Philippe Séguin, a minister in the 1980s.

A "chevalier of opportunism" who put into place a system of "corruption" in the years he was mayor of Paris, said Raymond Barre, the former prime minister who was part of Mr. Chirac's own camp.

Olivier Stirn, a former minister who worked under Mr. Chirac in the 1970s, described him even more brutally. "Chirac," he said, "is a killer."

Certainly, Patrick Rotman, the historian who made the television documentary, whose two parts were titled "The Young Wolf" and "The Old Lion," had a lot of material to work with.

Mr. Chirac, who turns 74 next month, has held no jobs outside of government. He joined the civil service in the 1950s, was elected to Parliament in 1967 and became a junior minister for the first time later that year. He was prime minister in the 1970s and again in the 1980s.

He is the only sitting politician who has served every Fifth Republic president since Charles de Gaulle. Many French people have never known politics without him.

"Chirac was a wild cat who eliminated everyone in his way to the Élysée," Mr. Rotman said. "Now he is rather alone and isolated. It's the tragedy of powerful men who were kings, who gave their lives to win power and at the end of their reign are abandoned."

Mr. Rotman's documentary is perhaps the most authoritative but only one of many attempts to write Mr. Chirac's political history — and obituary — in the past year. As the end of his political career draws near, the fear of him has receded, and the time to settle scores has come.

In his third volume of memoirs published this month, for example, former President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing accuses Mr. Chirac, a fellow politician of the center-right, of a double betrayal in the 1981 presidential election, which brought François Mitterrand, the Socialist leader, to power. Instead of supporting Mr. Giscard d'Estaing against Mr. Mitterrand, Mr. Chirac ran as well. Even worse, Mr. Giscard d'Estaing recounts a deathbed conversation in which Mr. Mitterrand credits his victory in the second round to secret support from Mr. Chirac.

"What motivates him is a fanatical desire to reach the presidency of the Republic," Mr. Giscard d'Estaing wrote in the book, already a best seller. "This obsession wipes out everything else — convictions as well as respect for the rules."

In "The Irresponsible," another best seller, Hervé Gattegno, a journalist for Le Monde, accuses Mr. Chirac of transforming France into an autocracy, using his presidency with "political and judicial irresponsibility, as a debtor without scruples uses his insolvency."

Earlier, "The Tragedy of the President," an unforgiving portrait by veteran journalist Franz-Olivier Giesbert, drew on private conversations with Mr. Chirac and pictured him as personifying the decline of France. The book was a runaway best seller.

"By cowardice as much as blindness, he persists in pursuing policies that have been leading the country to ruin for more than 20 years," Mr. Giesbert wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0088104

As Mr. Giesbert explained to an interviewer after the book was published, “We are in the world of Shakespeare now, and the king is alone because he killed off any rivals and many friends.”

But Mr. Chirac is not a politician who can go quietly into the night. The aura of the presidency is too powerful, the adulation of the crowd intoxicating. The French have already looked beyond him, but he is unready to say adieu.

Mr. Chirac has refused to announce that he will not run for a third term next spring, saying that he will announce his decision next March.

Last weekend, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin perpetuated the notion that there might be a third term for Mr. Chirac, praising his experience and calling the question of his running again “legitimate.”

The conventional wisdom is that Mr. Chirac plans to retire but refuses to become a lame duck, even though others seem to have made him one already. An IFOP poll last week said that only 2 percent of the French people want him to run again as the ruling, right-wing UMP party candidate in next spring’s presidential election.

So for the moment, he is busily doing what he does best — schmoozing, breaking bread with farmers and carrying the French tricolor around the world.

This week, this perpetual campaigner is in China. There is of course business to do — billions of dollars of contracts were signed as France joined the rush to profit from China’s boom.

It was a good week to be away given the anniversary of the civil unrest and the episodic acts of violence in recent days.

Mr. Chirac seemed happy in China, playing the role of the “lapin Duracell” or Energizer bunny — the unstoppable politician plunging into a sea of Chinese and being honored with a full military parade at Tiananmen Square.

This welcome seemed appropriate since Mr. Chirac’s main achievements, many here believe, have been on the world stage. According to a Paris-Match poll earlier this month, 78 percent of those polled approved of his handling of foreign affairs.

Part of that popularity stems from his opposition to the American-led war in Iraq in 2003. That may turn out to have been his best political move.

Indeed, in a 48-page special report on the “enigma” of Mr. Chirac in the journal L’Histoire this month, Jean-Luc Parodi, one of France’s leading research directors, suggested that there will be only one moment in which Mr. Chirac was “totally in balance with French society: when he refused to engage France in the Iraq adventure.”

Youths Set Fire To Bus In Marseille, Seriously Burning Woman (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

MARSEILLE, France (AP) — A group of marauding teenagers set fire to a bus Saturday in the southern French port city of Marseille, seriously wounding a passenger and leaving three others suffering from smoke inhalation, police said.

French police have braced for a surge of violence this weekend, a year after three weeks of riots swept through France's poor neighborhoods, where many immigrants and their French-born children live. Scattered violence was reported Friday, the one-year anniversary of the 2005 riots, and another attack was reported Saturday in Marseille.

Three or four young people burst onto a bus in the southern French city and tossed inside a bottle of flammable liquid before fleeing, police said, citing witnesses' accounts. A fire stared, seriously injuring a 26-year-old woman who suffered second- and third-degree burns on her arms, legs and face.

Three others were brought to a hospital to be treated for smoke inhalation, police said. The bus was destroyed.

In scattered violence from Friday night to Saturday morning, six police officers suffered minor injuries and 47 people were arrested, the Interior Minister said. Bands of youths torched two public buses, and in troubled neighborhoods around the country, youths set fire to a total of 277 vehicles, police said.

On an average night in France, up to 100 cars are torched. In a statement, the Interior Ministry described the anniversary night as "relatively calm."

Tne unrest could have been much worse.

At the height of last year's rioting, about 1,400 cars were burned nationwide in a single night. The rioting was fueled by anger at France's failure to offer equal chances to many minorities — especially Arabs and blacks — and France's 5 million-strong Muslim population.

DOJ_NMG_0088105

The rioting was sparked by the deaths of two teens who were electrocuted in a power substation in Clichy-sous-Bois on Oct. 27, 2005, where they were hiding after what they thought was a police chase.

Ahead of the weekend, the national police said about 4,000 people extra police and riot officers were deployed across the country to cope with a possible resurgence of violence. Some 7,000 police are at the ready on an average night in France, officials have said.

Reforms Roiling Eastern Europe (WT/AP)

By Vanessa Gera, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

WARSAW -- Anti-government rallies rock Budapest, the Hungarian capital. Political intrigue in Poland holds up new roads and housing. Populists take power in Slovakia, vowing to undo economic reforms. And the Czech Republic goes without a functioning government for months.

Political life has fallen into disarray in Eastern Europe, and many are asking what has gone wrong in the 2½ years since these former communist countries joined the European Union, expecting to reap the fruits of democracy and open markets.

Many specialists on the region say people are simply exhausted after years of economic sacrifices made to join the EU and NATO. They now lack the clear goals that drove them toward the West after the fall of communism in 1989.

And their discontent is mounting as the instant riches many thought would come from EU membership have failed to materialize.

"The common phenomenon in all these countries is transition fatigue," said Gergely Hudecz, a political analyst with the DZ Bank in Budapest. "The electorate has had enough of reforms."

Gone is the strong external pressure that pushed governments in Warsaw, Budapest, Prague and Bratislava, Slovakia, to shutter unproductive factories and sell off state companies, in the face of opposition from newly unemployed workers hurt by rising costs.

All four countries have replaced the leaders who took them into the bloc, and some have opted for parties pledging to restore the welfare benefits that were slashed to qualify for membership.

The greatest disruption has been in Hungary, where Socialist Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany outraged the country by saying in a recording leaked last month that the government had "lied morning, evening and night" about the economy. That sparked weeks of daily anti-government protests, including two nights of riots.

To the north in Poland, twin brothers with prickly nationalist views -- President Lech Kaczynski and Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski -- lead a country bogged down in frequent Cabinet reshuffles and convoluted political maneuverings.

The bickering has slowed down construction to ease a housing shortage and modernization of the dilapidated road system.

In the latest twist, the prime minister brought back into his Cabinet Andrzej Lepper, a fiery populist known for organizing anti-EU protests, less than a month after booting him out for demanding more spending.

In Prague, politics have been stalemated since a June election delivered a lower house of parliament divided evenly between left and right.

And in neighboring Slovakia, Prime Minister Robert Fico took power this summer on pledges to undo many of the economic reforms that have made his nation the darling of foreign investors.

His left-wing party generated anxiety when it built a coalition with an ultranationalist party.

After admission to the EU, "what we see now is a rise of populists and nationalism. Frustrations, sentiments and emotions, which were suppressed during the process of admission, are now coming to the surface," said Jiri Pehe, a political analyst and director of New York University in Prague.

But Mr. Pehe also stressed that the "democratic framework is very strong, and it's supported by the outside," thanks to the region's integration with the West.

Mikulas Dzurinda, the former prime minister of Slovakia, oversaw major pro-market reforms, including a flat tax that created strong economic growth. He acknowledges that voters are disillusioned to find themselves still lagging so far behind the West.

DOJ_NMG_0088106

"People thought there was something like a Marshall Plan for the eastern part of Europe that would automatically allow us to reach the richest countries in the union," Mr. Dzurinda said. "Now I notice something like frustration."

Abbas Eyes PLO Troops In Jordan (WT/AP)

By Amy Teibel, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas hopes to beef up his loyalist forces with Palestine Liberation Organization troops from Jordan, Palestinian officials said, as rival Palestinian factions bolstered their ranks in anticipation of a feared civil war.

Israel has objected in the past to letting members of the Jordan-based Badr Brigade enter Palestinian areas.

But with clashes intensifying between Mr. Abbas' Fatah Party and forces loyal to the militantly anti-Israel Hamas government, Israeli officials said they would consider allowing them in, according to the Palestinian officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because no decision had been made.

Israeli authorities were not immediately available for comment yesterday.

Palestinian officials did not say how many Badr forces Mr. Abbas hopes to mobilize. What is most important to him is that he would command their loyalty as head of the PLO, the officials said.

Mr. Abbas, elected separately last year, is nominally the supreme commander of all seven Palestinian security branches, and most security personnel were hired by Fatah, which controlled the Palestinian Authority for more than a decade.

But after Hamas swept Fatah from office in January elections, it set up its own militia, which now numbers 5,700 armed men, and announced plans to recruit an additional 1,500 in the West Bank, Fatah's stronghold.

The rival security forces have clashed frequently in the Gaza Strip in recent weeks as political tensions between the two sides grow. The violence has left more than a dozen dead and stoked fears of a bloody showdown.

The European Union, U.S. and other donors cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas took power in March. Despite growing hardship in the Palestinian areas, Hamas has rejected international calls to renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

Mr. Abbas plans to dissolve the Hamas-led government within two weeks if the Islamic militant group does not agree to a coalition with Fatah, Palestinian officials said Friday.

Meanwhile, Palestinian factions that kidnapped an Israeli soldier four months ago offered conflicting assessments yesterday on whether a prisoner swap was imminent.

Abu Mujahed, a spokesman for the Popular Resistance Committees, said his faction has agreed to an Egyptian proposal to release Cpl. Gilad Shalit in return for hundreds of Palestinian prisoners.

But a spokesman for the military wing of the Palestinians' ruling Hamas party said prospects for an imminent deal have faded.

Israeli officials have said they were unaware of any progress to win Cpl. Shalit's release.

Cpl. Shalit was captured on June 25 in a cross-border raid and is thought to be held in Gaza.

Police Ordered To Oaxaca After 3 Killings In Strike (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Oct. 28 -- President Vicente Fox on Saturday ordered federal police to seize control of strike-ravaged Oaxaca de Juarez, a popular tourist destination where a U.S. journalist was among three people killed Friday.

Despite pressure from Oaxaca's tourist industry, Fox had been reluctant to intervene in a five-month conflict that has pitted the governor of the state of Oaxaca against a coalition of citizen groups and striking teachers demanding his ouster. But the shooting death of Brad Will, 36, a volunteer correspondent for the Web site Indymedia.org, and two Mexican protesters prompted the president to respond with force for the first time.

DOJ_NMG_0088107

Several Mexican newspapers published front-page photographs of the mortally wounded Will lying in the street with blood trailing from a gunshot wound in his stomach. Photographs also showed rifle-wielding men in civilian clothes roaming the streets. Indymedia, citing a witness account, said Will was pulled to safety after being shot but died before reaching the hospital.

Strikers blamed the killings on plainclothes paramilitary members affiliated with Gov. Ulises Ruiz's Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI. The governor's office accused members of the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, or APPO, an umbrella group that includes union members and indigenous groups that have joined the teachers' protest.

Fox did not say how many federal police he planned to send to Oaxaca. Officers began arriving there by plane Saturday. In a statement, he said the mobilization was a response to events that threaten "the order and peace of citizens in the region."

Strike leaders reinforced barricades and vowed not to budge.

"These forces coming here are only going to make things worse," Florentino LÃ³pez MartÃ-nez, an APPO organizer, said in a telephone interview from downtown Oaxaca. "This is not a solution to the problem."

Mexican presidents are often reluctant to use force because federal officers have been accused in the past of inciting violence, most notably during student protests before the 1968 Olympics in Mexico City. Nonetheless, Fox ordered federal police to take over the city of Nuevo Laredo last year to quell an outburst of drug violence.

In Oaxaca de Juarez, the teachers' protest is an annual rite that began 26 years ago. The protests are usually peaceful and generally last a week or two, but this year the teachers became infuriated when Ruiz sent hundreds of police to forcefully remove demonstrators from the city's idyllic squares. APPO soon took on a greater role in the demonstrations, pushing an agenda of economic, social and political reform in Mexico's second-poorest state.

The demonstrations have left the region a shambles and scared away the tourists who are the foundation of the city's economy. Death estimates during the strike range from nine to 14, and APPO leaders say that more than a dozen of their members have disappeared. Countless downtown businesses have closed, buses have been set on fire, demonstrators have barricaded themselves in government buildings and protest blockades have cut off main thoroughfares. At times in the past five months, residents have been warned not to leave their homes. Shots have been fired at a university radio station, and more than a million students have been unable to attend classes.

"The city is practically kidnapped by all this," Luz Divina Sarate, a Ruiz spokeswoman, said in a telephone interview. "The people are tired of this."

Friday's shootings at several flash points in and around Oaxaca de Juarez took place despite signs of progress in negotiations with the striking teachers. Last week, teachers tentatively ratified an agreement that would allow them to return to classes at some unspecified date and receive 30 percent raises spread over six years.

But their unmet central demand -- the resignation of Ruiz -- threatened to undermine the fragile pact. Even as Friday's deaths reignited passions Saturday, federal negotiators continued to meet with teachers union leaders in Mexico City.

The spike in violence also seemed to suggest that there will be a long wait before Oaxaca's stunning colonial streets are once again crawling with camera-toting tourists. After the shootings, the U.S. ambassador in Mexico, Tony Garza, warned Americans to stay away.

3 Killed In Mexican Protest; Police Move In (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 28 — Hundreds of federal riot police officers and soldiers took up positions outside this besieged tourist city in southern Mexico on Saturday, poised to end an increasingly violent protest that has shut the downtown for five months and left about a dozen people dead.

Tension hung heavily in the air as night fell. Protesters appeared to be digging in at the barricades that they had constructed around town from sand bags, old tires, barbed wire and burned-out vehicles.

The federal government issued a statement ordering the protesters to “immediately hand over streets, plazas, public buildings and private property” so that officials could “guarantee public order and adherence to the law, as well as preserve respect for the population’s individual guarantees.”

DOJ_NMG_0088108

But the protesters' response was blunt.

"We're going to resist the attack," declared Florentino López, spokesman for the Oaxaca People's Popular Assembly, or A.P.P.O., a loose coalition of interests that has laid siege to the city's central square, or Zócalo, taken over radio stations and defaced much of the town with protest messages.

President Vincente Fox, in his final month in office, on Saturday ordered the federal troops in after three people, including a New York photographer, were killed in Oaxaca the evening before. The photographer, Bradley Roland Will, 36, who was shot twice in the abdomen, was a well-known activist on the Lower East Side who lived at times as a squatter in city-owned buildings.

The crisis in Oaxaca began in May when schoolteachers went on strike, an annual exercise that had usually led to a pay raise. But when Ulises Ruiz, the governor of Oaxaca State, ordered the protests broken up, leftists came to the teachers' aid.

Soon, Oaxaca's picturesque downtown was in the hands of the demonstrators, all with their own grievances against a local government they accuse of heavy-handed tactics.

"The roots of a revolution are gestating in Oaxaca," says Zenén Bravo Castellanos, a teacher who heads the Revolutionary Popular Front, one group leading the protests. "The people of Oaxaca are tired of so many corrupt governments."

After five months of standoff, with occasional bursts of violence, Mr. Fox's patience apparently ended with the latest deaths. It was unclear, however, whether the federal troops intended to take over Oaxaca by force or to merely put pressure on the protesters to continue the monthslong negotiations to end the impasse.

The teachers have reached a deal to return to classes, although some glitches remain. The other protesters, however, have vowed to continue to control the town until Governor Ruiz resigns.

Mr. Will, active in left-leaning political causes, was filming the standoff for an organization called Independent Media Center, or Indymedia. He was among the plaintiffs who had won a $120,000 settlement from New York City after officials demolished an East Fifth Street building despite a judge's order that it remain standing until people squatting there could retrieve their belongings.

Mr. Will worked as a freelance photographer and reporter for the New York City chapter of the Indypendent, a radical collective that published a weekly newspaper and maintained a Web site dedicated to subjects like immigration, the Iraq war and the struggles of the developing world. In recent years he traveled widely in Latin America.

In Manhattan on Saturday night, about 100 people gathered outside the Mexican Consulate for a somber remembrance of Mr. Will. People lighted candles and incense and held a large banner that read, "Bring Brad Will's Assassin to Justice."

Witnesses in Oaxaca said a plainclothes police officer was responsible for his death. Protest leaders said such violence by the authorities would only inflame the already volatile situation.

The Oaxaca attorney general, Lizbeth Cana, labeled the protesters urban guerrillas and said it was understandable that local people were lashing out at them violently. "The people are fed up with permanent violence, threats and kidnappings," she said, according to The Associated Press. But the mayor of a nearby town said the five men being detained for possible involvement in Mr. Will's killing were not disgruntled ordinary local citizens but police officers and local officials.

"Oaxaca is a question mark," Flavio Sosa, a leader of A.P.P.O., said before the federal forces arrived. "No one knows what's going to happen."

Mexican President Sends Police To Oaxaca (AP)

By Rebeca Romero

AP, October 29, 2006

Shop owners shuttered their businesses and demonstrators built up street barricades Saturday after President Vicente Fox ordered federal police to intervene in this picturesque city torn by more than five months of protests and violence.

Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, had refused repeated requests to use force in Oaxaca even as the southern city slid into chaos. But gunbattles Friday that killed a U.S. journalist and at least two Mexicans apparently exhausted his patience.

Fox's Interior Department issued an ominous statement late Saturday demanding protest leaders "immediately hand over streets, plazas, public buildings and private property" so that federal authorities can "guarantee public order and adherence to the law, as well as preserve respect for the population's individual guarantees."

DOJ_NMG_0088109

Mexican Deputy Interior Secretary Arturo Chavez said late Saturday that the police operation would not begin Saturday night or early Sunday.

It was unclear how many officers of the Federal Preventative Police were converging on this long popular tourist destination, though police in gray uniforms and carrying riot shields poured off of transport planes at Oaxaca's airport, which was closed to commercial traffic.

Teacher's union leader Daniel Rosas said protesters believed 4,000 federal police had arrived.

In unrest that began with a teacher strike for higher pay, leftists have blocked streets for months demanding the ouster of Oaxaca state Gov. Ulises Ruiz. They claim the state government has sent gunmen and thugs to provoke them.

After Fox announced he was ordering in federal police, protesters fortified their positions by piling up sandbags and parking large trucks and buses across roads leading into the center of Oaxaca.

Some demonstrators rolled enormous tree trunks across the main highway leading into Oaxaca from Mexico City, waving Mexican flags and chanting "Get out Ulises!"

With neat piles of rocks behind them ready for confrontation should police try to storm town, the demonstrators left just one lane open and were only allowing taxis and other local through. Nearby a sign trumpeted tourist attractions and proclaimed "Welcome to Oaxaca!"

"I think there's going to be violence," said Eutelma Cruz, a 54-year-old housewife and protester. "I hope (federal forces) intervene and find a peaceful solution."

Men also were seen removing broadcast equipment from one of the local radio stations seized by protesters months ago. A second station held by leftists remained on the air, urging Oaxaca's residents to prevent federal police from entering the city.

"We're not afraid. We were born to die," said Iris Hernandez, 29, who was guarding a roadblock.

Few people ventured from their homes. Across the heart of the city, nearly all shops and restaurants closed early. Street vendors packed up their wares and disappeared.

"We're afraid there is going to be more shooting," said Juan Lopez said as he pulled metal shutters down over the glass storefront of a sporting goods shop a half block from Oaxaca's leafy central plaza surrounded by arcaded colonial-era buildings.

Friday's deadly violence began when gunmen tried to remove a street blockade in a rough neighborhood. Journalist Bradley Roland Will, 36, of New York, was hit in the abdomen and died later at a Red Cross hospital.

Oaxaca resident Esteban Zurrita was shot dead and the bullet-ridden body of another man, Emilio Alonso Fabian, was discovered about two miles away. A photographer for the Mexican newspaper Milenio was slightly injured.

Will worked for Indymedia.org, an independent Web-based media organization and sold video on a freelance basis, said friends and Indymedia colleague Hinrich Schuleze. He had been documenting the upheaval in Internet dispatches that showed strong sympathy for the protesters.

"What can you say about this movement, this revolutionary moment," he wrote in a dispatch dated Oct. 16. "You know it is building, growing, shaping, you can feel it, trying desperately for a direct democracy."

Oaxaca Attorney General Lizbeth Cana, who has likened the protesters to urban guerrillas, said the shooting was sparked by angry townspeople defending themselves against the demonstrators.

"The people are fed up with permanent violence, threats and kidnappings," she said.

But U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza said in a statement that the shooters may have been Oaxaca police, and the Mexico City newspaper El Universal published photos Saturday identifying some of the men firing at protesters as local officials.

Mayor Manuel Martinez Feria of the nearby town of Santa Lucia del Camino said five men who appeared in the photos brandishing pistols had been turned over to state officials for possible involvement in Will's killing. He identified them as two members of Santa Lucia's city council, two of that town's police officers and a former justice of the peace from another town.

Local police officers — often out of uniform — and armed gangs have staged sporadic attacks on protesters, and at least five other people have been killed.

Several other shootings and clashes were reported in Oaxaca on Friday, and Red Cross officials said Saturday they treated 18 additional victims of violence, though none suffered gunshot wounds.

DOJ_NMG_0088110

Teachers went on strike in May demanding higher pay and better working conditions. But after police attacked one of their demonstrations in June, they extended their demands to include a call for Ruiz's resignation and were joined by leftists, students and Indian groups.

The struggle escalated into a fight for control of Oaxaca's streets as demonstrators occupied the central plaza, built barricades, seized radio and television stations, drove off local police and burned buses.

The protesters contend the 2004 governor's election was rigged by Ruiz, a member of the former longtime governing Institutional Revolutionary Party, which lost its hold on Mexico's presidency when Fox was elected six years ago.

Ruiz repeatedly has asked federal authorities to send troops to restore order, but Fox's government had insisted on trying to solve the dispute through negotiations.

Friday's clashes came a day after teachers agreed to end their strike, which has kept 1.3 million children out of classes across the southern state. The deal had been expected to take the sting out of the protests. But Rosas, the teacher's union leader, said late Saturday that Fox's decision to send federal forces could negate the agreement.

Oaxaca, famed for its colonial architecture and as a center of Indian handicrafts and cuisine, is one of the most famous inland tourist attractions in Mexico. Mountains overlooking the city hold the imposing ruins of the Zapotec city of Monte Alban.

Mexican Forces Converge On Oaxaca City (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez And Reed Johnson, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Fox sends soldiers and police to try to end a standoff between striking teachers and the governor's backers.

Federal riot police and soldiers toting shields and automatic weapons massed around this beleaguered colonial city Saturday in a bid to end a five-month standoff between striking teachers and supporters of state Gov. Ulises Ruiz, amid escalating violence that included the Friday shooting deaths of a U.S. journalist and two Mexican men.

But by Saturday evening, there were signs that both the protesters and federal officials might be stepping back from a confrontation that has caused at least nine deaths and paralyzed Oaxaca city, the state capital, since the strike began in May.

Hundreds of army troops and officers of the Federal Preventive Police began arriving here Saturday morning by plane and bus. They were dispatched by President Vicente Fox, who for months had resisted calls by Ruiz and Oaxacan businessmen for the federal government to intervene directly to end the occupation of Oaxaca by the striking teachers and an umbrella protest group, the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, known by its Spanish-language initials APPO.

Some APPO members had pledged to fight to the death to maintain the occupation. In recent days the group has barricaded city streets with tree trunks, sandbags and overturned buses and vans.

But APPO leader Flavio Sosa, reached late Saturday night, indicated that his group would continue to maintain its barricades but would not fight back if the federal forces attempted to dismantle them.

"We're going to maintain our barricades in the city. If the PFP wants to clear them, let them clear them," he said, referring to the federal police. "We won't resist, but tomorrow we'll march to show our disapproval for the presence" of the federal police and troops.

Sosa said the group was willing to attend negotiations.

"We'll go together with the striking teachers. We'll continue with our movement demanding Ulises Ruiz step down, and we'll state our disapproval of the PFP's presence," he said.

About the same time Saturday night, Arturo Chavez Chavez, deputy secretary of state, said at a Mexico City news conference that the federal forces had been sent only to prevent more violence and were not "contemplating any type of action" on Saturday or today.

He also said that the Oaxaca union representing the 70,000 striking teachers had agreed that they would return to their classrooms Monday.

As darkness fell, many streets were virtually deserted as businesses shuttered their storefronts and fearful residents hunkered down inside their homes.

DOJ_NMG_0088111

The smell of burning wood and rubber hung in the air, and a local radio station operated by the protesters urged people to resist any takeover attempt by police and the army. About 200 to 300 protesters gathered in the Zocalo, or central square, listening to impassioned speeches exhorting them to stick together in opposing the federal forces.

'They can shoot me'

But on the city's periphery, the resistance appeared to be minimal. Only about 50 protesters were massed along the main highway that connects the central city to the airport, in contrast to the thousands who had taken part in previous actions. Some carried tree branches for self-defense. Twenty-four Coke bottles filled with gasoline stood at the ready.

"They can shoot me, they can kill me," one elderly male protester said.

At nightfall, it was still unclear how many police officers had taken up positions in and around the capital.

Protesters estimated that 2,000 to 4,000 police had arrived, but federal officials refused to confirm those numbers.

Carlos Abascal, Mexico's interior minister, said Saturday night that the federal police had been sent to maintain civic order, not to take sides or "to curtail the freedom of expression or the liberty of demonstrating of all Oaxacans."

Late Saturday afternoon, the federal government issued an ultimatum demanding that APPO leaders "immediately hand over streets, plazas, public buildings and private property" so that federal authorities could "guarantee public order and adherence to the law."

Fox's decision to send federal police came one week after the state's teachers tentatively agreed to return to work in exchange for a 30% raise over six years. On average, Oaxacan elementary school teachers earn about $600 a month.

U.S. journalist killed

The decision also was made just hours after the death of Bradley Roland Will, 36, a New York City political activist and photojournalist with Independent Media Center, or Indymedia, an Internet-based alternative news agency, who had been in the region for four weeks documenting the conflict with photographs and video.

Will was shot in the abdomen Friday afternoon while attempting to conduct interviews at a street barricade and died en route to the hospital, according to witnesses and Indymedia's website.

Some witnesses said that Will was shot by a plainclothes undercover policeman.

Tony Garza, U.S. ambassador to Mexico, issued a statement calling Will's death "senseless" and saying that it "underscores the critical need for a return to lawfulness and order in Oaxaca."

A Oaxaca resident also was shot to death Friday, and the bullet-riddled body of a third man was discovered about two miles away, according to news reports.

Once a popular tourist destination famed for its pre-Columbian ruins and colorful Indian culture, Oaxaca has been transformed into a tense encampment of streets blocked with concrete hunks and sheet metal, public buildings slathered in graffiti and scores of shuttered businesses.

Deadly dispute

At least nine people have been killed during the dispute, which began in the spring when teachers went on strike to demand better wages and working conditions.

Teachers subsequently occupied the Zocalo, pitching tents and raising banners there and in surrounding streets. Gradually the teachers were joined by trade unionists, leftist activists, indigenous groups and others demanding the governor's resignation and conducting a campaign of mostly peaceful civil disobedience.

On June 14, Ruiz sent police officers to try to oust the protesters, prompting a melee in which police pummeled demonstrators with truncheons, according to Mexico's human rights commission. Since then protesters have seized radio stations, and both sides have taken up rocks, clubs, machetes, Molotov cocktails and firearms.

Though much of the violence reported to date has been inflicted against the protesters by cruising vigilantes, protesters contend that Ruiz and his supporters have been attempting to goad them into retaliation that would justify crushing the occupation.

Among other grievances, the protesters say that Ruiz, a member of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, which dominated Mexican politics for seven decades, manipulated votes in the 2004 governor's election. Ruiz, who has denied those charges, has spurned calls for his resignation while beseeching Fox to use force to end the demonstrations.

DOJ_NMG_0088112

sam.enriquez@latimes.com

reed.johnson@latimes.com

Enriquez reported from Oaxaca and Johnson from Mexico City. Times staff writer Carlos Martínez in Mexico City and special correspondent Rafael Bucio in Oaxaca contributed to this report.

Castro Appears On TV, Scoffs At Rumors Of His Death (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

HAVANA, Cuba (AP) -- The ailing Fidel Castro appeared on Cuban state television for the first time in more than a month Saturday, looking thin and tired but walking and ridiculing recent rumors of his death.

The 80-year-old Cuban leader temporarily ceded power to his brother Raul in July following intestinal surgery for an undisclosed ailment. Fidel Castro had not been seen since mid-September, when photographs of him greeting world leaders at a summit in Havana were released.

Saturday's video showed him walking slowly but steadily in an unidentified room and reading a newspaper in a loud voice.

"They've declared me moribund prematurely," he said, holding a copy of Saturday's edition of Granma, the Communist Party daily newspaper.

"But it pleases me to send my compatriots and friends this small video."

He said his recovery would be long and not without risk.

But he added: "I'm not the least bit afraid of what will occur."

The Cuban dictator said he was "coming along just as planned" and called rumors of his death ridiculous and insulting, claiming they were the work of his enemies.

"Let's see what they say now," he said.

The Cuban government has treated Castro's ailment as a state secret.

Rumors that he might have died intensified in recent weeks. He has not made a public appearance since July 26, a few days before he underwent surgery.

On Friday, Castro's close friend and ally Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said the Cuban leader was up and about and taking trips at night into the countryside.

Cuba TV Shows Pictures Of Castro (BBC)

BBC.com, October 29, 2006

He was shown walking unassisted and reading Saturday's newspaper Cuban television has broadcast the first images of President Fidel Castro in more than a month, defiantly addressing rumours that he had died.

Mr Castro said his recovery would be long and not without risk, but said he was "coming along just as planned."

He called the rumours "ridiculous" and said: "Let's see what they say now."

The 80-year-old, who temporarily handed over power to his younger brother in July following intestinal surgery, had not been seen since mid-September.

In the new video footage the ailing president was pictured walking unassisted and - to underscore that it is not archive material - reading a copy of Saturday's edition of Granma, the Communist Party daily newspaper.

"Now, when our enemies have prematurely declared me moribund or dead, I'm happy to send to our compatriots and friends around the world this short film footage," he said.

Cuban officials attending a ballet festival in Havana said they were delighted to see the images of President Castro.

"This is excellent news for everyone - all Cubans, and all of Cuba's friends," Vice President Carlos Lage said.

"We are really happy to see that Fidel is better and that every day he is moving forward," Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said. "He's not been lost, just working on his [recovery] plan."

State secret

Images of Mr Castro were shown in September to quell rumours Earlier this month, Time magazine quoted an unnamed US official alleging that the president had terminal cancer.

Mr Castro's younger brother, Raul, denied this, saying the president, was "getting better all the time".

DOJ_NMG_0088113

Mr Castro handed temporary power to his brother in July, prompting speculation that his 47-year rule was nearly over.

Cubans were told that details of the ailment would be kept secret to prevent Cuba's enemies from taking advantage of them.

Images of a frail Mr Castro were released on his birthday, on 13 August, in an attempt to quell rumours that he had died.

More recently, video images were broadcast showing Mr Castro, in his hospital bed and wearing pyjamas, greeting visiting Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Former Contra Fighters Divided Over Ortega (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

One pair of brothers stopped speaking after the younger defected.

The old guerrilla fighter has many battle scars. He'll roll up his pant leg and show you his prosthetic device if you're interested. Years ago, during the war, he lost his leg when he stepped on a mine laid by his enemies, the Sandinistas.

It's been a long time since Jose "the Jackal" Talavera has tried to kill Sandinistas. The leftists haven't ruled the country for 16 years, but the onetime Contra commander still despises them.

"They filled the country with Cubans and Bulgarians," Talavera, 46, said of the Sandinistas, who had close ties to the former Soviet bloc. "Our war against them was just and heroic."

The Talavera family lost three brothers in the 1980s to the U.S.-backed war against the leftist regime. Now, like many other Contra families, the surviving brothers are split over whether they should support the Sandinistas in next month's presidential election.

Last month, "the Jackal" turned on his TV and saw his younger brother, Salvador "the Little Jackal" Talavera, not only shaking hands with Sandinista leaders but embracing them.

Salvador Talavera is the president of the Nicaraguan Resistance Party, the conservative political group started by the demobilized Contras a decade ago. Last month, the 40-year-old signed a "peace agreement" with the Sandinistas by which the Contras promised not to go to war again should their bitterest foe, Daniel Ortega, win the Nov. 5 presidential election.

The agreement was a big boost for Ortega, and the Little Jackal is now featured in Sandinista campaign commercials.

"We Contras are becoming conscious of our rights for the first time," Salvador Talavera said, explaining his party's decision to break with its conservative allies, who've won every presidential election since 1990.

"Years of bad decisions by these right-wing governments have brought Daniel Ortega to the brink of power," he said.

Jose Talavera said he told his younger brother that supporting the Sandinistas was immoral. The brothers haven't talked since. "Like good democrats, we have to respect the political decisions other people make," Jose Talavera said.

The split in the Contras highlights a growing frustration among the rural population that makes up the movement's rank and file, analysts say.

Thousands of peasants who were granted land in exchange for giving up their armed struggle against the Sandinistas have yet to receive formal title to those properties, despite 16 years of right-wing government. And Nicaragua's adoption of free-trade policies has hurt the nation's agricultural sector.

"There's a lot of frustration in the Contra corridor," said Oscar Rene Vargas, a political analyst here, referring to a stretch of rural Nicaragua reaching from the Honduran border southward. "Promises were made to them, and those promises were not kept." As a result, Vargas said, the Sandinista National Liberation Front was gaining ground in rural areas that have long been conservative strongholds.

Several Contra leaders who have defected to the Sandinista cause say they feel the movement's right-wing political allies have taken them for granted.

"Seven thousand of our wounded war veterans are neglected," Salvador Talavera said. "We've been working in this alliance, but what's in it for us? We left our companions buried in shallow graves to bring these people to power. And now they have forgotten about us."

DOJ_NMG_0088114

The younger Talavera believes that guerrilla veterans have been used as right-wing political props in three consecutive victories over the Sandinistas in presidential elections.

"They've used us as their shock troops," he said. "When the elections come, they go and get the old Contra commanders and give us new suits."

Talavera's decision to sign the agreement with the Sandinistas on Sept. 15 was a stunning setback to the presidential aspirations of Eduardo Montealegre of the conservative Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance.

The Nicaraguan Resistance had backed Montealegre until Salvador Talavera's appearance last month with Ortega on a stage in Managua, the capital. Montealegre is the favored candidate of the U.S. Embassy here and is seen by many Nicaraguan conservatives as the best hope for preventing an Ortega victory.

"It was a low blow against Montealegre … and also very astute on the part of Salvador Talavera," said Carlos Tunnermann, a political analyst and former Nicaraguan ambassador to the United States. "And it allowed Daniel Ortega to put forward an image of reconciliation."

Salvador Talavera said many Contras also felt "a profound resentment" toward their old U.S. allies. "We kept gringo blood from being shed here, and we stopped what was then known as communism from reaching the frontiers of the United States," he said. But recently, the U.S. has "not considered even a small budget to help those heroic fighters who served them."

Jose Talavera understands his brother's frustrations, but not the decision to aid the family's old enemies.

"We have to keep the government from falling into the hands of the Sandinistas," he said. The older Talavera has just opened a new office for his group of Contra dissidents behind Montealegre's campaign headquarters.

hector.tobar@latimes.com

Nicaragua Bans Abortion (NYT)

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

The rights and safety of Nicaragua's women took a giant step backward last week when the country's legislature passed a law criminalizing all abortions, with no exceptions. The previous law permitted an abortion if the mother's life was in danger.

Latin America has the world's strictest laws on abortion. But that does not discourage it. Latin America also has the world's highest abortion rates, averaging nearly one per woman over the course of her reproductive lifetime.

Nicaragua's ban, which passed 52 to 0, was a clear bid to curry support from the Catholic Church before next weekend's presidential elections. Conservative parties were expected to vote for the legislation. But Daniel Ortega's Sandinistas also backed it. Once the party of social revolution, the Sandinistas have become the party of political opportunism.

If Nicaraguans want to see the possible consequences of their new law, they can look next door to El Salvador, where all abortions have been banned since 1998. If doctors find evidence of an abortion, they are required to report their patients to the police. Women who sought medical help after a botched abortion have been handcuffed to their hospital beds. And some women with late-term abortions have been given 30-year prison terms.

The only good news out of Nicaragua is that legislators declined to take up a proposal that would drastically increase prison sentences for women who have abortions and people who perform them.

Bolivia Agrees New Energy Deals (BBC)

BBC.com, October 29, 2006

Some deals were signed with only minutes to go before the deadline Bolivia has agreed energy deals with 10 foreign gas and oil firms, just before a deadline for foreign firms to agree new contracts or leave the country.

Brazil's Petrobras and Spain's Repsol were among eight to reach agreement on Saturday, after two deals on Friday.

The contracts come after President Evo Morales nationalised the oil and gas industry in May to give the state more control and a larger slice of profits.

He said that now Bolivia would no longer be "a beggar state".

"We will continue in this path of recovering our natural resources," said Mr Morales, " not only the hydrocarbons but... all non-renewable natural resources that belong to the Bolivian people."

DOJ_NMG_0088115

Under the terms of the president's 1 May decree, foreign companies had six months to sign contracts giving up majority control of their Bolivian operations.

The companies will also have to work in partnership with the re-founded Bolivian state energy firm, Yacimientos Petroliferos Fiscales Bolivianos (YPBF).

The BBC's Damian Kahya in La Paz says a deal with Petrobras - the largest foreign investor in the industry - came as a significant boost for Mr Morales as the Brazilians have invested more than $1bn in Bolivian gas.

However, Petrobras and the Brazilian government had been angered by the way the Bolivians conducted negotiations, accusing them of bullying, our correspondent says.

Deals with seven more firms, including the second largest investor Spain's Repsol and the UK's BG Group, were announced a few hours' before the deadline expired.

Details of the contracts signed on Friday are not yet available, but the president of YPBF, said they would bring Bolivia $120m (£63m) in annual gas revenues.

'Rocky' negotiations

The negotiation process has not been simple. Talks were dealt a blow in September when Andres Soliz Rada, a main player in the nationalisation process, resigned as energy minister.

Mr Soliz had clashed with state-owned Petrobras, the biggest investor in Bolivia's energy industry.

However, Mr Rada was replaced by Carlos Villegas, and talks proved to be more fruitful.

There were other problems including a lack of money that hampered Bolivia's YPBF, in its plans to buy control of the assets like refineries and pipelines.

YPBF also missed a 1 July deadline to restructure itself so it would be better able to handle its more dominant position in the oil and gas industry.

Boomtown In Venezuela Confronts Mining Ban (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

LA PARAGUA, Venezuela — This dusty, remote river port in southeastern Venezuela feels a bit like a latter-day Deadwood. Dreams of striking it rich in gold or diamonds have drawn about 5,000 people to La Paragua and some 40,000 to nearby areas, from beyond this country to Brazil, Colombia and Guyana.

Shopkeepers from the Middle East cater to a clientele that communicates in a local patois of Spanish, Portuguese and Guyanese-accented English. Between forays into the bush, the miners support a cauldron of bars, prostitutes and storefronts dealing in precious metals.

But the town has become a focus of efforts by President Hugo Chávez to halt much of the mining, citing environmental concerns. In September, army soldiers sent here to enforce a mining ban killed six miners, setting off violent protests. Miners blocked access to the town, burning army vehicles, and destroyed the mayor's residence in the nearby town of Maripa.

A dark mood weighs heavily here. Residents speak with fear about army checkpoints and the presence of soldiers who threaten their livelihoods. Graffiti on the walls of dozens of buildings rail at Mr. Chávez, mourn the miners and even take shots at the government's recent military purchases from Russia.

Residents say they will stay and that the mining will go on. Longino Guerra, an immigrant from the Canary Islands who operates a warehousing and bush-pilot service in La Paragua, said, "As long as there are diamonds and gold in the ground, there will be miners here."

But the environmental toll can be high. Open-pit mines scar the fragile landscape of Bolívar State, home to the soaring sandstone mesas known as tepuis, and to Angel Falls, the world's highest waterfall. The mercury used to pry gold from riverbeds pollutes water systems, and dredging and mining operations erode riverbanks and silt up the river. That threatens the Guri hydroelectric complex, which provides Venezuela up to three-quarters of its electricity.

DOJ_NMG_0088116

"It's a complicated situation with no easy solution," said Argenis Palacio, an official with the National Statistics Institute who has been taking a census of the area. "We've encountered miners from as far away as the Czech Republic and Portugal who are drawn here by the idea that there is no oversight of their activities."

The government has promised to create jobs for miners in tourism or agriculture, and to teach them to plant crops like cassava or corn. But miners say the promises have not been fulfilled, and last year, hundreds near the town of Las Claritas blocked a highway to Brazil and threw Molotov cocktails at troops.

In early October, border tensions were added to the fury over the September killings, when Venezuelan soldiers killed a Guyanese citizen, claiming he was smuggling gasoline across the border for generators used in the area's mines. Maps in Venezuela still claim large swaths of Guyana, describing the region as a "reclamation zone."

When the national guard was responsible for the area, it was accused of human rights abuses and taking bribes. Last year, Mr. Chávez replaced it with an army-led force called TO-5, for Theater of Operations No. 5. Now, Gen. Raúl Baduel, the defense minister, said, prosecutors plan to investigate 18 military officials with the new force.

The general has described the September attack as an enforcement operation that went awry. Troops were sent to a camp detected in an area where mining was prohibited with orders to destroy machinery and tools, he told reporters.

But the soldiers shot at least seven miners with high-caliber weapons at close range, killing all but one.

The lone survivor, a Venezuelan who suffered multiple gunshot wounds, survived by pretending he was dead, his sister said. That man, Manuel Felipe Lizardi, 36, has been recovering at a hospital three hours away in Ciudad Bolívar.

"He had the angels by his side," said the sister, Berenice Lizardi, 28. "Now I'm afraid the army will come after him and us."

The justice minister, Jesse Chacón, said ballistic studies of the corpses "makes us suppose there was at least an excess use of force."

"Control over security in the area got out of the hands of the government," said Alexander Luzardo, a professor of anthropology and environmental rights at Central University of Venezuela and a former Chávez campaign official.

He said the incident was a blow both to the government's environmental policy and its approach to indigenous groups, since small-scale mining was essentially condoned during most of Mr. Chávez's government, which began in 1998. "Nothing justifies the killing," he said.

Manuel Rosales, the main opposition candidate in presidential elections set for December, came here recently to criticize the government's inability to carry out viable mining guidelines. Further political fallout may depend on the government's ability to counter claims that soldiers demand money from miners for allowing them to work.

Still, even as the town has crystallized into a place of frustration with the army and Mr. Chávez's government, the mining goes on. Residents gathered on a recent afternoon at a riverfront bar to watch miners emerge muddy and exhausted from days in the bush.

"If Chávez wants to empty the mines, we're finished," said Ana Victoria Mendoza Palma, 23, a cook. "The government says it wants miners to work in tourism, but why would anyone come here?"

President Holds A Big Lead As Brazil Prepares To Vote (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Oct. 28 — Rebuked at the polls four weeks ago because of voter irritation with a corruption scandal and his unwillingness to answer questions about it, Brazil's president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, heads into a runoff vote on Sunday with a lead that every poll suggests is insurmountable. A win would guarantee him another four years in office.

A final round of public opinion surveys published Friday shows Mr. da Silva, a former factory worker and labor leader, defeating his opponent, Geraldo Alckmin of the Brazilian Social Democratic Party, by at least 60 percent to 40 percent. More than 125 million Brazilians are registered for the runoff vote, which is required because Mr. da Silva fell just short of a majority in the first round of balloting on Oct. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0088117

"Everything indicates that this is going to be a resounding, unquestionable victory for Lula, despite all the scandals," said Jairo Nicolau, a political science professor at Candido Mendes University, using Mr. da Silva's nickname. Mr. Nicolau said that if the polls were right, Mr. da Silva would duplicate the landslide victory that carried him into office in 2002.

Mr. Alckmin, a 53-year-old physician and former governor of São Paulo, Brazil's richest and most populous state, was able to force a second round largely because of a late-breaking political scandal. In mid-September, the police apprehended operatives of Mr. da Silva's left-wing Workers Party as they were about to pay $792,000 in cash for a dossier they apparently hoped would incriminate Mr. Alckmin's camp in a notorious corruption scheme.

Mr. da Silva, who turned 61 on Friday, has denied any involvement in the skulduggery, which forced the resignation of his campaign manager and was, according to the police, organized by his former bodyguard and several other aides and friends.

Mr. da Silva has been able to pull away from Mr. Alckmin over the past several weeks, in part, by labeling him a one-note candidate who spoke more of corruption than of his own plans for Brazil.

The campaigning featured relatively little in the way of conventional rallies and marches. Instead, both Mr. da Silva and Mr. Alckmin focused their efforts on the news media and on forming alliances, some of them ideologically illogical, with the governors, mayors, legislators and other local political bosses who are traditionally the power brokers in Brazilian politics.

This week, for example, Mr. da Silva campaigned alongside the scion of one of the conservative family dynasties that he always blames for the poverty and backwardness of his native Northeast region. Mr. Alckmin, whose party is center-left, was pilloried for allying himself with the populist former governor of Rio de Janeiro state, nominally a leftist like Mr. da Silva but one of the president's main rivals.

Mr. da Silva has offered only one formal news conference since taking office in January 2003, and also chose to absent himself from a candidates' debate just before the first-round vote. Polls cited that decision, seen as arrogant, as one of the reasons for a sudden drop in his popularity, and during the second round of campaigning he was much more available, agreeing to four debates with Mr. Alckmin.

The last of those debates took place here on Friday night, with a panel of undecided voters supplying questions. "The scandals just don't stop," Mr. Alckmin said, at one point turning away from the panel to face Mr. da Silva directly. "They haven't learned. They haven't investigated. They hide everything."

Mr. da Silva responded that no government had done more than his to root out corruption, which he described as "a tumor embedded" in the Brazilian body politic.

Cash Aid Program Bolsters Lula's Reelection Prospects (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Incentives for Families To Help Themselves Spreads Beyond Brazil

ALTO DE SANTA HELENA, Brazil, Oct. 28 -- In this sparsely furnished cinder-block house with seven rooms, one tattered love seat and no chairs, the refrigerator doesn't work and the electric stove won't heat up. But the 13-inch television can conjure a picture through its rabbit-ear antenna, and that's what Edmundo Rodrigues da Silva points to when explaining how he'll vote in Brazil's presidential election Sunday.

"The reason I got the television was to keep my kids in the house, instead of watching them go to a neighbor's house to watch their television," said Rodrigues da Silva, a 54-year-old father of seven and a subsistence farmer. "And the reason I was able to get it was President Lula. After he got into office, we got Bolsa Familia."

Bolsa Familia is the cash assistance program that pays more than 11 million low-income families in Brazil about $40 per month in cash if they meet conditions such as ensuring their children regularly attend school and have regular health checkups and vaccinations. The assistance was enough for Rodrigues da Silva to afford his first television set, and it has been instrumental in helping President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva overcome corruption scandals and build a lead of more than 20 points in opinion polls heading into the runoff against former Sao Paulo state governor Geraldo Alckmin.

Such "conditional cash transfer" aid programs have spread throughout Latin America in recent years and have recently been exported to the United States, where New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg this month announced that his city would adopt a version. Like most of the other examples, Brazil's program is popular among voters, and Lula has promoted Bolsa Familia as the cornerstone of his first term. Even Alckmin has used the program as a campaign tool -- he has tried to remind voters that his party launched an early version of the program during the presidency of Fernando Henrique Cardoso in the 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0088118

But the poor strongly associate the program with Lula, who poured billions into it, and surveys indicate that support for Lula among the two-thirds of the population that lives on less than $500 per month is powering his reelection hopes. Even though Alckmin has a strong advantage among voters in high income brackets, Lula is expected to gain 63 percent of total valid votes versus 36.8 percent for Alckmin, according to a poll released this week by the firm CNT/Sensus.

Lula, 61, who achieved national prominence as a union leader, narrowly failed to win the election outright during a first-round vote Oct. 1, which came in the wake of allegations that his aides tried to buy incriminating information about his opponents with briefcases full of cash. The scandal has quieted, with Lula promising to investigate and punish those involved.

During the campaign's final televised debate Friday night, Lula painted Alckmin as the candidate who favors the rich and would sell off state companies, while continuing to tout Bolsa Familia as his signature program. Lula has been following the formula for weeks, and political analysts said it has helped him comfortably pad his lead.

"The Bolsa Familia program is probably the most successful social program in Brazil's history, and it's also very different from the programs of the past," said Rogerio Schmitt, a political analyst in Sao Paulo. "Instead of just giving money to the poor, this has strings attached. So the idea is that the requirements will help make sure that in the future, the children of the families won't need the program."

Skeptics contend that the cash assistance programs divert focus in developing countries from making structural reforms in education and the economy -- changes that many analysts say Brazil's next president will be pressured to address. And because the proliferation of such programs is so recent -- Mexico launched its pioneering Opportunidades program in 1997 -- experts say it is too soon to make definitive judgments about long-term benefits.

In this village of about 190 families, local officials say that school attendance is up, child labor down and health care more consistent. Rodrigues da Silva's wife, Ana Lucia, keeps her children's vaccination cards stashed in the wooden box above the basin outside where she scrubs laundry. Their 8-year-old son, Edvan, walks with his mom each month to a health clinic to get weighed and briefly examined. The teacher at his school sends attendance cards to a government office every three months. If a student's attendance is below 85 percent and he or she doesn't have a valid excuse, the parents' benefits can be pulled.

But obvious problems persist here. If a chair in the school breaks, for example, the students have to wait until the next school year to get a replacement, Rodrigues da Silva said. Finding qualified teachers willing to come to a poverty-racked rural area is just as difficult as it always has been, he said.

"It's clear that more children are attending school, for example, but it's not clear that they are learning more," said Eduardo Lora, a principal adviser with the research department of the Inter-American Development Bank in Washington who has analyzed conditional cash transfer programs in Latin America. "The main constraint is the quality of the schools. But when people say that the money would be better spent to improve education, it's very difficult because we don't know of simple ways to improve education."

Even though Lula's government more than doubled social spending during his term, to about $8 billion last year, the Bolsa Familia program is a small part of the federal budget in a country of 185 million where most workers pay about 36 percent of their income in taxes, Lora said. The cost falls in line with most of the other similar conditional cash aid programs in Latin America -- about 0.3 percent of a country's gross domestic product, Lora said.

Ramon Marcelo da Silva coordinates the Bolsa Familia program for 16 towns in this pocket of Minas Gerais state, overseeing benefits for about 95,000 people -- about half of the region's total population. He said that since he began two years ago, he has repeatedly heard a familiar complaint of critics of welfare programs: You shouldn't give people fish, but instead, teach them to fish.

"The problem is that in some rivers there is nothing to fish," Marcelo da Silva said. "There's just nothing there."

Besides the TV, the Rodrigues da Silva family uses its aid money to buy school supplies and food. In one of the house's bare rooms, tubes of toothpaste and bars of soap sit on a windowsill, where one glass pane has been replaced by a piece of cardboard. Against one cracked wall is a small stack of rice, beans, sunflower seeds, paraffin and olive oil. All of it was bought with money from the Bolsa Familia program. Ana Lucia said it is enough to turn the vegetables, fruits and herbs the family grows outside the house into full meals.

DOJ_NMG_0088119

She estimated that the vast majority of her neighbors -- "probably 99 percent" -- also received payments from Bolsa Familia, which is available to families with per capita incomes less than about $55 per month. And in the village, she and her husband said they knew of only three people who planned to vote for Alckmin instead of Lula. One reason, they said, is that they hope Lula will increase the payments distributed under the program.

"Now I want to buy furniture," Ana Lucia said.

Brazil's President Revives Rhetoric (AP)

By Michael Astor

AP, October 29, 2006

Facing a surprisingly rough campaign, President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva has revived the populist rhetoric he had largely shed since taking office.

Fiery speeches contrasting the lives of Brazil's poor with the wealthy elite have left many Brazilians wondering whether he would push the country to the left if he wins a second four-year term in Sunday's runoff election.

Silva, a former union firebrand and Brazil's first working-class president, faced similar fears four years ago, but calmed them by adhering to market-friendly, pro-business policies that won praise even from conservatives.

But with his administration engulfed in corruption scandals, Silva has returned to his traditional base — the poor — rallying them with claims that his opponent, Geraldo Alckmin, would sell off cherished state assets and eliminate popular programs such as Family Allowance, which gives needy families monthly subsidies.

"The rich don't need the Brazilian state. The ones who need it are the poor people of this country," Silva said at rally on Sao Paulo's poor east side. "The poor are the ones who need public universities because the rich can pay — or even study in Paris."

While few believe Silva would adopt the radical populism of Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, they worry that he could entrench divisions in Brazil, which has one of the world's widest gaps between rich and poor.

"It's very easy to mobilize the poor. What's hard is to demobilize them after the election," said Bolivar Lamounier, director of the Augurium political consulting firm. "I'm afraid if he wins a second term, which looks likely, he will be tempted to take an authoritarian turn."

According to two polls released Saturday night, Silva led Alckmin by 22 percentage points. Both the Ibope and the Datafolha institutes said Silva would win 61 percent of the valid votes, while Alckmin would get 39 percent.

The Ibope survey interviewed about 8,680 people on Saturday, while Datafolha talked to 12,820 Brazilians between Friday and Saturday. Both polls, conducted for Globo TV, had a margin of error of 2 percentage points.

In the first round on Oct. 1, Silva fell just short of the 50 percent needed to avoid a runoff. Polls had predicted he would win outright but then news media ran photos of $770,000 in cash that members of his party allegedly planned to spend on purchasing an incriminating file about Alckmin and his allies.

Although Silva was never personally implicated, the expose reinforced suspicions of government corruption — suspicions driven home by Alckmin in his campaign speeches.

It was then that Silva stepped up the class-driven rhetoric.

He called Alckmin a tool of the rich and out of touch with the common man, while his allies painted a corruption scandal enveloping Silva's party as an elitist-driven conspiracy.

"The raw and naked truth is that, in the elite's political program ... the poor have not been included," Silva said at a Sao Paulo rally. "During elections the poor are worth more than bankers, but after the elections the poor are not even invited in for coffee."

The first-round vote split the nation along geographic lines, with Silva winning handily in Brazil's poor north while Alckmin took the industrialized south, including Sao Paulo, the state he served as governor.

DOJ_NMG_0088120

In the second round, Silva counterattacked with an appeal to national pride, claiming that Alckmin would privatize government-run companies that are sacred cows to many Brazilians — oil giant Petrobras, Banco do Brasil, the national post office.

Alckmin called the president a "liar" to his face during their first debate — but Silva hammered away at the theme, and analysts say many of Brazil's 125 million voters believed him.

"It's not very difficult with the low level of education in Brazil to motivate this prejudice," Lamounier said. "It was very hard to carry out privatization in Brazil, and while it a made good business sense, when poor people got their phone bills or light bills they just saw that things cost a lot."

Alckmin has played on fears that Silva, like Chavez, could rewrite the constitution to give the poor more power. Silva has denied any attempt to split the country along class lines.

His socialist fire has already inflamed prejudices among upper-class Brazilians.

"If he's elected I hope he gets impeached during his first days in office," said Remo Dalla Zanna, a 67-year-old economist. "He's not the kind of person I want governing my country. I don't want a crude and ignorant union leader. No one I know is going to vote for him."

The poor majority, in large part, remains Silva's devout power base.

"With Lula, things have gotten much better for the poor," said Celsinha Coqueiro de Sousa, a 52-year-old maid, "and I hope they will get even better."

___

Associated Press writer Hellen Berger contributed to this report from Sao Paulo.

DR Congo Votes For New President (BBC)

BBC.com, October 28, 2006

Voting has opened for a new president of the Democratic Republic of Congo, in one of Africa's most significant elections for many years.

President Joseph Kabila, who came to power after his father Laurent was assassinated in 2001, is facing former rebel leader Jean-Pierre Bemba.

The UN-backed election is intended to crown a peace process that ended five bloody years of civil war in 2003.

Correspondents say the outcome could shape the future for much of Africa.

Sunday's run-off will conclude the DRC's first fully democratic polls since independence in 1960 and is aimed at restoring peace to one of Africa's largest and most turbulent states.

The BBC's Mark Doyle in Kinshasa says it is impossible to exaggerate how the destiny of DR Congo could shape the future of Africa.

Joseph Kabila (left) is running off against Jean-Pierre Bemba (right) Nine African states border the country and all were affected by the wars caused by the long lack of real government in DR Congo, the power vacuum at the heart of Africa, he says.

UN officials say the polls are the most important on the continent since the 1994 election of Nelson Mandela that ended apartheid in South Africa.

However, our correspondent says the candidates are not Nelson Mandelas and neither of them has a good record of being a democrat.

Mr Kabila has strong support in the east of Congo; Mr Bemba is popular in the west.

This political split across the geography of a vast nation is the same split that in the past led to a war in which four million people are estimated to have died, our correspondent adds.

'Tense but manageable'

Mr Kabila won first round polls on 30 July, but fell just short of the 50% needed for outright victory.

At least 23 were killed in armed clashes between the two men's security forces in Kinshasa after the results were announced.

DOJ_NMG_0088121

United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan has called on the two candidates to ensure that the election is peaceful. Both men have promised to urge their supporters against violence and to abide by election rules.

A UN official in Kinshasa has described the situation as "tense but manageable".

Extra UN peacekeeping troops are on standby in the east of the country. In the capital, Kinshasa, the UN is being backed up by a special European Union military force.

Final Stage Of Election In Congo Holds Hopes Of Many For Peace (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

GOMA, Congo, Oct. 28 -- By 8 a.m. Thursday, several dozen people had already lined up at the election commission office. Some had walked miles in leather loafers or flip-flops, ridden bicycles with skinny tires across lumpy dirt roads or traveled by car through the rolling green jungle.

Then they waited. They explained. They argued. They walked to a different election office across town, and back again. At last, lucky Augistin Busaka reached the plastic orange table inside the old stone building where stacks of handwritten lists spilled onto towers of cards and more lists. He handed an election worker a letter of introduction that began, "Dear Sirs," which he hoped would help him obtain the coveted prize: a voting card.

"I want peace," he said, explaining that his farm remains in the hands of one of several militia groups fighting in the palmy mountains around here. "Whatever it costs. If I have to walk 60 kilometers, I'm going to walk it, just to vote."

There is an exuberant, if fragile, sense in eastern Congo these days that the country is inching toward one of the most significant moments in its post-colonial history.

In the culmination of the first multiparty elections in 40 years, tens of millions of people are expected at the polls Sunday for the runoff vote for president and to elect, for the first time, provincial legislators tasked with bringing democracy closer to people who have seen decades of epic corruption and two ruthless wars.

The process has been largely peaceful, the result of a massive logistical effort by the United Nations, which has deployed 17,500 peacekeepers; international donors, who have given $450 million; and mainly, the Congolese themselves.

The Congolese Independent Election Commission has managed the mind-boggling, largely pen-and-paper task of registering 60 million voters across a mostly roadless country the size of the United States east of the Mississippi. Through posters, music and even theater, election workers have explained such basics as how to mark a ballot, a task that continued until nightfall Saturday in Goma, a dirt-street town of wooden kiosks and markets.

Although an estimated 70 percent of registered voters turned out for the first round of elections in July, in this eastern province alone nearly 37,000 ballots were voided. Some people, for instance, had seized a long-awaited chance to express themselves, writing, "You fool!" next to the picture of a despised candidate or, "You are my savior, I love you so much!" next to a favored one.

"People drew faces on the candidates and things like that," said Jason Luneno, who leads a group that promotes good governance and educates voters in Goma. "So all that was an expression of anger. . . . Our job is to sensitize people not to do that again. So with all that, we hope the election will be successful."

In general, the Congolese seem to be sharply divided between the two presidential candidates. The western half of the country, including the capital, Kinshasa, voted heavily in the first round for Jean-Pierre Bemba, a businessman from that region.

Here in the war-ravaged east, people voted overwhelming for Joseph Kabila, whose father, Laurent Kabila, led a rebellion in 1997 that toppled Mobutu Sese Seko, who, with U.S. support, ruled the country by force for 37 years. By some estimates, he looted billions from the government of this nation abundant with diamonds and minerals.

The younger Kabila took power after his father was assassinated in 2001 and in the east is generally credited with helping to end major fighting among various militias. Some of the groups have demobilized, others have been integrated into the national army, and some still roam here, seeming to have settled into a routine of brutal violence. Human rights groups estimate that 4 million people have died as a result of the fighting since 1998. And even now more than 1,000 die daily because of hunger, disease and other consequences of being run into an unforgiving jungle.

DOJ_NMG_0088122

And so, the elections have been greeted in eastern Congo as a chance at lasting peace.

On Thursday, the lines at the election commission office grew longer and sweatier as the day wore on.

Here was Angalia Kifene, an evangelical minister who was chased from his village three times by militiamen who came looting and killing, and Gilbert Banyawesize, who had to flee his village twice, and Mugenzi Isaac, at the moment a farmer without a farm. Isaac had walked through the dawn to get his voting card and was waiting now, more defiant than downtrodden.

"I have no farm now because it's been taken over by Nkunda's forces," Isaac said angrily, referring to Laurent Nkunda, perhaps the most notorious warlord here. Nkunda's militias forced Isaac to flee to Goma, where he makes what money he can these days carrying luggage for U.N. officials or wealthy businessmen passing through. "We hope if we have a responsible president, we will be able to go home."

As the last-minute scramble for voting cards went on, minivans plastered with Kabila's face and loaded with supporters -- often paid with lunch -- zoomed around the dusty streets. Many other vans advertising the provincial candidates -- in Goma, there are no fewer than 143 vying for three seats -- sped around blaring Congolese music as a voice from a loudspeaker urged people to vote for No. 53, or No. 61, or No. 72.

Nkunda's party, which once controlled a vast swath of the east, lost heavily in the first round of voting. Although some provincial candidates remain affiliated with his party, very few have openly advertised the fact in the last few days before the election, instead posting big smiling photos of Kabila on the vans, a sign of the warlord's waning power.

Indeed, whether the losers accept the results -- or whether the winner is able to fold them into the new government -- remains an open question in eastern Congo, as well as in Kinshasa, where forces loyal to Bemba and Kabila clashed after the first round of voting and elsewhere in recent days.

And beyond the announcement of results next month, a more complicated matter remains: governing a country where most institutions of democracy remain weak. Many Congolese have no access to courts. Some agencies and many of the soon-to-be-created provincial legislatures, which will manage 40 percent of the country's revenue, according to the new constitution, do not yet have physical buildings.

The bureau of information in Goma, for instance, consists of a room with three dangling light bulbs and four donated desks. Recently, three men, reading newspapers, seemed simply to have dropped by.

"Three years ago, no one would have believed we would have gotten this far," said Jason Stearns, an analyst with the International Crisis Group. "But the U.N., regional leaders, the Congolese, while they've been successful in organizing the election, they haven't been successful in creating other trappings of democracy. You can't just vote and go home."

At the moment, at least, residents of Goma say they are ready.

Throughout the day Friday, hundreds of Congolese poll watchers turned up at the election commission office to get their accreditation. Thousands more gathered at a plywood electoral commission stand set up at the center of town. They were there for their voting cards, and a commission official called their names from a megaphone: "Mongane! Muhindo! Mutubaze! Muindo! Mumbere!"

Among the handful of workers there was Mbalamiramwira Mukenge, born, he said, in 1978. Forced into one rebel group, he switched to another, then went back to the first, and in recent months decided he had had enough of it all.

He went to a government demobilization center, where he renounced the life of a soldier in return for a promised $300. When he arrived in Goma to get the money, however, he received only $25. With his home village still under the control of a militia, he roamed the city until he found a place to sleep.

One recent morning, officials found him curled up at the electoral commission stand and gave him a job as a guard.

"I'm hoping with the election coming that we'll have peace in the country," said Mukenge, adding that he wants to resume his studies and become a teacher. "Maybe I will be someone in the future government."

Fears Usurp Optimism In Congo Vote (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Violence ahead of the presidential runoff sparks the question: Will the loser abide by the results peacefully?

DOJ_NMG_0088123

Anxious Congolese returned to the polls this morning to complete the first democratic presidential election in more than 40 years. But fears of renewed violence in this Central African giant largely overshadowed the hope and optimism many had expressed during the first round of voting.

Millions were expected to line up at 50,000 polling stations nationwide, just as they did July 30 for the first round; however, officials worried that heavy thunderstorms this morning in Kinshasa, the capital, could affect turnout. The initial round had ended without any of 33 presidential contenders garnering the required 50% of ballots.

In today's runoff, voters faced two choices: transitional President Joseph Kabila, the son of assassinated President Laurent Kabila; and his archenemy, Jean-Pierre Bemba, a businessman-turned-militia leader who serves as a vice president.

In August, the men's private security forces fought for three days, killing at least two dozen people in Kinshasa. Ever since, the capital has remained on edge, worried the election's loser will resort to violence and plunge the country back into civil war.

"If they are really democrats, as they pretend to be, they should accept the results," said Heritier Lionga, an economics student at Protestant University of Congo. "But I'm not optimistic. Everyone is afraid. We hope whatever happens won't last for a long time."

As election day approached, United Nations tanks and armored personnel carriers took up position in front of the Independent Election Commission, media outlets and the candidates' campaign headquarters. About 2,500 U.N. troops, some working behind sandbag positions, are providing security along with 1,700 European Union soldiers. Military helicopters occasionally buzzed overhead.

Independent as of 1960, the Democratic Republic of Congo, formerly known as Zaire, endured decades of dictatorship and kleptocracy under strongman Mobutu Sese Seko, followed by four years of civil and regional war that killed about 4 million people, mostly from disease and hunger. A transitional government was installed in 2003.

International experts say the election could help stabilize one of Africa's most populous and resource-rich — but also most traumatized — nations.

"The transition represents the best possibility that has existed for many years, possibly ever, to get things going right in this very big and very important country," U.S. Ambassador Roger Meece said in an interview.

Meece said he remained optimistic despite the fact that he was among several diplomats briefly ensnared in the fighting in August. The clashes rocked an upscale riverfront neighborhood where Kabila, Bemba and many international diplomats live, leaving stray bullet holes in some of the elegant mansions and turning Bemba's personal helicopter into a pile of melted metal and ash. "That was an ugly period," Meece said.

Reissued assurances

Since then, a flurry of internationally supervised commissions and peace agreements have worked to ensure that the candidates will accept the will of the voters. So far, both have pledged to shun violence and keep their fighters off the streets, although the men made similar promises during the first round.

The media-shy Kabila, 35, who backed down last week from the only scheduled debate, is considered the front-runner. He won 45% of the vote in July, with strong support in the eastern part of the country. He recently forged coalitions with other top vote-getters, including a son of Mobutu and an ex-premier who ranked third in the first round.

Kabila declined to be interviewed last week, but he told the BBC that he would "without question" accept the poll's results. Some diplomats blame him for instigating the August standoff by dispatching some of his estimated 5,000 presidential guard soldiers to surround the election commission offices when the results were scheduled to be released.

Bemba, who received 20% of the vote in the first round and remains popular in Kinshasa and much of the west, has been working hard to replace his tough-guy image with a more "presidential" look, shunning traditional Congolese shirts in favor of dark suits and red power ties.

"I'm a democrat," he said last week. "In a democracy, winning and losing is a result of the will of the people."

But he insisted he would not shy away from confrontation, if provoked. "In a democracy, tanks and troops have no place in the streets," he said. But "I will defend myself."

DOJ_NMG_0088124

Experts say the outcome could be close, despite Kabila's strong first-round lead. Bemba won endorsements from another strong first-round contender, Oscar Kashala, a Harvardeducated cancer doctor who returned to Congo last year and generated enthusiasm among students and intellectuals.

Although veteran opposition leader Etienne Tshisekedi has refused to endorse either candidate, many of his supporters are backing Bemba.

'Framework for the future'

Election commission officials have until Nov. 19 to announce the provisional results, but they hope to make an announcement by Nov. 10 to avoid the climate of rumors and speculation that fueled August clashes, said Apollinaire Malu-Malu, president of the commission. But he warned against high expectations, noting that the new government will face challenges in reforming the army, providing social services and maintaining security.

"The elections are not the end," he said. "They just provide a framework for the future. It's a new point of departure."

Officials at the U.N., which is funding the $500-million election, said they had reevaluated security since the August standoff. "It's been beefed up," said Roberto Valent, deputy director for the U.N. Development Program in Kinshasa.

Analysts say Kabila and Bemba appear to be preparing for a fight, gathering weapons and soldiers.

Bemba's private militia in Kinshasa is estimated to consist of from 600 to 1,000 fighters, about twice the number he had during the first round. He also draws strong support from unemployed youths, who probably would rally to his cause in the event of another confrontation.

There are reports that Angolan troops are gathering along the border, presumably to come to the aid of Kabila. The reports stir memories of Angola's assistance to Kabila's father in the late 1990s, when Congo's civil war drew in its neighbors, snowballing into what many call Africa's "First World War."

"They are definitely arming," said Jason Stearns, senior analyst at the International Crisis Group, a conflict-resolution research organization. "But I don't expect a return to all-out war. The key will be for the winner to be able to consolidate his position, both politically and militarily. It cannot be a winner-take-all scenario."

edmund.sanders@latimes.com

Sudan Denies Report That It Bombed Towns In Chad (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

N'DJAMENA, Chad (AP) — Chad accused neighboring Sudan on Saturday of bombing four towns along its eastern border, close to Sudan's volatile western Darfur region where thousands have been displaced by three years of conflict.

The Sudanese army spokesman, Brig. Gen. Osman Mohammed al-Aghbash, denied the Chadian report and said Sudanese forces "have no interest in intervening there."

There has been no independent confirmation of the Chadian government's allegations that Sudan's air force attacked the villages of Bahai, Tine, Kayarin and Bamina on Friday.

"Sudan has to stop ... otherwise we are going to take measures," Chadian Foreign Minister Ahmat Allam-mi told journalists Saturday without elaborating. "We are not going to accept any other aggression. Our forces will take all necessary measures to respond."

On Wednesday, Chad accused Sudan of supporting rebels that have attacked three eastern towns in recent days. Officials said the rebels had been driven back across the border.

The United Nations announced Friday that it was sending a mission to Chad and the Central African Republic to look for ways to keep the escalating conflict in Darfur from spilling into other countries.

Rebel groups are using various nations as rear bases to stage destabilizing attacks in both Chad and Sudan's western Darfur region, and "the humanitarian fallout is extremely serious," U.N. Undersecretary-General for Peacekeeping Jean-Marie Guehenno said in New York.

Al-Aghbash, the Sudanese spokesman, said a senior military delegation visited Chad's capital of N'Djamena last week seeking to improve relations between the two countries' militaries. He denied Sudan allows Chadian rebels to operate from Sudanese territory.

DOJ_NMG_0088125

After an April rebel attack on N'Djamena, Chadian President Idriss Deby accused Sudan of supporting the Chadian rebels, which Sudan denied. He closed the border and severed diplomatic ties, but the two countries resumed relations and reopened the border in August.

Human rights groups have long warned the violence in Darfur could destabilize the entire region. More than 200,000 people are believed to have been killed and 2.5 million people displaced in a three-year conflict between Darfurian rebels and the Sudanese government.

Chadian rebels, who include army deserters and some of Deby's relatives, have had sporadic clashes with Chad's army since October 2005. Deby, who first took power at the head of his own rebel army in 1990, won elections in May that the main opposition parties boycotted because they claimed they had been rigged.

The competition for power in Chad has become more intense since the country began exporting oil in 2004.

In Swaziland, 'Secret Lovers' Confronted In Fight Against AIDS (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

MBABANE, Swaziland -- This tiny kingdom's new anti-AIDS campaign arrived without warning one day in July, featuring a slogan both unusually explicit and dripping with implied accusations: Makhwapheni Uyabulala.

Your secret lover can kill you.

Despite living in a country that has the world's highest rate of HIV, Swazis had grown accustomed to bland billboards suggesting that more condoms or a positive attitude toward the disease would curb its spread. These new ads were different.

By the time they disappeared two weeks later in a frenzy of controversy, they had sparked a passionate national debate about how best to combat a disease that, Swazis say, has pushed their country to the brink of collapse. And the ads forced many here to confront how freewheeling sex was fueling an epidemic of early death.

In Swaziland's bustling capital, callers were jamming the lines of radio shows. Men at pubs began looking askance as their friends maneuvered their way into casual hookups. And Musa Ndlangamandla, the stocky 35-year-old editor of the Swazi Observer newspaper, began rethinking his attitude toward casual relationships.

"Sometimes you need shock therapy," said Ndlangamandla, a short man with a neatly trimmed goatee, broad shoulders and a bit of a beer belly. He was so impressed by the campaign that he began printing "Say No to Multiple Sex Partners!" in capital red letters on the front page, just below the newspaper's nameplate.

Swaziland, a southern African country about half the size of Maryland, at first glance appears deeply traditional, with cattle roaming freely among clusters of mud-and-thatch huts nestled in the green folds of steep mountainsides. But Swazis say it is modernizing at warp speed, with new highways, shopping malls and easy access to American soap operas and gossip about the exploits of Hollywood celebrities.

Although polygamy is common -- the king has 13 wives -- even more common, Swazis say, are relationships in which men have only one wife but girlfriends also. Women often maintain several partners as well. A study by a Christian aid group, World Vision, reported in May that in several southern villages, roughly three out of five residents, both men and women, reported having two or more sexual partners in the past three months.

The word makhwapheni (pronounced "ma-kwa-penny"), which means "your secret lover," became the centerpiece of radio and newspaper ads on the order of Derek von Wissell, 62, a courtly, gray-haired former cabinet minister who founded the national AIDS commission in 2002. He grew frustrated with his agency's inability to curb a virus that had infected an estimated 200,000 of Swaziland's 1 million residents. Among adults 15 to 49, the rate was even higher, with one out of three infected.

Von Wissell concluded that the vague, unfocused public education campaigns common here and throughout Africa had failed. In this, he was persuaded in part by the research of Daniel T. Halperin, an AIDS expert for the U.S. Agency for International Development based in Swaziland, who in speeches and private presentations pointed to dozens of studies showing that condom promotion campaigns were having little impact and that it would be more effective to target the multiple, concurrent sexual relationships that fuel high rates of HIV.

DOJ_NMG_0088126

"We have been pussyfooting around sex," von Wissell said in an interview in his office in a small concrete building dominated by a convenience store and gas station. "The first thing you must recognize is that sex spreads HIV."

The issue of multiple sexual partners has rarely been the focus of anti-AIDS campaigns in Africa, both because of taboos against publicly discussing sex and because of a long-standing consensus among anti-AIDS groups that educational messages should inspire hope rather than fear, researchers say. Campaigns have been especially careful to avoid suggesting that people with the disease -- including millions of women who had sex only with their unfaithful husbands -- bear any blame for contracting it.

The makhwapheni campaign cast that conventional wisdom aside in what von Wissell said was a desperate bid to force Swazis to take responsibility for protecting themselves, and their loved ones, from AIDS.

The ads were designed to look like cellphone text messages. Perhaps the most brazen was written as a sexual invitation from a married woman to her secret lover. Beside the image of the cellphone screen, the words "why kill your family" were written in English. In smaller letters, in siSwati, the dominant language in Swaziland, was the slogan "makhwapheni uyabulala" -- your secret lover can kill you.

Another ad, also in siSwati, bore a similar cellphone message, but next to it were the words "watifaka elubishini," which mean "and more orphans were left behind."

But some Swazis, such as activist Gcebile Ndlovu, 44, who had spent years battling the stigma surrounding AIDS, said they felt insulted and undermined by the campaign.

Ndlovu, a mother of three who has a round face and graying hair that she wears in braids, had watched her husband shrivel up and die from AIDS eight years ago. The makhwapheni ads outraged her, she said. They blamed the victims. And, she said, they would increase the stigma that she and other activists carrying the virus had struggled to ease.

"Who wants to be called a makhwapheni?" Ndlovu said as she wiped tears from her eyes. "Is this campaign going to encourage people to test, so that they know their status? Or is it going to drive people underground?"

For activists, the campaign painfully recalled an earlier era of the epidemic, before the arrival of antiretroviral drugs here made AIDS a chronic but survivable disease for many. AIDS activists also objected to the moralizing tone of the makhwapheni ads. They preferred messages urging wider use of condoms.

"Don't tell me how many people to have sex with," Ndlovu said. "You can't dictate that to me. I go to bed with someone. That's my choice. Rather, tell me how to be safer."

In just a few days, Ndlovu and another AIDS activist organized one of the largest demonstrations in Swaziland's limited history of democratic protests. Hundreds of men and women, many wearing T-shirts with the words "I am HIV positive," delivered a petition to the office of the prime minister. Then they marched on von Wissell's office, singing "Away with makhwapheni!"

Von Wissell refused to meet the throng, but a few days later, he gave in to the complaints and suspended the campaign.

The word makhwapheni, however, was not so easily erased from the minds of Swazis. All over the country, it continued to dominate conversations. When cellphones buzzed with the arrival of text messages, some would joke, "Is that your makhwapheni?"

Radio host Bongani Dlamini, 50, who used one of Swaziland's most popular shows to defend polygamy and other Swazi traditions, attempted to eliminate the word on his show, out of deference to von Wissell's decision. But his callers would not follow such edicts. They kept calling, and they kept demanding that Swazis abandon their makhwaphenis.

"Those are the people who are doing the damage!" callers raged, Dlamini recalled.

It was about this same time, AIDS activists say, that children of women with HIV began asking their mothers, "Do you have a makhwapheni?" In other families, the frenzy stirred up by the campaign, activists said, prompted at least a few families to banish relatives who were open about having HIV.

"It was saying, women are prostitutes, women are the ones bringing HIV into the home as if it was us who were bringing HIV here," said Siphiwe Hlophe, 47, a friend of Ndlovu's who helped organize the protests.

But von Wissell was convinced that the message, even if it upset some, was working. And in the face of attack, he had decided not on surrender but on a tactical retreat. In meetings with Ndlovu and other activists, he vowed to resume the campaign, with an important concession. The word at the center of the controversy, makhwapheni, would be used no more.

DOJ_NMG_0088127

The new campaign, which includes television ads, began in late September, two months after the makhwapheni messages were suspended.

The changes are not nearly enough for Ndlovu, though she says that she has lost the will to continue the fight. "Even now," she said, her soft voice cracking with hurt, "the messages are the same. And because I'm quiet, Siphiwe is quiet, no one is saying anything about it."

Von Wissell was not entirely pleased with the outcome, either, fearing that the loss of his shocking slogan watered down the impact of the ads. Preliminary research on the makhwapheni campaign, conducted for the AIDS commission, showed tremendous reach throughout Swaziland.

Among Swazis surveyed, 86 percent had heard of the campaign, and despite the controversy, 91 percent agreed with its message warning against the dangers of multiple sexual partners, and 78 percent said it made them consider changing their own sexual behavior. The study was funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development.

It is far too soon to tell whether the makhwapheni campaign, or its toned-down successor, caused changes that will lower Swaziland's HIV rate.

The AIDS activists who opposed it remain doubtful.

"I wonder how many Swazis are now faithful to their partners?" Hlophe said with a skeptical smile. "It did not make any difference."

But one man it did affect was Ndlangamandla, the newspaper editor.

Years of watching Swazis die, including several friends, did not force him to accept that his fondness for girlfriends endangered him and his wife, and ran the risk of making their two children orphans. The makhwapheni campaign -- and especially the conversations it provoked -- did.

"I will be at the bar," Ndlangamandla said, "but you'll never find me with another woman. I'm scared."

Africa's World Of Forced Labor, In A 6-Year-Old's Eyes (NYT)

By Sharon Lafraniere

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

KETE KRACHI, Ghana — Just before 5 a.m., with the sky still dark over Lake Volta, Mark Kwadwo was rousted from his spot on the damp dirt floor. It was time for work.

Shivering in the predawn chill, he helped paddle a canoe a mile out from shore. For five more hours, as his coworkers yanked up a fishing net, inch by inch, Mark bailed water to keep the canoe from swamping.

He last ate the day before. His broken wooden paddle was so heavy he could barely lift it. But he raptly followed each command from Kwadwo Takyi, the powerfully built 31-year-old in the back of the canoe who freely deals out beatings.

"I don't like it here," he whispered, out of Mr. Takyi's earshot.

Mark Kwadwo is 6 years old. About 30 pounds, dressed in a pair of blue and red underpants and a Little Mermaid T-shirt, he looks more like an oversized toddler than a boat hand. He is too little to understand why he has wound up in this fishing village, a two-day trek from his home.

But the three older boys who work with him know why. Like Mark, they are indentured servants, leased by their parents to Mr. Takyi for as little as $20 a year.

Until their servitude ends in three or four years, they are as trapped as the fish in their nets, forced to work up to 14 hours a day, seven days a week, in a trade that even adult fishermen here call punishing and, at times, dangerous.

Mr. Takyi's boys — conscripts in a miniature labor camp, deprived of schooling, basic necessities and freedom — are part of a vast traffic in children that supports West and Central African fisheries, quarries, cocoa and rice plantations and street markets. The girls are domestic servants, bread bakers, prostitutes. The boys are field workers, cart pushers, scavengers in abandoned gem and gold mines.

By no means is the child trafficking trade uniquely African. Children are forced to race camels in the Middle East, weave carpets in India and fill brothels all over the developing world.

DOJ_NMG_0088128

The International Labor Organization, a United Nations agency, estimates that 1.2 million are sold into servitude every year in an illicit trade that generates as much as $10 billion annually.

Studies show they are most vulnerable in Asia, Latin America and Africa.

Africa's children, the world's poorest, account for roughly one-sixth of the trade, according to the labor organization. Data is notoriously scarce, but it suggests victimization of African children on a huge scale.

A 2002 study supervised by the labor organization estimated that nearly 12,000 trafficked children toiled in the cocoa fields of Ivory Coast alone. The children, who had no relatives in the area, cleared fields with machetes, applied pesticides and sliced open cocoa pods for beans.

In an analysis in February, Unicef says child trafficking is growing in West and Central Africa, driven by huge profits and partly controlled by organized networks that transport children both within and between countries.

"We know it is a huge problem in Africa," said Pamela Shifman, a child protection officer at the New York headquarters of Unicef. "A lot of it is visible. You see the kids being exploited. You watch it happen. Somebody brought the kids to the place where they are. Somebody exploited their vulnerability."

Otherwise, she asked, "How did they get there?"

John R. Miller, the director of the State Department Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the term trafficking failed to convey the brutality of what was occurring.

"A child does not consent," he said. "The loss of choice, the deception, the use of frauds, the keeping of someone at work with little or no pay, the threats if they leave — it is slavery."

Some West African families see it more as a survival strategy. In a region where nearly two-thirds of the population lives on less than $1 a day, the compensation for the temporary loss of a child keeps the rest of the family from going hungry. Some parents argue that their children are better off learning a trade than starving at home.

Indeed, the notion that children should be in the care of their parents is not a given in much of African society.

Parents frequently hand off children to even distant relatives if it appears they will have a chance at education and more opportunity.

Only in the past six years or so has it become clear how traffickers take advantage of this custom to buy and sell children, sometimes with no more ceremony than a goat deal.

In 2001, 35 children, half of them under age 15, were discovered aboard a vessel in a Benin port. They said they were being shipped to Gabon to work.

In 2003, Nigerian police rescued 194 malnourished children from stone quarries north of Lagos. At least 13 other children had died and been buried near the pits, the police said.

Last year, Nigerian police stumbled upon 64 girls aged 14 and younger, packed inside a refrigerated truck built to haul frozen fish. They had traveled hundreds of miles from central Nigeria, the police said, and were destined for work as housemaids in Lagos.

In response to such reports, African nations have passed a raft of legislation against trafficking, adopting or strengthening a dozen laws last year alone.

There were nearly 200 prosecutions of traffickers on the continent last year, four times as many as in 2003, according to the State Department's trafficking office.

Some countries are encouraging villages to form their own surveillance committees. In Burkina Faso, the government reported, such committees, together with the police, freed 644 children from traffickers in 2003. Still, government officials in the region say, only a tiny fraction of victims are detected.

Ghana, an Oregon-size nation of 21 million people, has yet to prosecute anyone under the new antitrafficking law it adopted last December. But the government has taken other steps — including eliminating school fees that forced youngsters out of classrooms, increasing birth registrations so that children have legal identities and extending small loans to about 1,200 mothers to give them alternatives to leasing out their children.

The International Organization for Migration, an intergovernmental agency set up after World War II to help refugees, has also mounted a United States-financed program to rescue children from the fishing industry.

DOJ_NMG_0088129

Since 2003, the organization says, 587 children have been freed from Ghana's Lake Volta region, taken to shelters for counseling and medical treatment, then reunited with parents or relatives.

"We sign a social contract with the fishermen," said Eric Peasah, the agency's Ghana field representative. "If they have 10 children, we say, 'Release four, and you can't get more, or you will be prosecuted.' Once they sign that, we come back and say we want to release more."

To reduce child trafficking significantly, said Marilyn Amponsah Annan, who is in charge of children's issues for the Ghanaian government, adults must be convinced that children have the right to be educated, to be protected, and to be spared adult burdens — in short, the right to a childhood.

"You see so many children with so many fishermen," she said. "Those little hands, those little bodies. It is always very sad, because this is the world of adults.

"We have to educate these communities because they do not know any other way of existence. They believe this is what they need to do to survive."

That is the fishermen's favorite defense in Kete Krachi, a day's drive through dense forests from Ghana's capital, Accra. For the area's roughly 9,000 residents, fishing is their lifeblood. Children keep it going.

Nearly every canoe here holds at least a few of them, some no older than 5 or 6, often supervised by a teenager. A dozen boys, interviewed in their canoes or as they sewed up ratty nets ashore, spoke of backbreaking toil, 100-hour workweeks and frequent beatings. They bore a pervasive fear of diving into the lake's murky waters to free a tangled net, and never resurfacing.

One 10-year-old said he was sometimes so exhausted that he fell asleep as he paddled. Asked when he rested, another boy paused from his net mending, seemingly confused. "This is what you see now," he said.

They never see the pittance they earn. The fishermen say they pay parents or relatives each December, typically on trips to the families' villages during the December holidays.

The children's sole comfort seems to be the shared nature of their misery, a camaraderie of lost boys who have not seen their families in years, have no say in their fate and, in some cases, were lured by false promises of schooling or a quick homecoming.

On Nkomi, a grassy island in the lake, Kwasi Tweranim, in his mid to late teens, and Kwadwo Seaako, perhaps 12 or 13, seemed united by fear and resentment of their boss. Both bear inchlong scars on their scalps where, they said, he struck them with a wooden paddle.

"I went down to disentangle the net, and when I came up, my master said that I had left part of it down there," Kwasi said. "Then I saw black, and woke up in another boat. Only the grace of God saved me."

Kwadwo, stammering badly, said he had been punished when the net rolled in the water.

Not every fisherman is so pitiless. Christian Lissah employs eight children under 13, mostly distant relatives. He said he knew many children who were treated no better than workhorses, and some who had drowned.

"In general, this is not a good practice because people mishandle the children," he said. Yet he said he could not imagine how he would fish profitably without child workers, and depends on friends and acquaintances to keep him supplied — for a commission.

"You must get people who are a very low background who need money," he said. "Some of them are eager to release their children."

Mark Kwadwo's parents, Joe Obrenu and his wife, Ama, were an easy sell. Mr. Obrenu fished the seas off Aboadzi, a hilly, sun-drenched town on the Gulf of Guinea, and his wife dried the catch for sale. But the two often ran short of food, said Mark's aunt, Adwoa Awotwe. Over the years, they sold five of their children into labor, she said, including Mark's 9-year-old sister Hagar, who performs domestic chores for Mr. Takyi.

Mr. Obrenu drummed up other recruits from neighbors, sometimes to their lasting regret. "It was hunger, to get a little money; the whole today, I have not eaten," said Efua Mansah, whose 7-year-old son, Kwabena, boarded a small blue bus with Mr. Takyi four years ago for the 250-mile trip to Kete Krachi.

She has seen him only twice since then. In all that time, Mr. Takyi has paid her $66, she said, a third of which she spent on buses and ferries to pick up the money.

DOJ_NMG_0088130

In her one-room hut decorated with empty plastic bottles, she forced back tears. "I want to bring my son home," she said.

Mark also cried when his turn to leave came this year, his aunt said, so his mother told him that Mr. Takyi would take him to his father. Instead, he was brought to Mr. Takyi's compound of caked mud huts, to a dark six-foot-square cubicle with a single tiny window. He shares it with five other children, buzzing flies and a few buckets of fish bait.

In two days, a smile never creased Mark's delicate features. He seldom offered more than a nod or a shake of the head, with a few telling exceptions: "I was beaten in the house. I can't remember what I did, but he caned me," he said of Mr. Takyi.

Mr. Takyi, who sleeps and works in the same gray T-shirt, is disarmingly frank about his household. He can afford to feed the children only twice a day, he said, and cannot clothe them adequately. He himself has been paddling the lake since age 8.

"I can understand how the children feel," he said. "Because I didn't go to school, this is work I must do. I also find it difficult."

Yet he does not hesitate to break a branch from the nearest tree to wake the boys for the midnight shift.

"Almost all the boys are very troublesome," he complained. "I want them to be humble children, but they don't obey my orders."

One recent morning, his young crew, wrapped in thin bedsheets for warmth, hiked in the darkness down to the shore.

They paddled out in two leaky but stable canoes, searching the water for a piece of foam that marked where their net was snagged on submerged tree stumps. Kwabena, 11, stripped off his cutoff shorts and dived in with an 18-year-old to free it, yanking it at one point with his teeth.

Mark has not mastered the rhythm of paddling. Mr. Takyi said the boy cries when the water is rough or he is cold. He cannot swim a stroke. If the canoe capsizes, Mr. Takyi said, he will save him.

"I can't pay what is asked for older boys," Mr. Takyi said, as Mark bailed out the canoe with the sawed-off bottom of a plastic cooking oil container. "That is why I go for this. When I get money, I go to get another one."

In the other canoe, Kwame Akuban and Kofi Quarshie plucked fish from the net with the air of prisoners waiting for their terms to end.

Kofi, 10, said his mother had told him his earnings would feed their family. But he suspects another motive. "They didn't like me," he said softly.

Kwame, 12, said his parents had promised to retrieve him in a year's time and send him to school.

"I have been here three years and I am not going home, and I am not happy," he said quietly.

As if on cue, Mr. Takyi shouted: "Remove the fish faster, or I will cane you."

Running away is a common fantasy among the boys. Kofi Nyankom, who came from Mark's hometown three years ago, at age 9, was one of the few to actually try it.

Last December, he ran to town half-naked, his back a mass of bruises. He said Mr. Takyi had tied up him and whipped him.

George Achibra, a school district official, demanded that the police intervene, and Mr. Takyi was forced to let Kofi go.

But before many weeks passed, he had brought in a replacement — younger, more helpless, more submissive. It was Mark Kwadwo.

A Travesty In Libya (WP)

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

A new cure for AIDS: Shoot foreigners.

IN AN attempt to shed his rogue status, Libyan leader Moammar Gaddafi has foresworn weapons of mass destruction and agreed to compensate the families of those who died in the 1988 Lockerbie bombing. But on Tuesday a trial reopens that could again tarnish Libya's image. Five Bulgarian nurses and a Palestinian doctor are accused of intentionally injecting the AIDS virus into more than 400 Libyan children. The accusations are an attempt to deflect Libyans' attention from the shocking state of their own medical system. The evidence against the six foreigners is flimsy, but they could face a firing squad.

The infections occurred at a children's hospital eight years ago in Benghazi, a city in Libya's northeast. When the outbreak was discovered, a local magazine suggested that the infections reflected poor standards of hospital hygiene: Children were often treated with unscreened blood products, and equipment was not always cleaned before reuse. But Libyan authorities seized the foreign health workers at the hospital and tortured them until they confessed to malpractice. The foreigners were convicted and sentenced to be executed. But Libya's Supreme Court ordered a retrial following foreign protests.

DOJ_NMG_0088131

The prosecution's case in the new trial is built on a report by five Libyan physicians. The British science journal, Nature, obtained this report and showed it to Western medical experts, who determined that it contained no real evidence. Meanwhile, the Libyan court has refused to admit as evidence an investigation done by two prominent European AIDS experts. The Europeans concluded that the infections had begun before the foreign health workers had even arrived in Benghazi. They also noted that many of the children were infected with hepatitis B and C, evidence consistent with the theory that the HIV was spread by poor hospital hygiene.

The European Commission and the United States have called for the release of the health workers. If Libya nonetheless goes ahead with this travesty of justice, it will be saying that it prefers to scapegoat foreigners rather than admit to the weakness of its own medical system. The first victims will be the health workers. But they will be followed by the Libyans themselves, who need a government with the honesty to confront the true causes of HIV infections.

If Not Now, When? (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

Perhaps the most extraordinary aspect of Darfur isn't that gunmen on the Sudanese payroll heave babies into bonfires as they shout epithets against blacks. It's that the rest of us are responding only with averted eyes and polite tut-tutting.

This past week alone, Sudan expelled the U.N. envoy for Sudan and sent a proxy army to invade eastern Chad. Those moves underscored both the audacity of Sudan's leaders and the fecklessness of the rest of the world's.

In fact, there's plenty we can do. The international community has focused on getting U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur, but Sudan refuses to admit them. The stalemate drags on; the slaughter continues — but here's what we can do:

• Kofi Annan should appoint a new U.N. envoy of utmost prominence. Possibilities include Bill Clinton, Jimmy Carter, Richard Holbrooke and Bernard Kouchner (a founder of Doctors Without Borders). The envoy's job would be to lead an intensive negotiation aimed at achieving a political settlement.

The focus has been on getting U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur, and they are needed, but in the long run only a peace accord can calm Darfur. "This is distracting from the main need," Mudawi Ibrahim Adam, a Sudanese human rights campaigner, said of the focus on peacekeepers. In May a peace agreement was stillborn after only one Darfur rebel faction signed it, but the pact can be renegotiated, for the differences are small and bridgeable.

• President Bush and European leaders need to use their leverage on four nations in particular to make them part of the solution: China, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Libya. China is playing a disgraceful role underwriting the Darfur genocide, by giving Sudan the guns used to shoot children and by protecting Sudan in the U.N. Security Council. And the three Arab states need to be involved so that Sudan cannot claim that plans to protect Darfuris are American or Jewish plots to dismember the country.

"It is very clear there is a plan to redraw the region," the Sudanese president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, said last month, explaining the calls for U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur. "Any state in the region should be weakened, dismembered in order to protect the Israelis."

Sudanese journalists say that Mr. Bashir has cleverly used such arguments to portray himself as a nationalist, and as a result is in a stronger position now than when he started killing babies in Darfur. Arab leaders need to show that they care about Muslim children being shot even when Israel is not responsible.

• To get more coverage on Al Jazeera and other Arab networks, Mr. Annan could take a planeload of Arab journalists on a visit to Darfur refugee camps. Condi Rice could do the same. The U.S. could put video footage (I'd supply some) of Darfur atrocities on its Arabic-language satellite television station, Al Hurra.

• The U.S., France and U.N. should immediately send peacekeepers to Chad and the Central African Republic to prop up those countries (the U.S. can supply airlift, intelligence and communications support, but our ground troops would create a backlash). Sudan has sent proxy forces to invade both, and they are teetering.

DOJ_NMG_0088132

• We need contingency plans for forcible military intervention. There is talk that in the coming months Sudan's janjaweed militias may start systematically massacring some of the two million people who have taken shelter in camps in Darfur. If that were to happen, U.N. and NATO forces would have to go in and rescue those people — and if Sudan knew of such contingency plans, that would make massacres less likely.

• The U.S. and French air forces should jointly impose a no-fly zone from the French air base in Abéché, Chad, as the Chadian president has invited us to do.

• Western countries should apply targeted sanctions that freeze international assets of Sudanese leaders whom the U.N. has already listed as involved in the genocide.

• Mr. Bush must use his bully pulpit. He could invite Arab and African leaders to the White House for a summit on Darfur. He could suggest to the Chinese president, Hu Jintao, that they jointly visit the area.

After fewer than 10,000 white people had died in Kosovo, the U.S. intervened to prevent a genocide. So far, several hundred thousand black people have been slaughtered in Darfur, and our president hasn't even dedicated a speech to it.

If we don't try bold new approaches now, when? After 750,000 have died and Chad has collapsed? After all north central Africa is in chaos and 1.5 million are dead? When?

DOJ_NMG_0088133

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, OCTOBER 29, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
New Southcom Leader Approves Of Conditions At Guantanamo Bay (SCCD/MCT) ... 3

Homeland Response:
How To Spot A Terrorist On The Fly (WP) ... 4

War News:
Seeking To Ease Rift, Bush Confers With Iraq Premier (NYT) ... 5
Bush, Iraqi Premier Act To Close Rift After Week Of Tension (WP) ... 6
Iraqi Premier Makes His Case To Bush (LAT) ... 7
Bush Reaffirms Support For Iraq's Prime Minister (AP) ... 9
Iraqi Prime Minister: 'I'm Not America's Man' (CNN) ... 10
Timetables? Depends On Who's Talking (WP) ... 11
Aide: Iraqi Leader Using U.S. Angst (AP-Y) ... 11
Iraqi Leader Critical Of U.S. Envoy (WT) ... 13
Tipping Point For War's Supporters? (WP) ... 14
Iraq And Americans: One Land, Two Worlds (NYT) ... 16
In Iraqi Villages, Troops See Strides And A Big Challenge (WP) 17
Iraqis See The Little Things Fade Away In War's Gloom (NYT) . 19
This Is Baghdad. What Could Be Worse? (WP) ... 20
Iraq: Army Has Al-Zarqawi's Cameraman (AP) ... 23
The Bomb Squad (WP) ... 23
. . . But A U.S. Policy Czar Might Help (WP) ... 29
Partition Is Not The Solution . . . (WP) ... 30
Dying To Save The G.O.P. Congress (NYT) ... 30
NATO, Afghan Troops Battle Insurgents (AP) ... 32
NATO: 70 Suspected Insurgents Killed (NSDY/AP) ... 33
Nato Kills 55 Afghan "Militants" (BBC) ... 34
General: 'Mistakes' Made In Afghanistan Strike (CNN) ... 34
NATO Says 55 Suspected Insurgents Killed (AP) ... 35
Taking The Fight To The Taliban (NYT) ... 36
With Army Stretched Thin, Could The U.S. Respond To A New Crisis? (HC) ... 41
'Antiwar' And Other Fighting Words (NYT) ... 43
Are We The Mongols Of The Information Age? (LAT) ... 44

Corporate Scandals:
Businesses Seek Protection On Legal Front (NYT) ... 46

Criminal Law:
Ehrlich Bristles At Probe Questions (BSUN) ... 48
Katrina Crime: Perceived Or Real? (SAEN) ... 49
Vicious MS-13 Gang Seen As Growing Threat (DMN) ... 54
Lawyer's Query To U.S. Attorney Prompts A New Salvo From Kean (NSL) ... 57

Civil Rights:
EVERYONE'S IN FDNY'S HIRING POOL (NYPOST) ... 58
A Minority Report The FDNY Likes (NYDN) ... 58
Lowell Blitzes Immigrant Areas With Ballot Help (BOS) ... 58
U.S. Investigates Voting Machines' Venezuela Ties (NYT) ... 60
Who Needs To 'Help' America Vote? (WP) ... 62
Bishops Draft Rules On Ministering To Gays (NYT) ... 63
Gay Couples' Adopted Kids May Be Baptized, Catholic Draft Says (WP) ... 64
Gay Marriage Through A Black-White Prism (NYT) ... 64

Antitrust:
In A Blurry World, Ownership Is Yesterday's News (NYT) ... 65

Environment:
Climate Research Center's Oversight Up For Bidding (LAT) ... 67
Arsonist Sought As Calmer Winds Aid Firefighters (NYT/AP) ... 67

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
New Rules Cut Number Of Meth Labs (FWST) ... 68
Federal Marshals, Police Step-up Effort To Nab Sex Offenders (PPG) ... 70

Immigration:
Critics Attack Proposed Rules For Citizenship (LAT) ... 70

Tax:
Future Tax Shock (NYT) ... 72

Congress-Administration:
What He's Trying To Say (NYT) ... 73
GAO Chief Warns Economic Disaster Looms (AP) ... 78
Elections May Bring New Accord In Senate (WP) ... 80
Project Chugs Along With Senator's Help (LAT) ... 82
Ethics Rules Send NIH Scientists Packing (AP) ... 83
NASA Deciding Whether To Close A Window Into Space (WP). 84

Other News:
It's Not The Economy, Stupid (WP) ... 86
Where We Went Wrong (WP) ... 87
Return Of The Yellow Dog (WP) ... 89
What Democrats Would Do (WP) ... 90

Running Against The Boogeyman (LAT) ... 91
Racism Enters The Races (LAT) ... 92
On Campaign Stop, Bush Rallies Loyalists (WP) ... 92
Bush Rallies Base To 'Just Say No' (WT) ... 94
A Warm Welcome For Bush The Campaigner, In Indiana (NYT) 95
In Campaign Mode, Bush Takes On Dems (AP) ... 96
Bush Picks His Battles In Friendly Country (LAT) ... 97
Partisan Rhetoric Even In Wartime Sets Bush Apart (LAT) ... 98
Iraq War's Unpopularity Sours Many Voters On The Republicans' Swagger (BOS) ... 99
Democrats Push To Counter G.O.P. In Turnout Race (NYT) ... 100
As Elections Near, Dueling With Dollars (WP) ... 103
Can Bush Cross The Aisle? (WP) ... 104
Poll Puts Maryland Democrats In The Lead (WP) ... 105
Steele Hits Cardin For Paying Lip Service To Black Voters (WT) 108
O'Malley Assails Ehrlich On Race (WP) ... 108
For Zeese, Third-Party Campaign Is Not A Matter Of Odds (WP) 109
Webb Defends Novels Against Attacks (WP) ... 111
Webb Defends Sexual Explicitness Of His Novels (WT) ... 112
The Senate Race In Connecticut (NYT) ... 113
A Senate Race Riding On Cash Flow (NYT) ... 114
Bloomberg Raises Cash For Lieberman (AP) ... 115
Waterfront Project Reflects 2 Images Of A Senator (NYT) ... 115
Caution Prevails In Last TV Debate (MCA) ... 119
Political Theater And The Real Rick Santorum (NYT) ... 120
GOP Hopes Fade For Taking District Bush Calls Home (WT) ... 121
Democrats Aim To Regain Majority Of Governors (WT) ... 121
Novice Stands Her Ground On Veterans' Turf In Alaska (NYT) 122
New Governor's Name Is ... Crist. Or Davis. The Race Remains Too Close To Call. (STPETE) ... 123
Politician Disputes Waitress' Claim (LAT) ... 125
Winning Women? (NYT) ... 125
Candidates, Parties Target Web Audience (AP) ... 126
Mental Health Reform, Please (WP) ... 126
Islam, Terror And The Second Nuclear Age (NYT) ... 127
Iran Sounds An Awful Lot Like Iraq (LAT) ... 135
Russia Led Arms Sales To Developing World In '05 (NYT) ... 137
Report: U.S. Mulls Defenses For Tokyo (AP) ... 138
U.S. May Deploy Patriot Missiles (LAT) ... 138
U.S. Jobs Shape Condoms' Role In Foreign Aid (NYT) ... 138
Fueling U.S. Adversaries (WT) ... 141
Chirac's Last Act: Lion In Winter, Wolves All Around (NYT) ... 143
Youths Set Fire To Bus In Marseille, Seriously Burning Woman (AP) ... 145
Reforms Roiling Eastern Europe (WT/AP) ... 145
Abbas Eyes PLO Troops In Jordan (WT/AP) ... 146
Police Ordered To Oaxaca After 3 Killings In Strike (WP) ... 147
3 Killed In Mexican Protest; Police Move In (NYT) ... 147
Mexican President Sends Police To Oaxaca (AP) ... 148
Mexican Forces Converge On Oaxaca City (LAT) ... 150
Castro Appears On TV, Scoffs At Rumors Of His Death (AP) ... 151
Cuba TV Shows Pictures Of Castro (BBC) ... 152
Former Contra Fighters Divided Over Ortega (LAT) ... 152
Nicaragua Bans Abortion (NYT) ... 153
Bolivia Agrees New Energy Deals (BBC) ... 153
Boomtown In Venezuela Confronts Mining Ban (NYT) ... 154
President Holds A Big Lead As Brazil Prepares To Vote (NYT) 155
Cash Aid Program Bolsters Lula's Reelection Prospects (WP) ... 156
Brazil's President Revives Rhetoric (AP) ... 157
DR Congo Votes For New President (BBC) ... 158
Final Stage Of Election In Congo Holds Hopes Of Many For Peace (WP) ... 159
Fears Usurp Optimism In Congo Vote (LAT) ... 160
Sudan Denies Report That It Bombed Towns In Chad (AP) ... 162
In Swaziland, 'Secret Lovers' Confronted In Fight Against AIDS (WP) ... 162
Africa's World Of Forced Labor, In A 6-Year-Old's Eyes (NYT) 164
A Travesty In Libya (WP) ... 167
If Not Now, When? (NYT) ... 168

DOJ_NMG_0088135

TERRORISM NEWS:

New Southcom Leader Approves Of Conditions At Guantanamo Bay (SCCD/MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

The State College Centre Daily/McClatchy, October 29, 2006

MIAMI - Just days into the job, the Pentagon's new Southern Command chief made an overnight weekend visit to the U.S. Navy base at Guantanamo Bay - and declared captive conditions compatible with the Geneva Conventions.

Navy Adm. James Stavridis said Saturday he met with about 300 U.S. military personnel and saw about 50 of the 435 captives held at the base, including the so-called high-value terrorist suspects who had recently been moved there from secret CIA custody.

"I went and saw their facility," the admiral told The Miami Herald in a telephone interview after a 24-hour visit to the remote Navy base in southeast Cuba.

He declined to give specifics on where the latest arrivals are being kept, and under what circumstances. But he declared them "in appropriate conditions commensurate with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. I laid eyes on it; they're in good shape in that regard."

After being stung by a U.S. Supreme Court decision earlier this year, the Bush administration reversed course and declared that - although enemy combatants, not prisoners of war - the alleged al-Qaida and Taliban captives were entitled to the protections.

They were just this month granted their first visits with the International Committee of the Red Cross, after up to four years in secret U.S. captivity and so-called CIA "black sites."

In the course of the site inspection, the admiral said, he saw detainees in a range of locations - being interrogated, playing soccer and exercising individually - and found them "a hearty bunch."

Interrogations, he said, struck him as "amicable conversations between two people."

Referring to the 14 high-value detainees in particular, he said they were in "very good shape."

President Bush ordered the men sent to the detention camps for possible trial around Labor Day, including suspected Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed - who published reports allege was subjected to a rough interrogation technique called water-boarding, and at one point purportedly confessed to wielding the knife that beheaded Wall Street Journal correspondent Daniel Pearl, in January 2002 in Pakistan.

In parallel, the first Navy admiral to oversee military operations in Latin America and the Caribbean also met with about 300 sailors and soldiers at the base - from senior commanders to camp guards - and declared himself impressed with their professionalism in what he called "a stressful environment down there."

U.S. forces at Guantanamo, he said, are "interacting daily with very, very dangerous terrorists" in typical one-year tours that he described as "hardship duty" that separates them from their families.

His Miami-based staff, he said, would propose improvements in housing and other activities for them.

As he took the job Oct. 19, Stavridis said he'd visit the controversial camps first, and then follow up later with trips to Colombia and Central America, where U.S. forces work with those host countries. Cuba has virtually no engagement with the U.S. military under four-decade-old U.S. policy.

During his visit, Stavridis said he met senior detention camp staff, "looked every one of them in the eye and said we're going to run this camp in a transparent and legal fashion."

Separately, he said, he also toured the portion of the base where the U.S. military might house migrants found at sea during a rafter crisis similar to the huge numbers of Haitians and Cubans who were interdicted by the U.S. in the mid-1990s.

He declared the base suitable for "very barebones" humanitarian relief and would develop contingency plans - although he said he didn't foresee any crisis on the horizon.

During the `90s, the U.S. Navy base threw up tent camps around the 45-square-mile base to house a migrant population that swelled at one point to about 40,000.

DOJ_NMG_0088136

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

How To Spot A Terrorist On The Fly (WP)

By Paul Ekman

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

The man in the cheap brown jacket stood slumped in line, staring at the ground. His hands were fidgety, reaching repeatedly into his inside jacket pocket, or patting it from the outside. A momentary look of anguish, just 1/15th of a second or so, occasionally flashed across his face -- the inner corners of his eyebrows would go up, so that his brows sloped down from the center of his forehead, his cheeks would rise, and the corners of his lips would pull down slightly. He was exhibiting what I call a micro-expression, a sign of an emotion being concealed.

The question was: What was he concealing? And why?

To the behavior-detection officers I was with at Boston's Logan International Airport, his combination of mannerisms -- the micro-expression, the slumped posture, the pocket-patting -- was unusual enough to raise a red flag. They called a uniformed state police officer, who asked the man the purpose of his travel. It turned out that he was on the way to the funeral of his brother, who had died unexpectedly. That was the reason for the bowed head. The frequent chest-patting was to reassure himself that he had his boarding pass. The micro-expression was an attempt to conceal his grief.

The man was not a terrorist, nor a malefactor of any kind, but just an innocent traveler carrying some extra emotional baggage that day. So why single him out for questioning because of a fleeting expression and a sad-sack posture?

Critics of the controversial new security program I was taking stock of -- known as SPOT, for Screening Passengers by Observational Techniques -- have said that it is an unnecessary invasion of privacy, based on an untested method of observation, that is unlikely to yield much in the way of red-handed terrorists set on blowing up a plane or flying it into a building, but would violate fliers' civil rights.

I disagree. I've participated in four decades' worth of research into deception and demeanor, and I know that researchers have amassed enough knowledge about how someone who is lying looks and behaves that it would be negligent not to use it in the search for terrorists. Along with luggage checks, radar screening, bomb-sniffing dogs and the rest of our security arsenal, observational techniques can help reduce risks -- and potentially prevent another deadly assault like the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

A lot has been said about the 9/11 hijackers' unusual behavior in the days before they boarded their ill-fated flights. Several of them were repeatedly questioned, but no one recognized their lies. An airport screener later said he had been suspicious of one because of his strange demeanor on the day of the attacks. But the screener had no training that would have given him the confidence to act on his suspicions.

The hijackers' lies -- to visa interviewers and airport check-in workers -- succeeded largely because airport personnel weren't taught how to spot liars. They had to rely on their hunches. The people who might have saved the lives of many Americans were needlessly handicapped.

Imagine if that screener had been taught to discern the signs of deception in a person's facial expressions, voice, body language and gestures. With such training, he could have been confident enough to report the hijacker's behavior. SPOT, which the Transportation Security Administration introduced this year at 14 U.S. airports, including Washington's Dulles International, is the first attempt at using observational techniques as part of our security approach, and it is promising. Preliminary findings show that the overwhelming number of those who are taken out of line and detained for further investigation were intending to commit or had committed some kind of wrongdoing: They were wanted criminals, drug smugglers, money smugglers, illegal immigrants -- and, yes, a few were suspected terrorists.

SPOT's officers, working in pairs, stand off to the side, scanning passengers at a security checkpoint for signs of any behaviors on the officers' checklist, such as repeated patting of the chest -- which might mean that a bomb is strapped too tightly under a person's jacket -- or a micro-expression.

The items on the SPOT checklist are culled from law enforcement experience and research on deception and demeanor. What about your face, voice and body betrays the fact that you're lying? I've been studying this question for nearly 40 years, ever since I began researching it in the 1970s with Maureen O'Sullivan of the University of San Francisco and, several years later, with Mark Frank of the State University of New York at Buffalo.

In our studies, we recorded interviews set up in such a way that we knew when a person was lying. Afterward, we replayed the videotapes over and over in slow motion to identify the expressions and behaviors that distinguish lying from truth-telling. We spent hours identifying the precise moment-to-moment movements of the facial muscles based on my Facial Action Coding System (FACS) -- a catalogue of every conceivable facial expression that I created and published in 1978 -- to get comprehensive evidence of the kinds of facial looks that accompany spoken lies. Once such expressions are identified, people can be quickly trained to recognize them as they occur.

DOJ_NMG_0088137

We also looked at the behavioral signs that accompany the act of thinking up an answer on the spot (e.g., an increase in pauses) and signs of emotion in the face, voice or gesture that contradict the words being spoken ("The answer is definitely no" accompanied by just a slight nod of the head).

The facial expressions we identified allowed us to correctly determine who was lying 70 percent of the time; when the rest of demeanor is added, it pushes accuracy close to 100 percent.

Tools like this are indispensable to the future of airport security, and more are coming. Within the next year or two, maybe sooner, it will be possible to program surveillance cameras hooked to computers that spit out FACS data to identify anyone whose facial expressions are different from the previous two dozen people in line.

Someday, remote surveillance devices may identify anyone whose blood pressure and heart rate are much higher than those of the previous two dozen people. While this will provide an important new way of knowing that something is amiss, it does open a Pandora's box. Legislation to protect privacy and prevent misuse of such a technique should be enacted now.

Meanwhile, short-term research on several questions -- whether SPOT misses people whose behaviors are on its checklist; whether other behaviors should be included on the list; and whether additional training would increase observers' accuracy -- could help improve the program.

Civil libertarians have raised the expected concerns about using observational techniques at airports: that SPOT spots more than just terrorists; that minorities, who fear discrimination and might act more nervous than others, may be unfairly singled out; that most of the people identified are innocent.

But the day I spent at Logan confirmed for me that SPOT violates no one's civil rights. Few people were identified. Nearly always, the answers to initial questions made further investigation unnecessary. No record was made, and the passenger lost no time.

Observational techniques are not a substitute for all the other techniques we now use to catch would-be terrorists. But they add another layer to transportation security. They are now being used at fewer than one in 10 major U.S. airports. We need to use them everywhere.

paul@paulekman.com
Paul Ekman, professor emeritus of psychology at the University of California at San Francisco, is a pro bono adviser to the Transportation Security Adminstration's SPOT program.

WAR NEWS:

Seeking To Ease Rift, Bush Confers With Iraq Premier (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise
The New York Times, October 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 28 — President Bush stepped into an increasingly fractious relationship with the Iraqi government in a videoconference with Baghdad on Saturday after days of angry comments by Iraqi leaders about what they see as American meddling.

The 50-minute conference between Mr. Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki took place after an acrimonious conversation late Friday between Mr. Maliki and the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad. According to an aide to Mr. Maliki, the Iraqi leader said that he was “a friend of the United States, but not America’s man in Iraq.”

The sharp remarks appear to be part of a growing schism between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and its American supporters, a division building for months that burst into full public view this week. Mr. Maliki spoke out angrily on Wednesday against the idea of American deadlines for action on stabilizing Iraq. Mr. Khalilzad publicly detailed the benchmarks the day before.

Iraqi leaders say that the United States, in particular Mr. Khalilzad, has been too meddlesome in internal affairs.

In the videoconference, Mr. Maliki, sitting beside Mr. Khalilzad in the Green Zone, opened with praise for Mr. Bush, according to Tony Snow, the White House press secretary. “History will record that because of your efforts Iraq is a free country,” Mr. Maliki said, echoing a statement he made on his trip to Washington three months ago, according to Mr. Snow, who sat in on the session.

DOJ_NMG_0088138

Mr. Snow said that Mr. Maliki made "no demands, and it was a very cordial discussion." But the prime minister, he said, made clear that he wanted to move quickly toward "an Iraqi assumption of command and control" over forces operating in Baghdad and elsewhere.

A Maliki spokesman, Ali Dabbagh, said the prime minister had said the Iraqi government wanted more control over its army, which operates under Americans.

The meeting, the second in 12 days for Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki, was clearly part of a White House effort to diffuse tensions between the two governments.

The push for more Iraqi control comes just as American military commanders are saying the Iraqi Army needs more time to improve. America's top military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., said this week that it would be another 12 to 18 months before Iraqi troops would be ready to take over.

A central irritant for the Shiite leaders is what they say is an American preoccupation with Shiite militias — often linked to political parties — that have been responsible for much of the bloodshed here in the past year. Shiites fault American officials, particularly Mr. Khalilzad, for treating militias as enemies on a par with the Sunni insurgency.

"The forces need to know one clear fact," said one prominent Shiite politician. "Who is the real enemy here? It is the Saddamists and the takfiris." Takfiris are Sunni extremists.

That preoccupation has distracted American military policy, Shiite leaders say, and led to gaps in protection of Shiite areas vulnerable to attacks by Sunni militants, a position that American military commanders strongly dispute. Leaders argue that the Iraqis should be allowed to protect these areas themselves, an assertion that raises a distant but real American fear — that the government could use the largely Shiite army selectively, or that it could even become one side of a civil war.

Mr. Maliki leads a government that is a fragile coalition between Sunnis, Kurds and other groups, but with the arguments made in recent days, appears to be placing himself firmly inside the Shiite camp, lending an increasingly sectarian tinge to the Iraqi political landscape.

One major lever the Iraqis have is the United Nations agreement that extends legal authority for foreign troops to be here. Senior officials are trying to amend the agreement, which expires on Dec. 31, in order to give the government more control over parts of the army sooner, a process American officials are watching worriedly.

In Washington, the administration has sought to smooth relations, particularly as midterm elections near.

Part of the Shiites' anger seems to center on Mr. Khalilzad. A Sunni Muslim born in Afghanistan, Mr. Khalilzad has been most closely associated with his intense efforts to bring minority Sunni Arabs into Iraqi politics. Shiite leaders say he has worked so hard to involve Sunnis that he has abandoned the Shiites.

The meeting on Saturday, whose participants included Stephen J. Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, was also notable for what was not discussed. Mr. Bush did not raise the White House frustrations with the comparatively small number of Iraqi troops dedicated to the latest effort to secure Baghdad. Nor was there discussion, Mr. Snow said, of seeking to further incorporate the militia of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr into the army.

In recent days, other officials have stressed that Mr. Bush is doing all he can to bolster Mr. Maliki, whose early months as prime minister were widely described in Washington as a disappointment. But several officials have noted recently that Mr. Bush has promised to support Mr. Maliki only as long as he makes what Mr. Bush calls "hard decisions."

"No one has said what happens if he stops making those decisions," one senior official said early this week. "I don't think anyone knows."

Mr. Maliki took issue even with aspects of the enterprise that Americans have gone to great lengths to make work.

The White House, in a statement, said the leaders had agreed on the goals of accelerating the pace of training the Iraqi Security Force, Iraqi assumption of command and control over its forces, and transferring responsibility for security to the government of Iraq. A working group was set up to achieve them.

The military on Saturday announced the death of another American soldier from "enemy action" on Friday in Anbar Province in western Iraq. It has also said a soldier was killed in Diyala Province on Thursday. The deaths bring the toll for American troops this month to 98, the highest for one month in more than a year.

Also on Saturday, 11 Iraqi soldiers were kidnapped at a fake checkpoint in the heavily Sunni village of Adhaim, north of Baghdad. South of Baghdad in the town of Iskandariya, five Iraqis were killed and 11 wounded in a car bombing.

David E. Sanger and Jim Rutenberg contributed reporting from Washington, and Abdul Razzaq al-Saiedi from Baghdad.

Bush, Iraqi Premier Act To Close Rift After Week Of Tension (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088139

BAGHDAD, Oct. 28 -- President Bush coaxed Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki back into a common front with the U.S. administration Saturday, soothing the Iraqi leader in a 50-minute video link-up after a week of missteps and sharp words exposed tensions between the two allies.

Both leaders declared themselves "committed to the partnership" and prepared to work "in every way possible for a stable, democratic Iraq and for victory in the war on terror," the White House said in a statement after the Baghdad-Washington teleconference.

Bush and Maliki also agreed to create a top-level committee to come up with recommendations for speeding up the training of Iraq's security forces, moving ahead on efforts to put Iraq in control of those forces, and making the Iraqi government responsible for the country's security. Maliki's spokesman, Ali Dabbagh, said the recommendations would include timelines.

The proposed commission, which is to include Iraqi government ministers, U.S. Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, will be at least the second high-level U.S.-Iraqi commission established here since the summer of 2005 to try to speed up Iraq's takeover of security and the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

Since formation of the first panel, sectarian warfare between Sunnis and Shiites has exploded, taking Iraqi civilian casualties this summer to the highest level of the war and helping to push American combat deaths this month to their third-highest figure since U.S. troops entered Iraq in March 2003.

For the Bush administration, Saturday's accord gave hope of closing an embarrassing rift that broke open just as Bush was trying to show that his much-criticized Iraq policy was adapting to the increasing violence. Congressional elections, just 10 days away, are focused heavily on the unpopular 3 1/2 -year-old war.

Maliki had sought Saturday's talk, aides said, because he was unhappy over what he took as Washington's dictating of terms to his government. The Iraqi leader was intent on showing that Khalilzad "was no L. Paul Bremer," the Associated Press quoted one Maliki aide as saying, referring to the American appointed to run Iraq shortly after the U.S. invasion.

The falling-out between the two administrations had its roots in growing U.S. frustration -- expressed privately by American officials -- over what is seen as the slowness of Maliki's roughly five-month-old government to quell both a Sunni Arab insurgency and the even bloodier Shiite-Sunni sectarian struggle.

Feathers were ruffled Tuesday, when Khalilzad held a news conference with Casey to announce what he said were new commitments from Iraq's government on timelines and reforms meant to speed the day when U.S. troops could leave.

Maliki angrily denied any such commitment in a news conference the next day, and he followed up with interviews stressing that he and his government were independent of the United States.

Point made, White House spokesman Tony Snow said after Saturday's videoconference. "He's not America's man in Iraq," Snow told reporters. "The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister -- he's the leader of the Iraqi people. He is, in fact, the sovereign leader of Iraq."

Snow said that Bush assured Maliki of continuing U.S. support despite midterm election criticism of the war. "Both leaders understand the political pressures going on. But the president told him: Don't worry about politics in the United States because we are with you, and we are going to be with you," Snow said.

Maliki's spokesman called the statement of U.S. support gratifying.

"The agreement shows there is a strategic alliance between the two countries for fighting terrorist groups and full support between President Bush and his administration to the government of Maliki," Dabbagh said. "It's a clear message to all in Iraq and the world that the administration supports the Maliki cabinet."

The U.S. military on Saturday reported the combat death of a U.S. Marine in Anbar province, raising to 98 the number of U.S. personnel killed in October.

In other violence around Iraq, one person was killed and 35 wounded in Baghdad when a rocket slammed into an outdoor market in the southern neighborhood of Dora.

Police also found 10 bodies of victims of apparent sectarian violence -- seven around Baghdad and three in Baqubah, 35 miles northeast of the capital.

In Kirkuk, 10 armed men stormed the house of a female rights activist, Halima Ahmad Hussein al-Jubouri, and killed her in front of her children, police Capt. Emad Khidir said.

At least 12 other people were reported killed in shootings and bomb attacks nationwide. The number of killings that reach public notice each day is a fraction of that logged by Iraq's morgues and hospitals.

Other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Iraqi Premier Makes His Case To Bush (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088140

Maliki, in a talk with the president aimed at easing tensions, asks for more control over security forces.

Iraq's prime minister pressed President Bush on Saturday to give his government a freer hand to fight Sunni Arab insurgents and neutralize the Shiite Muslim militias knocking the country off balance, in a conversation meant to smooth tensions that had flared over security disagreements and election-year rhetoric.

Bush, in a 50-minute videoconference with Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, upheld Washington's commitment to his Shiite-dominated government despite its failure to rein in the Shiite militias, which form a nucleus of Maliki's political base.

Maliki and U.S. officials have pressured anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr to crack down on a powerful and volatile militia nominally under his control. On Saturday, several members of his organization said that Sadr had designated a committee of loyalists to investigate and purge his organization of the most egregious troublemakers.

The committee has already expelled and publicly denounced 30 self-styled Sadr movement members, said Qusai Abdul-Wahab, a member of parliament loyal to the cleric.

Saturday's conversation between Bush and Maliki followed a week of recriminations between U.S. officials in Baghdad and the Iraqi government over the potential disbanding and disarming of Sadr's Al Mahdi army and other paramilitary groups allegedly responsible for the kidnapping, torture and killing of thousands of Sunni Arab men.

At least 20 such slaying victims, some bearing electrical drill and hot-iron wounds on their bodies and gunshot wounds to the head, were discovered Saturday in Baghdad.

At a private meeting Friday, Maliki demanded of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad that he respect Iraq's sovereignty, aides to the prime minister said. Maliki's reported message came in the face of mounting American demands for his government to take security steps against Sadr.

Khalilzad and other U.S. officials have referred to timelines that the Iraqi government must abide by or face unspecified consequences.

But there was no mention of timelines or deadlines in a joint statement issued Saturday after Bush and Maliki spoke, just a commitment to "accelerating the pace of training the Iraqi security force, and transferring responsibility for security" to Iraqis.

"As leaders of two great countries, we are committed to the security and prosperity of a democratic Iraq and the global fight against terrorism which affects all our citizens," the statement said.

With nine days left before Americans go to the polls, Bush has tried to bolster support for the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq by acknowledging setbacks and embracing a schedule of benchmarks for Iraq's political progress.

But Maliki's opposition to deadlines and his criticism that the U.S. attitude toward his government has encouraged the insurgents have put the Bush administration on the defensive.

"There are no strains in the relationship," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Saturday.

He added that Maliki was "not America's man in Iraq. The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister — he's the leader of the Iraqi people. He is, in fact, the sovereign leader of Iraq."

Maliki asked Bush to give him the power to consolidate authority over security forces. The hodgepodge security arrangement in Baghdad, he told Bush, was allowing insurgents to flee one area for another after staging attacks, said Haidar Abadi, a confidant of the prime minister and a leader of his Islamic Dawa Party.

Maliki asked Bush to let his security forces enter areas controlled by U.S. forces, Abadi said.

"He asked the president to allow the Iraqi government to have a stronger and freer hand in managing the security situation in Iraq," he said. "We don't have control over the movement of security forces."

Sharp disagreements over the handling of the Shiite militias have frayed relations between Maliki's government and U.S. officials in Baghdad.

Khalilzad has demanded that the Iraqi government take the same zero-tolerance stance toward Shiite militias that it has with regard to Sunni Arab insurgents. But Maliki told Bush he had a different formula for disarming the Shiite fighters, Abadi said.

There are signs that Maliki's approach is producing some results.

Shortly after he visited Sadr in his Najaf home to discuss security issues, the cleric created the purging committee and gave it the power to investigate those purporting to act in the name of his organization and expel those involved in criminal activity.

The committee is headed by Sheik Mohammed Fartusi and Sheik Ali Kufi, two captains in the Sadr movement.

"The committee has great authority," Sheik Hazem Araji, a Sadr deputy in Baghdad, said in an interview. "Any violator will be kicked out of the Mahdi army and their name will be publicly announced."

Maliki told Bush that the Shiite militias would disappear when the Sunnis' campaign of bombing and shooting civilians and officials and attacking Shiite holy sites subsided.

There were few signs Saturday that such a prospect was on the horizon.

DOJ_NMG_0088141

At least one U.S. service member was reported killed in Iraq, bringing to 98 the number of American troops killed here this month. The Marine, assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5, died Friday of combat injuries sustained in the western province of Al Anbar, the military said.

Insurgents blew up a minor Shiite shrine near the northern city of Kirkuk on Saturday, placing a bomb in the tomb of Imam Ismael in the village of Shikha.

Authorities found the bodies of four Iraqi soldiers in northern Baghdad. Twelve other soldiers were kidnapped while driving through a Sunni insurgent stronghold north of the capital.

daragahi@latimes.com

Times staff writers Nicole Gaouette in Washington, Saif Rasheed in Baghdad and Saad Fakhrildeen in Najaf and special correspondents in Baghdad, Basra and Kirkuk contributed to this report.

Bush Reaffirms Support For Iraq's Prime Minister (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush on Saturday reaffirmed his support for Iraq's prime minister, telling Nouri al Maliki that he isn't "America's man in Iraq" but a sovereign leader whom the U.S. is aiding.

Playing down tensions over a U.S. plan for benchmarks toward reducing the violence, the leaders said they were "committed to the partnership" and would work "in every way possible for a stable, democratic Iraq and for victory in the war on terror."

In a statement after a 50-minute video conference, Messrs. Bush and Maliki outlined three goals: speeding up the training of Iraq's security forces; moving ahead with Iraqi control of its forces; and making the Iraqi government responsible for the country's security. A special group of high-level Iraqi ministers will work with the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad to recommend how best to achieve those goals.

"As leaders of two great countries, we are committed to the security and prosperity of a democratic Iraq and the global fight against terrorism which affects all our citizens," according to their joint statement.

Mr. Maliki had squabbled with the Bush administration this week over his objections to a timeline proposed by Washington for bringing security to Iraq. "There are no strains in the relationship," Mr. Snow said.

During the video hookup, Mr. Maliki told Mr. Bush, "History will record that because of your efforts, Iraq is a free country," according to White House press secretary Tony Snow.

"What you've got in Maliki is a guy who is making decisions," Mr. Snow said after the session. "He's making tough decisions, and he's showing toughness and he's also showing political skill in dealing with varying factions within his own country. And both leaders understand the political pressures going on."

Mr. Maliki was quoted by a close aide as having told Mr. Khalilzad on Friday, "I am a friend of the United States, but I am not America's man in Iraq."

In response, Mr. Snow told reporters Saturday, "He's not America's man in Iraq. The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister -- he's the leader of the Iraqi people. He is, in fact, the sovereign leader of Iraq."

"In this prime minister, you have somebody in the Iraqi government who wants to take charge, who wants to take responsibility, is working on all fronts, on the economic side, on the security side, and on the political reconciliation side," the spokesman said. "And he believes it's important to do whatever he can to build greater faith and trust with the Iraqi people in the democracy. So the president's very happy actually with the way the prime minister is working."

After a tense week in U.S.-Iraqi relations, the prime minister and the U.S. ambassador issued a rare joint statement Friday in which Iraq reaffirmed its commitment to a "good and strong" relationship with the U.S.

The joint statement said that Iraq "made clear the issues that must be resolved with timelines for them to take positive steps forward." Mr. Maliki had issued several public statements this week declaring that the U.S. had no right to impose "timetables" on his government. That contradicted Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad's assertion that the Maliki government had already agreed to set timelines for curbing violence and solving other problems. The statement was issued after the two men met "to discuss our ongoing efforts to bring peace and security to Iraq and create a better future for all Iraqis," the highly unusual joint statement said.

Calm Gives Way to Chaos

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced the death of a Marine in Anbar province of Baghdad on Friday, raising to 98 the number of American forces killed in Iraq in October, already the fourth-deadliest month since the Iraq war began in March 2003.

The relative five-day calm in Baghdad in the five days since the end of the holy month of Ramadan ceded ground Saturday to a fresh outbreak of bloodletting.

DOJ_NMG_0088142

Clashes erupted Saturday between U.S. and Iraqi troops and gunmen in the city of Ramadi, an insurgency stronghold where scores of militants staged a military-like parade last week not far from the local U.S. base. The troops used loudspeakers to ask residents to stay indoors.

One person was killed and 35 wounded when a rocket slammed into an outdoor market in Baghdad's turbulent southern neighborhood of Dora, police Lt. Mohammed al Baghdadi said. A second person was killed and nine were wounded when a bomb went off in a minibus in an eastern Baghdad district.

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

Iraqi Prime Minister: 'I'm Not America's Man' (CNN)

CNN.com, October 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Saturday referred to the boundary between himself and the United States, telling U.S. President Bush that he answers first to the Iraqi government and people, according to an Iraqi official.

The clarification first came up Friday during a private meeting between al-Maliki and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, according to an Iraqi parliament member who is also al-Maliki's senior aide.

"I consider myself a friend of the U.S., but I'm not America's man in Iraq," al-Maliki told the U.S. ambassador, according to Hassan al-Seneid.

The prime minister told Khalilzad that as head of a national unity government, he must win the approval of Iraq's parliament before acting on any proposals, al-Seneid said.

Al-Maliki repeated the message to Bush during a video conference Saturday, in which the two leaders discussed transferring power to Iraqi forces, Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow agreed with al-Maliki's stance. "He's not America's man in Iraq," The Associated Press quoted Snow as saying. "The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister -- he's the leader of the Iraqi people. He is, in fact, the sovereign leader of Iraq."

"There are no strains in the relationship," Snow added, according to AP.

Bush and al-Maliki agreed on three goals during their 50-minute talk: accelerating the training of Iraqi security forces; eventual control by Iraq of its forces, and the transfer of security responsibilities to the Iraqi government.

Absent among those goals was the dismantling of militias, which have been blamed for leading death squads and sectarian vendettas against Iraqi civilians.

On Saturday, Iraqi authorities found the bodies of 25 people across Baghdad -- all believed to be the victims of Sunni-Shiite violence. Some, with hands and feet bound, showed signs of torture, police said.

Al-Maliki has been critical of the setting of timelines and the U.S. military effort, particularly a raid in Baghdad's Sadr City to detain a death squad leader this week.

Bush and al-Maliki agreed to form "a high level working group to put forward recommendations on how to reach those goals," according to their joint statement. The group would include Iraq's national security adviser, ministers of defense and interior, U.S. Gen. George Casey and Khalilzad, the statement added. Women's rights leader killed

Violence in Iraq killed at least three people and wounded scores more on Saturday.

Police were also investigating the killing of a women's rights leader in Iraq.

Gunmen reportedly stormed Faliha Ahmed Hassan's house in Hawija, about 43 miles southwest of Kirkuk, and shot her to death on Friday evening.

Also in Hawija, gunmen on Saturday morning killed an Iraqi soldier and wounded three others in an attack on a joint Iraqi army and police patrol, a Kirkuk police official said.

Iraqi security forces were also targeted in eastern Baghdad. A roadside bomb wounded two Iraqi police officers in charge of guarding an oil industry facility Saturday morning, an Iraqi police spokesman said.

Also in eastern Baghdad, a bomb planted in a parked minibus exploded on Palestine Street, killing a civilian and wounding eight others, Iraqi emergency police said.

In a separate attack in the southern neighborhood of Dora, eight mortars exploded at a bus station, killing a civilian and wounding 30 others, Iraqi emergency police said.

And, in what has become a common occurrence, Iraq police found 10 bullet-riddled bodies thought to belong to victims of Sunni-Shiite sectarian vendettas.

West of the capital in Anbar province, a U.S. Marine with the Regimental Combat Team 5 died Friday after being wounded in battle, the U.S. military said Saturday.

The U.S. military death toll for the war is 2,811. So far this month, 98 troops have died. The deadliest month for U.S. forces in Iraq was November 2004, with 137 killed.Other developments

The Iraqi Army has captured the cameraman for Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the slain former leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, a spokesman for Iraq's Ministry of Defense said Saturday. During the capture of Khaled al-Khayyali, documents and tapes were seized that detailed past crimes committed by al-Zarqawi, operations that had been carried out and more operations that were planned, said spokesman Mohammed al-Askari. Al-Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike in June.

U.S.-led coalition forces killed a terrorist suspect and detained 10 Iraqis believed responsible "for the movement of foreign fighters" into the country during a raid south of Baghdad on Saturday morning, the U.S. military said. The raid was part of an effort to cut back on the number of car bombs and roadside attacks on the military there, the military added.

Timetables? Depends On Who's Talking (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Recent discussion about Iraq has focused on the U.S. and Iraqi governments setting benchmarks for improving stability so the United States can eventually draw down troops, but public statements have made it difficult to determine who has agreed to what. The situation seemed to change over the course of the week, until finally it appeared that little had really happened.

On Tuesday, U.S. ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told a Baghdad news conference that the Iraqi government had agreed to benchmarks and timelines. "Iraqi leaders must step up to achieve key political and security milestones on which they have agreed," he said. "Iraqi leaders have agreed to a timeline for making the hard decisions needed to resolve these issues."

He added that Iraqi President Jalal Talabani has "made these commitments public" and that the United States will support the Iraqis "in their effort to meet these benchmarks."

Khalilzad described some of the specifics: Over the next 12 months, "assuming that the Iraqi leaders deliver on the commitments that they have made," there will be action on allowing constitutional amendment, disarming militias, making laws to administer oil revenue and improving security institutions.

On Wednesday in Baghdad, however, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki contradicted Khalilzad.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people, and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," he said. "The Americans have the right to review their policies, but we do not believe in a timetable."

Hours later, in Washington, President Bush staked out a middle ground. He said that Iraq had indeed agreed to a schedule but that specific benchmarks were in the works.

Iraq has "agreed to a schedule for resolving issues, such as disarming illegal militias and death squads, sharing oil revenues, amending the Iraqi constitution and reforming the de-Baathification process," Bush said. "The first objective is to develop benchmarks that the [Iraqi] government agrees with and that we think are important."

On Thursday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made benchmarks seem further down the road. Benchmarks are "still in discussions," he said. They will cover political, economic and security issues "to see how we get from where we are through this year and through next year and accomplish the things that are in our mutual interest."

Friday, White House press secretary Tony Snow cast the issue in even broader terms. "What you do have is collaborative efforts to try to work toward a series of goals, political, economic and security. . . . The Iraqis have already published a lot of their economic and political goals. And as I've also explained, for obvious reasons, you don't really go public with a lot of the security stuff, because it in fact tips your hand."

Later Friday, Maliki and Khalilzad met. They released a statement that still did not resolve whether the two governments are setting out specific deadlines.

It read: "Iraq and the United States are committed to working together to respond to the needs of the people. The Iraqi government has made clear the issues that must be resolved, with timelines, to take positive steps forward on behalf of the Iraqi people. The United States fully supports their goals and will help make them a success."

Yesterday, Bush and Maliki had a 50-minute videoconference to smooth out the differences that had bubbled up during the week. Afterward, they released a statement that made no mention of timelines, benchmarks or schedules.

"We have three common goals: accelerating the pace of training the Iraqi Security Force, Iraqi assumption of command and control over Iraqi forces, and transferring responsibility for security to the Government of Iraq," the statement said.

Aide: Iraqi Leader Using U.S. Angst (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst And Qassim Abdul-zahra, Associated Press Writers

AP, October 29, 2006

After a hastily arranged video conference with George Bush, Iraq's prime minister said Saturday that the U.S. president promised to move swiftly to turn over full control of the Iraqi army to the Baghdad government. A close aide to Nouri al-Maliki said later the prime minister was intentionally playing on U.S. voter displeasure with the war to strengthen his hand with Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0088144

Hassan al-Suneid, a member of al-Maliki's inner circle, said the video conference was sought because issues needed airing at a higher level than with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad.

Al-Suneid said the prime minister complained to Bush that Khalilzad, an Afghan-born Sunni Muslim, was treating the Shiite al-Maliki imperiously.

"The U.S. ambassador is not (L. Paul) Bremer (the former U.S. administrator in Iraq). He does not have a free rein to do what he likes. Khalilzad must not behave like Bremer but rather like an ambassador," al-Suneid quoted al-Maliki as saying.

The remarks were the fourth time in a week that al-Maliki challenged the U.S. handling of the war. The ripostes flowed from an announcement by Khalilzad on Tuesday that al-Maliki had agreed to a U.S. plan to set timelines for progress in quelling violence in Iraq.

Al-Maliki's anger grew through the week until on Friday, al-Suneid said, the prime minister told Khalilzad: "I am a friend of the United States, but I am not America's man in Iraq."

After Saturday's talks, White House spokesman Tony Snow said of al-Maliki: "He's not America's man in Iraq. The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister — he's the leader of the Iraqi people."

Snow said that reports of a rift between the United States and Iraq were wrong and that Bush had full confidence in al-Maliki.

"What you've got in Maliki is a guy who is making decisions. He's making tough decisions, and he's showing toughness and he's also showing political skill in dealing with varying factions within his own country. And both leaders understand the political pressures going on."

Snow said Bush told al-Maliki not to worry about U.S. politics "because we are with you and we are going to be with you."

Al-Suneid, however, said al-Maliki was intentionally using the displeasure of American voters over Bush's handling of the war to strengthen his position.

"It's al-Maliki's chance to get what he wants. It's a chance for al-Maliki to force a better deal for himself," he said.

Al-Suneid said Bush accepted Iraq's position that a renewal of the U.N. mandate for the U.S.-led military force was conditional on swift action to hand full control of the Iraqi army to the Baghdad government and the withdrawal of coalition forces from Iraqi cities and towns when the army is ready to take control.

Bush also agreed to set up a joint military operations room early next year that would give Iraqi authorities a say in the movement of U.S. and Iraqi troops, al-Suneid said. That is meant to head off unannounced raids like one Wednesday in Baghdad that targeted an alleged Shiite death squad leader.

Al-Maliki, who depends heavily on Shiite politicians whose parties have heavily armed militias, complained angrily about the U.S.-backed raid and demanded he be consulted before such operations in the future.

The United States said the death squad leader was on a preapproved list and the raid to capture him did not require specific Iraqi government approval. The man was not caught.

It was not clear whether al-Maliki's tough stance in recent days is a matter of conviction or a bid to bolster support among his domestic constituency — or both.

A joint statement issued after the video conference between al-Maliki and Bush said both sides "are committed to the partnership our two countries and two governments have formed and will work in every way possible for a stable, democratic Iraq and for victory in the war on terror."

It said the two sides agreed to form a working group "to make recommendations on how these goals can be best achieved." It will consist of the U.S. military commander, Gen. George Casey, Khalilzad and Iraq's national security adviser and ministers of defense and interior.

Al-Maliki has grown increasingly prickly as the Americans have pressed him to rein in Shiite militias and crush death squads that have sprung up since a Shiite shrine was bombed by Sunni insurgents in February. Thousands of Sunnis have died in revenge attacks, many under brutal torture.

The Sunnis, particularly disaffected insurgents, have fought back vigorously in a sectarian bloodbath verging on civil war.

The U.S. military on Saturday reported the combat death of a U.S. Marine in Anbar province, raising to 98 the number of U.S. personnel killed in October — the fourth deadliest month for American forces since the war began in March 2003.

Violence also returned to the capital after a relative five-day calm following the end of the holy month of Ramadan.

One person was killed and 35 wounded when a rocket slammed into an outdoor market in Baghdad's turbulent southern neighborhood of Dora, while a bomb in a minibus killed a second person and wounded nine in an eastern district, police said.

Police also found 10 bodies of victims of apparent sectarian violence — seven in several parts of Baghdad and three in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of the capital.

Eleven other people were reported killed in shootings and bomb attacks nationwide.

DOJ_NMG_0088145

Iraqi Leader Critical Of U.S. Envoy (WT)

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A festering grievance between Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the United States escalated yesterday with Mr. al-Maliki telling President Bush that America's ambassador in Baghdad acts like a viceroy instead of a diplomat.

Hassan al-Suneid, a member of Mr. al-Maliki's inner circle, said a hastily arranged videoconference with the president was needed because issues needed airing at a higher level than with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad.

Mr. al-Suneid also said the prime minister complained to Mr. Bush that Mr. Khalilzad, an Afghan-born Sunni Muslim, was treating the Shi'ite Mr. al-Maliki imperiously.

"The U.S. ambassador is not [L. Paul] Bremer. He does not have a free rein to do what he likes. Khalilzad must not behave like Bremer, but rather like an ambassador," Mr. al-Suneid quoted Mr. al-Maliki as telling the president. Mr. Bremer had the power to make laws by decree, many of which are still in force today.

The exchange punctuated one of the bloodiest months since the U.S. invasion.

The military announced yesterday that a Marine died from wounds in Anbar province on Friday, bringing the U.S. death toll so far this month in Iraq to 98, the highest since January 2005.

Since the summer, Iraqis have been dying at a rate of about 3,000 a month, prompting Mr. al-Maliki's government this month to stop releasing body counts to the United Nations.

Mr. Bush's Republican Party faces possible loss of control of Congress in the Nov. 7 elections, with dismay over his Iraq policy a critical factor in voter intentions.

White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed talk of a rift between Iraq's leader and the United States.

"There are no strains in the relationship," Mr. Snow told reporters at Andrews Air Force Base after the 50-minute videoconference.

Mr. Snow said that Mr. Bush told Mr. al-Maliki not to worry about U.S. politics "because we are with you, and we are going to be with you."

Yesterday marked the fourth time in a week that Mr. al-Maliki challenged the U.S. handling of the war. The ripostes flowed from an announcement by Mr. Khalilzad on Tuesday that Mr. al-Maliki had agreed to a U.S. plan to set timelines for progress in quelling violence in Iraq.

Mr. al-Suneid, however, said Mr. al-Maliki was intentionally using the displeasure of American voters over Mr. Bush's handling of the war to strengthen his position.

"It's al-Maliki's chance to get what he wants. It's a chance for al-Maliki to force a better deal for himself," he said.

Mr. al-Suneid said Mr. Bush accepted Iraq's position that a renewal of the U.N. mandate for the U.S.-led military force was conditional on swift action to hand full control of the Iraqi army to the Baghdad government and the withdrawal of coalition forces from Iraqi cities and towns when the army is ready to take control.

Mr. Bush also agreed to set up a joint military-operations room early next year that would give Iraqi authorities a say in the movement of U.S. and Iraqi troops, Mr. al-Suneid said. That is meant to head off unannounced raids like one Wednesday in Baghdad that targeted a purported Shi'ite death-squad leader.

Mr. al-Maliki, who depends heavily on Shi'ite politicians whose parties have heavily armed militias with links to death squads, complained angrily about the U.S.-backed raid and demanded he be consulted before such operations in the future.

The United States said that the death-squad leader was on a preapproved list and that the raid to capture him did not require specific Iraqi government approval. The man was not caught.

A joint statement issued after the videoconference between Mr. al-Maliki and Mr. Bush said both sides "are committed to the partnership our two countries and two governments have formed and will work in every way possible for a stable, democratic Iraq and for victory in the war on terror."

It said the two sides agreed to form a working group "to make recommendations on how these goals can be best achieved." It will consist of the U.S. military commander Gen. George Casey, Mr. Khalilzad, Iraq's national security adviser and its ministers of defense and interior.

Mr. al-Maliki has grown increasingly prickly as the U.S. has pressed him to rein in Shi'ite militias and crush death squads that have sprung up since a Shi'ite shrine was bombed by Sunni insurgents in February. Thousands of Sunnis and Shi'ites have died in revenge attacks, many under brutal torture.

Violence also returned to the capital after five days of relative calm following the end of the holy month of Ramadan.

One person was killed and 35 wounded when a rocket slammed into an outdoor market in Baghdad's turbulent southern neighborhood of Dora, while a bomb in a minibus killed a second person and wounded nine in an eastern district, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0088146

Police also found 10 bodies of victims of apparent sectarian violence -- seven in several parts of Baghdad and three in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of the capital.

Eleven other persons were reported killed in shootings and bomb attacks nationwide.

Tipping Point For War's Supporters? (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

In Past Month, Even Stalwarts Have Called for Change in Iraq Policy

As the fighting in Iraq swerved toward civil war in February, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) expressed "a high degree of confidence" that a new government would take charge and that by the end of the year the conflict "won't be the same."

As October opened, Warner returned from Iraq with a far grimmer assessment. "The situation," he said, "is simply drifting sidewise." His judgment gave voice to Republican doubt that had been suppressed in a campaign season. Lawmakers who had vowed to "stay the course" called for change. One GOP senator declared Iraq "on the verge of chaos." By last week, President Bush was saying he too is "not satisfied" and is looking for a fresh approach.

October 2006 may be remembered as the month that the U.S. experience in Iraq hit a tipping point, when the violence flared and shook both the military command in Iraq and the political establishment back in Washington.

Plans to stabilize Baghdad collided with a surge in violence during the holy month of Ramadan. Sectarian revenge killings spread, consuming a town 50 miles from the capital. U.S. officials spoke of setting benchmarks for the Iraqi government to take on more responsibility, only to have the Iraqi prime minister call that suggestion election-year grandstanding. Bush compared the situation to the 1968 Tet Offensive -- often seen as a turning point in the Vietnam War -- and urged Americans not to become disillusioned.

"October has been very busy from a standpoint of operations on the ground and certainly back here in Washington," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said.

With Iraq again dominating the national dialogue right before key midterm elections, "there's an expectation in the air that after the election, the partisanship and the politically charged environment will dissipate somewhat and people can start looking for ways to work together on this issue," Bartlett said.

Republicans are anxious about what happens in the meantime; polls show wide discontent. "Republicans are responding to the nervousness of the American people," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.). "People have begun to wonder about the basic premise that the Iraqi people are capable of solving their problems politically."

If October does prove to be a turning point for the Iraq war, historians are likely to point to two events, one in domestic U.S. politics and the other in Iraq.

The first was Warner's visit to Baghdad. As the chairman of Armed Services, a stalwart Bush supporter and a pillar of the Republican establishment, he rattled much of Washington with his dour assessment Oct. 5. If events have not improved in 60 to 90 days, he said, the Bush administration should find a new course. While still opposed to a precipitous troop withdrawal, Warner made clear that staying the course is no longer a viable option.

Warner's comments proved to be the starting gun for a race toward an exit strategy. Other Republicans had nursed similar doubts but kept quiet for fear of giving Democrats ammunition in a tough campaign cycle. Warner's remarks freed them to express their own misgivings.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Republican from the president's state of Texas, began talking about the need for a different approach in Iraq, such as partition. In Virginia, Sen. George Allen, who maintained in September that he would not "second-guess" the war, said that "mistakes have been made, and progress has been far too slow." More Republican candidates called for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to be fired.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), a strong Bush supporter, was struck that Warner's comments echoed those of the ranking Democrat on Armed Services, Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), who has advocated putting more pressure on the Iraqi government.

"They reminded me of some of the things Senator Levin has been saying for some time," Cornyn said last week. "We fought to allow Iraqis to control their own future, and I'm a little concerned about our making demands on them as if we are an occupying force."

In Iraq, meanwhile, the key moment was the realization by top commanders in mid-October that sending 12,000 U.S. troops back into Baghdad did not have the calming effect that had been hoped for. As Shiite-Sunni tensions erupted in the city, civilian casualties doubled in a matter of months, with 2,660 deaths in September alone.

"Operation Together Forward has made a difference in the focus areas, but has not met our overall expectations of sustaining a reduction in the levels of violence," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said Oct. 19, using the U.S. military name for the Baghdad operation. In other words, the U.S. military had played its ace in the hole -- it had asserted itself in Iraq's most important city -- yet had not been able to improve deteriorating security in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0088147

A Marine colonel said he is seeing a major shift even inside the military. "There's a concern now that there wasn't previously," said the colonel, who remains on active duty and is not authorized to speak publicly on political matters. "Folks that took things at face value in the past are asking more questions."

Searching for a way out, Washington has focused new attention on the work of the Iraq Study Group, a panel of well-connected luminaries led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). Recommendations from the group, once seen as a sop to Congress, are expected in late December or early January and promise to be the first major subject tackled by the members of the next Congress.

People familiar with the group's option papers expect it to recommend either a scaling back of U.S. ambitions in Iraq, making stability rather than democracy the top priority, or, less likely, a slow but steady withdrawal of U.S. forces.

In the wake of Warner's revelation and the unchecked violence in Iraq, Bush's language in discussing the war changed markedly. As late as the end of August, he was still describing his policy as "stay the course." But with Democrats pounding away in campaign advertising, saying he refused to recognize the unfolding disaster in Iraq, the White House officially jettisoned the phrase this month, saying it did not adequately describe the administration's flexible approach.

"We've never been 'stay the course,' " Bush told an interviewer. The concept will not die that easily, though. On Friday night, Vice President Cheney told reporters traveling with him on Air Force Two that "the United States' ability to stay the course and get the job done is a very, very important piece of business."

As congressional Republicans peeled away from the president, the White House grew more isolated. Debate over a National Intelligence Estimate's conclusion that Iraq had become a "cause celebre" for Islamic extremists and several books critical of the administration's handling of the war kept interfering with the White House message.

Democrats, once deeply divided over the war, coalesced around the idea of a phased withdrawal and aired television ads on Iraq in most of the competitive races around the country. Republican candidates, on the other hand, started ignoring Karl Rove's advice to talk about the war. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) told an interviewer that "the challenge is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

Other conservatives grew more skeptical that there is anything the United States can now do to fix Iraq. "I don't know what the new course would be," said Richard N. Perle, former head of the Pentagon's Defense Policy Board and an early supporter of the war. "The options are extremely limited now. The new course that's necessary is new Iraqi leadership."

The last full week of October underscored the fitful attempts by the White House to get on top of the situation. U.S. officials announced plans for benchmarks for Iraqis to assume more security duties, but Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said his government had not agreed to any deadlines. Bush called his second news conference in as many weeks to assure the American public that he is "not satisfied" with the way things are going, while still asserting that "absolutely, we're winning."

Inside the White House, officials were glum, trying just to get through the election in hopes that after the rhetoric fades there might be a chance for both parties to fashion a new approach. "I'm not disparaging new ideas; I'm welcoming new ideas," national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said in an interview. But, he noted, "no one I know has come up with a silver bullet."

Hadley described the administration's three top priorities: a political agreement among Iraqi sects, enhanced security with Iraqis taking more of the lead and greater international support. "There's an opportunity to try to figure out how to do better," he said. "A lot of it is not a conception issue; it's an execution issue. It's an execution issue for the American government, and it's an execution issue for the Iraqi government."

All the while, in the background was the drumbeat of U.S. deaths in Iraq, with October's toll of 98 so far the worst in a month since January 2005. Iraqi forces have recently paid an even heavier price, with 300 troops dying during the month of Ramadan, the U.S. military said.

A series of grim events on the ground in Iraq deepened fears that the nation is sliding closer to a full-blown civil war. A battle between two towns -- one Shiite, one Sunni -- on opposite banks of the Tigris River earlier in the month epitomized the factors tearing the country apart. A vengeance killing blamed on Sunni Arab insurgents based in the farm hamlet of Duluiyah prompted a killing spree targeting Sunnis across the river in the predominantly Shiite city of Balad. The U.S. military and residents of both Duluiyah and Balad accused the towns' police of taking part in the killings.

Looking for protection, Shiites in Balad turned not to their elected government or to the U.S. military but to Shiite militias, summoning them from Baghdad. By the time the killing ebbed three days later, at least 80 people were dead. Balad was all but empty of Sunni families, which had lived among Shiites for generations.

The militias blamed in many of the Sunni deaths belong to two Shiite religious parties that dominate Iraq's five-month-old government. Maliki, a Shiite, has used his position to block U.S. efforts to crack down on militias. Last week he denounced a

DOJ_NMG_0088148

U.S.-backed Iraqi raid into Sadr City seeking the most notorious of the death-squad leaders. U.S. officials had not notified Maliki before the raid.

The White House said reports of a rift were overblown, but privately U.S. officials wondered about the Maliki government's competence. Maliki's comments last week underscored a growing divide. "If anyone is responsible for the poor security situation in Iraq," he said, "it is the coalition."

Looming over this deteriorating situation is the fact that, despite the training of 310,000 Iraqi soldiers and police officers -- close to the number once thought necessary to ensure security -- those new forces have not brought calm to the capital and the area around it.

Experts disagree whether the past month represents the beginning of the end of the U.S. involvement in Iraq. But there was little question among them about whether it will be remembered as a major turning point. "We are at a real crossroads," said Graham, who sits on the Senate Armed Services panel. "Personally," said James Burk, a military expert at Texas A&M University, "I think the 'experiment' . . . is over."

But Dov S. Zakheim, who was a senior Pentagon official under Rumsfeld, said he thinks this is simply the beginning of a new phase in the U.S. effort in Iraq.

"Everyone knows that if we leave Iraq, not only will that country have little hope of regaining any form of stability, we will likely destabilize the entire region," he said. So the current turmoil reflects the "recognition in all policy circles that we are about to enter a new phase."

Correspondent Ellen Knickmeyer in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Iraq And Americans: One Land, Two Worlds (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

BAGHDAD

ABU HUSSEIN is a 31-year-old Iraqi who works on an American military base. He used to commute. But last year his life collapsed and now he lives at work.

His story is familiar. He quickly moved his family out of Iraq after his children's doctor and a neighbor, both Shiites, were killed in their Baghdad neighborhood on the same day. His family was denied residency in Jordan, so he moved them back to Iraq, but to a southern city that had no jobs.

Now he sleeps on a cot in the base. He works day and night for two months at a stretch. He counts himself lucky. "The base is the safest place in all of Baghdad," he said.

Last week, an intense debate was taking place in the United States about how long American troops would have to stay in Iraq to keep security. But in the view of many Iraqis, that is something Americans have never been able to offer. And the longer they stay, the less confidence Iraqis have that the Americans will be able to do so. That distrust has hardened over three and a half years, adding ever more distance between two worlds: That of the American soldiers who are trying to do a job here, and that of the Iraqis and the grim realities that they must live with and the Americans try to navigate.

Part of the problem is that the Americans cannot see for themselves how bad things get when they are not around.

No one knows this better than Iraqi workers on bases. Like stowaways from another world, they adopt a kind of American identity. They take names like Joe and Ozzy. They learn how to swear and talk American slang.

These Iraqis know all too well what life is like outside. Abu Hussein tried for years to get them to protect Iraqis coming in and out of the base by shielding the civilian parking lot to hide the license plates from the eyes of Iraqis who hate those who work for Americans. Blast walls were erected only recently. "Everybody knows I'm going to leave from the gate," Abu Hussein said, his face tight with worry. "I have no weapon. I am isolated."

An American soldier, on the other hand, "is in a Humvee with armor and weapons."

Indeed, the divide is so profound that an American private had to dress in full battle armor this month to walk 20 paces outside the gate to an Iraqi employee parking lot in order to pick up a book.

When Americans move through Iraq, they do so like a giant ship cutting through a thick and treacherous sea. They move slowly, displacing the harsh reality on both sides, carving out a trough of safety around them. But after they pass, reality closes back in, in all its sucking, swirling fury.

That reality is terrifying because much of Iraq is a place without rules or laws, in which armed gangs, sometimes dressed as police officers, can come into any house and do exactly as they please.

This broad challenge for the Americans — making security last past the moment the Humvee on patrol rolls away from the house — could be seen last week in even the smallest ways in Ur, a sliver of residential blocks just north of Sadr City, the impoverished Shiite district where unruly militias are strong.

DOJ_NMG_0088149

The Americans began sweeping in late in August, going house to house looking for weapons. It had been more than a year since they had patrolled Ur, and residents were surprised to see them.

The neighborhood was mostly middle class and heavily Shiite, but while the Americans were gone its northeast corner had become the site of brutal executions: Authorities found 90 bodies there in the heat of August, most of them victims of Shiite death squads that had driven into the area from Sadr City.

"They killed openly, they did not hide," said a worker in eastern Ur who said he witnessed as many as 40 daytime executions, over several months, near a shop where he works. An Iraqi Army checkpoint was less than a mile away.

After the sweeps, fewer bodies were found, but the hard part — keeping the area clear of killings — had only just begun.

A deep fear had settled in the neighborhood's northeastern edge, the area closest to the militia stronghold.

At dusk on a recent Sunday, Sgt. Andrew Pokora stood in a courtyard with a nervous Shiite woman. Her husband had spoken to American soldiers before and they had found the conversation useful. It was the third time Americans had come to the house in recent weeks.

"What do you need from him?" asked the wife, her voice tense. "Every day Americans are coming here. The neighbors are asking why."

The neighbors were suspicious because the family had moved only recently from a hard-line Sunni neighborhood, Ameriya, from which Shiites were being driven out. They had not yet proved to their neighbors that they could be trusted, even though a sticker portraying a Shiite cleric was stuck to their battered white door.

Outside that door spread a vast expanse of dirt fields and garbage where gangs of men who like the cleric move. They call themselves the army of the Mahdi, a Shiite saint, and are known as brutal killers.

"Danger for us, for me, for my husband!" the woman told the Americans, standing firm as other family members wandered out into the small darkening courtyard. "They will say we are your client."

Sergeant Pokora, a bright, young soldier from Connecticut, relented. He wrote down the man's telephone number, thinking it best to call the husband later.

Even in safer areas, engaging Iraqis on the topic of their lives is difficult. Earlier that afternoon, the sergeant had sunk into a spongy couch in the living room of a housewife in Ur, trying to gain her confidence. "Do you feel safe when you see the police?" he asked, through a teenage interpreter.

She replied in a quiet voice, nodding slightly. Three tiny children with saucer eyes stared.

"She says she feels happy when she sees them," a translator told him.

"Ask her how she feels when American troops come through her neighborhood."

Another phrase in Arabic.

"Happy," the translator said.

The sergeant smiled and squinted in mock skepticism.

"Tell her to be honest," he said. "It's Ramadan."

And he didn't give up. He urged her to come to an American base if she had a tip. He said they would pay for it.

The Iraqi and American worlds in Iraq were not always quite so separate. In 2003, Iraqis lined up at the gate of the Rustimiya base waiting their turn to ask for jobs. Now the road is empty, with discarded plastic bags swirling in the wind.

American soldiers in northern Baghdad went to a public swimming pool shortly after the invasion in 2003. The former head of the Olympic Committee, Ahmed al-Hijiya, tried to organize a soccer game between an American military unit and a semi-professional Iraqi team earlier this year, but requirements for blast walls torpedoed the suggestion. In July, Mr. Hijiya was kidnapped from his office in central Baghdad. He and 23 other victims, 20 of them guards, are still missing, according to the Olympic Committee's office manager.

Today, the approach to the base is empty and ominous: A two-story watch tower peers down at anyone seeking entry, the guards shouting barely intelligible words in English. Guns are pointed. Nerves are keyed up.

Earlier this month, four teenagers who had worked as cleaners in Rustamiya were killed by gunmen who followed them to their homes in Nahariya, a suburb near the base, a worker who knew them said. A translator was killed the same week.

On a recent Friday morning, an Iraqi man wearing glasses stood alone near the highway outside the base, staring at approaching cars, as if he was remembering license plates.

In Iraqi Villages, Troops See Strides And A Big Challenge (WP)

By Josh White, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088150

MUSTAFAR, Iraq -- The smell of baking bread wafted over the dusty central square as children clamored to get closer to the U.S. troops and their hulking armored vehicles. Lt. John Sirhal tried fruitlessly to keep order among a group of boys waiting for M&Ms, while Capt. Adam Sawyer calmly walked up to businessmen hawking their wares.

Samir Hassan, a 53-year-old shopkeeper, said he was happy with the U.S. forces who have maintained peace around his home. But the Iraqi police who have set up a checkpoint at the entrance to Mustafar have made the residents uneasy, he said, as have the Shiite militias that operate just miles away.

"We feel safe here," Hassan said, waving his arm at the throngs of people in the streets on a recent day. "But now we can't go to Baghdad. We need to have security in Iraq. The government has no control, and I don't trust the Iraqi forces."

It is in small villages like these that U.S. soldiers say they are making their biggest strides but also face their biggest challenges. Commanders in Iraq say they can win any battle against armed insurgents and conduct any military operation successfully, but persuading Iraqis to believe in Iraq could end up being the most difficult battle in this war.

There are places in Iraq where U.S. troops are greeted with suspicion. And there are others where they confront grave danger. More than 90 American servicemen have been killed in hostile action across Iraq this month.

But in some of the small towns that ring the southern edge of Baghdad, the situation is quite different. For many residents, the daily dose of roadside bombs and gunshots that plague the capital is glimpsed only on television. Here, U.S. forces work to provide more electricity, to ensure water supplies are clean and to fix roads. The locals appear to appreciate it, but they also appear to genuinely fear what could happen if U.S. forces leave.

Lt. Col. Mark Suich, commander of the 1st Squadron, 89th Cavalry Regiment, is on the leading edge of the campaign to win over a swath of land south of Baghdad that includes Mustafar. He said the key to success in Iraq is to hand over control to the Iraqis, but that doing so could take time.

"Ultimately, they need to see the government functioning, especially in the area of security," said Suich, 42, of Greenville, Pa. "It's a long process to make people change their minds. It's stuff you can't do overnight."

In Mustafar, residents are just beginning to trust the Iraqi police, a ragtag group that periodically makes the short trek from its checkpoint into town to buy lunch or gifts. So far, no one has tried to sneak weapons past the checkpoint, and there has been no violence in the village for weeks.

It has also been peaceful in nearby Abu Hillan, a tiny collection of houses of Sunni Arabs along a strip of dirt road. Residents there recently teamed with a neighboring town and with U.S. soldiers to tap into an electrical substation, boosting their daily availability of electricity from about two hours to more than 20.

"We're happier now," said Othman Ibrahim, 23, a fireplug of a farmer with coarse hands and soft eyes. "We like the U.S. soldiers because they came in and made things better. But we don't trust the Iraqi army, and while there are still militias, we're never going to trust them."

Ibrahim also has difficulty trusting the government. Though he likes the idea of democracy, he said, he isn't sure what difference it has made or will make.

"We are farmers, and we know nothing about democracy," he said, shaking his head. "We see no changes because of it."

Sawyer, who commands the regiment's C Troop and spends much of his time working to improve services in the region, said it could be years before large-scale improvements are made.

"I can't fix electricity overnight, but we can come in and do the little things, and those little things do matter," Sawyer said, shortly after surveying a vacant building he hopes to turn into a medical clinic. "You will gain more from these things than you can possibly gain from using your weapon. It's all about taking baby steps."

Suich acknowledges that his squadron is fighting two main battles, one with armed insurgents and one with the idea of a new Iraq. He said he plans to build locals' trust of Iraqi troops by gradually dispatching them on joint patrols with their U.S. counterparts.

"We have to be patient, we have to be persistent, and we have to go back to them and go back to them," Suich said.

At a compound for Special Operations forces near Baghdad, civil affairs officers are working to speed things up by offering medical services and interest-free business loans.

On a recent afternoon, dozens of families lined up to see doctors and to receive gifts such as shoes, school supplies and board games.

"There's no doubt in my mind that we have terrorists coming through the gate here, and we help them, too," said Maj. Stephen Przybelski, a civil affairs officer from Green Bay, Wis. "Maybe we'll turn someone. I don't know how many we can turn, but if we can turn one or two, how many people's lives have we saved?"

One of the clinic's main forces is Dr. Turki, an Iraqi American who lives in Centreville, Va., and returned to Iraq to help her country. Turki, who didn't want to give her full name for security reasons, said she treats many Iraqis who are afraid to be seen with U.S. forces but really want their help.

DOJ_NMG_0088151

She said she has high hopes.

"It's so hard these days, and I feel so sad for what is going on here," she said. "I wish one day to open my eyes and see peace all over Iraq."

After Sirhal, the lieutenant, handed out candy to children in Mustafar, he paused and looked out over the villagers who were smiling and waving.

"This really does make me proud," said Sirhal, 27, of Bloomfield Hills, Mich. "You see how they are here? It could be like this everywhere. We just have to be patient."

Iraqis See The Little Things Fade Away In War's Gloom (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 28 — The things the women missed were almost too small to notice at first.

Simple numbers and dates began to elude their memories. They were hugging their children less. Past pleasures, eating and listening to music, began to feel flat. They were shouting at their husbands like army commanders.

Small as they seemed, these scraps of life were the effects of the war as discussed by four Iraqi women on a cloudy Saturday afternoon in a women's center in Baghdad.

Their stories began with a familiar theme: the shrinking lives of middle-class families in the capital. Social clubs have emptied out. Weddings have been sparsely attended. But as the circle has become smaller, and as they focus intensely on just staying alive, they said, even the basics are being stripped away.

"All the elements of society have been dismantled," said Fawsia Abdul al-Attiya, a sociologist and a professor at Baghdad University. "You are afraid because you are a woman, a man, a Sunni, a Shiite, a Kurd.

"All these things start to change society."

In a room in the Amal Women's Network that was strewn with remnants of a morning meeting — a half-eaten piece of cake, an orange peel, some crumpled tissues — the women talked about the changes forced on their lives by that fear.

One of the women, a senior employee in an Iraqi ministry that is now run by religious Shiites, recalled recently walking through the gate of her office building with several colleagues, two wearing form-fitting dresses with bare heads and a third in a hijab, when security guards pulled the third woman aside.

"They told her to tell her friends to be more cautious," she said, leaning out of her high-backed chair. She asked that her name not be used because it would be recognized. She has received two threats on her life.

Her own office was a measure of just how far relations between Iraqis have unraveled. She has worked with her colleagues for 21 years, but in the past year, strange new alliances and rivalries have emerged. In business trips abroad, lists of those permitted to go were compiled along sectarian lines. Shiites chose Shiites. Sunnis chose Sunnis.

Basma al-Khateeb, a 47-year-old mother of three, shook her head sadly at the familiar tale. "We never dreamed it would be like this," she said.

Ms. Khateeb, who runs a program for youths at the center, said she missed the very simple pleasures that gave life its texture.

"Walking. Riding a bicycle down the street. We gave up so many things we used to do," she said. "Now we call them accessories."

Private lives have been dented and squeezed into uncomfortable positions. Houda, a 40-year-old layout designer for a magazine in Baghdad who would not give her last name, said the violence had cast her and her husband in the roles of emergency room doctors, shouting orders and performing urgent tasks. Little time remains for intimacy. The last time she remembers feeling happy together was a year ago.

"Something has changed," she said. "There is a kind of dryness between us now."

One conversation that comes up daily is about leaving Iraq, but there are no answers.

It is a daily struggle not to shout at her two teenage girls, one that she usually loses. She has stopped hugging and kissing them, a strange byproduct of extreme stress, she said. Recently, her 15-year-old called to say she missed her, though they had not been apart.

"I feel surrounded by threats," she said. "When I go to work. When they go to school."

As the violence tears the fabric of society, breaking communities and long-established social networks, even peoples' thinking is muted. Plans for the future are too painful, too breakable, many Baghdad residents say, and so their thoughts stay fixed on the immediate.

"The events are too big to comprehend, and the mind stops thinking," Ms. Attiya said. The result, she said, is a distracted population with vastly diminished ambitions.

DOJ_NMG_0088152

With jobs too difficult or too dangerous to find in many cases, young people in particular have put aside their dreams. In such an environment, the allure of populist leaders and militias offering protection, a sense of purpose and belonging has become compelling.

For the women — secular, middle class, employed and part of an increasingly slender slice of Iraq's population — the effects have been on a more personal scale.

Many reported a new difficulty with memory, particularly of numbers and dates.

For Houda, it happened in front of a television set. She sat down to turn on her favorite Egyptian television show a few days ago, and for several minutes she could not remember the channel.

"It was a blankness," she said. "My brain is loaded. It is not active like before."

The feeling is particularly intense for those who have lost a close relative, especially a child. Haifa Hassan, an English teacher whose 12-year-old son was kidnapped while he walked home from school this summer and then brutally killed, has a face like a mask. She finds it hard to smile, and when she does, it is more a grimace.

She has trouble sleeping at night. She tries to nap, but when her husband enters the bedroom, her eyes are often open, staring ahead.

"My son dies every day," she said, recalling his small body and neck with rope marks. She left Iraq with her husband and remaining son this month.

Life has become so hard that many Iraqis find it too painful to partake of the world outside. Houda said she can no longer stomach movies, bright things that show varnished, perfect lives. She has not watched a movie all the way through in more than a year.

Life was also hard under Saddam Hussein, the women pointed out. Plans were equally impossible to build. But the basic fabric of life, visiting family, attending weddings and funerals, was for the most part intact. Now Iraqis are letting go even of those parts.

The ministry employee sat at the table looking agitated. She attended the funeral for the mother of a good friend this month. The family was Christian, large and respected in the community, and before the war, such a funeral would draw hundreds. Instead, 10 people came to the church service, and only one, the dead woman's son-in-law, risked following the casket out to the cemetery. Even her daughter stayed home.

Those who escape to Jordan or Syria or the Kurdish enclave in northern Iraq describe stumbling around for days, extremely disoriented.

One of the women recalled that when she saw her children in a mall in Jordan, she was overcome by a feeling of indescribable relief. The lights were bright. Her children were safe, and drinking fruit shakes. But they were also melancholy, tinged with the memory of what had been lost.

Hana Edwar, the director of the women's center, said she brought a group of young people to a scenic lakeside resort in Iraqi Kurdistan in September. When a group gathered there for prayer, one young man joked that he did not need to pray because he was already in heaven.

"Really, you feel how much we miss these things," Ms. Edwar said. "How much we miss them."

A year ago, there was still so much hope, she said, "but now the light is so weak."

A stanza by her favorite poet, Muhammad al-Jawahiri, runs constantly in her mind.

"Oh open-handed Tigris!" it says. "Our ambitions have fallen so low that even the simplest among them is not promised."

This Is Baghdad. What Could Be Worse? (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

There was an almost forgettable exchange earlier this month in the Iraqi National Assembly, itself on the fringe of relevance in today's disintegrating Iraq. Lawmakers debated whether legislation should be submitted to a committee to determine if it was compatible with Islam. Ideas were put forth, as well as criticism. Why not a committee to determine whether legislation endorses democratic principles? one asked. In stepped Mahmoud Mashadani, the assembly's speaker, to settle the dispute.

"Any law or decision that goes against Islam, we'll put it under the kundara!" he thundered.

"God is greatest!" lawmakers shouted back, in a rare moment of agreement between Sunni and Shiite Muslims.

Kundara means shoe, and the bit of bluster by Mashadani said a lot about Baghdad today.

It had been almost a year since I was in the Iraqi capital, where I worked as a reporter in the days of Saddam Hussein, the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, and the occupation, guerrilla war and religious resurgence that followed. On my return, it was difficult to grasp how atomized and violent the 1,250-year-old city has become. Even on the worst days, I had always found Baghdad's most redeeming quality to be its resilience, a tenacious refusal among people I met over three years to surrender to the chaos unleashed when the Americans arrived. That resilience is gone, overwhelmed by civil war, anarchy or whatever term could possibly fit. Baghdad now is convulsed by hatred, paralyzed by suspicion; fear has forced many to leave. Carnage its rhythm and despair its mantra, the capital, it seems, no longer embraces life.

DOJ_NMG_0088153

"A city of ghosts," a friend told me, her tone almost funereal.

The commotion in the streets -- goods spilling across sidewalks, traffic snarled under a searing sun -- once prompted the uninitiated to conclude that Baghdad was reviving. Of course, they were seeing the city through a windshield, the often angry voices on the streets inaudible. Today, with traffic dwindling, stores shuttered and streets empty by nightfall, that conceit no longer holds.

Even the propaganda, once ubiquitous and often incongruous, is gone. One piece I recalled from two years ago: a map of Iraq divided into three colored bands. In white, it read, "Progress." In red, "Iraq." In white again, "Prosperity." The promises are now more modest: "However strong the wind," reads a new poster of a woman clutching her child, "it will pass." More indicative of the mood, perhaps, was one of the old banners still hanging. Faded and draped over a building scarred with craters from the invasion, it was an ad for the U.S.-funded Iraqi network, al-Iraqiya. In Arabic, its slogan reads, "Prepare your eyes for more."

As I spoke to friends, some for the first time in more than a year, that was their fear: more of the kundara.

"When anyone is against you, when anyone has differences with me, I will put a kundara in his mouth, I will shove a kundara down his throat, I will hit him with a kundara, and so on," another friend told me.

"We live in a kundara culture today."

I had first met Karima Salman during the U.S. invasion. She was a stout Shiite Muslim matriarch with eight children, living in a three-room apartment in the working-class district of Karrada. Trash was piled at her entrance, a dented, rusted steel gate perched along a sagging brick sidewalk. When I visited last year, the street, still one of the safer ones in Baghdad, exuded a veneer of normalcy. Makeshift markets overflowed with goods piled on rickety stands: socks imported from China, T-shirts from Syria and stacks of shoes, sunglasses and lingerie. Down the street were toys: plastic guns, a Barbie knockoff in a black veil, and a pirate carrying an AK-47 and a grenade. There was a "Super Mega Heavy Metal Fighter" action figure and a doll that, when squeezed, played "It's a Small World."

On this day, the metal stands were empty, as were the streets.

"Praise God," Karima said as I asked how she was. In a moment, her smile faded as she realized the absurdity of her words. "Of course, it's not good," she said, shaking her head. "There's nothing that's ever happened like what's happening in Iraq."

On June 23, 2005, three car bombs detonated in Karrada, outside her home, wrecking the Abdul-Rasul Ali mosque and spraying shrapnel that sliced into the forearm of one of her five daughters, Hiba. Friends at school nicknamed her "Shrapnel Hiba." Two months ago, yet another bomb hurled glass through their window, cutting the head of Hiba's twin sister, Duaa. Four stitches sealed the wound. Over that time, Karima lost her job as a maid at the Palm Hotel, where she had earned about $33 a month.

"People are too scared to come," she said matter of factly.

Next to her sat her son Mohammed. During the invasion, Mohammed, an ex-convict, had joined a motley unit of a dozen men patrolling Baghdad's streets as part of the Baath Party militia. Now he had entered the ranks of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia loyal to a young cleric, Moqtada al-Sadr, and blamed for many of today's sectarian killings in Baghdad. Karima's son-in-law Ali had been an officer in the American-equipped police force, earning $300 a month. He quit after receiving a death threat. Now he, too, had joined the Mahdi Army.

"Not all of them are good," Karima told me, casting a glance at her son.

Stocky and a little surly, Mohammed smiled. "Who else is going to protect Iraq?" he asked.

They debated the causes of the violence that, these days, is the topic of almost every conversation. Radical Sunnis, the Americans, Iranian agents, other militias. "Even the Egyptians," Karima offered. "And the Sudanese," Mohammed added.

"Brothers are killing their brothers," she said.

Stories poured forth: a bomb amputating the arm of a 10-year-old neighbor; another killing Marwan, the barber.

"If they brought the Israelis, the Jews, and they ruled Iraq, it would be better," said Karima, her face framed by a black veil. Sunlight bathed the room; electricity, as usual, was cut off. "It would be a million times better than a Sunni, a million times better than a Shiite."

Her first grandchild, 2-month-old Fahd, sat next to her. His expression was rare in Baghdad: eyes expectant, fearless.

"Is it not a pity to bring a baby in a world like this?" she asked. "It's a shame."

Her eldest daughter, Fatima, looked on.

"One-third of us are dying, one-third of us are fleeing and one-third of us will be widows," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0088154

"This is Iraq," Karima added.

The last time I had visited Faruq Saad Eddin, he and his wife, Muna, had argued over whether their eldest son should have left the country. We sat in Jihad, a neighborhood so dangerous now that a stranger risks death by entering it. A generator droned in the background; occasional bomb blasts thundered in the distance, probably homemade mines targeting U.S. patrols. An urbane former diplomat, Faruq had been upset. He worried about what would become of his ancient land if its capable fled.

"You can't just cut out and run away," he told me. "This is our country and sooner or later our children will come back. The resilience of the people, that's what 11,000 years means," he said. "Someone who has 11,000 years, 100 years to lose here or there is not that much."

On April 17, Faruq and Muna left Iraq at the insistence of their son, who had paid a year's rent for an apartment in Jordan. A month later, a car bomb detonated outside their Baghdad home, shattering the windows in the room where we once had shared bitter coffee.

On a cool morning in the Amman neighborhood of Umm al-Summaq, Faruq shook his head at the arbitrariness of fate.

"We would have been killed, no doubt about it," he said.

"We are all stranded, here and there, Iraqis," he added.

A friend once compared the elderly who are reluctant to leave Baghdad to the blind. Take them away from the familiarity of their home, garden and street, and they become lost and disoriented. Faruq has sought new routines: morning strolls, e-mails to friends, a voracious appetite for news and late-night updates on his favorite baseball team, the St. Louis Cardinals. His apartment overlooked the rolling hills of Amman, glowing in the morning's soft sun; his granddaughter Mayasa played giddily next to him with a stuffed toy.

"I should feel happy," he said.

He shook his head again, a gesture that meant he wasn't.

"We have a heavy heart, really," he said after a few moments of silence. "Just knowing what's happening makes us grieve."

I had come to know Wamidh Nadhme in 2002, before the invasion. A professor of political science at Baghdad University, he was a forthright voice in those tense, uneasy days when Hussein was still in power. He tried to speak with complete honesty despite the possible consequences of doing so in a police state. With an ever-present Dunhill cigarette, he would slowly field questions back then, reasoning out every intricate response, surrounded by his French-style furniture, worn Persian carpets and a framed piece of papyrus from Egypt, where he had spent time in exile as a young activist. But on this visit, reason eluded him, as did explanation.

"I find myself unable to understand what's going on," he said.

Wamidh had settled into what he called "withdrawal." He still visited the university once a week, but Baghdad was simply too dangerous to venture outside. After nightfall, the streets of his neighborhood of Adhamiya look like they might an hour or so before dawn: dark, without traffic, and menacing. As we talked, helicopters rumbled overhead. Gunfire burst almost continuously.

"You feel like the country is exploding," he said.

We traded stories. One I had heard from a friend: Insurgents stopped a driver at a checkpoint. They opened his trunk. "Why do you have a spare tire?" the insurgent asked solemnly. "You don't have trust in God?"

Well into 2005, Wamidh has bristled at the notion of a sectarian divide, even as the very geography of Baghdad began to transform into Shiite and Sunni halves divided by the Tigris River. Like many Iraqis, he blamed the Americans for naively viewing the country solely through that sectarian prism before the war, then forging policies that helped make it that way afterward. He ran through other "awful mistakes": the carnage unleashed by Sunni insurgents affiliated with al-Qaeda, the assassination of a Shiite ayatollah in 2003 who may have bridged differences, the devolution of Sadr's movement today into armed, revenge-minded mobs.

As Wamidh finished, he flashed his customary modesty. "Perhaps you could correct me?" he offered.

I asked him whether it would become worse if the American military withdrew.

He looked at me for a moment without saying anything, as though he were a little confused.

"What could be worse?" he asked, knitting his brow.

I saw Wamidh again a week later, and the question had lingered with him. "I sometimes wonder what I would do if I were the Americans," he said over a traditional Ramadan dinner. His answer seemed to hurt him. "I have no idea, really."

"It's like a volcano that has erupted. How do you stop that?"

On April 9, 2003, Firdaus Square became the lasting image of the U.S. entry into Baghdad. In its center was a metal statue of Hussein in a suit, his arm outstretched in socialist realist fashion. Like an arena of spectators, columns of descending height encircled him, each bearing the initials "S.H." on their cupolas. By early afternoon that day, hundreds of Iraqis swarmed around the statue with one task in mind: bring it down. It marked the fall. A year later, amid uprisings by Sunni insurgents in Fallujah and

DOJ_NMG_0088155

Sadr's militia in Baghdad and the south, it spoke of occupation. The square was deserted, guarded by U.S. tanks whose barrels read, "Beastly Boy" and "Bloodlust." Soldiers, edgy, had orders to shoot anyone with a weapon. At times, music blared over speakers on a Humvee.

One song: "Ring of Fire," by Johnny Cash.

As I stood in Firdaus Square this day, after invasion, liberation and occupation, I wondered what word described Baghdad.

"This is a civil war now," Harith Abdel-Hamid, a psychiatrist, had told me, trying to diagnose the madness. "When you see hundreds of people killed every day, corpses of people tortured in the streets every day, what else does it mean?"

"Call it what you will," he said, "but it is a civil war."

Perhaps. But I felt as though I was witnessing something more: the final, frenzied maturity of once-inchoate forces unleashed more than three years ago by the invasion. There was civil war-style sectarian killing, its echoes in Lebanon a generation ago. Alongside it were gangland turf battles over money, power and survival; a raft of political parties and their militias fighting a zero-sum game; a raging insurgency; the collapse of authority; social services a chimera; and no way forward for an Iraqi government ordered to act by Americans who themselves are still seen as the final arbiter and, as a result, still depriving that government of legitimacy.

Civil war was perhaps too easy a term, a little too tidy.

I looked out on the square. On one side were rows of concrete barricades and barbed wire, having faded almost organically into the landscape. In another direction, a billboard read: "Terrorism has no religion." Across the street, a poster portraying Iraqi police pleaded: "We are the heroes fighting for the sake of Baghdad." In the middle of the square, on the stone perch where Hussein's statue once stood, were torn scraps of other posters: "Your voice," "the nation," "patriotism," "dialogue," "building the future." The words were isolated, without context, like fragments of a clay tablet.

Sirens soon pierced the square. Two armed police escorts, headed in opposite directions, rushed along the street. Each frantically waved at the other to pull over. Guns dangling from the window, they fired volleys into the air to intimidate each other.

In time, the one with fewer rifles and fewer men let the other pass. They were playing by the rules of the kundara.

In the square, Salam Ahmed sat with a friend, Saad Nasser, under the statue, looking out at the scene.

"They died under Saddam, and they're dying now," Salam said.

Unshaven, wearing a baseball cap, Saad looked at the ground. He was grim, angry and dejected.

"No one can stop it but God," he said. "Only God has the power."

Iraq: Army Has Al-Zarqawi's Cameraman (AP)

AP, October 29, 2006

Iraq's Defense Ministry said Saturday that the Iraqi army captured a man thought to be the personal cameraman for Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the slain leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, the country's most feared terrorist group.

Spokesman Mohammed al-Askari told al-Iraqiyah television that Khalid al-Hayani was detained in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad.

He declined to say when the capture occurred or give al-Hayani's nationality, saying that could hinder future operations against terrorists. He said videotapes and documents were found in al-Hayani's possession but did not describe their contents.

The Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi, who was killed by a U.S. airstrike June 7 in Diyala, had appeared in several videos posted on militant Internet sites.

One clip often played on Middle Eastern TV news channels showed him clad in black and firing a machine gun. An earlier one purported to show al-Zarqawi with his face covered, speaking to the camera before he slit the throat of a Western hostage.

The Bomb Squad (WP)

By Whitney Terrell

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Their job: Hunt down and disarm the explosive booby traps that kill more Americans than any other weapon. Try not to die doing it.

1ST LT. NATE RAWLINGS IS STANDING IN THE CAMP LIBERTY MOTOR POOL, just west of Baghdad, trying to figure out why a NASCAR track dryer should be welded to one of his minesweeping trucks. In such situations, Rawlings -- who is 6-2, 230 pounds -- resembles an offensive lineman who has been asked to dance ballet. His brow furrows, his comic-book square chin dips with respectful curiosity. But he'd like to make sure that this step is really necessary. "What happens if [it's] hit with shrapnel?" he asks the Asymmetric Warfare Group man.

The Asymmetric Warfare Man -- who has what I can only hope is an irrational fear that if I use his name, insurgents will go to America and hunt down his family -- bites his lip. A retired officer, he has his web belt cinched so tight that it acts as a corset, flaring out his rib cage. He's here to help the Army combat unconventional weapons by inventing contraptions such as the dryer, which is supposed to blow dirt off of buried bombs. Also, his wife kicked him out. ("Go!" is what he remembers her saying. "You've been wanting to since Day One of the war. You'll hate yourself if you don't.")

DOJ_NMG_0088156

"This gas can, okay, it sits right here?" The Asymmetric Warfare Man squats beside the dryer, which resembles a lawn mower engine bolted to a jet turbine bolted to an elbow of air-conditioning duct. He taps its exposed gas can, and continues. Maybe if Rawlings mounted some fire retardant next to the gas can, it would powder in a blast? Render the fuel inert? And then act as a fire retardant for the whole thing? "That's not too bad," the Asymmetric Warfare Man declares, gaining momentum. "Whaddya think?"

"I don't like it," Rawlings says.

Neither do I, given that I'm going to be riding in one of these minesweeping trucks tomorrow. The shrapnel Rawlings mentions is an all-too-likely possibility, considering the 25,000 improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, that have been aimed at American troops since the war in Iraq began, severing limbs and crushing the skulls of U.S. soldiers and journalists alike. It doesn't help that Rawlings's soldiers -- with whom I am embedded -- are the leading edge of a $6.1 billion Pentagon effort to win the war against roadside bombings in Iraq.

They're IED hunters. It's their job to find the bombs that the insurgents plant. It's Rawlings's job to make sure they don't get blown up trying.

"When I first started," Rawlings shouts as the dryer revs up for a demonstration, "I used to sit by the radio 14 hours a day. I'd stay till 4 in the morning, whatever it took, listening to my guys out on patrol until I was sure they'd made it home okay."

Rawlings isn't supposed to worry this much. Part of the Pentagon's spending has paid for specially armored trucks -- such as the RG-31 we've been inspecting -- designed to protect his soldiers from IED blasts. On the other hand, as we drive back to his headquarters, we pass another unit's RG-31: Its engine compartment and four-foot-tall front tires are gone; the ballistic windows in its cab and armored bed are spiderwebbed from an IED attack that wounded two.

"Yeah, well," Rawlings says. "That vehicle looked a lot better when we first towed it in. People have been stripping parts from it."

It's hard to tell whether he's reassuring himself or me.

It's even harder to try to bridge the gulf between Rawlings's language -- this war's now-familiar lexicon of "flaks" and "mortar pits" and scouts who disappear in a "fine red mist" -- and what I know of his life as a history major at Princeton University, where he graduated in 2004. A "big, beefy rugger player from Chattanooga" -- in the words of his writing professor, John McPhee -- Rawlings was the kind of romantic enthusiast that I remember emulating when I attended Princeton in the early '90s. In addition to rugby, he wrestled and acted as the social chair of Tiger Inn, a notoriously rowdy club, while at the same time studying with historian Sean Wilentz and researching a thesis on a Confederate ancestor in Tennessee. Rawlings also considered military service a family responsibility, and, following in the footsteps of his uncle and grandfather, who fought in Vietnam and WWII, respectively, he joined ROTC three weeks before 9/11. That decision has led him to a desk in this plywood-floored tactical operations center, or TOC, surrounded by soldiers from E Company, 1st Battalion, 22nd Infantry's Ironclaw team. His deployment didn't kill his romantic streak -- in an e-mail last winter, he described his first firefight by writing, "Teddy Roosevelt would have found that engagement rather sporty" -- but after six months in Iraq, that part of him seems to be struggling against the messiness of the fight against IEDs.

Until recently, he tells me, most IED patrols were done on foot -- a process that often involved uncovering bombs by hand. When I express disbelief, Rawlings cites the experiences of Sgt. Willard Peterson, who is sitting in a dusty leather chair five feet away from us.

"Effective but dangerous" is Peterson's verdict on this method, delivered in the same tone that he has already used to tell me that Army life is "slightly incompatible" with his Mormon upbringing.

"I lost a lot of friends like that," Peterson says, describing how, during a foot patrol, one friend decided to search for bombs beside a wall covered with anti-American graffiti. He found one. "It was an ambush," Peterson explains. "Blew that wall up and killed him."

Despite his Ivy League background, Rawlings is clearly at home in the ramshackle confines of the TOC, which serves as a clubhouse for the soldiers who live in rows of blindingly white trailers out back. He can be found there at all hours, and is always willing to stop what he's doing and engage in discussions on the value of the energy drink Rip It ("That stuff will keep you up forever"), evaluations of insurgents' seized weapons ("What's that, a flintlock musket?") or mildly didactic history lessons ("What is unique about Harry S Truman's name? His middle initial doesn't need a period after it"). The prevailing mood of the place is a half-goofy, half-gallows humor -- for platoon assignments, Rawlings has written FIND BOMBS, BLOW UP BOMBS on the dry erase board behind his head -- that I recognize from the hunting clubs I grew up with.

DOJ_NMG_0088157

This afternoon, as Peterson calmly recites the multiple ways that an IED can be triggered and, thus, kill, Rawlings launches into a spirited defense -- against withering remarks from skeptics -- of a French movie whose director, he claims, "is supposed to be the next Hitchcock." Meanwhile, he's fixing a torn cardboard cutout used to stencil E Company's numbers on the Ironclaw vehicles, and shouting modifications to Peterson's lecture -- "The worst thing the insurgents do is put the bombs out right after our trucks go by" -- through its panels. Then a call crackles over the radio, and its 20-year-old operator shouts out: "Hey, they found a cache -- the infantry patrol. They got anti-tank mines, rockets, ball bearings, cellphones!"

All the makings for an IED.

And that, of course, is where my hunting club analogy fails. Because Ironclaw teams are really being hunted, every bit as much as they are doing the hunting.

The company's commander, Capt. Samuel Olan, strides out of his office to plot the weapons caches on a glossy aerial map of western Baghdad, where E Company began patrolling a month ago. Things have been pretty quiet. But the discovery of these new weapons stockpiles, combined with a recent order to repaint his Ironclaw trucks -- and thus cover the markings of the more experienced unit his men have replaced -- tells Olan that the honeymoon is about to end.

"They're going to give us a welcome party," he says. "Because they know -- especially now that we're putting new numbers on the vehicles. They think, 'These guys are here from the States. They don't know anything.' It's like in high school -- you see the new kid and say, 'Let's go fight him!'"

Fortunately, the man who ushers me out of Camp Liberty's gates the next morning hardly qualifies as a new kid. At 24, Sgt. Kristopher Tate is on his second tour in Iraq, and yet his face remains fresh and animated -- a young Sugar Ray Leonard, if the champ had also fancied gold teeth. Tate's looks have gotten him a lot of attention from women who work at the bases surrounding E Company's headquarters. But what he'd wanted to be was a ballplayer, a center fielder. "My dream stopped because I went to a small school," he told me. "LaPoynor High School in Larue, Texas. Nobody scouted me."

Except the Army.

Now a career soldier, Tate leads the RG-31 in which I've been assigned to ride -- and the convoy behind it -- with the casual confidence of the athlete he used to be. "You got something?" he shouts up at his gunner, whose tan boots are dancing nervously on the gunner's platform beside my seat.

The gunner, Pfc. Jeffrey McGorvin drops down in a squat. He's about 5-4 -- too short to use the .50-caliber's sling seat -- Jersey-accented and apple-cheeked.

"There's this white rock with wires coming off the top," he says.

"Keep going," Tate tells his driver who has (in my opinion) reasonably hit the brakes. "Even if that is an IED, we got to set up security. Gonna have to pass it, anyway." Until this moment, I've been using Tate's vehicle as an armored tour bus and gawking at the Iraqi countryside. That's what the RG-31 is designed to be. From the outside, it resembles a cross between a covered pickup and a Land Rover. But its great tactical advantages are the spacious, shatterproof windows that wrap the cab and the armored back bed, where Tate and I sit in air-conditioned comfort next to a cooler of Gatorade. The soldiers inside -- the "window lickers," as they're called -- have a 360-degree view of the roadway, marred only by the matte black circles of gun ports and the occasional divot left by an AK-47 round. The day is sunny and beautiful, the roads are clear, the soldiers seem relaxed (though later they explain that they were unnerved by the lack of traffic, which often precedes an IED attack) and, as I gawk, I've been trying to describe the territory that my country is spending more than $300 billion to pacify. If you ignore the palm trees, much of it resembles western Kansas -- dry, distant plains, fields of irrigated corn and wheat, white-green stands of trees shimmering along the waterways -- which is a disappointment, because, for that kind of money, I think Kansas would've come along quietly.

But that's just in the rural areas. The rest, the gutted industrial ruins, the cinder-block strip malls, the apocalyptic fields of pureed brick where U.S. forces have bombed something, all of this is much more difficult to define. From house to house the scenery radically shifts, as if someone were channel-surfing through different worlds. Shaded, landscaped mansions bunkered with parked Mercedes share blocks with goat herders and thatch-roofed huts; in the towns, the Iraqis stare poker-faced, dressed in white robes and oil-stained mechanics' jumpsuits alike.

For the last half-hour, I've almost forgotten about IEDs. "That's what we're looking for," Tate says. "Something different. Something that doesn't fit."

Tate points over my shoulder to a mundane landscape of dusty grass along a highway that is backed by a canal and then a raked hayfield in which a flock of pigeons has landed to eat. No ominous music plays; there's no sound, beyond the grind of the RG's transmission and Tate's measured breathing. And then I notice a tiny white rock with a pair of wires drifting out of it and burrowing into the grass. "All right, let's do an interrogation," Tate says as the RG-31 speeds up, fleeing the object's theoretical blast range. In Army-speak, bombs are interrogated just as insurgents are; the difference is that everybody hopes the bombs stay quiet. "Go on and bring the Buffalo up here."

DOJ_NMG_0088158

The Buffalo is the star of the Ironclaw program, and, like any star, it has its own press kit, music video, theme song and testimonial page. These are all available at the Web site run by its producer, Force Protection Inc., which describes its product as "able to withstand bomb blasts that would shred a lesser vehicle" and "a regular truck but on steroids." The 27-foot-long machine comes equipped with a mechanical arm and claw (thus the "Ironclaw" team), five-inch-thick windows and steel-lined, blast-proof tires. But its secret weapon is the revolutionary "V-shaped hull design" that will part the shock waves and shrapnel column of an IED just as a boat hull parts water.

That's what I'm told, at least. But to me, the Buffalo looks like a phone line repair truck.

Accompanied by a young pair of fruit stand vendors and an Iraqi in a melon truck, my RG crew watches from a safe distance as the Buffalo, operated by Sgt. Brett Eggleston and three other soldiers, creeps a mere 10 feet from the potential IED and unfolds its mechanical arm to interrogate. Eggleston can park that close thanks, in part, to the "electronic countermeasures" that many Army vehicles carry and which are designed to block the cellphone calls that frequently trigger IEDs. Still, cellphones aren't the only way to detonate surplus artillery rounds -- the favored payload for these weapons. Some insurgents tape frayed wires inside a cardboard tube (called "crush wires"); when a Humvee runs this over, the wires complete a circuit, ignite a blasting cap and, thus, detonate the bomb. Even IEDs with cellphone triggers include a washing machine timer as a backup; when it winds down, the rounds blast off. This tends to make interrogations a nerve-racking ordeal. "We don't know what it feels like in here" when an IED goes off, one Buffalo crewman, Spec. Brendon Croteau, has acknowledged to me. "We haven't been blown up yet."

And this is where the whole expedition turns . . . well, into a "Wizard of Oz" moment for me. Because as I peer through the haze of the Iraqi noon, the Buffalo's claw ponderously raking the grass beside the road, I realize that the heart of the Pentagon's program for defeating IEDs is: 1) buy some armored trucks with big windows; 2) send young soldiers out to drive up next to bombs; 3) investigate with a phone truck.

As Tate points out later: "I've seen tanks destroyed. I've seen Bradleys destroyed . . . There's only so much armor can do."

Fortunately, this particular wired rock turns out to be an irrigation pump. After another hour or so, I'm dropped off at a nearby patrol base.

Fifteen minutes later, Tate's RG-31 nearly runs over an IED.

McGorvin -- dubbed "the Jedi master" by his fellow soldiers for his ability to, as they put it, "detect ordnance" -- tells me about it the next day as he fidgets on a torn couch behind the TOC. He explains that he sensed the bomb a mile before he reached it -- noticing first the grinning face of a taxi driver who squatted down behind his cab to key a Motorola phone. A few minutes later as the convoy rumbled through a small town, McGorvin felt it again outside a cluster of mud wattle shacks, their yards suspiciously empty.

Then, all at once, his RG-31 passed a mound of dirt with a cone of rusty metal showing through its side. McGorvin's gaze locked on a sliver of blue plastic tucked behind the mound. "I got something!" he yelled. "I don't know what it is, but it's got a cellphone on it!"

The RG-31's armor wouldn't protect McGorvin standing in his gunner's nest, so, as radios barked and the convoy scattered, he tucked his thighs against his chest and squatted.

"McGorvin -- good looking," Tate shouted as their truck finally jolted to a stop outside the bomb's blast radius.

"My gunner's got two rounds on the left side," Tate radioed to Eggleston, who was waiting in the Buffalo. "I'll walk you to it."

As the Buffalo team prayed, Eggleston lowered its nine-pronged claw -- his "pooper scooper," as he calls it -- toward the buried IED. He followed his progress on a color monitor connected to a camera on the arm's first joint. Gingerly, he scratched the dirt, revealing two rusty 130mm artillery shells and then, zooming in, found a blue Nokia cellphone, battery and a washing machine timer that had been wired to a blasting cap in the nose of the first shell.

"What type of rounds you got?" radioed Sgt. Thomas Sutton, the leader of the Ironclaw team. "What kind of initiation system?"

Distracted and infuriated by this interruption, Eggleston -- who prefers to work in complete silence -- remembers quietly heaving a few empty water bottles around the cabin, then shaking his fists at the heavens. When he'd calmed himself, he returned to the controls, tangled the claw in the ignition wire and -- carefully, carefully -- lifted the cellphone, timer and battery clear of the charge, disarming the IED.

"For the third time," he radioed Sutton, "I've got two 130mm rounds." And then, having pawed around a bit more where the rounds were buried, he keyed his mike again. "No, check that. I've got three."

McGorvin's IED was one of 2,625 such bombs found or detonated during the month of July: 959 of them were discovered, while 1,666 exploded. Numbers such as these have made IEDs the leading killer of U.S. troops in Iraq, which places McGorvin and his buddies squarely on the front lines of the war. It also means their stories -- "Gets the blood flowing!" I hear McGorvin exclaim to Tate when he's finished -- carry an extra authority, one they seem acutely aware of. Nearly all them instruct me, "Just tell people what it's really like over here." At first I assume this is a reference to the administration complaint that the war isn't going as badly as the media make it appear. And yet, the longer I stay with the unit, the less certain I am that their version of Iraq is meant to toe anybody's party line.

DOJ_NMG_0088159

This is certainly true of Corbett Baxter, a sweat-soaked first lieutenant who has been doing eight- to 10-hour foot patrols every day. "It's a [expletive] classic area," he says after Rawlings and I meet him in an empty briefing room. He gazes blankly at the far wall, perspiration still beading high up in the bluish skin of his shaved head, despite the icy air-conditioning. "A mixed Shia and Sunni population, everybody living together peacefully. But in the last few days, everybody, all the families I've got to know -- they've all left. Fled."

Baxter stops and stares at me. His eyes are dark and hollow. Most of the roughly 35,000 people at Camp Liberty never leave the gates, and those who do, including the Ironclaw teams, rarely leave the paved roads. It is as if the New York police department patrolled only Broadway, First Avenue and Eighth Avenue, leaving the rest of the city in darkness. Baxter, however, has seen that darkness.

"I would walk through these neighborhoods where I had kids running all over," he tells me. "I'd sit down and have chai with them. As far as I can tell, they liked having us there, but they're gone. You know what I'm doing now? Now all I'm doing is waiting for the [expletives] who chased them out to come in."

Like the Ironclaw teams, Baxter has seen the center of the war. The facts he's returned with don't necessarily fit the Army's -- or, certainly, Washington's -- official version of the war's progress, but because they're true, he tells them to me anyway. I have a different experience the next day when Rawlings and I visit the 16th Engineering Brigade, which is the "executive agent" for the Ironclaw teams. Maj. Mitch Gargac, who greets us, is eager to talk about the showers, latrines, Hesco barriers (bags filled with sand) and concrete T-walls that his engineers build inside the wire. We sit in a video conference room whose stadium-style seats and blond wood furnishings are as nice as anything Rawlings saw at Princeton. But when I ask about the Ironclaw program -- for instance, how many teams exist or how many bombs they've found -- Gargac admits, "Truthfully, I don't know if I can say."

Instead, he introduces me to the brigade's "Baghdad Is Beautiful" program. Its chief, Lt. Col. Tris Cooper, has $80 million to spend and flashes charts that say things such as: "Electricity: Goal: increase production." And "Health Care: Goal: construct facilities." They contain no statistics. Even if I hadn't just read reports concluding that Baghdad residents get only five to eight hours of power a day and that the U.S.-based contractor, Parsons, has failed to deliver 130 of 150 promised health clinics, I would find this performance depressing. After all, Rawlings and I have just been out driving around Baghdad. Baghdad is not beautiful. Baghdad is covered with trash and saturated with the ugliest kind of danger. As we leave the briefing, Rawlings -- who is as optimistic an Army supporter as you can find -- looks as if he's seen a ghost. He hustles off for the reality of his Humvee while I snap pictures of Gargac, guarding the parking lot. My camera breaks.

Gargac is just doing his job, I understand -- which is, in part, to paint the war in as positive a light as possible, when dealing with the media. (In September, six weeks after I leave Iraq, following multiple e-mail requests, he tells me that Ironclaw teams around Baghdad have found 1,247 IEDs since January, a number positive enough that I wonder why he didn't give it to me in the first place.) But the meeting highlights the difference between the stories that the Ironclaw team tells about the war and those told by Army officials or politicians. The soldiers know that Baghdad isn't beautiful. But neither is it completely accurate to call the varied landscape they drive through each day a "Dante-esque hell" or "nightmarish" -- two descriptions of Baghdad that I find in U.S. newspapers on my return. And so, caught between opposing, abstract versions of the war, they refuse to simplify: This story means we're winning. This story means we're losing.

They live among facts too overwhelming to parse: Rawlings opens the door of a shrapnel-shredded truck on a highway south of Baghdad to find a beheaded child, on his dead father's lap, cradling a flat of eggs. Only one is broken.

Tate picks up a scrap of rubber on a roadway to find himself staring at an IED. One night, during an ambush, a brave sergeant named Travis Parker sprints across 100 yards of open highway under fire, in the dark, to deliver ammunition to Rawlings's Bradley. Peterson's friend is scraped up off the pavement after the graffiti-covered wall explodes in his face. Or it's a good week, and they putter past verdant date groves undisturbed and, quite frankly, bored for hour after hour, day after day. McGorvin fantasizes about returning in peacetime and driving the same roads in a rental car. Rawlings blasts rock-and-roll under highway overpasses. Tate keeps track of which houses on their route have the best landscaping.

For them, these stories are the war, period. They are not sound bites to be scooped up to justify some larger political narrative. Their attitude reminds me of the soldiers in Erich Maria Remarque's WWI novel All Quiet on the Western Front , which Rawlings says he's reading. At one point, as the narrator watches a friend die, he notes: "We have lost all sense of other considerations, because they are artificial. Only the facts are real and important to us."

Rawlings comes the closest to stating this outright. One night around 3 a.m. -- Rawlings's usual bedtime -- I push him to talk about politics and war. I tell him that if he wants to be a writer (a profession he says he's considering), he's going to have to have opinions, to not worry too much about upsetting anybody.

DOJ_NMG_0088160

Rawlings, clearly uncomfortable with the topic, ends up surprising me. He begins talking about seeing Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Committee chairman, on "Meet the Press" after the Valerie Plame scandal. "It was like an opera," he says, in a tone that makes me feel this isn't a compliment. "Everything the guy says comes out in three's. Two good things for us, one bad thing for them. I went to work the next day, saw my guys getting ready to go to Iraq -- I hated the idea that while we were working, he's flinging around political stuff."

I hear a conversation in Camp Liberty's posh, 1,000-seat cafeteria that crystallizes this thought for me. A well-fed soldier is polishing the vocabularies of two foreign national workers. A severe over-cleanliness of uniform already defines him as a "fobbit," someone who never leaves his FOB, which stands for "forward operating base." But he's well on his way to defining "vicarious," too. "Like, there are politicians who talk about this war 'vicariously,'" he says, his voice rising, indignant. "They don't know anything about the war because they've never been here. They just want to get their face on TV and make people think they're looking out for them, and so they say the war is bad, but they don't know whether it is or it isn't."

It's a worthy question, whether the war is good or bad. But when the Ironclaw team is outside the wire, looking down on a bomb, it's too late to ask.

THE SECOND IED DIDN'T EVEN TICKLE MCGORVIN'S JEDI SENSE. Just a few hours after the first bomb they'd found, the soldiers were cruising down a hardball road, open scrub on the left, a canal on the right backed by corn stubble and the silver swoops of power lines angling through it, off to the horizon. Light poles, evenly spaced, dotted the road. As his RG-31 slowed for a speed bump, McGorvin heard a small pop, and a foot-high column of dust bloomed on the right shoulder of the road. It looked as if a bullet might have struck there.

"McGorvin -- did you see that?" shouted Spec. Jose Fuentes, 21, who rode in the RG's passenger seat. "What the [expletive] was it?"

"Incoming?"

"I don't know. It wasn't loud enough for incoming."

Tate, expecting an imminent attack, shouted to his driver, Pfc. David Griffin. "Hey, you got to go on past. Even if it is an IED, we got to get to the other side."

Griffin was a rookie, in country only a few weeks. But being a Missourian, he had plenty of experience on bad roads: He gunned the RG like a pro, slamming through potholes so hard that the crew nearly jolted out of their seats.

Once they were clear, Tate radioed the convoy they'd left behind, his voice quieter than usual: "Hey, an IED just went off. Everybody move up!"

This time the insurgents had timed the convoy's speed by the light poles along the road, which allowed them to set off their bomb just as the trucks arrived. The puff of smoke signaled the ignition of a blasting cap that had inexplicably failed to detonate two 130mm rounds. Otherwise, the RG-31 carrying Tate, Fuentes and McGorvin -- who was standing up, unprotected, in his gunner's hatch -- would've been hit directly.

McGorvin squatted down in the RG's cab and held his hands out, palms down. "Look at this, Fuentes," he said, as his fingers shook.

In the middle of the convoy, a soldier had seen three Iraqis emerge from some bushes and fold up a tripod -- a device they'd likely used to time the convoy's approach. Sutton backed his RG-31 past the unexploded rounds and, regulations be damned, left the pavement and hurtled down a dirt road after them.

Though the three triggermen escaped Sutton's wrath by crossing a canal, an infantry unit picked them up 30 minutes later.

Up at the lead vehicle, a curious kind of giddiness descended. It wasn't fear exactly -- there was constant chatter, constant activity. That's the strange thing about the front lines: There's a high. Everyone, even a general, has to admit that you've visited a privileged place. Which, in turn, makes it harder and harder to fit in anywhere else.

Other voices rehashed the luck of the near miss, the fizzle of the bomb.

"Damn, we almost died," someone said.

But Fuentes understood the paradox of this high: As good as it felt, it was also changing each one of them, in ways nobody could predict. Before the team dismounted to pull guard, he told McGorvin and Tate, "I love you guys."

Then he turned to Griffin, the new driver. "Welcome to the war," he said.

POSTSCRIPT:

Recently, E Company's patrol area expanded eastward into more urban areas of Baghdad, and attacks on their vehicles increased. In an e-mail dated September 13, Rawlings reported that the lead RG-31 I'd ridden in had been hit by a bomb, which cracked but did not shatter its windows. McGorvin was struck in the face by shrapnel, the blast's only casualty. He returned to duty after three days' rest. The company is scheduled to return to the United States at year's end.

Whitney Terrell is the New Letters writer in residence at the University of Missouri at Kansas City. His second novel, The King of Kings County, was just released in paperback.

DOJ_NMG_0088161

. . . But A U.S. Policy Czar Might Help (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Political rhetoric serves in an election season to deny the obvious and get voters to suspend belief in their own judgments. Thus George W. Bush in recent days, urging the American public not to "allow our dissatisfaction to turn into disillusionment about our purpose" in Iraq.

The reality is that deep disillusionment has already taken hold, especially among those who supported "our purpose" of regime change in Iraq. It is the conduct of the war in Bush's hands that has spread -- precisely, Mr. President -- disillusionment that will almost certainly cost the Republicans the House and perhaps the Senate on Nov. 7.

Admitting this has to be the point of departure in Bush's search for a new approach to Iraq and a new approach to an American public that -- for good reason -- has largely stopped believing him on Iraq.

There seems to be almost no learning curve in Washington's dealing with Iraq's societal and religious cleavages and prickly nationalistic politicians, who have been shoved aside or undermined for not showering effusive praise on Bush for their liberation or for asserting their own priorities and political legitimacy.

It was Groundhog Day all over again last week as Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki reacted irritably to Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Bush announcing that Maliki would do X, Y and Z -- "benchmarks" in presidential parlance -- or else. Nobody seems to have imagined that the besieged Maliki would want to announce his government's programs instead. Bush sought to placate the Iraqi yesterday by holding and then publicizing a 50-minute video conference with the still-fuming Maliki.

Until then, the sequence was a culturally insensitive replay of the moments that quickly soured the initial chances in 2003 to let Iraqis take charge and to try to come to terms with their Arab and Iranian neighbors, who have instead helped destabilize Iraq since.

First, proconsul L. Paul Bremer cavalierly dismissed the proposed six-person provisional government that had been constructed over two years of painful negotiations abroad between Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis. Bremer then threatened to dismiss the subsequent interim government if it did not carry out his wishes. And so on.

This is not ancient history. On orders from a myopic White House last spring, Khalilzad openly intervened in the negotiations for an Iraqi prime minister to block incumbent Ibrahim al-Jafari and create a situation in which Maliki -- Jafari's deputy and dependent on Shiite radicals for votes -- was the only viable candidate to run Iraq.

Maliki's claims to legitimacy were destroyed by that open American micromanagement. Khalilzad's subsequent sales campaign for the "national unity" government -- which has quickly become a collection of corrupt and sectarian fiefdoms -- has damaged his effectiveness.

I have written relatively little about Iraq's tortured path since that moment, in part because I hoped Maliki would prove me wrong but also because what would happen, and was happening, seemed so depressingly obvious.

This midterm election is a moment of accountability, as Bush acknowledged at the news conference where he sought to fend off intimations of disillusionment. It is the time for voters and citizens to examine recent and past mistakes and omissions of U.S. policy in Iraq and then vote accordingly.

Bush seemed to draw a comparison between Vietnam and Iraq last week during an interview with ABC News. It was left to author David Halberstam to point out that the important part of the exchange was that neither Bush nor his interviewer seemed to have a firm grip on what Vietnam's Tet Offensive had been about.

"I don't know what either of them is really saying," Halberstam observed on National Public Radio. "The president has been exceptionally weak on the history of the Vietnam War." Was Bush saying, implausibly, that "Tet was a victory for America but a political defeat, and therefore . . . the war is really going better than this momentary glitch shows?"

Halberstam is a voice worth listening to on this comparison. His dispatches from Vietnam argued initially that the conflict could be won if strategy and tactics were changed. Only later did he come to the conclusion that the conduct of the war had finally made it unwinnable.

It is not Bush's poor grasp of Vietnam but his poor grasp of Iraq that is the urgent problem. After Nov. 7 the president should stop pretending to run an Iraq policy that has in fact beached him like a dying whale. He should give a senior Republican wise person complete powers to steer a new course, guided by the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton study group and others.

George Shultz, Ronald Reagan's secretary of state (and, like Jim Baker, an ex-Marine), is the outstanding candidate for a salvage mission on Iraq. He will not want to become the Iraq czar. But if it happens, I will quickly offer Shultz my congratulations, and my apologies.

DOJ_NMG_0088162

Partition Is Not The Solution . . . (WP)

By Rend Al-rahim

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Desperate to find solutions to the violence in Iraq and thus an exit strategy for the United States, an increasing number of lawmakers in Congress are considering Iraq's partition into Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite regions under the umbrella of a loose confederation. But partition is neither desirable nor feasible.

Neat partition lines are impossible because few regions in Iraq are ethnically or confessionally homogeneous. The governorates of Diyala, Mosul, Salahuddin, Hilla, Kirkuk and Basra are intermixed or have large minorities scattered throughout each province. In Baghdad, with probably a quarter of Iraq's population, the ethnic and sectarian groups are inextricably interwoven.

A plan to partition Iraq would plunge the country into total civil war far more widespread and bloody than the sectarian and factional violence we are witnessing now. The partition of India and Pakistan in 1947 resulted in 2 million dead and 11 million displaced. The death toll and refugee numbers from collective murder, reprisal killings and ethnic cleansing in Iraq would be comparable, dwarfing the casualties in Iraq today.

Nor would conflict end once areas had been purified at this horrific human cost. As in Kashmir, regions along the partition lines would continue to be contested for decades, leading to continued violence and warfare. The belt of towns surrounding Baghdad would be a war zone of competing territorial claims, as would the border regions skirting Kirkuk, Mosul and Diyala.

With the exception of the Kurdish regional government, the institutions of local governance, including regional councils, regional assemblies and the local police forces, are underdeveloped and fragmented, with little capacity to preserve the rule of law or deliver services. In such an environment, partition will inevitably lead to a meltdown of authority, and internecine fighting would intensify. We have had a harbinger of such warfare in the so-called stable areas in the south, where fighting has erupted in Basra, Diwaniyah and Amarah among the various Shiite factions; it has been contained only provisionally and with the greatest difficulty. With control of resources and absolute power as the beckoning prize, the factions would battle even more viciously for supremacy.

Iraq's neighbors would not stand by and passively witness the turmoil attending efforts at partition. There is too much at stake for all of them, and several are already meddling in Iraq's internal affairs. If Iraq is partitioned, Iran, Turkey, Syria and Saudi Arabia will intervene -- either militarily and directly, as Turkey might do in Kurdistan and northern Iraq, or by increasing and expanding support to Iraqi factions, or both. In the case of Iran, a stepped-up nonmilitary Iranian presence and increased support for pro-Iranian groups are both feasible and likely options. Iraq would thus become the battleground of an undeclared war for control not only of Iraq but of the entire Middle East.

The most probable outcome of this violent competition for territory, resources and power would be a radical Sunni, Taliban-style regime in the west and in parts of central Iraq that would be a breeding ground for terrorism. In the south it is likely there would be a fundamentalist Shiite regime pliant to Iran's will. In both cases these would be authoritarian regimes hostile to pluralism and genuine democracy. Unchecked by a stunted and impotent national government, these governments would use their resources to promote their radical ideologies abroad, support like-minded movements in neighboring countries and destabilize the region. Meanwhile, Baghdad would remain a war-torn city with a fig-leaf government too feeble to hold itself together, let alone uphold the rule of law across the country.

These are hardly the outcomes for which the United States fought a war to remove Saddam Hussein from power and for which Iraqis and Americans continue to pay a price in precious lives and resources. Rather than seeking ways to weaken the national government, we should find ways to strengthen and empower it to do a better job, and seriously consider substantially increasing the number of Iraqi army troops and raising the number of U.S. forces at least temporarily.

At this stage, strengthening the national government and providing it with the tools and institutions to enforce the rule of law is far more likely to produce a stable country that can govern and defend itself and be a friend to the United States. This, rather than a misguided plan of partition, presents a viable exit strategy for the United States and a definition of success in Iraq.

We need to engage in new thinking and develop new strategies for Iraq, but above all, no matter how dire the situation, we must not grasp at options that look good in theory but would prove disastrous in practice.

The writer is executive director of the Iraq Foundation. She served as the representative of the interim Iraqi government to the United States from November 2003 to December 2004. This article expresses her personal opinion only.

Dying To Save The G.O.P. Congress (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088163

IF you happened to be up around dawn on Tuesday, you could witness the death rattle of our adventure in Iraq live on CNN. Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador, and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the American commander, were making new promises from the bunker of the Green Zone, inspiring about as much confidence as Jackie Gleason and Art Carney hatching a get-rich-quick scheme to sell a kitchen gadget on "The Honeymooners."</object.title>

"Success in Iraq is possible and can be achieved on a realistic timetable," said Mr. Khalilzad. Iraq can be "in a very good place in 12 months," said General Casey. Even a child could see how much was wrong with this picture.

If there really is light at the end of the tunnel, why after three and a half years can't we yet guarantee light in Baghdad? Symbolically enough, television transmission of the Khalilzad-Casey press conference was interrupted by another of the city's daily power failures. If Iraq's leaders had signed on to the 12-month plan of "benchmarks" the Americans advertised, why were those leaders nowhere in sight? We found out one day later, when the prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, mocked the very idea of an America-imposed timetable. "I am positive that this is not the official policy of the American government, but rather a result of the ongoing election campaign," he said, adding dismissively, "And that does not concern us much."

Give the Iraqi leader credit for a Borat-like candor that almost every American in this sorry tale lacks. Of course all the White House's latest jabberwocky about "benchmarks" and "milestones" and "timetables" (never to be confused with those Defeatocrats' "timelines") is nothing more than an election-year P.R. strategy, as is the laughable banishment of "stay the course." There is no new American plan to counter the apocalypse now playing out in Iraq, only new packaging to pacify American voters between now and Nov. 7. And recycled packaging at that: President Bush had last announced that he and Mr. Maliki were developing "benchmarks" to "measure progress" in Iraq back in June.

As Richard Holbrooke, the broker of the Bosnia peace accords, has observed, the only real choice left for the president now is either "escalation or disengagement." But there are no troops, let alone money or national will, for escalation. Disengagement within a year, however, is favored by 54 percent of Americans and, more important, 71 percent of Iraqis. After Election Day, adults in Washington will step in, bow to the obvious and pull the plug. The current administration strategy — praying for a miracle — is not an option. The current panacea favored by anxious Republican Congressional candidates — firing Donald Rumsfeld — is too little, too late.

The adults in charge of disengagement will include the Bush family consigliere, James Baker, whose bipartisan Iraq Study Group will present its findings after the election, and John Warner, the Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, who has promised a re-evaluation of Iraq policy within roughly the same time frame. Democrats will have a role in direct proportion to the clout they gain in the midterms.

One way or another the various long-shot exit scenarios being debated in the capital will be sorted out: federalism and partition; reaching out somehow for help from Iran and Syria; replacing Mr. Maliki with a Saddam-lite strongman. There will be some kind of timeline, or whatever you want to call it, with enforced benchmarks, or whatever you want to call them, for phased withdrawal. (Read "Out of Iraq: A Practical Plan for Withdrawal Now" by George McGovern and William R. Polk for a particularly persuasive blueprint.) In any event, the timeline will end no later than Inauguration Day 2009.

In keeping with the political cynicism that gave birth to this war and has recklessly prolonged it, the only ones being kept in the dark about this inevitable denouement are our fighting men and women. They remain trapped, dying in accelerating numbers in a civil war that is now killing so many Iraqi civilians that Mr. Maliki this month ordered his health ministry to stop releasing any figures.

Our troops are held hostage by the White House's political imperatives as much as they are by the violence. Desperate to maintain the election-year P.R. ruse that an undefined "victory" is still within reach, Mr. Bush went so far at Wednesday's press conference as to say that "absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq. He explained his rationale to George Stephanopoulos last weekend, when he asserted that the number of casualties was the enemy's definition of success or failure, not his. "I define success or failure as to whether or not the Iraqis will be able to defend themselves," the president said, and "as to whether the unity government" is making the "difficult decisions necessary to unite the country."

Unfortunately, the war is a calamity by both of those definitions as well. The American command's call for a mere 3,000 more Iraqi troops to help defend Baghdad has gone unanswered. As we've learned from Operation Together Forward, when Iraqis do stand up, violence goes up. And when American and British troops stand down, murderous sectarian militias, some of them allied with that "unity" government, fill the vacuum, taking over entire cities like Amara and Balad in broad daylight. As for those "difficult decisions" Mr. Bush regards as so essential, the Iraqi government's policy is cut and run. Mr. Maliki is not cracking down on rampaging militias but running interference for their kingpin, Moktada al-Sadr. Mr. Maliki treats this radical anti-American Shiite cleric, his political ally, with far more deference than he shows the American president.

The ultimate chutzpah is that Mr. Bush, the man who sold us Saddam's imminent mushroom clouds and "Mission Accomplished," is trivializing the chaos in Iraq as propaganda. The enemy's "sophisticated" strategy, he said in last weekend's radio address, is to distribute "images of violence" to television networks, Web sites and journalists to "demoralize our country."

DOJ_NMG_0088164

This is a morally repugnant argument. The “images of violence” from Iraq are not fake — like, say, the fiction our government manufactured about the friendly-fire death of Pat Tillman or the upbeat news stories the Pentagon spends millions of dollars planting in Iraqi newspapers today. These images of violence are real. Americans really are dying at the fastest pace in at least a year, and Iraqis in the greatest numbers to date. To imply that this carnage is magnified by the news media, whether the American press or Al Jazeera, is to belittle the gravity of the escalated bloodshed and to duck accountability for the mismanagement of the war. Mr. Bush’s logic is reminiscent of Jeffrey Skilling’s obtuse view of his innocence in the Enron scandal, though at least Mr. Skilling has been held accountable for the wreckage of lives on his watch.

It is also wrong to liken what’s going on now, as Mr. Bush has, to the Tet offensive. That sloppy Vietnam analogy was first made by Mr. Rumsfeld in June 2004 to try to explain away the explosive rise in the war’s violence at that time. It made a little more sense then, since both the administration and the American public were still being startled by the persistence of the Iraq insurgency, much as the Johnson administration and Walter Cronkite were by the Viet Cong’s tenacity in 1968. Before Tet, as Stanley Karnow’s history, “Vietnam,” reminds us, public approval of L.B.J.’s conduct of the war still stood at 40 percent, yet to hit rock bottom.

Where we are in Iraq today is not 1968 but 1971, after the bottom had fallen out, Johnson had abdicated and America had completely turned on Vietnam. At that point, approval of Richard Nixon’s handling of the war was at 34 percent, comparable to Mr. Bush’s current 30. The percentage of Americans who thought the Vietnam War was “morally wrong” stood at 51, comparable to the 58 percent who now think the Iraq war was a mistake. Many other Vietnam developments in 1971 have their counterparts in 2006: the leaking of classified Pentagon reports revealing inept and duplicitous war policy, White House demonization of the press, the joining of moderate Republican senators with Democrats to press for a specific date for American withdrawal.

That’s why it seemed particularly absurd when, in his interview with Mr. Stephanopoulos last weekend, Mr. Bush said that “the fundamental question” Americans must answer is “should we stay?” They’ve been answering that question loud and clear for more than a year now.

What we should be thinking about instead are our obligations to those who are doing the staying. Kevin Tillman, who served with his brother in Iraq and Afghanistan, observed in an angry online essay this month: “Somehow back at home, support for the soldiers meant having a 5-year-old kindergartener scribble a picture with crayons and send it overseas, or slapping stickers on cars, or lobbying Congress for an extra pad in a helmet.”

If we really support the troops, we’ll move past Mr. Bush’s “fundamental question” to one from 1971 posed by a 27-year-old Vietnam veteran, John Kerry, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee: “How do you ask a man to be the last man to die for a mistake?”

NATO, Afghan Troops Battle Insurgents (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi

Associated Press, October 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) -- NATO and Afghan troops battled a large group of insurgents who attacked a military base in southern Afghanistan Saturday, killing 55 suspected militants, the alliance said. A roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight others.

The fighting in Uruzgan province came a day after an international human rights group criticized NATO-led troops in Afghanistan, saying their tactics increasingly endanger civilians and are turning the population against the Western alliance.

NATO's top commander apologized Saturday for civilian deaths caused by fighting between Taliban militants and NATO forces earlier in the week, but said insurgents endanger civilians by hiding among them.

"Sadly, in asymmetric warfare, when you're battling an insurgency, typically the insurgents do not play by the same rules that we would like to play by," U.S. Gen. James L. Jones said.

Some 100 to 150 militants attacked a military base north of Tarin Kowt in Uruzgan, NATO said. NATO-led and Afghan troops fought back with small arms fire, attack helicopters and airstrikes.

"Initial battle damage assessment indicates that up to 55 insurgents were killed," NATO said. One Afghan soldier was wounded.

On Sunday, a roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight other troops in Uruzgan, the alliance said. Three civilians were wounded. The nationalities of the slain and wounded soldiers were not disclosed.

A purported statement by the Taliban leadership, meanwhile, said the hardline militia has ruled out talks with President Hamid Karzai's government as long as foreign troops remain in the country.

The New York-based Human Rights Watch complained Friday that NATO's recent operations have killed dozens of civilians, but it also criticized the Taliban and other insurgents for putting civilians at risk "by using populated areas to launch attacks on NATO and Afghan government forces."

DOJ_NMG_0088165

"While NATO forces try to minimize harm to civilians, they obviously are not doing enough," said Sam Zarifi, the group's Asia research director. "NATO's tactics are increasingly endangering the civilians they are supposed to be protecting and turning the local population against them."

He spoke on the same day that the International Red Cross urged all sides in the Afghan conflict to spare civilians.

Jones, the NATO commander, expressed regret for civilian deaths but said Taliban fighters use civilians as human shields and said that in the heat of battle it can be difficult to separate the two.

The death of a civilian "is something that causes anybody in uniform to lose a lot of sleep," Jones said at a news conference at Bagram, the largest U.S. base in Afghanistan.

His comments came four days after clashes between NATO-led troops and insurgents in the south that Afghan officials say killed 30 to 80 civilians, including women and children. NATO said its initial investigation found 12 civilians killed.

The 32,000-strong NATO-led force took command of security operations in Afghanistan last month. The alliance has been battling resurgent Taliban militants in the south and east in the worst upsurge of violence since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban.

A Taliban statement e-mailed to The Associated Press by purported militia spokesman Muhammad Hanif dismissed Karzai's offer for talks Friday and called his administration a "puppet government." Hanif's exact ties to Taliban leaders are unclear, and it was not possible to verify the statement's authenticity.

"We say even today that there is no possibility of any talks when the country is under occupation," it said. "Any talks with aggressors would amount to selling the country."

On Friday, Karzai reiterated to reporters that he was ready to negotiate with Mullah Omar if the fugitive stops receiving support from neighboring Pakistan. Karzai says Omar is hiding in the Pakistani city of Quetta, while Pakistan says he is in Afghanistan.

Over the past two years, hundreds of Taliban supporters, including some senior officials, have reconciled with Karzai's government, but there is no indication that high-level talks with the rebel leadership have occurred.

Karzai made a similar offer in an interview with AP last January, telling Omar to "get in touch" if he wanted to talk peace, but fighting has since escalated sharply.

Human Rights Watch argued that NATO is relying too much on aircraft to attack insurgent positions. In June, the U.S. Central Command reported 340 airstrikes in Afghanistan, double the 160 strikes in Iraq in the same month, the group noted.

Maj. Luke Knittig, the spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan, said that "airpower is used extensively because it is an advantage and it can be decisive at a close fight."

But, he added, "its careful application is mandatory."

NATO: 70 Suspected Insurgents Killed (NSDY/AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi

Long Island Newsday/AP, October 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- NATO and Afghan troops killed 70 suspected militants who attacked a military base in southern Afghanistan, while a roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight others, the alliance said Sunday.

Some 100 to 150 militants attacked a military base north of Tarin Kowt in Uruzgan on Saturday, said Maj. Luke Knittig, a spokesman for the NATO-led force. The alliance and Afghan troops fought back for several hours with small arms fire, attack helicopters and airstrikes.

Seventy insurgents were killed, Knittig said, upgrading an earlier estimate of 55 dead. One Afghan soldier was wounded. It was impossible to independently verify the death toll at the remote battle site.

On Sunday, a roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight in Uruzgan, the alliance said. Three civilians were wounded. The nationalities of the slain and wounded soldiers were not disclosed.

Saturday's fighting in Uruzgan province came a day after an international human rights group criticized NATO-led troops in Afghanistan, saying their tactics increasingly endanger civilians and are turning the population against the Western alliance.

NATO's top commander apologized Saturday for civilian deaths caused by fighting between Taliban militants and NATO forces earlier in the week, but said insurgents endanger civilians by hiding among them.

"Sadly, in asymmetric warfare, when you're battling an insurgency, typically the insurgents do not play by the same rules that we would like to play by," U.S. Gen. James L. Jones said.

The New York-based Human Rights Watch complained Friday that NATO's recent operations have killed dozens of civilians, but it also criticized the Taliban and other insurgents for putting civilians at risk "by using populated areas to launch attacks on NATO and Afghan government forces."

DOJ_NMG_0088166

Jones, the NATO commander, expressed regret for civilian deaths but said Taliban fighters use civilians as human shields and said that in the heat of battle it can be difficult to separate the two.

The death of a civilian "is something that causes anybody in uniform to lose a lot of sleep," Jones said at a news conference at Bagram, the largest U.S. base in Afghanistan.

His comments came four days after clashes between NATO-led troops and insurgents in the south that Afghan officials say killed 30 to 80 civilians, including women and children. NATO said its initial investigation found 12 civilians killed.

The 32,000-strong NATO-led force took command of security operations in Afghanistan last month. The alliance has been battling resurgent Taliban militants in the south and east in the worst upsurge of violence since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban.

A purported statement by the Taliban leadership, meanwhile, said the hardline militia has ruled out talks with President Hamid Karzai's government as long as foreign troops remain in the country.

The statement, e-mailed to The Associated Press by purported militia spokesman Muhammad Hanif, dismissed Karzai's offer for talks Friday and called his administration a "puppet government." Hanif's exact ties to Taliban leaders are unclear, and it was not possible to verify the statement's authenticity.

On Friday, Karzai reiterated to reporters that he was ready to negotiate with Mullah Omar if the fugitive stops receiving support from neighboring Pakistan. Karzai says Omar is hiding in the Pakistani city of Quetta, while Pakistan says he is in Afghanistan.

Over the past two years, hundreds of Taliban supporters, including some senior officials, have reconciled with Karzai's government, but there is no indication that high-level talks with the rebel leadership have occurred.

Nato Kills 55 Afghan "Militants" (BBC)

BBC.com, October 29, 2006

Nato forces in Afghanistan say they have killed 55 suspected militants in clashes in southern Uruzgan province.

Some 100 to 150 militants attacked the Nato-led International Security Assistance Force troops at their military base north of Tarin Kowt.

Troops responded with small arms fire, attack helicopters and air strikes, the alliance said in a statement.

In a separate incident, a Nato solider was killed and eight injured by a roadside bomb, Nato said.

The blast hit a Nato military convoy in the southern province of Uruzgan, the statement said.

Three civilians were also wounded in the attack and were taken to a military hospital for treatment.

General: 'Mistakes' Made In Afghanistan Strike (CNN)

CNN.com, October 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan (CNN) -- NATO Supreme Allied Commander Gen. James Jones promised Afghan President Hamid Karzai at a news conference Saturday that a full investigation of an incident involving the unintended death of around 70 Afghan civilians would be launched.

Karzai has already assembled a team to investigate reports of civilian casualties caused by NATO air operations in southern Afghanistan.

On Thursday, Karzai issued a presidential decree to look into reports stemming from incidents in the Panjwayi and Pashmul districts of Kandahar province.

The team is made up of tribal and community elders from various districts of Kandahar province.

"The team has been asked to prepare a full and complete account of the incident and identify its causes and victims," Karzai said in a news release.

"The team will investigate the reports of civilian casualties and damages inflicted in this operation. They will also present their suggestions to the president on how such unfortunate incidents could be prevented in the future."

Also, NATO's International Security Assistance Force said it and the Afghan Defense Ministry are conducting a joint investigation into a Tuesday incident "in the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province, in which a number of civilians were killed along with a large number of insurgents."

ISAF commander Gen. David Richards, speaking to reporters in Kabul Saturday, said "in the night in the fog of war, mistakes were made."

ISAF has said they were "satisfied" that they "identified and targeted a group of insurgents," but said they were uncertain how many civilians were killed as a result but believes it to be about 70 individuals.

ISAF said it has consulted local elders and other citizens "who have indicated that the great majority of those killed were Taliban."

DOJ_NMG_0088167

The International Committee of the Red Cross said Friday that civilians are being caught in the crossfire.

"Aerial bombardment and ground offensives in populated rural areas, together with recent suicide attacks and roadside bombs in urban areas, have significantly increased the number of innocent civilians killed, injured or displaced," it said.

It urged all parties to respect international humanitarian law and "to maintain a distinction between fighters and civilians at all times." It said the law "also requires the parties to exercise constant care in the conduct of military operations and prohibits attacks directed against civilians or civilian objects."

The fighting in the south has been heavy this year with the resurgence of the Taliban militant movement and the expansion of ISAF in the southern provinces.

There were reports of more deadly violence Friday in the south.

Karim Rahimi, presidential spokesman, confirmed a report that 14 people in a vehicle were killed in a bombing near the Uruzgan provincial capital of Tarin Kowt. Among the victims were children and elderly.

Karzai said he deplores the Taliban and their activities.Karzai willing to talk with Taliban

Nevertheless, Karzai's spokesman confirmed a report that the president told reporters Friday he is willing to "talk and negotiate" with Taliban militants "for the sake of peace."

Rahimi said Karzai made similar remarks before.

It is unclear whether such a gesture was simply an academic utterance, since the hostilities and hatred between the Taliban and the Afghan government are fierce.

"Those people, if it is Mullah Mohammad Omar or others, if they want to talk and negotiate with us, they are welcome but they should first free themselves from foreign slavery and come to their own land and live in peace," Karzai is quoted as saying.

"For the sake of peace in Afghanistan, we are ready to negotiate with them. We have always negotiated with their supporters and people who control them, and will do again."

One of the others he was referring to is rebel commander Gulbeddin Hekmatyar.

Karzai isn't offering amnesty, the news report said.

And Karzai reportedly said if wanted militants return to Afghanistan, Afghans would be able to take legal action against them. Many of the militants are thought to be across the border in Pakistan.

"If any one had any legal cases against them, they can do that," he reportedly said.

NATO Says 55 Suspected Insurgents Killed (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi

AP, October 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan - NATO and Afghan troops battled a large group of insurgents who attacked a military base in southern Afghanistan Saturday, killing 55 suspected militants, the alliance said. A roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight others.

The fighting in Uruzgan province came a day after an international human rights group criticized NATO-led troops in Afghanistan, saying their tactics increasingly endanger civilians and are turning the population against the Western alliance.

NATO's top commander apologized Saturday for civilian deaths caused by fighting between Taliban militants and NATO forces earlier in the week, but said insurgents endanger civilians by hiding among them.

"Sadly, in asymmetric warfare, when you're battling an insurgency, typically the insurgents do not play by the same rules that we would like to play by," U.S. Gen. James L. Jones said.

Some 100 to 150 militants attacked a military base north of Tarin Kowt in Uruzgan, NATO said. NATO-led and Afghan troops fought back with small arms fire, attack helicopters and airstrikes.

"Initial battle damage assessment indicates that up to 55 insurgents were killed," NATO said. One Afghan soldier was wounded.

On Sunday, a roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight other troops in Uruzgan, the alliance said. Three civilians were wounded. The nationalities of the slain and wounded soldiers were not disclosed.

A purported statement by the Taliban leadership, meanwhile, said the hardline militia has ruled out talks with President Hamid Karzai's government as long as foreign troops remain in the country.

The New York-based Human Rights Watch complained Friday that NATO's recent operations have killed dozens of civilians, but it also criticized the Taliban and other insurgents for putting civilians at risk "by using populated areas to launch attacks on NATO and Afghan government forces."

"While NATO forces try to minimize harm to civilians, they obviously are not doing enough," said Sam Zarifi, the group's Asia research director. "NATO's tactics are increasingly endangering the civilians they are supposed to be protecting and turning the local population against them."

DOJ_NMG_0088168

He spoke on the same day that the International Red Cross urged all sides in the Afghan conflict to spare civilians.

Jones, the NATO commander, expressed regret for civilian deaths but said Taliban fighters use civilians as human shields and said that in the heat of battle it can be difficult to separate the two.

The death of a civilian "is something that causes anybody in uniform to lose a lot of sleep," Jones said at a news conference at Bagram, the largest U.S. base in Afghanistan.

His comments came four days after clashes between NATO-led troops and insurgents in the south that Afghan officials say killed 30 to 80 civilians, including women and children. NATO said its initial investigation found 12 civilians killed.

The 32,000-strong NATO-led force took command of security operations in Afghanistan last month. The alliance has been battling resurgent Taliban militants in the south and east in the worst upsurge of violence since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban.

A Taliban statement e-mailed to The Associated Press by purported militia spokesman Muhammad Hanif dismissed Karzai's offer for talks Friday and called his administration a "puppet government." Hanif's exact ties to Taliban leaders are unclear, and it was not possible to verify the statement's authenticity.

"We say even today that there is no possibility of any talks when the country is under occupation," it said. "Any talks with aggressors would amount to selling the country."

On Friday, Karzai reiterated to reporters that he was ready to negotiate with Mullah Omar if the fugitive stops receiving support from neighboring Pakistan. Karzai says Omar is hiding in the Pakistani city of Quetta, while Pakistan says he is in Afghanistan.

Over the past two years, hundreds of Taliban supporters, including some senior officials, have reconciled with Karzai's government, but there is no indication that high-level talks with the rebel leadership have occurred.

Karzai made a similar offer in an interview with AP last January, telling Omar to "get in touch" if he wanted to talk peace, but fighting has since escalated sharply.

Human Rights Watch argued that NATO is relying too much on aircraft to attack insurgent positions. In June, the U.S. Central Command reported 340 airstrikes in Afghanistan, double the 160 strikes in Iraq in the same month, the group noted.

Maj. Luke Knittig, the spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan, said that "airpower is used extensively because it is an advantage and it can be decisive at a close fight."

But, he added, "its careful application is mandatory."

Taking The Fight To The Taliban (NYT)

By Elizabeth Rubin

The New York Times Magazine, October 29, 2006

One morning this summer, I headed out with a U.S. Army convoy of Humvees, a truck called a wrecker and a packed supply truck into the Afghan mountains. I was among some two dozen American and Afghan soldiers from Task Force Warrior, an infantry battalion based in Zabul Province, just north of Kandahar. We trundled up a path fit for goats because the nearby riverbed was perfect for concealing improvised explosive devices, or I.E.D.'s. Soon enough, the truck keeled over into the riverbed anyway. To hoist it up, the wrecker had to crash through wheat fields, and within minutes a gray-bearded farmer appeared brandishing his stick. “Are you Afghan?” he shouted at Farooq, my interpreter. “I have 30 members in my family. Why did you destroy my wheat?” The old farmer then clasped my wrist with his ancient garden tool of a hand. “You Americans are all friends of Bush the persecutor. You see this area” — he swept his other arm in every direction — “these are all Taliban. But they don’t have power. As soon as we find power, I will kill all of you.”

Farooq tried to calm him, but the farmer was fixated on his crushed wheat stalks until he spotted First Sgt. Ruel Robbins, a red-cheeked, chest-first sort. Robbins looked the farmer over, then said, “Tell him I’m real sorry to drive over his wheat, but I had to ’cause my vehicle turned over.” The farmer eyed the sacks in the supply truck; Robbins gave him one of rice and two of flour.

The farmer watched us take off in a swirl of dust, and Specialist Melissa Elliot, who was driving our Humvee, said to Farooq: “We’re not trying to hurt them. We’re trying to protect their security. Why’d he get so upset with us? Is their wheat part of their religion or something?”

“It’s the food for his family, ma’am,” Farooq said patiently.

And so began our mission into the mountains of Zabul Province, 6,500 square miles of desert, farmland and 9,000-foot peaks with almost no paved roads to link one patch to the next. It’s a place where, just decades ago, families lived as nomads, until King Mohammad Zahir Shah gave them government land to settle on, and where national politics is superseded by Pashtunwali — the Pashtun codes for tribal coexistence, based on retaliation, mediation and hospitality. In 1994, when the Taliban movement of young religious students swept into Zabul offering an end to illegal road taxes and warlord rule, Zabul’s leaders simply joined hands with their Pashtun brothers. After the Taliban’s fall, President Hamid Karzai’s nephew was dispatched to head the Zabul Police; in July 2002, I found him besieged by locals, who put feces in his food and threatened to kill him. For five years now American forces have been chasing the Taliban in Zabul and attempting reconstruction. The police buildings have improved. A new hospital (financed by the United Arab Emirates) was finished. Roads were being laid in terrain so remote that when the Americans turned up, the villagers thought they must be Russians. The Americans opened a trade school in Qalat, the capital. But the pace of progress has been painfully slow. These remain the Taliban's mountains.

DOJ_NMG_0088169

There are 42,000 U.S. and NATO troops in Afghanistan today, trying to secure a country that is a third again the size of Iraq, where there are almost 150,000 U.S.-led troops. In the past two years, more than 300 American and NATO soldiers have died trying to stave off a resurgent Taliban. Already this year, some 1,500 Afghans have been killed. And while there were just two suicide bombings in 2002, there is now one about every five days.

With the Taliban's alarming offensive, which began last spring, American generals began speaking of a different war — not a war against terror but a war of ideas. In military jargon this meant balancing kinetic and nonkinetic activity. Or, in plain speech, fighting the Taliban versus nation-building, two goals often at odds. "This is the war for the people," Lt. Col. Frank Sturek, the battalion commander of Task Force Warrior, told me. Sturek served in Iraq under Lt. Gen. David Petraeus — one of the military's leading thinkers on counterinsurgency — in Mosul, a city with 50,000 university students. In Zabul, by contrast, the literacy rate is 15 percent, at best. Sometimes Sturek couldn't tell if people wanted to be catapulted to the 21st century or just left alone. On that he deferred to Delbar Jan Arman, the governor of Zabul Province and a former anti-Soviet mujahedeen, who mentored him on local ways — distinguishing a Taliban killing from a tribal feud or a quarrel over a boy lover. Arman explained cultural sensitivities: how pulling off a man's turban or opening the clothing box of a woman could set off a revolt. Sturek would nod. "The standard military play is, Land in, round up the men, find someone who is nasty and mean and arrest him, drop off supplies and split," Sturek told me. "We're trying to humanize ourselves. It's uncomfortable. You train an infantry battalion to kill the enemy, and it's hard to tone it down." The governor's response was always: "The people are simple. We can win this war if the Army stays nice with the people and if we embrace them."

After many sweaty hours, we rumbled into the Alamo Bar and Grill in Kharnay, elevation 8,000 feet. It was a fitting name for an outpost fashioned from a mud schoolhouse — dusty, waterless and powerless except for what the soldiers slurped off a Humvee battery. Charlie Company, Fourth Brigade, 10th Mountain Division, had been based here for nine weeks already when we arrived. They had been living on meals ready to eat, or M.R.E.'s, patrolling the mountains with packs weighing 60 pounds or more, befriending locals and being mortared and ambushed once or twice a week. Their skin was burned, their uniforms ripped. But for this evening, all suffering was suspended for barbecue night. The Humvees had brought frozen slabs of beef from the United States.

In downtime, the soldiers of Charlie Company would cram into a mud room to imbibe American culture — <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="286678">"Shark Tale," <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="288851">"The Bourne Supremacy," Lil Wayne, Toby Keith singing his "Taliban Song" — all courtesy of Pvt. Dennis Taylor and his DVD and CD collection. A teenager from Tampa's housing projects, Taylor grew up with the Bloods. The Army has set him straight, even if his buddies teased him because they couldn't decipher his lingo and he wasn't sure what continent he was on or what the Koran was. "It's Islam's holy book," said one soldier. "Man, how can you be fighting here and not know that," another teased. Taylor laughed and shrugged. </object.title></object.title>

At the other end of the spectrum was Cpl. Kyle Hayes, who had made Taylor his project and, like Sgt. Jon Terry, a sentimental tough guy from Louisiana, often shared meals with the Afghan soldiers accompanying their unit to taste their culture and to bond. Hayes owned a Web design company in New York City and until two years ago was touring with his band, "Half Left." The band had a revelation while producing a record near ground zero in Manhattan, and they all joined the Army. Hayes's family was stunned. "I was the only guy at basic training who voted for Kerry," he told me. Sometimes he felt weird on leave in New York City, where people gawk at uniforms, though a few older people thanked him. His life plan, as inscribed in his diary, is to be a rock star, business mogul and founder of a Texan city by 35, governor of Texas by 45 and president by 55.

Anticipation hung over the Alamo. Charlie Company's next mission was a bit of deceptive theater intended to lure the Taliban into ambushing the soldiers so they could counterattack. Part of the strategy involved Lt. Nathan Shields — a smiling, easygoing officer from Rochester — posing as a gullible new commander. Meanwhile, units hiding in the mountains would block the Taliban's escape. That night, a few squads hiked up a thousand feet, each soldier hauling water (temperatures in the day are usually in the 100's), food, rifle, knife, flashlight and first-aid kit, all atop 35 pounds of armor and ammunition. The Afghan soldiers carried little besides a rifle and ammunition. The American infantryman's burden is the Taliban's biggest advantage. Fleet-footed, carrying little more than an AK and a walkie-talkie, Taliban fighters could sail over the mountains.

The next morning we headed toward Solan, a village so unfriendly that when American soldiers airlifted in a bridge months earlier, it was burned down the next day. "We don't know if the Taliban burnt it or the villagers," Lt. David Patton, a tall, circumspect Texan with Task Force Warrior, said of the bridge in Solan. "Everyone believes in the mission," he added, "but there's an underlying thought that when we leave, it'll go back to the way it was." As Zabul's governor, Arman, had told me, Zabul's religious leaders all supported the Taliban, and in Afghanistan the most powerful platform is the minbar, a pulpit where the mullah delivers his Friday sermon. So although villagers were friendly when the Americans patrolled, they refused to help rebuild a school and a bazaar, for example, fearing retaliation from the Taliban who had destroyed them.

DOJ_NMG_0088170

Shortly after we left the first village on our route to Solan, the Afghan soldiers began picking up Taliban radio chatter about the new Americans. Robbins was pleased. We were the bait, and the plan was working. We spread out along the gorge for a long, edgy march. Outside Solan, we met Sayed Ali Sheikh, an elder of the area, in whose compound the Americans had stayed before. He said he couldn't guarantee that the place wasn't rigged with explosives, but nevertheless he handed Robbins the key, showed us shrapnel the size of a skateboard that had ricocheted off a mountain when American planes dropped a 500-pound bomb — and vanished. In no time, the soldiers transformed Ali Sheikh's compound into a base of operations: satellite hookup to call the Air Force for cover, mortar base near the well, sniper positions.

Ten lean men in turbans came to meet Shields, who played his role as new commander somewhat awkwardly. A strange dialogue ensued, led by one of the 10 men, Haji Gailani, whose oversize glasses, gabardine vest and cane denoted authority. He said that they didn't deny Taliban fighters were nearby. "If you can catch those people, thank you," he said. "If you want to slaughter my neck, please do." There was a little nervous laughter. No, no, Shields said, of course not. Then Gailani said: "You have planes. You can hear the Taliban on your radios. And still you cannot force them out of here. How can we?"

Others began to speak up. Planes had attacked the mountains the night before, the men said. They had heard about the bombing of civilians in Kandahar. They wanted to know if they were about to be bombed. Robbins advised them to stay near the thickest walls and shut off the lights. Then they left.

And the waiting began. Pvt. Andrew Richards pulled out photos of his family, who lived in Colombia. Specialist Jonathon Routledge, whose voice still cracked and who couldn't believe he was roped into the Army by some cool recruitment videos, poked at a chick that was pecking at spilled tea. Shields and the medic climbed onto the compound roof to give coordinates in case of a medevac. Pvt. Jason Belford was so itchy that he played can-you-down-a-pack-of-crackers-in-two-minutes.

The radio began sputtering with Taliban voices. An Afghan policeman, who went by the code name No. 5, had found their frequency. He heard them discussing our compound. They knew everything: how many Americans and Afghans, the location of the mortar, the sniper positions, the satellite and the flower (code for me, the woman in the group). Presumably one of our earlier visitors was an informant. No. 5 seemed a little dodgy, too — perhaps working only for the troops, perhaps the Taliban, perhaps both.

Shields, Sgt. Jeff Griffin, Belford and a few others moved out to check the area around the compound for mines. Just as we neared the rock garden, a detonation jolted us. A deafening sound. A black smoke squall. Amazingly, no one was hurt. But something was wrong. They had been out to that rock garden twice and found nothing. Suspicion fell on No. 5.

"Fire a mortar," shouted one of the soldiers. Dan Guenther, a sniper from Texas, spotted something. Everyone assumed an imminent showdown. Someone threw a grenade into an outcropping to see if it was booby-trapped.

"If you're gonna come to the party, come already!" shouted Guenther. Then he suggested they should all run out in front of the house, smack their butts and provoke a fight. It was 6:42 p.m., and the light was fading. Shields and a few others popped out of the compound's shelter, hoping to draw fire. As darkness fell, I climbed up to talk to Specialist Tommy Glasgow, who was perched on the roof. He said that there was no way the Taliban would pick a fight after seeing all the U.S. fire power and listening to the bombers occasionally buzzing overhead. We talked about the mission in Zabul, and Glasgow said: "As bad as I don't want to be here, we should be. The Romanians are coming to take over from us, and the Taliban are just gonna cream 'em."

The fight never did come, and when we got back to the Alamo, the Americans were packing, and the Afghan police and soldiers appeared bewildered, convinced they would be dead in 24 hours. One policeman had already defected to the Taliban, I was told. "We'll be bombing this compound in a few weeks 'cause it'll be filled with Taliban," Hayes told me. He tried to find an hour every day to write in his diary. On May 12, for example, he had written: "I killed some people last night. Second squad is out looking for corpses right now. We got mortared right around dark ... when I was getting all the last stuff done for the day, and I got a hypoglycemic attack when I was doing sit-ups. It was still a good day, though. I got a lot done. Everyday I grow stronger."

A few days later, the Alamo was indeed abandoned by the Afghan forces.

The final draft of the U.S. military's latest counterinsurgency manual, written under the direction of Lt. Gen. David Petraeus and Lt. Gen. James Mattis, emphasizes that if you skimp on resources, endurance and meeting the population's security requirements, you lose. Yet for the past five years, the Pashtun provinces have been plagued by a lack of troops and resources. James Dobbins, President George W. Bush's former special envoy to Afghanistan, blames the White House, which he said had a predisposition against nation-building and international peacekeeping. The Bush administration rejected Afghan and State Department appeals to deploy a peacekeeping force in the provinces, dismissed European offers of troops and had already begun shifting military resources to Iraq, Dobbins told me, while U.S. troops in Afghanistan were to be limited to counterterrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0088171

"In manpower and money," he added, "this was the least resourced American nation-building effort in our history." In Afghanistan, the White House spent 25 times less per capita than in Bosnia and deployed one-fiftieth the troops. Much of the money that was pledged didn't show up for years. "The main lesson of Afghanistan is low input, low output," Dobbins said. "If you commit low levels of military manpower and economic assistance, what you get are low levels of security and economic growth."

The draft counterinsurgency manual is thoughtful, full of details and warnings like these: losing moral legitimacy means losing the war; the more force is used, the less effective it is; provoking combat usually plays into the enemy's hands; and building a government through illegitimate actions like unlawful detention and torture is self-defeating, even against fighters who conceal themselves among noncombatants.

Yet while I was in the south, I saw how readily vicious practices are condoned. An Afghan security official who insisted that I not use his name but who was an aide to a prominent southern governor, told of an instance when they couldn't find a boy suspected of plotting an attack. "We sent out a command — arrest all his brothers, uncles, cousins, relatives, all of them," he said. "When we arrested the relatives, no one knew what that boy was doing. Still we beat them all until they would shout, 'Write that we killed 5 or 10 people, whatever you want, and I will say anything.' " In Zabul's provincial capital, Qalat, the police proudly showed me three "Taliban" they had just captured. One of them had been beaten so badly he could hardly walk, and his feet were oozing puss. His eyes were mere wrinkles in swollen tissue. An American intelligence officer looked slightly embarrassed when he walked into the police station.

With a corrupt justice system, young Afghan men on the receiving end of injustice have often felt their honor could only be restored through acts of revenge. One night, a doctor introduced me to a young farmer who asked me not to use his name. He had been shot by U.S. forces in a gunfight a year earlier. Seven metal clamps were holding his leg in place. Though deeply religious, he never liked the Taliban regime. His family was relieved when Mullah Omar and the "Afghan Arabs" who first came to fight the Soviets in the 1980's fled Kandahar. He believed that Karzai and the international community would help build the country. "But they didn't," he said in the dark little flat where we met. "They just came to arrest the people." His father was a tribal leader with pomegranate orchards, and relatives often appealed to him to get their family members out of Afghan and American prisons. He would urge the Americans not to be fooled by false reports naming "Taliban." The real Taliban had mostly fled to Pakistan.

About a year and a half ago, he told me, a mine exploded next to an American convoy. His father was sitting in a mosque when he was rounded up by coalition troops. Twenty days later, his father's body was dropped off at a hospital. "I couldn't control myself," the young man said, nearly knocking over the gas lamp with his awkward, pogo-stick leg. "I wanted to avenge. I knew where the Taliban operated, because they would come at night, and so I found the commander of a small group. He welcomed me warmly and told me: 'It is the time of jihad. You are a lion and a hero.' "

Colonel Sturek, a powerfully built, blue-eyed Maryland man so cleanshaven that he appeared bald, and Governor Arman, a heavily bearded engineer, made an unlikely team. They shared a meal of sheep, rice and melon four times a week to talk strategy. Sturek loved Arman's vision of a network of roads by 2008, linking up Zabul's remote districts, where they would build schools and markets. Zabul straddled the most dangerous stretch of highway in Afghanistan. After 3 each afternoon, Taliban blocked the roads, looking for foreigners, money, spies, satellite phones. Sometimes they would just burn up buses or trucks. They even set loose a donkey on the path to an American base, rigged with rockets, mortars and a detonation card.

Across Afghanistan's southern provinces, American and Afghan troops were responding to the Taliban resurgence with Operation Mountain Thrust. In Zabul, the focus was on Taliban fighters in the Day Chopan mountains. Sturek's goal was to disable the Taliban leadership, allow the Americans to find weapons caches, bring in aid and persuade people that they had no intention of interfering with their religion. As the full moon moved into place last May, enabling a predawn landing, Afghan and American soldiers with Charlie Company, Special Forces and U.S. doctors air-assaulted into the Day Chopan mountains, taking scattered gunfire, and descended on the tiny village of Hazarbuz. Special Forces soldiers with goggled sniffer dogs rounded up the men, numbered their hands with markers and interrogated them. Some were arrested and flown back to base camp. I followed Jeff Griffin and his squad, who were dispatched to the villagers' homes with a message: Governor Arman is coming here to find out what you need, and a medical team has come to treat sick people and animals. This was typical of the American balancing act in Afghanistan. The Village Medical Outreach unit consists of reservist doctors who bring chests full of hygiene kits and medicine to villages that have just been raided by fighting forces.

We climbed up a hill through apricot and almond orchards to reach the scattered homes. We found a woman in a red velvet dress, who had beaded necklaces and a pair of scissors dangling from her neck. She said that the men were all sleeping. Then she said that they had left when we came. Griffin told her about the doctors, but she seemed frightened and said that she didn't want medical attention. We wandered from house to house until a radio call came in from an observation unit. They had seen a boy wearing black, possibly an informant, running toward one of the houses.

DOJ_NMG_0088172

More climbing, more rocks, until we reached a wind-swept mountain top where an old crippled man emerged to hug Griffin, who hugged him back, uncomfortably — after all, he had come to search his house. He then ordered the boy in black to move to a clearing so the observation unit, on a nearby mountain, could see if he was the runner. The soldiers rummaged through the house, turning up small piles of paper and boxes that seemed suspect. It turned out that the boxes were full of snuff and the house was just a shop. As we were about to leave, the radio blared out to Griffin: Don't forget to tell them about the Village Medical Outreach.

As we rambled back down under the noonday sun, exhausted and thirsty, plucking apricots, almonds and mulberries off the trees, I remembered the Afghans I'd met complaining about Americans pillaging their harvest. It wasn't hard to see how a few apricots could transmute into theft or how speaking to a woman after you have rounded up all the men could transmute into "Americans are abusing our women." One afternoon, I had a car accident in Zabul. Within minutes, some 100 men pulled over and began heaving the wreck out of the ditch. As I crouched in the dirt wrapped in a tentlike Kuchi shawl, not a single man glanced my way. Rather, they asked my wounded translator if his wife was O.K. Someone must have sensed a foreigner, however, because 10 minutes after we left for the hospital, the Taliban showed up. They pummeled the driver, demanding to know what happened to the foreigner. He lied and saved his life. But that moment, when not one person glanced my way, offered a window into how seriously they abide by rules that are utterly alien to a 19-year-old American soldier. Sturek constantly struggled with pushing "cultural sensitivity" down the chain of command. It was nearly impossible.

On our long walk back down the mountain, two privates were trying to grapple with the contingencies of their lives, free will, U.S. history and America's intangible objectives. They were having an existential moment and craving a meal at Red Lobster. This valley in Zabul reminded one of them, Specialist Joshua Pete, of canyons where the U.S. Army once fought his Navajo ancestors. Pete thought he had had a calling, that his country needed him. But because of Afghanistan, he had lost both his scholarship to Dartmouth and his fiancée. He didn't believe in "this" anymore. Half the Afghans, he said, didn't even want "our billions to build this country." He wanted to be home fighting drug gangs in downtown L.A. or helping impoverished people in Flagstaff.

Back in the village of Hazarbuz, I found Governor Arman in his white robes, blazer and turban, sipping tea with Colonel Sturek. After one week, the governor said, once we were all gone, the Taliban would punish the people for sitting with Americans and the governor. Sturek agreed, but added that if the Americans didn't come, the people would have no idea there was an alternative.

Men and boys filtered down to meet the governor. They sat cross-legged, skeptical, nervous. Arman was an earthy man, and while kind ("Tell anyone who has run to the mountains to come talk, there'll be no trouble. I am your governor. Why am I here? To hear your problems."), he also let them have it.

"Look at your kids," he said, pointing to the boys. The men did, and he winced. "Look at their hands and feet, the infections on their skin, their bad education. Everyone looks sick. Don't they have the right to be educated?

"Are the Punjabi kids in this situation?" he then asked, referring to the children of the ruling ethnic group in Pakistan. "Why do people call it jihad here in Afghanistan? Why don't they fight this jihad in Quetta and Pakistan? We need to defend our country from the Punjabis."

He told them that this war was a Pakistani drama. The Pakistanis were sending Taliban to burn Afghan schools while their own children were being educated. If America leaves, he warned, you will all be slaves of Pakistan.

Over the three days we stayed, Arman's speeches grew harsher, and the men who visited him and Sturek grew more numerous and more attentive. The governor and the colonel could pick out the Taliban informants — like the young man with good sneakers whom everyone deferred to. Jin Kong radios, which work with solar power, batteries or a hand crank, were handed out by the U.S. military to the locals. The elders got bicycles; kids, school bags with pencils and other supplies.

Why did these Americans come here, the governor bellowed? Because the Taliban had not been nice with the people of this country. The Taliban beat the women, cut the heads off people, went to the north and made tribal enmity for Afghan people. How many Hazara, he asked, were killed in Shajoy (a district of Zabul)? Taliban had slaughtered hundreds of Hazara, an ethnic group descended from the Mongols and primarily Shiite. Arman repeated the accounts of Taliban cutting the throat of a little girl in front of her mother, then killing the mother, of the Taliban putting a gun in the mouth of a boy, who began to suck it and then they shot him. "Don't you have sons?" he asked. Some of the men averted their eyes, fidgeting in the dust.

On one occasion, Arman asked the men who had come if any among them could read and write. He held up a paper with the word God written on it. None of them could read. "If you can't read the name of God, you are blind," he said. Trying to raise their Pashtun pride, he pointed to one of the interpreters, a Hazara from the neighboring district of Jaghori. "What is your district like?" he asked the interpreter, who dutifully reported it had 72 schools, 32 of them high schools, and that all boys and girls were educated. They had electricity, radio stations, lawyers and engineers. "Why are we Pashtuns always fighting?" asked the governor. "You will all be laborers to the Jaghori people because you are illiterate and uneducated."

DOJ_NMG_0088173

Perhaps, but the men wanted to know when their relatives would be let out of U.S. prisons in Kandahar and Bagram. And then a rocket exploded, then another, then gunfire began to echo back and forth between the valley walls. I trekked up to where snipers were perched on a small slope in front of a boulder. On the radio, we could hear Shields, who had taken some men and gone to patrol a valley. He was amazingly calm. "We're under fire," he said. "We're in a riverbed on the side of a hill." In fact, they were pinned down in an irrigation ditch with bullets throwing up dust and rocks all around them. An A-10 Warthog screeched across the sky as a 500-pound bomb smacked the side of the mountain.

We could still hear Shields breathing as he walked up the mountain. And that oddly calm voice: "We're definitely putting ourselves at a disadvantage. Pretty much anywhere I'm standing they could take us out."

A donkey began braying as the full moon drifted up above the mountains. Capt. Craig Johnson told Lieutenant Shields to watch out because shadows would cast long with that moon.

The Taliban, judging from the radio communications we were monitoring, seemed to be wounded and out of ammunition. One of them invited another to prayer. The other demurred, saying he was worried that he would be spotted. "O.K., then pray there, and I'll pray here," the first man said. Later, when I met a Taliban commander in Pakistan, he told me that they knew the Americans listened to their radios, so that the five daily prayers were often used as code to signal anything from "I've run out of food" to "Ambush them."

The next afternoon, we flew by helicopter to Andar, a nearby village. I sat in the fields with a former teacher named Anwarjan. The governor had appointed him district chief for all of Day Chopan, but Anwarjan could barely travel. The entire province, he said, was Taliban. Still, he was busy with Shields getting hundreds of kids to school in the central town. He had convinced the parents that Pakistan wants their children to stay wild and uneducated. "I have 300 students now," he said. "They're changed. They are polite, greet people, treat their mothers well. One man can change a generation."

But his efforts, he said, were being undermined by the constant incursions of Taliiban from Pakistan. "The leader of Day Chopan, Mullah Kahar, lives in Quetta," in Pakistan, Anwarjan said. "All the heads are there. So why don't you do anything?"

U.S. intelligence knows the same thing. As Seth Jones, an analyst with Rand, told The New York Times earlier this year, Pakistani intelligence agents are advising the Taliban about coalition plans and tactical operations and provide housing, support and security for Taliban leaders. Sturek told me that the U.S. is well aware that the Taliban heads are in Quetta. On one side, he said, most U.S. policy makers argue that the Pakistanis are our friends. On the other side are those, including some in the military, who say, "Let's just drive into Quetta."

I often received updates from Charlie Company soldiers after leaving Afghanistan. One of their platoon was killed heading up to an observation post in Day Chopan. After they pulled out of Day Chopan, one of the soldiers told me, they heard that things weren't going so well and that the Taliban were using the fact that the Romanians had taken over to claim the Russians were back. And another soldier wrote: "Our platoon got sent to a National Guard unit to help them out. They've lost like six people in the last week, but none of them were from our platoon.We were in Kandahar for a little while to get resupplied, and you're notkidding about the Canadians going down.We kept having to go to the big ceremonies for their bodies to get loaded on the plane.It seemed like they were getting messed up pretty bad. I definitely don't get the whole 'success story' thing."

With Army Stretched Thin, Could The U.S. Respond To A New Crisis? (HC)

By Michael Hedges

Houston Chronicle, October 29, 2006

Retired general says deployments put America in 'strategic peril'

FORT HOOD — At this sprawling base on the Central Texas plains, a few hundred soldiers of the 17,000-member 1st Cavalry Division made tearful goodbyes to family members before making another trip to Iraq this month.

On the other side of Fort Hood, soldiers of the 4th Infantry Division trickled back from Iraq at the end of a bloody, yearlong deployment that left scores of their buddies dead and hundreds more wounded.

The quick pace of comings and goings is evidence of an Army strained to the breaking point, with little in reserve if the United States is forced to respond to a new crisis, according to military analysts.

"One third of our combat units are in Iraq and Afghanistan, and they are the best troops we've ever fielded, but essentially every other brigade is not ready to fight," said retired Maj. Gen. Barry McCaffrey, who makes frequent trips to Iraq as a military consultant.

"America is in a period of strategic peril," he added. "What happens if we have to confront North Korea or Iran?"

Paul Rieckhoff, a former Army captain in Iraq who heads Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, said his organization has gathered extensive evidence that has convinced him the Army is nearing a crisis.

"The rate of deployment is absolutely not sustainable," he said. "We are mortgaging the future of the Army. If this goes on much longer, we are going to get a post-Vietnam-type hangover in the military."

DOJ_NMG_0088174

After Vietnam, the Army was called the "hollow force," afflicted with inadequate troop levels, training and equipment, leading to most of its units being rated unfit for combat, military analyst James Jay Carafano of the Heritage Foundation said.

Some military leaders in Washington as well as in Fort Hood, however, said the Army is adapting to pressure on staffing and other aspects of its operation and that the military would be able to muster an appropriate response to another trouble spot in the world.

The U.S. Army, with a total active force of a half-million, supplies the overwhelming majority of the more than 150,000 service personnel in Iraq and Afghanistan. This month, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker indicated the number probably will remain the same through 2010.

"The problem is simple: Our military is designed to win wars quickly, not occupy foreign countries for extended periods," said Carafano.

Military on the defenseGen. Peter Pace, the head of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, conceded last week that the Army and Marines were being forced to deploy more often than the ideal of two years home for every year in a combat zone.

"We are using the force faster than we would like to," he said. "That does not mean that they're not available to go to the next fight."

Pace said troops in combat had all the equipment needed, and units not deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan do not.

"It is true that our units that are here at home are not fully equipped as they would be if there wasn't a war going on," he said. "But none of our potential enemies should miscalculate the capacity of this nation to generate overwhelming combat power tomorrow to defend our national interests."

The repeated deployments to combat zones are causing some senior non-commissioned officers, who are considered the backbone of the Army, to reassess their careers. "We were willing to go to war to defend the country. But when we got in the Army, the idea wasn't to be deployed overseas every other year indefinitely," said Perry Jeffries, 45, of Killeen , a former Army first sergeant who got out after a deployment to Iraq.

Pressures on familiesCol. Larry Phelps, a 28-year veteran, said soldiers entering today's Army understand what is being asked of them. Most embrace it, he said.

"This isn't the Cold War Army anymore," he said. Phelps said the Army today is actually in better shape than it was in the decade after the Vietnam War when he joined.

"I joined the Army in 1978. That was a broken Army," he said. "It was twice the size of the Army we have today, but it was not capable of doing the things we can do today."

Still, the veterans association's Rieckhoff said his group has gathered substantial anecdotal evidence of the strain on soldiers and their families.

"What we are hearing over and over again from senior sergeants and junior officers is that the toll on families is terrible," Rieckhoff said. "Our people don't like to whine in public, but to us they talk about divorces, alcohol abuse, depression."

The anecdotal testimony of strain on families is backed by figures compiled by the Pentagon. Divorce rates among the roughly 55,000 married Army officers tripled to 6 percent between 2002 and 2004. Though the numbers are relatively small, suicides are rising in the Army: In 2005, 83 soldiers committed suicide, compared with 67 in 2004 and 60 in 2003.

Senior officers of the 1st Cavalry Division at Fort Hood strenuously object to any suggestion that their unit is overtaxed by the war.

"At the pace we are on right now, this is a sustainable force," said Brig. Gen. Vincent Brooks, one of two deputy commanders of the division. "I don't think we are at the point of erosion."

Phelps said the Army is more responsive to the pressures on families with the high rate of deployments. He is assigned to stay at Fort Hood while the division deploys to Iraq and work on issues that arise with families of the force's 17,000 troops.

Juggling two battlesBut ample evidence shows that the Army is scrambling to cope with the demands of Iraq and Afghanistan:

·The Army has forced about 75,000 soldiers since 2003 to continue serving after their enlistments ended, a policy called "stop loss." That has applied mostly to units slated to deploy to Iraq and Afghanistan. Now, 11,000 soldiers are serving beyond the term of their enlistments. Of course, the military has extensively tapped Reserve and National Guard units to augment military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

·The Army, to keep hitting enlistment targets, has increased financial incentives, added many more recruiters, raised the age of eligible enlistees (from 35 to 40 in January, then to 42 in June) and taken more enlistees who were considered marginal before because of past legal problems.

·The Pentagon has increasingly relied on contractors in Iraq, with more than 35,000 working there now, mainly in food services, transportation and construction. Some Navy and Air Force personnel also are being pressed into jobs such as driving trucks into Iraq that usually would have been assigned to ground forces.

DOJ_NMG_0088175

Military experts said the stressful deployment rate is a result of an Army cut too deep, too fast since the end of the Cold War.

About 504,000 soldiers were in the active-duty Army last week, according to the Pentagon. That compares with nearly 800,000 during peacetime 20 years ago. Since then, the Army was reduced from 18 divisions to 12, then 10.

"We have the smallest army America has fielded since 1939, when the pre-World War II buildup began," McCaffrey said.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union, the consensus in Washington was that the military could be reduced to reap a "peace dividend."

Military planners believed that high-tech weaponry rather than "boots on the ground" was critical, leading to further cuts. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld came into office in 2001 with a commitment to continuing the transformation.

Spanning the globeOf those half-million soldiers, roughly two-thirds are in support roles and can't simply be rotated in and out of Iraq. Tens of thousands are needed in other overseas posts, from Korea to Djibouti to Bosnia. Thousands of others, including recruiters and trainers, are permanently based in the United States.

The assignment of fighting street-by-street battles with insurgents in Iraq has fallen mainly on the Army, and the much smaller but also greatly stressed U.S. Marine Corps, more than the Navy or Air Force, which have been solely in supportive roles since the fall of Baghdad.

Experts said there are no easy solutions to the strains. The Pentagon, beginning in 2004, has reconfigured the existing pool of troops into brigade combat teams of about 4,000 soldiers as a way to get more soldiers into the deployment rotations for Iraq. There are 36 such teams available to deploy. The Army is aiming to increase that to 43 within a couple of years.

Even if the Army added 80,000 soldiers, as Congress proposes to do, it would take years before more brigades would be ready for combat, at a cost of billions of dollars.

But in the long term, analysts said, the United States has to make a significant financial commitment to maintain a military capable of protecting the country and intervening abroad when necessary.

At the height of the Vietnam War, American taxpayers spent 9.4 percent of the gross domestic product on the military. Twenty years ago, during peacetime, 6.2 percent of the GDP was channeled to the Pentagon. That had fallen to 3 percent by 2001. It is now back up to about 4 percent, or roughly $400 billion annually.

"We need to spend about 4 percent of the GDP on the military for the next decade to fix it," Carafano said. "That should be something America can do."

‘Antiwar’ And Other Fighting Words (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON

DEMOCRATS have spent three decades trying to exorcise the ghost of Senator George S. McGovern, whose losing 1972 presidential campaign calling for a withdrawal from Vietnam crystallized his party’s image as soft on national defense.

But surveying the midterm elections last week, Mr. McGovern, 84, said he sees an opportunity for an antiwar campaign in the 2008 presidential race.

“I would love to be running again if I were 25 years younger,” he said in an interview from his Montana home. “I think I would win.”

On the eve of the midterms, dismay over the Iraq war has propelled the Democrats to a political status they have not enjoyed since before Mr. McGovern: for the first time in decades, polls show that the public trusts Democrats as much as Republicans to handle foreign affairs.

But as they look ahead, Democrats are torn between two visions of their history. Some potential candidates in the 2008 Democratic primary and many liberal activists argue that the Republican responsibility for the Iraq war has, in effect, freed the Democrats from Mr. McGovern’s legacy. They say the 2006 elections will provide a mandate for a new antiwar argument: that troops can be pulled from Iraq in order to shore up American security elsewhere in the world.

Other strategists and political scientists argue that the Iraq war has given the Democrats a different opportunity to lay to rest their McGovernite image, in part by rejecting calls for a quick withdrawal in Iraq.

“All voters are doing is giving Democrats a chance, and we better not blow it,” said Gary Hart, the former senator and presidential candidate.

A younger McGovern could probably win the Democratic primary, Mr. Hart said, but he would still lose the general election. “Just running on a platform of ‘get us out of Iraq’ is not going to solve the Democrats’ problem on the issue of national security,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0088176

After Vietnam, there was a brief time when both parties seemed to compete to be seen as the party of restraint: the moment in the 1976 presidential race when Senator Bob Dole, the Republican nominee for vice president, charged that the "Democrat wars" of the 20th century had killed or wounded "1.6 million Americans, enough to fill the city of Detroit."

But the Iranian hostage crisis three years later put an end to that short peace fad. And ever since President Ronald Reagan's campaign for a military buildup, Democrats have suffered from a reputation as the party that was less sure to keep America safe. Their only presidential victories were in the years of relative peace between the end of the cold war and the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11.

During the midterm campaigns, Democrats have risen in the polls merely by attacking President Bush's conduct of the war. They have not spelled out or agreed on a clear alternative of their own.

That luxury, however, is coming to an end. On Nov. 8, the day after the election, attention will shift toward the 2008 presidential race. How to handle Iraq could be the defining issue of the Democratic primary, and criticizing President Bush may not count for much in the general election since the Republican nominee may also be a vocal critic of his administration's handling of the war.

Pleasing the party's "bring 'em home" base while burnishing its security credentials may not be easy. A USA Today poll released Friday showed that more than 80 percent of the public expects Democrats to set a timetable for a withdrawal from Iraq if they take control of Congress. But so far none of Democratic Congressional leaders has called for a fixed deadline.

And although all the potential primary candidates — and President Bush for that matter — say they want the troops home as soon as possible, on the question of a timetable, their views could hardly be more disparate.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the most prominent candidate, has rejected any timetable for withdrawal. Senator John Kerry, the 2004 nominee, and Senator Russell Feingold of Wisconsin have already called for a fixed deadline.

Many Democrats, Mr. Feingold argued, have made a "serious mistake" by getting caught up in the party's Vietnam history. Fearing Mr. McGovern's fate, they are stuck in what he called "the Iraq trap."

"They think if somebody calls for a timetable to get out of Iraq they will be labeled as 'cut and run,' " Mr. Feingold said. Democratic gains in the 2006 elections, he said, will show that the public accepts the broader argument for a pullout from Iraq in order to fight terrorism more effectively elsewhere in the world.

Kevin Mattson, a liberal historian at Ohio University, argued that the comparisons to the McGovern campaign were misleading and "goofy."

For one thing, unlike critics of the Iraq war, neither Mr. McGovern nor any other prominent Democrat opposed the Vietnam War because it was an impediment to the fight against Communism — an argument that would have been hard to make at that advanced stage of the cold war. Advisers to Vice President Hubert Humphrey urged him to make such a case in 1968 but he refused, Mr. Mattson said.

Others, however, argued that letting their victories this year eclipse the McGovern experience may be the biggest risk that Democrats face in 2008. "My concern is that some Democrats will learn the wrong lessons from our victory," Senator Joe Biden of Delaware said.

Noting the number of conservative Democratic challengers this fall, he said that voters are seeking "a bipartisan consensus" about how to leave more than chaos and instability in Iraq. "A pullout is not a plan," Mr. Biden said, "it is a reaction." What sealed the Democrats' image after Vietnam, historians say, was not just Mr. McGovern's campaign but also their reaction as public opinion turned on the war. After 1968, Democrats in Congress began pressing to curtail the war or cut off its financing. And their efforts reached a peak after the post-Watergate midterm election of 1974, when many Democrats interpreted their landslide gains as a mandate to cut back on national defense.

No one is making similar proposals today. But James M. Lindsay, a director of the Robert S. Strauss for International Security and Law at the University of Texas in Austin and a former national security official in the Clinton administration, said big wins in 2006 may well embolden antiwar Democrats in 2008, while pulling "centrists" like Mrs. Clinton closer to withdrawal.

"But there are going to be a lot of Democratic strategists whispering in their ears that 'you don't want to go there' because it is bad politics, and it is bad policy to boot," he said. "The problem is you also have to win the general election. You don't need to appeal to people who have made up their mind and had a bumper sticker on the back of their car for the last four years."

Mr. McGovern, for his part, said the debate reminded him of the way Republicans used to accuse Democrats of being weak on Communism, even though containment was a Democratic idea. "I sure hope we are not going to have 50 years of being weak on terrorism in the eyes of Republicans," he said.

Are We The Mongols Of The Information Age? (LAT)

Max Boot

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088177

The future of U.S. power rests in its Industrial Age military adapting to decentralized adversaries.

GREAT POWERS cease to be great for many reasons. In addition to the causes frequently debated — economics, culture, disease, geography — there is an overarching trend. Over the last 500 years, the fate of nations has been increasingly tied to their success, or lack thereof, in harnessing revolutions in military affairs.

These are periods of momentous change when new technologies combine with new doctrines and new forms of organization to transform not only the face of battle but also the nature of the state and of the international system. Because we are in the middle of the fourth major revolution since 1500 — the Information Revolution — it is important to grasp the nature and consequences of these upheavals.

Until the 15th century, the mightiest military forces belonged to the Mongols. But strong as they were in the days of bows and arrows, the Mongols could not keep pace with the spread of gunpowder weapons and the rise of centralized governments that used them. They fell behind, and Europe surged to the forefront. In 1450, Europeans controlled just 15% of the world's surface. By 1914 — following not only the Gunpowder Revolution but also the first Industrial Revolution — their domain had swollen to an astounding 84% of the globe.

Not all European states were equal, of course. Some early leaders in gunpowder technology — for instance, Spain and Portugal — were also-rans when industrialization began in the 18th century. At least Spain and Portugal managed to maintain their independence. Numerous others — from Poland to the Italian city-states — were not so lucky. They endured prolonged occupation by foreigners more skilled than they were at new forms of warfare.

The big winners of the Gunpowder Revolution (from roughly 1500 to 1700) were the northern European states, from Britain to Russia. But the Romanovs, Habsburgs and Ottomans did not survive the cataclysmic conflict of the first Industrial Age — World War I — and their empires collapsed, even as Germany and Japan were catapulting themselves into the upper rank of nation-states largely through their growing military expertise. World War II — the major conflict of the second Industrial Revolution, defined by the internal combustion engine, airplane and radio — further shook up the international balance of power.

The conventional assumption is that the outcome of World War II was virtually foreordained: The Allies won because they were bigger and richer than the Axis. There is some truth to this. But by 1942, Germany, Italy and Japan controlled most of the natural resources of East Asia and Europe. This would have allowed them to match the Allies if they had been more adept at marshaling their military and economic power. The Soviet Union and the United States — the biggest beneficiaries of the second Industrial Revolution — did a better job not just in managing wartime production. They also grabbed the lead in the use of such key weapons as the tank (the Soviet Union) and the long-range bomber and aircraft carrier (the U.S.). There are many reasons why once-dominant powers such as France and Britain had become second-tier ones by 1945, but central among them was their failure to exploit advances in weaponry during the inter-war years.

The Information Revolution of the late 20th century upset the seemingly stable postwar order. The Soviet Union had no Silicon Valley and could not compete with the United States in incorporating the computer into its economic or military spheres. U.S. prowess at waging war in the Information Age was showcased in the 1991 Persian Gulf War, which, along with the collapse of the Soviet empire, left the United States standing alone as a global hegemon.

But if history teaches any lesson, it is that no military lead is ever safe. Challengers will always find a way to copy or buy the best weapons systems or develop tactics that will offset their effect. Our most formidable enemies, Al Qaeda and its ilk, have done both. They are using relatively simple information technology — the Internet, satellite television, cellphones — to organize a global insurgency. By using such weapons as hijacked airliners and bombs detonated by garage-door openers, they are finding cracks in our defenses.

We have an insurmountable advantage in high-end military hardware. No other state is building nuclear-powered aircraft carriers, stealth fighters or unmanned aerial vehicles. In fact, we spend more on the development and testing of new weapons — $71 billion this year — than any other country spends on its entire defense. But all that spending produces weapons systems that aren't much good for pacifying Baghdad or Kandahar.

Technology isn't irrelevant to the global war on terror. We can use powerful surveillance systems to break up terrorist plots. And "smart bombs" can be invaluable for dealing with the perpetrators. But our enemies can stymie multibillion-dollar spy platforms by using couriers instead of satellite phones, which helps explain why Osama bin Laden remains on the loose.

New revolutions in military affairs, possibly centered on biotechnology and cyber-war, promise to give smaller states or sub-state actors more destructive capacity. Imagine the havoc that could be caused by a genetically engineered contagion combining the worst properties of, say, smallpox and the Ebola virus. Or imagine how much damage our enemies could inflict by using computer viruses — or directed-energy weapons — to immobilize critical bits of our civilian or military computer networks. In theory, it's possible to crash stock markets, send airliners plowing into the ground and blind our most advanced weapons systems.

DOJ_NMG_0088178

The most threatening weapon of all harks back to an earlier military revolution. Nuclear bombs haven't been used since 1945, but given their proliferation around the world, it will only be a matter of time. Our scientific sophistication gives us a reasonable chance of shooting down a nuclear-tipped missile, but a nuclear suitcase smuggled into the U.S. would be much harder to detect.

To stop such stealthy threats, we need to get much better at human intelligence, counterinsurgency, information operations and related disciplines. We need more speakers of Arabic and Pashto, more experts who understand tribal relations in Iraq's Anbar province and Pakistan's Northwest Frontier province, more diplomats who can win over audiences on Al Jazeera. And we need to set them loose without having to worry about a burdensome bureaucracy micromanaging their every move.

It may sound melodramatic, but the future of U.S. power rests on our ability to remake a government still structured for Industrial Age warfare to do battle with decentralized adversaries in the Information Age. After all, aren't we the mightiest, richest nation in history? How could our hegemony possibly be endangered? That's what previous superpowers thought too. But their dominance lasted only until they missed a revolutionary turn in military technology and tactics.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Businesses Seek Protection On Legal Front (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 28 — Frustrated with laws and regulations that have made companies and accounting firms more open to lawsuits from investors and the government, corporate America — with the encouragement of the Bush administration — is preparing to fight back.

Now that corruption cases like Enron and WorldCom are falling out of the news, two influential industry groups with close ties to administration officials are hoping to swing the regulatory pendulum in the opposite direction. The groups are drafting proposals to provide broad new protections to corporations and accounting firms from criminal cases brought by federal and state prosecutors as well as a stronger shield against civil lawsuits from investors.

Although the details are still being worked out, the groups' proposals aim to limit the liability of accounting firms for the work they do on behalf of clients, to force prosecutors to target individual wrongdoers rather than entire companies, and to scale back shareholder lawsuits.

The groups hope to reduce what they see as some burdens imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, landmark post-Enron legislation adopted in 2002. The law, which placed significant new auditing and governance requirements on companies, gave broad discretion for interpretation to the Securities and Exchange Commission. The groups are also interested in rolling back rules and policies that have been on the books for decades.

To alleviate concerns that the new Congress may not adopt the proposals — regardless of which party holds power in the legislative branch next year — many are being tailored so that they could be adopted through rulemaking by the S.E.C. and enforcement policy changes at the Justice Department.

The proposals will begin to be laid out in public shortly after Election Day, members of the groups said in recent interviews. One of the committees was formed by the United States Chamber of Commerce and until recently was headed by Robert K. Steel.

Mr. Steel was sworn in last Friday as the new Treasury undersecretary for domestic finance, and he is the senior official in the department who will be formulating the Treasury's views on the issues being studied by the two groups.

The second committee was formed by the Harvard Law professor Hal S. Scott, along with R. Glenn Hubbard, a former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers for President Bush, and John L. Thornton, a former president of Goldman Sachs, where he worked with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.

That group has colloquially become known around Washington as the Paulson Committee because the relatively new Treasury secretary issued an encouraging statement when it was formed last month. But administration officials said Friday that he was not playing a role in the group's deliberations.

Its members include Donald L. Evans, a former commerce secretary who remains a close friend of President Bush; Samuel A. DiPiazza Jr., chief executive of PricewaterhouseCoopers, the accounting giant; Robert R. Glauber, former chairman and chief executive of the National Association of Securities Dealers, the private group that oversees the securities industry; and the chief executives of DuPont, Office Depot and the CIT Group.

Jennifer Zuccarelli, a spokeswoman at the Treasury Department, said on Friday that no decision had been made about which recommendations would be supported by the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0088179

"While the department always wants to hear new ideas from academic and industry thought leaders, especially to encourage the strength of the U.S. capital markets, Treasury is not a member of these committees and is not collaborating on any findings," Ms. Zuccarelli said.

But another official and committee members noted that Mr. Paulson had recently pressed the groups in private discussions to complete their work so it could be rolled out quickly after the November elections.

Moreover, committee members say that they expect many of their recommendations will be used as part of an overall administration effort to limit what they see as overzealous state prosecutions by such figures as the New York State attorney general Elliot Spitzer and abusive class action lawsuits by investors. The groups will also attempt to lower what they see as the excessive costs associated with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

Their critics, however, see the effort as part of a plan to cater to the most well-heeled constituents of the administration and insulate politically connected companies from prosecution at the expense of investors.

One consideration in drafting the proposals has been the chain of events at Arthur Andersen, the accounting firm that was convicted in 2002 of obstruction of justice for shredding Enron-related documents; the conviction was overturned in 2005 by the Supreme Court. The proposals being drafted would aim to limit the liability of auditing firms and include a policy shift to make it harder for prosecutors to bring cases against individuals and companies.

Even though Arthur Andersen played a prominent role in various corporate scandals, some business and legal experts have criticized the decision by the Bush administration to bring a criminal case that had the effect of shutting the firm down.

The proposed policies would emphasize the prosecution of culpable individuals rather than corporations and auditing firms. That shift could prove difficult for prosecutors because it is often harder to find sufficient evidence to show that specific people at a company were the ones who knowingly violated a law.

One proposal would recommend that the Justice Department sharply curtail its policy of forcing companies under investigation to withhold paying the legal fees of executives suspected of violating the law. Another one would require some investor lawsuits to be handled by arbitration panels, which are traditionally friendlier to defendants.

In an interview last week with Bloomberg News, Mr. Paulson repeated his criticism of the Sarbanes-Oxley law. While it had done some good, he said, it had contributed to "an atmosphere that has made it more burdensome for companies to operate."

Mr. Paulson also repeated a line from his first speech, given at Columbia Business School last August, where he said, "Often the pendulum swings too far and we need to go through a period of readjustment."

Some experts see Mr. Paulson's complaint as a step backward.

"This is an escalation of the culture war against regulation," said James D. Cox, a securities and corporate law professor at Duke Law School. He said many of the proposals, if adopted, "would be a dark day for investors."

Professor Cox, who has studied 600 class action lawsuits over the last decade, said it was difficult to find "abusive or malicious" cases, particularly in light of new laws and court decisions that had made it more difficult to file such suits.

The number of securities class action lawsuits has dropped substantially in each of the last two years, he noted, arguing that the impact of the proposals from the business groups would be that "very few people would be prosecuted."

People involved in the committees said that the timing of the proposals was being dictated by the political calendar: closely following Election Day and as far away as possible from the 2008 elections.

Mr. Hubbard, who is now dean of Columbia Business School, said the committee he helps lead would focus on the lack of proper economic foundation for a number of regulations. Most changes will be proposed through regulation, he said, because "the current political environment is simply not ripe for legislation."

But the politics of changing the rules do not break cleanly along party lines. While some prominent Democrats would surely attack the pro-business efforts, there are others who in the past have been sympathetic.

People involved in the committees' work said that their objective was to improve the attractiveness of American capital-raising markets by scaling back rules whose costs outweigh their benefits.

"We think the legal liability issues are the most serious ones," said Professor Scott, the director of the committee singled out by Mr. Paulson. "Companies don't want to use our markets because of what they see as the substantial, and in their view excessive, liability."

Committee officials disputed the notion that they were simply catering to powerful business interests seeking to benefit from loosening regulations that could wind up hurting investors.

"It's unfortunate to the extent that this has been politicized," said Robert E. Litan, a former Justice Department official and senior fellow at the Brookings Institution who is overseeing the committee's legal liability subgroup. "The objectives are clearly not to gut such reforms as Sarbanes-Oxley. I'm for cost-effective regulation."

DOJ_NMG_0088180

The main Sarbanes-Oxley provision that both committees are focusing on is a part that is commonly called Section 404, which requires audits of companies' internal financial controls. Some business experts praise this section as having made companies more transparent and better managed, but many smaller companies call the section too costly and unnecessary.

Members of the two committees said that they had reached a consensus that Section 404, along with greater threat of investor lawsuits and government prosecutions, had discouraged foreign companies from issuing new stock on exchanges in the United States in recent months.

The committee members said that an increase in stock offerings abroad was evidence that the American liability system and tougher auditing standards were taking a toll on the competitiveness of American markets. But others see different reasons for the trend and few links to liability and accounting rules.

Bill Daley, a former commerce secretary in the Clinton administration who is the co-chairman of the Chamber of Commerce group, expects proposed changes to liability standards for accounting firms and corporations to draw the most flak. But he said that the changes affecting accounting firms are of paramount importance to prevent the further decline in competition. Only four major firms were left after Andersen's collapse.

Another contentious issue concerns a proposal to eliminate the use of a broadly written and long-established anti-fraud rule, known as Rule 10b-5, that allows shareholders to sue companies for fraud. The change could be accomplished by a vote of the S.E.C.

John C. Coffee, a professor of securities law at Columbia Law School and an adviser to the Paulson Committee, said that he had recommended that the S.E.C. adopt the exception to Rule 10b-5 so that only the commission could bring such lawsuits against corporations.

But other securities law experts warned that such a move would extinguish a fundamental check on corporate malfeasance.

"It would be a shocking turning back to say only the commission can bring fraud cases," said Harvey J. Goldschmid, a former S.E.C. commissioner and law professor at Columbia University. "Private enforcement is a necessary supplement to the work that the S.E.C. does. It is also a safety valve against the potential capture of the agency by industry."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ehrlich Bristles At Probe Questions (BSUN)

By Andrew A. Green, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, October 29, 2006

Aide subpoenaed by U.S. attorney over slots in 2004

Ehrlich angered by probe questions

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. acknowledged yesterday that a top aide received subpoenas from federal prosecutors investigating in 2004 what published reports said was the influence of slot-machine gambling interests in Annapolis, an admission that led to a demand by his Democratic opponent that the administration release full details of the probe.

The legal requests came from the office of then-U.S. Attorney Thomas M. DiBiagio, who had been recommended for the post by Ehrlich.

The subpoenas were issued to Paul E. Schurick, the governor's communications director and one of the key figures in Ehrlich's attempts to legalize slot machines, and were first reported this month by The Washington Post. Schurick received the requests on June 2 and June 16 in 2004 as part of a probe into gambling, the paper said, adding that the governor's press office - still run by Schurick - would not comment on them.

Responding to a question from a caller on Stateline with Governor Ehrlich on WBAL radio yesterday, the governor for the first time spoke publicly about the inquiry.

"Paul cooperated, produced everything that they wanted and nothing came of it," said Ehrlich, responding to the caller.

Later in the day, when asked for more details about what his office had provided to investigators, Ehrlich said, "How would I know?" and added that the line of questioning was prompted by a Democratic Party memo distributed last week. It could not be learned whether federal prosecutors were targeting specific individuals in their investigation.

Democratic Party spokesman David Paulson denied that any "memo or e-mail on this sordid episode" was distributed.

A spokesman for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic nominee for governor, said Ehrlich's acknowledgement that his communications chief received a subpoena is further evidence that the governor did nothing to eliminate the "culture of corruption" he campaigned against four years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0088181

"There are all these criminal investigations, and they just cover them up," said O'Malley spokesman Steve Kearney. "There's this one that they hid for two years. There's the federal investigation of governor's deputy chief of staff [Edward B. Miller, who created a compay that lobbyist Jack Abramoff said he used to launder money]. ... There's the federal investigation into the governor's top fundraiser [Richard E. Hug] setting up secret nonprofits. ... Taxpayers deserve answers - and they deserve better."

There is no indication that Miller and Hug are the subject of current investigations, although Miller's company received a subpoena in the Abramoff probe, and Hug's slots-related fundraising activities were examined by federal investigators.

Ehrlich has supported a slots bill in each of his four years, but the House of Delegates killed it every time. With millions of dollars of profits at stake, the gambling and horse racing industries have spent heavily in Annapolis - making $700,000 in campaign donations in the five years prior to 2004, according to a Common Cause study, and spending up to $600,000 yearly on lobbyists.

A month before DiBiagio subpoenaed Schurick, he wrote a memo to his staff pressuring them to aggressively pursue public corruption cases. The meeting agenda, obtained by The Sun, said DiBiagio wanted "three 'front-page' indictments" by that November to cement his office's status as a premier investigative agency.

About a month after Schurick was contacted, DiBiagio's powers to investigate public corruption were severely curtailed by a new directive from his bosses who said that officials with the Bush administration Justice Department in Washington had to approve any such investigations.

The caller to WBAL who raised the issue - who identified himself only as "Leo" - questioned the timing and asked Ehrlich if anyone in the governor's administration or on the governor's behalf intervened to quash the investigation, a suggestion that drew Ehrlich's anger.

"The timing of it was very coincidental, because as you know, Mr. Schurick was subpoenaed in June of 2004, and then it was about four weeks after that the Department of Justice, which is of course run by Republicans, stripped him of his authority to pursue public corruption investigations," the caller said.

Ehrlich said: "Are you suggesting through that statement that something nefarious happened? When the guy prosecuted my superintendent of Maryland state police?" referring to Edward T. Norris, who pleaded guilty to misusing a police account for personal gain while city police commissioner.

"I think that your call is really inappropriate. I think it's partisan. I think that you are trying to damage the reputation of somebody who has worked for Democrats most of their life," Ehrlich said. Schurick was once chief of staff to then-Gov. William Donald Schaefer.

"I think the timing of your call is ridiculous. Nothing came of it. Everybody knows it. Can you imagine, if something would have been there, the Baltimore Sun not jumping on that. So my answer to you is 'Give me a break.' And the election is in 11 days," Ehrlich said.

Neither Schurick nor DiBiagio returned phone messages seeking comment yesterday.

In an opinion piece published in The Sun a little more than a year after announcing his resignation in December 2004, DiBiagio wrote that he had been under "constant pressure to aim low and look the other way from potentially corrupt officials. The pressure finally culminated in a threat that I would be 'hurt' if I continued."

Ehrlich's relationship with DiBiagio soured as the U.S. attorney pursued public corruption instead of gun crimes. The governor said yesterday that he had virtually no contact with DiBiagio after his appointment.

DiBiagio's apparent investigation into the influence of slots backers wasn't limited to the Ehrlich administration. In 2003, Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller, a Democrat, was also under investigation for slots-related donations to a national state legislative political committee he led. The investigation was ultimately dropped.

andy.green@baltsun.com

Sun reporter Kelly Brewington contributed to this article.

Katrina Crime: Perceived Or Real? (SAEN)

By Todd Bensman, Express-News Staff

San Antonio Express-News, October 29, 2006

Just days after the first of about 30,000 Louisiana hurricane evacuees began arriving in San Antonio, Mayor Phil Hardberger was asked a simple question he laughingly brushed off. What might be the impact of the influx on city crime rates and services?

It was Sept. 7, 2005, and the mayor was riding high on national praise for a CNN appearance during which he had projected an image of his city as unflinchingly philanthropic. People displaced by Katrina still were flooding in.

"That's like if my house is on fire and I'm looking to you for a bucket of water, and you ask what the new house will look like," he said with a laugh. "Everybody's been worried about crime, and the impact on social services. But so far, it is just worry; it hasn't been factual."

More than a year later, the issue remains unaddressed, conspicuously so in light of a 55 percent spike in murders the first eight months of this year, increasing violent crime rates in San Antonio, a stretched police force and widespread media reports linking some evacuees in Houston to similar crime trends there.

So: Did the sudden arrival of about 30,000 evacuees, a group equal to Del Rio in population, cause additional crime? The question, loaded with the kind of politically sensitive racial implications that can discomfit some politicians, is much more than academic. Millions of dollars could be at stake.

In choosing not to ask, San Antonio's political leadership potentially turned its back on federal money that Houston has gained by citing an evacuee link to a increasing murder rate and other violent crime.

It also invites speculation and perceptions not necessarily grounded in fact.

City leaders, such as Hardberger, several council members and top police officials, assert the evacuees have had no effect on crime. Those who interact most closely with some of the city's highest concentrations of evacuees, including beat cops, business owners and the evacuees themselves, say the opposite is true.

The San Antonio Express-News spent four months trying to determine whether a link exists between evacuees and crime in San Antonio. Among the highlights were an extensive analysis of crime data and interviews with dozens of street-level officers, community leaders, business owners, residents and evacuees throughout the city:

Steeply declining rates of violent crime and property crime during the first eight months of 2005 suddenly reversed after they arrived, although there is no proof evacuees caused it. Houston, however, has successfully cited a similar coincidence of suddenly rising crime to argue for more federal money.

Crime hot spots developed after evacuees arrived in and around some of the 170 apartment complexes where they resettled. For example, one 10-mile stretch of W.W. White Road contributed 20 percent of a citywide spike in armed robberies last fall. In contrast, at least one complex had lower crime after relatively large numbers of evacuees moved in, based on several measures of crime.

Of the 55 percent spike in San Antonio's murders this year, three suspects and two victims were found to be evacuees. Several other cases have suspected links, but dozens of cases could neither be included nor excluded as related to evacuees. Unlike Houston, the San Antonio Police Department homicide unit never has been asked to methodically look for such a connection that could be cited in a request for federal funds.

Violence and criminal activity involving evacuees occurred as the result of interaction between San Antonio residents and the new arrivals, often over drugs.

A coincidence of crime

The Louisiana evacuees found much more than a welcoming refuge when they showed up in need at San Antonio's doorstep last summer. Compared with their crime-ridden neighborhoods back home, evacuees found relative peace and security here. Most came from the same few districts responsible for making New Orleans notorious as the nation's most lethally violent city.

But San Antonio had been enjoying eight months of double-digit downturns in serious crime, such as murder, robbery and rape and sexual assaults, when the newcomers began settling into local shelters and hotels on Sept. 2, 2005.

Then the trend, for reasons unknown, reversed significantly in certain categories of crime. By Christmas 2005, San Antonio was beset by double-digit rises in the kind of crime that residents in any city especially fear and loathe.

Compared with the September-to-December period a year earlier, armed robberies of businesses were up 42 percent, and of people up 18 percent. Vehicle theft was up 18 percent, and weapons violations 33 percent, to name a few.

The number of residents' calls for police ballooned and is now on track to set a record by breaking the 1 million mark this year, with an average 8,500 more calls for police per month from September 2005 through July 30 than the same period a year earlier. The swell began just after evacuees arrived, taxing street cops and stretching response times.

The Houston metropolitan area, which received five times as many evacuees but is three times the size of the San Antonio area, experienced a similar coincidence of higher crime after evacuees arrived on a comparative scale.

Neither Houston nor the Express-News was able to examine the only unassailable evidence that would link imported criminal elements to higher crime: last known addresses for either suspects or victims. Many crimes remain unsolved with no suspects to identify.

The absence of suspect arrests and publicly available information that would prove an evacuee link to specific crimes has left some crime victims to draw their own conclusions.

Ed Theo Flores, owner of the family-run Theo's Brake and Tire Service near downtown for 40 years, had experienced only one crime in the business' history, and that was two decades ago. In a few weeks after more than 50 evacuee families moved into the hotel next door to his shop, Flores reported three cars stolen off his lot and a break-in that cost him hundreds of dollars in tools. No arrests were made.

"I'm not blaming anything on the Katrina people," Flores said, choosing his words carefully. "I'm just saying the coincidence is right there."

The hotel did have problems with the evacuees. It was forced to evict a third of the guests for drugs and prostitution, said Janice Maragakis, spokeswoman for hotel owner Accor North America. Police reports confirm an increase in arrests at the address.

More than half of the city's evacuee population now is gone, having begun trickling out of town when Federal Emergency Management Agency housing vouchers started running out last spring, officials report. The overall total crime rate citywide has tapered off.

Today, top police officials are quick to highlight that total crime doesn't look bad.

From September 2005 through July, total crime citywide was up only 2.3 percent and total violent crime came out about even.

"The big picture is that violent crime is down," Police Chief William McManus said.

But total citywide numbers touted by police officials don't tell what happened for many months in neighborhoods after evacuees settled in them.

The period from September 2005 through July shows that several crime categories remained in double-digit higher territory over the same period a year earlier. Those include drug crimes, up 14 percent; total aggravated robberies, up 27 percent; and vehicle theft, up 17 percent.

Open to debate

Houston's attempt to peg a statistical correlation of higher crime rates to the arrival of evacuees has brought in millions of dollars to help pay its police and fire bills. But that city's correlation — and the Express-News' attempt to replicate Houston's analysis — is open to debate.

Criminologist Dr. Peter Scharf, director of the University of New Orleans Center for Society, Law and Justice, said the newspaper's findings, as well as Houston's, of the apparent shifts in the crime trends are "highly probative," suggesting some degree of proof.

"I think you're on to something," Scharf said after examining the Express-News findings. "And the lack of curiosity in your town is really interesting."

Scharf is studying the migration of people from the nation's most criminally prolific districts in New Orleans to Texas and back. He said it helps no one to casually dismiss what to him is an obvious pattern in which violent crime has followed one of the most dangerous criminal underclasses in the country.

It is likely no coincidence, Scharf also said, that crime rates in New Orleans fell from the nation's highest to nearly zero when just those few flooded high-crime districts emptied into Texas. Now, New Orleans crime is approaching old highs — in new areas — as evacuees settle in them, Scharf said.

Still, he cautioned that correlating a short-term crime spike with the arrival of evacuees is at best a crude barometer justifying more study and cannot be used to rule out other possible causes of a crime trend.

Other criminologists go further.

"I think saying that comes pretty close to demonizing people who were evacuated. All you can say is that's interesting, that went up," said Dr. Michael J. Gilbert, associate professor in the University of Texas at San Antonio criminal justice department and Mayor Phil Hardberger's appointee to a local crime commission.

"While that's perfectly rational thinking, it may be misleading in terms of what this data may actually mean. I think they're (city of Houston) trying to make the best case they can to get money when it's not defensible."

He and other experts say the coincidence that a sudden spike in major crime occurred with the arrival of evacuees might easily be explained by population increases, shifts in police tactics or changing drug trade dynamics.

Albert Steven Dietz, a criminal justice professor at Texas State University in San Marcos, said the post-September crime rate jumps in San Antonio indicate to him that some evacuees may have contributed out of proportion to their numbers — but for just the first few months of their residency.

He said a logical assumption is that the simple crime trend becomes less indicative after evacuees disburse throughout the city and, for instance, find opportunities to leave the criminal underworld, if they were part of it.

Is perception reality?

DOJ_NMG_0088184

While nearly impossible to easily verify the origins of all arrestees through available public records, a perception accompanies the pattern of increasing crime: Based in truth or not, some people who interact closely with evacuees believe elements of that imported population are committing the crimes. Among them are police, prosecutors, apartment complex managers, neighboring residents and business owners.

Perhaps most credibly, though, evacuees themselves in a dozen apartment complexes told the Express-News they believe some in their own ranks are responsible for violence, thievery and drug dealing that have made their own law-abiding lives in San Antonio as miserable as they were in New Orleans.

Among those who came to San Antonio were at least 140 probationers and parolees from Louisiana who hadn't reported to a parole or probation officer in either Texas or their home state, the Express-News reported in July.

Evacuees in the Huntley Manor apartments in East San Antonio, where calls for police jumped after some 50 Katrina evacuee families settled there, tell tales of conflicts involving young Louisiana men that went on for months, even after management, who did not respond to interview requests, arranged extra security.

One police report tells of 10 men chasing off the drivers of a meat delivery truck, then looting the vehicle in a frenzy until it was empty.

Josh Hooper, a young man from New Orleans, boasted of participating in conflicts.

"It got crazy around here. It was shooting and shooting, for real," he said, getting into a car with friends. "We did shoot back. I'm gonna tell you for real. You think somebody shootin' at me and I ain't gonna shoot back? For real. This is Texas; everybody got a gun."

Several evacuees said the complex has settled down noticeably since most of their compatriots moved, a story echoed elsewhere.

Evacuees living in West and North San Antonio complained bitterly about similar problems they say are caused by fellow evacuees, sometimes young men fighting over drugs with young San Antonio men.

"The thugs and criminals here (in San Antonio) met up and socialized with the thugs and criminals from there (New Orleans)," said Stephaney Wyeth, a 58-year-old grandmother from New Orleans, describing the nightly drug dealing, shootings and fights she endured in her Northwest San Antonio complex.

Buyers looking for drugs mistakenly knock on her door all night long, she said.

"It seems like our complex is the whole city's place to come and get drugs," Wyeth said, wishing her fellow evacuees would leave. "We have a lot of criminals in the building."

Yolanda Herbert, 43, blames local San Antonio youths for instigating violence with the New Orleans crowd.

"I think they're just getting with the wrong people," she said. "I believe they're being influenced by other gangsters that's from here who know where to go and what to do."

Others said they were targets of locals interested in stealing financial aid that everyone on the street knew the evacuees received. Evacuee Lavell Simpson said groups of Hispanic youths preyed on the evacuees at his complex near Lackland AFB.

He said a group of three young Hispanics once attacked him "to take me for my jewelry."

"They can tell who we are," Simpson said, sitting on the stairwell leading up to his apartment one afternoon. "We dress different. We talk different. We walk different."

In late July, a Katrina evacuee was shot in the leg during a robbery at his apartment in 3100 block of East Commerce. He had cashed a FEMA check. The robbers got away.

Several hot spots exist

The Express-News tried to discern whether data supported perceptions among evacuees and residents both in and around 10 of the more than 170 apartment complexes where evacuees resettled last fall. The complexes were selected because they hosted high concentrations of evacuees.

Three measurements — police offense reports, residents' calls for police and total crime offense reports in a half-mile surrounding radius — showed rises in and around four of the 10 complexes compared with the same time period a year before. Five others showed declines in one or two of those measurements but increases in others. One of the 10 complexes showed declines in all three.

Residents who live in other complexes that took in large numbers of evacuees said what cold hard numbers can't. They've been feeling more afraid — of evacuees.

Evacuee Trina Boone of New Orleans, a mother of two young children who lives at Artisan at Willow Springs on Gembler Road, showed a bullet hole that was fired through her apartment one morning in June.

"To be honest, they selling a lot of weed," she said. "We have a lot of fightin' and shootin', all kinds of whatnot; that's why I'm moving out of here."

DOJ_NMG_0088185

Another hot spot centers on an urban strip of W.W. White Road on San Antonio's East Side, where businesses from major chains to small eateries sustained a spike in armed robberies that frightened owners into organizing to defend themselves.

Crime data support their claims, but in other parts of the city, residents made claims against evacuees that data did not appear to support.

For instance, Nette Hinton, a retired U.S. Customs officer and member of Dignowity Hill Homeowners Association east of downtown, blamed evacuees who she believed traveled from other parts of the city to commit crimes along a stretch of Hackberry Street that police had worked years to reduce.

An analysis of crime data showed crime and calls for police service on and around Hackberry Street actually fell after evacuees came to San Antonio.

Still, Hinton believes political timidity has caused city officials to turn a blind eye to concerns like hers.

The former agent said leaders "probably hesitate to point fingers at the bad elements because it's antithetical to the kindly face we presented to Katrina evacuees. I think we're embarrassed to say there were some thugs and they're still here preying on people."

Not to wonder why

In Houston, which also received five times as many evacuees as San Antonio, the statistical impact is not much greater because its population is three times the Alamo City's size.

After tracing murders and noting leaps in other violent crime near resettlement areas, the administration of Houston Mayor Bill White has aggressively pursued more than $30 million in federal money for public safety costs. The money has gone to pay police and fire overtime and for five new police academy training classes.

In San Antonio, police overtime costs have gone up and remained higher since the evacuees came. No evidence has surfaced that these increased costs are linked to serving San Antonio's evacuees. City officials blame various nonpreventable operations for higher overtime costs but do allow for the possibility of evacuee-related services as a cause.

Houston has claimed the evacuee link wholeheartedly, with some success. Houston won an $18 million Department of Justice grant after White lobbied Houston's congressional delegation.

"My opinion is it never hurts to ask," said Gary E. Gray, assistant director for Houston's finance department. "If you don't ask what's possible, nothing's going to happen."

A number of San Antonio city leaders, including top police commanders, professed ignorance of Houston's problem with "Katrina crime" and its pursuit of federal funds and said they saw no need to follow suit. Yet money is tight.

San Antonio's leaders, voting last month on a new budget, had to scrimp and scrape $2.4 million in city tax money out of next year's budget to help fund a 54-officer addition to its 2,069-member force that McManus said was hundreds short of what is needed.

In San Antonio, police overtime costs were falling steadily for the eight months before evacuees arrived, then from September 2005 through December rose to a record $6.7 million, of which $4 million was evacuee-related and reimbursed by FEMA, according to figures supplied by the city's finance department.

Houston has fought to recover more of the costs than it was reimbursed during that four-month period, as well as extra costs through May.

San Antonio's police overtime costs were up 11 percent from January through May, amounting to $400,000 more over the same period a year earlier.

Houston has also sought federal money for fire department overtime since the initial influx of evacuees.

Last October, before the shelters were closed, San Antonio top officials repeatedly assured the media that little anticipated crime had surfaced.

However, data from September 2005 to December show the number of crime reports generated from a half-mile area around the KellyUSA shelter spiked more than 160 percent, from 27 to 71, as a result of robberies, burglaries and drugs.

One office that did try to track crime related to evacuees is the Bexar County district attorney's office, which identified at least 135 prosecutions of evacuees staying in shelters last fall. Offenses ranged from rape to petty larceny and theft. One evacuee was charged with murder.

The DA's office initiated the count, First Assistant District Attorney Cliff Herberg said, should it need to justify federal funding requests later, but let the program lapse after the shelters emptied. A Police Department effort to code evacuee arrests also ended after a short time for reasons that remain unclear.

"I certainly think the impact has been much more, much more" than the 135 criminal prosecutions, Herberg said. "I think we're all aware of that. There's been a criminal element over there that has become a criminal element here."

Yet most other public officials posit various other causes for more crime while excluding evacuees. Councilwoman Sheila McNeil, whose district is bedeviled by a spiking number of armed robberies, dismissed the evacuees as a possible contributor.

"Part of it happens during the Christmas holidays," McNeil said of the robberies. "No one speculated what it could be, just Christmas time and people needed extra money. I've talked to our police officers and they have not given me that indication (of an evacuee link)."

In August, as the council was considering the slim police-hiring budget, Hardberger also excluded evacuees and blamed higher crime on an annual summer cycle. When asked if he'd ever considered that evacuees he embraced a year earlier brought crime to his city, the mayor said: "I don't believe the statistics will support that in San Antonio."

He said he was not interested in learning if it was true so the city might benefit from federal money.

"I know the statistics are up," Hardberger said. "But I'm not seeking a scapegoat here."

Several hours after that interview, however, the mayor phoned to say he'd had a change of heart and had asked City Manager Sheryl Sculley to examine the question.

"We need to look at the facts, and if we're going to look at the facts you'd better gather the facts first, and that's what I'm going to be doing," Hardberger said.

Two weeks later, the mayor's initiative produced a single-page interoffice memo from James Glass, manager of the SAPD Strategic Analysis and Mapping Office, to McManus.

The Aug. 16 memo titled "Analysis of Crime & Katrina Evacuees," cited an evacuee population number between five and six times lower than the nearly 30,000 that FEMA and Red Cross officials provided to the Express-News.

It went on to state in part, "the results from this micro level analysis are inconclusive" and that more study of updated information would be necessary. Police spokesman Gabe Trevino dismissed the short study, saying "That doesn't tell you anything. We can't say one way or another."

But when questioned about a possible Katrina link to higher crime and federal money, McManus cited the memo as grounds for why he was not inclined to order a more rigorous examination.

"We can't pinpoint any increases in crime to any particular population," he said.

The disinclination to learn more has carried over into enforcement strategy. Apartment complexes with large numbers of evacuees never figured into a special police task force that McManus deployed for 60 days this summer to target high crime areas, even though SAPD Capt. Cris Anderson, its commander, said he believed an evacuee-crime link existed.

Since Katrina evacuees arrived, Anderson said one night as his task force went into action where no evacuees lived, "there are more hot spots and violent pockets in town, and I just don't believe it's coincidental."

In contrast, a similar counter-crime task force fielded by Houston focused on evacuee complexes.

Gilbert, the UTSA criminologist, said all the debate about Katrina crime in Houston and perceptions about it in San Antonio should be viewed through a wider lens of time.

Compared with high violent crime in the late 1980s, San Antonio is enjoying historically low crime overall, even with its new population, in defiance of what studies like those he has authored show: Crime is usually higher in poor communities.

"San Antonio is a very poor city," he said. "And yet we have a very safe city, comparatively." tbensman@express-news.net

News Researcher Julie Domel analyzed the statistical data for this report.

Vicious MS-13 Gang Seen As Growing Threat (DMN)

By David Mclemore, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, October 29, 2006

Authorities target group in Texas and across U.S.

PHARR, Texas – Shortly after midnight in late September, a Texas National Guard soldier with night-vision equipment spied four figures slipping through the brush and alerted Border Patrol agents.

The men were arrested, and one in particular stood out for the extensive tattoos across his face, body and arms.

AP Wilmer Matamoros, 23, a Mara Salvatrucha gang leader, was imprisoned earlier this year in Tegucigalpa, Honduras.

A fingerprint check showed Santos Chileno-Gomez, a 23-year-old Salvadoran, had been deported for an assault on a Long Island, N.Y., police officer. His lengthy criminal record – and the tattoos – labeled him as a member of Mara Salvatrucha 13, a vicious international street gang that federal authorities call one of the most violent in the U.S.

Mr. Chileno-Gomez is among 76 MS-13 members apprehended by the Border Patrol in the Rio Grande Valley during the just-ended fiscal year. That total was up from 62 the previous year, showing the gang's resilience to federal efforts aimed at rooting it out and its determination to travel almost at will through Texas to cliques operating throughout the U.S.

And, some police agencies believe, there is evidence that MS-13 has taken sides in the bloody war among drug cartels that's playing out in Nuevo Laredo.

"They are getting more disciplined and more organized. And they're getting smarter," said Susan Ritter, chairwoman of the criminal justice department at the University of Texas at Brownsville, who is preparing a scholarly research article on MS-13.

"In Texas, they often hold meetings or recruitment drives in public under the guise of legitimate activity, such as a soccer game or barbecue. There has been talk of efforts to join forces and operate with one overall leader. That hasn't happened yet," she said.

Officials estimate there are up to 10,000 hard-core members of the gang operating in 33 states, the largest clusters living in Los Angeles, Washington, D.C., and the Mid-Atlantic region. But Texas is one of the fastest-growing states for MS-13, simply by virtue of geography.

"From Honduras and El Salvador, the quickest routes in the U.S. are the smuggling pipelines that run from Mexico directly into the Valley," said Border Patrol Supervisory Agent Roy Cervantes. "From here, they quickly move on to Dallas or Houston and blend in with the immigrant communities there. They want out of the border area as quickly as possible."

In March 2005, when local police and federal agents began a national yearlong sweep of gang members, MS-13 members were involved in two shootings a week apart in Dallas that underscored the gang's violent streak. One involved a 14-year-old boy who was shot in the face and survived.

Eduardo Galicia, 19, wasn't so lucky.

Police said Mr. Galicia was playing soccer at a playground near Love Field when a man identified as an MS-13 member walked up and asked in Spanish, "What gang are you down with?" When Mr. Galicia said he didn't belong to a gang and turned to walk away, the man shot him in the back of the head. Dallas police made four arrests.

That year, Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigators estimated there were about 140 MS-13 members in the North Texas region. In raids last March, police arrested about 44. Local police say the national roundup of gang members has forced MS-13 members to take a decidedly lower profile in the Dallas area.

"I'm not saying we don't have a problem," said Sgt. Mark Langford of the Dallas Police gang unit. "That would be naive. We're always watching."

It's a sentiment shared by police in Dallas' suburban neighbors.

"We're not seeing a lot of crime directly attributable to MS-13 members. It's minimal," said David Tull, spokesman for the Irving Police Department. "We're not in denial. We know they're out there.

"We hear on the street that someone is coming in and we'll see graffiti around town, but unless we can get them in the light at the right time, we don't get a chance to get them."

Said Patrick Murphy of the Carrollton police: "It's really difficult to say how many MS-13 gang members we have. ... They come and go constantly."

That fluidity – members moving among cliques and back and forth to Central America – makes it hard to pin down numbers in any community with any accuracy, police said.

"This is a gang that operates across borders. It's common to see members of the L.A. clique work in El Salvador, or Salvadoran members operating in New York, recruiting or sharing tactics," said Brian Trucheon, director of the FBI's MS-13 National Gang Task Force, created in 2004. "The scary thing for us is how quickly they can evolve to move around obstacles law enforcement throws up."

Gang's beginnings

MS-13 began in the Ramparts section of Los Angeles in the mid-1980s to protect refugees of El Salvador's civil war from other street gangs. Mara Salvatrucha is street slang for "Salvadoran guard posse." The tattoos gang members use as a mark of identity and pride invariably involve the initials MS and the number 13, a designation of an earlier alliance with a Southern California gang.

A 2005 Department of Homeland Security gang threat assessment identified MS-13 as one of the largest and most violent gangs in the country. That February, Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents launched a national sweep – Operation Community Shield – targeting MS-13 members. It was later expanded to include other violent gangs. More than 3,000 gangsters were eventually rounded up, one third of them affiliated with MS-13.

The gang's terrifying reputation includes a callous disregard for life and a willingness to use extreme violence with weapons ranging from machetes to semi-automatic rifles.

"Machetes, decapitations and sexual violence against victims are a common tool of intimidation," said Alonzo Pena, the ICE special agent in charge for South Texas. "They are growing rapidly and pose a significant risk to our communities. This is a gang we can't allow to continue to grow."

Intelligence gathering

As a policy, ICE agents conduct face-to-face interviews with any member of the group arrested in Texas in an attempt to gather detailed intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0088188

One sign of the group's increased organization: Recently, MS-13 leaders have told members to remove tattoos from their faces, necks and arms to avoid notice from law enforcement. During interviews with agents, MS-13 members now deny involvement and insist their tattoos are residue of past involvement.

"We're sure that's just disinformation they're feeding us," Mr. Pena said. "The rule of MS-13 is once in, always in."

Houston, with its large Central American immigrant community, is the group's center of activity in Texas, authorities said.

"It doesn't surprise us that they are coming in greater numbers across the border," said Shawna Dunlap, an FBI special agent in Houston. She said Houston saw an increase in what she called "high-profile" gang activity last year, including extortion, robbery and kidnapping.

"About 50 percent of those we see in Houston have been deported multiple times," she said.

While not the largest gang in Houston, MS-13 has become a significant player, said Capt. Mike Graham of the Houston police gang division. He said the gang is getting more organized.

"Our biggest challenge is that they are so transient," he said. "They prey on immigrants, but they don't necessarily stay in the immigrant communities. MS-13 is all over the city. If things get hot for them in Houston, they can disappear to North Carolina or D.C."

The FBI now assigns 10 agents to work with Houston police for investigations involving MS-13.

Homegrown threat

While MS-13 recruits heavily from El Salvador and Honduras and Central American refugees in the U.S., this is no invasion from south of the border. MS-13 is strictly a homegrown gang.

"Only after they were deported did the gang spread to Central America," said UT-Brownsville's Dr. Ritter, who set out to research the gang because she found little information available.

Once back in El Salvador and Honduras, members of MS-13 quickly fought with existing gangs for control, Dr. Ritter said. Both countries got tough, enacting stringent anti-gang laws known as super mano dura, or super hard hand, which provide hard prison time for those simply found to be MS-13 members.

Wherever it spreads, MS-13's business is crime, including drugs, extortion, human smuggling, car theft and contract killings.

"They're very opportunistic and diverse in criminal activities," said Mr. Trucheon of the FBI task force. "In some cities, they specialize in robbery; in others, extortion or crimes of violence. When they move into a community, they'll prey on the lawful and the law-breakers alike."

And intelligence gathered by U.S. and Mexican law enforcement agencies indicates the gang's growing presence in the smuggling operations of Mexican drug cartels.

While the FBI says the evidence is indefinite, other agencies say MS-13 appears to have taken sides with the Sinaloa cartel in its vicious turf war with the Gulf cartel to control narcotics trafficking in Nuevo Laredo.

Like the Zetas, a gang of Mexican ex-military commandos, MS-13 members are believed to serve as cartel enforcers on both sides of the border.

"They've shown themselves willing to hire out to protect drug loads, smuggle aliens and intimidate witnesses. If they can find a way to make a dollar engaging in criminal activity, they'll do it," said Mr. Pena of ICE.

"We have received intel that in a short time, MS-13 has taken control of the rail lines in Southern Mexico used to transport illegal immigrants in from Central America," Mr. Pena said. "They are heavily involved in the human trafficking network, and they collect 'taxes' – extortion – from immigrants and the smugglers. MS-13 rapidly becomes a force to be reckoned with wherever they set up."

Border arrests

Many of the gang members apprehended in South Texas by the Border Patrol appear to be new recruits journeying to join cliques in the U.S. or older members traveling on gang business. Some are messengers, a position of trust within the gang's hierarchy.

The biggest border apprehension occurred in February 2005, when a car carrying a load of narcotics was stopped by a Department of Public Safety trooper near Falfurrias in Brooks County. One of the men inside was Ebner Rivera-Paz, a top leader of MS-13.

He had recently escaped from a Honduran prison, where he was being kept for his role in ordering gunmen to open fire on a bus with automatic weapons in Tegucigalpa. Twenty-eight people were killed; the intended target was an enemy of MS-13.

Mr. Rivera-Paz was convicted in federal court for illegal re-entry and deported this year to Honduras. It was his fifth deportation.

DOJ_NMG_0088189

"When we apprehend these guys, they clearly are not afraid of the courts or law enforcement," said Mr. Cervantes of the Border Patrol. "And when they get deported, it won't be long until they return. To follow the smuggling route from Honduras takes about a month."

E-mail dmclemore@dallasnews.com

Gang Violence in N. Texas

Three examples of known MS-13 activity in the Dallas area:

March 2005: A 14-year-old boy was shot in the face in northwest Dallas but survived. MS-13 members were detained by police and immigration officers.

March 2005: Eduardo Galicia, 19, was playing soccer near Bachman Lake when he was approached by a gunman who asked, "What gang are you down with?" According to a police report, Mr. Galicia replied that he was not a gang member and turned to walk away. He was shot in the back of the head and killed. Suspected MS-13 members were arrested and charged.

December 2001: A 21-year-old Javier Calzada, 21, was shot to death in Grand Prairie. Later, MS-13 member Brenda Paz, who had turned government witness after moving to Virginia, told police she witnessed the shooting by other gang members. She was found stabbed to death and nearly decapitated along the Shenandoah River in 2003.

SOURCE: Dallas Morning News research

Lawyer's Query To U.S. Attorney Prompts A New Salvo From Kean (NSL)

By Deborah Howlett, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 29, 2006

Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. yesterday questioned why Democratic U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez would enlist the services of one the state's top defense lawyers if he isn't under a federal criminal investigation.

Menendez has said the lawyer, Joseph Hayden, contacted the U.S. attorney around the time a subpoena was issued for records from a federally funded nonprofit agency that paid more than $300,000 to rent a row house that Menendez owned in Union City.

Hayden was doing a "favor" for the campaign, Menendez spokesman Matt Miller said, not personally representing Menendez. Miller declined to say who in the campaign reached out to Hayden and asked him to make the call, except to say it was not Menendez.

"We were trying to find out what was going on," Miller said of tapping Hayden. "We were just looking to find out in the midst of all these rumors what the facts were."

Miller declined to say what the campaign gleaned from Hayden's conversation with federal authorities. "I'm just not going to go there," he said.

Such a scenario makes no sense, Kean said during a press conference in Mountainside yesterday.

"Every criminal defense attorney knows that you don't reach out to the U.S. Attorney's Office during a pending criminal investigation unless you are representing a subject, target or witness," he said.

As an attorney for the campaign, Hayden would not have had the "standing" to inquire about the case, said Kean's campaign counsel Scott Weber of the Patton Boggs law firm in Washington, D.C. "The first question (from the U.S. Attorney's Office) would have been 'Who do you represent?'" said Weber, a former federal prosecutor. "If you're not representing someone, the conversation ends."

Hayden, who could not be reached yesterday, earlier told The Star-Ledger that he and Menendez never talked after the call, even though Menendez has said they did.

Miller said yesterday that there was confusion because "there was no substantive conversation; the senator called to thank him."

Menendez's federal campaign financial reports show no payment to Hayden for legal work, nor any in-kind donation from Hayden.

"He was never officially retained as counsel," Miller said. "He did it as an individual volunteer activity, which is completely permissible under campaign finance law."

With the polls showing the campaign a virtual dead heat 10 days before the election, Menendez continues to insist that there is no ongoing federal criminal investigation.

Deborah Howlett covers politics. She may be reached at dhowlett@starledger.com or (609) 989-0273.

DOJ_NMG_0088190

CIVIL RIGHTS:

EVERYONE'S IN FDNY'S HIRING POOL (NYPOST)

By Patrick Gallahue

The New York Post, October 29, 2006

October 29, 2006 -- The FDNY's million-dollar diversity drive is starting to pay off as the department heads into its final week of recruiting.

Forced to extend its deadline due to lagging numbers, the FDNY's aggressive campaign to bring minorities into the department has managed to boost its pool of applicants by thousands, the Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta announced yesterday.

"The results are impressive," he said. "We have over 20,000 applicants [who] filed [to take the test] as of yesterday, and 35 percent of those applications are from minorities - and we still have a week to go."

Applicants have until Nov. 3 to sign up for the test, which is given every four years.

Last year, the city and the FDNY put more than $3 million into the department's Recruitment and Diversity Unit as the Justice Department probed the department for allegedly discriminatory hiring practices. More than 90 percent of the 11,000-member force is white.

Scoppetta said more than 275 volunteer recruiters visited more than 2,400 events during the drive.

On the original deadline date, Oct. 13, the overall number of applicants was well below average, although the applicant pool was reportedly a little over 31 percent minority.

In the last two weeks, the department has been able to boost both those numbers.

patrick.gallahue@nypost.com

A Minority Report The FDNY Likes (NYDN)

By Brendan Brosh And Don Singleton, Daily News Writers

New York Daily News, October 29, 2006

The FDNY's effort to diversify what has been a largely white, male department has paid off with increased applications from minorities, officials said yesterday.

Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta said a stepped-up recruitment effort has resulted in 20,000 applications, 35% of them from minority group members, who want to take a civil service exam scheduled for Jan. 20.

Early this month, Scoppetta had reported that the department had received only 12,000 applications, down from about 20,000 during a comparable period in 2002.

Scoppetta's response was to extend the application deadline by three weeks, to Nov. 3, and to hold 2,400 recruiting events manned by 275 volunteer recruiters from within the FDNY.

The department has also operated a phone bank, contacting individuals who have indicated an interest in joining up. A total of 42,000 applications were sent out as part of the drive, Scoppetta said.

"It's never been easier to file to become a firefighter," said Scoppetta. "It's a very simple application - no one should be intimidated."

In May, with the department's hiring practices under investigation by the Justice Department, the FDNY launched a multimillion-dollar ad campaign to lure more minority-group firefighters. In August, it relaxed its hiring requirements - the latest move in an uphill effort to increase the diversity of a department that is 91% white.

Lowell Blitzes Immigrant Areas With Ballot Help (BOS)

By Alexander Reid, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 29, 2006

It is a truism of any political election: E very vote counts.

In the past in Lowell, voter registration efforts in the city's immigrant communities have fallen short and advocacy groups have charged that voters who speak languages other than English have faced problems at the polls.

During this year's election campaigns, the city and a number of groups have worked to deal with both situations.

Volunteers from ONE Lowell, an immigrant advocacy group, have spent the past several weeks canvassing neighborhoods throughout the city to register new voters. Translators and bilingual poll workers have been recruited and trained for duty at voting precincts in neighborhoods with the highest population of non-English-speaking residents. Ballot instructions and voting information have been printed in Khmer, Spanish, and Portuguese for distribution on Election Day, Nov. 7.

DOJ_NMG_0088191

Gail Cenik, a manager with the city's Election Commission, said her office has concentrated on education to familiarize people with the voting process.

"There's a population in this city that's never voted before, even though they're citizens and have the right to," she said. "For whatever reasons, they don't participate and we want to change that."

Cenik's comments reflect efforts by the city to correct many of the problems that have plagued the last two elections in Lowell. In March, the US Department of Justice began an investigation into alleged voting rights violations faced by Cambodian-Americans who tried to vote in elections held last November.

The federal investigation was prompted by complaints from the New York-based Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund. The advocacy group surveyed the city's polling places in that election and found several problems, including statements that several voters were directed to the wrong polling places and one instance in which a voter's name was misspelled on the voting roll.

Previously, the legal defense fund had reported on voting problems in the 2004 elections when several voters were not given provisional ballots after their names were found to be missing from the list of registered voters. Others were turned away and told to register in the next election. Those specific problems were not evident in the 2005 election.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson confirmed the ongoing investigation and declined to provide further details.

With the federal probe underway, the city opened discussions with representatives from the legal defense fund and ONE Lowell.

The issue is critical considering Lowell's large number of Cambodians, many of whom are new to the election process. The 2000 C ensus indicates that about 9,000 people of Cambodian ancestry live in Lowell but organizations that work with immigrant communities say the actual figure is closer to 25,000. Overall, Lowell has about 105,000 residents and about 70 percent of them are white.

Voter registration has been a major focus in the weeks leading up to this election.

The Election Commission has been setting up voter registration tables at neighborhood gatherings and events, and at the Southeast Asian Water Festival in August. Public-service announcements have aired on local cable-access programs that target ethnic communities.

Volunteers from ONE Lowell have gone door-to-door to households in the Acre, Back Central, Lower Belvidere, and Middle Highlands neighborhoods to sign up unregistered voters. They've also gone onto the campuses of the University of Massachusetts at Lowell and Middlesex Community College.

Victoria Fahlberg, executive director of ONE Lowell, said the agency had pursued unregistered voters for the past four years but the effort this year was increased, thanks in part to a $40,000 grant from the Theodore Edson Parker Foundation and $3,000 from the Massachusetts Immigrant Refugee Advocacy Coalition.

Fahlberg said the money has been used to pay volunteers who were fluent in Khmer and Spanish. She said voter registration focused primarily on Cambodians but has been broadened to include residents who speak Spanish and Portuguese.

"There are many legislative issues that have come up over the years that have affected immigrants," Fahlberg said, "but their voices are not heard because they didn't have sufficient voting constituency to hold elected officials accountable."

Since late July, Robyn Long-Navas, a worker with ONE Lowell, has accompanied volunteers registering voters in neighborhoods across the city.

"We make it convenient for them," she said. "If they're over 18 and a citizen, they only have to fill out and sign the form." Long-Navas said ONE Lowell will convene a seminar at City Hall tomorrow evening for first-time voters.

Cenik, the Elections Commission manager, said such efforts have helped boost the number of registered voters in the coming election to 49,176 compared to last year's total of 47,403.

Beyond registering new voters, the city also has tried to address obstacles that voters faced when they have shown up at the polls. The survey by the legal defense fund noted an absence of foreign-language materials, including ballots, voting instructions, and information about provisional ballots. It also noted the lack of bilingual poll workers and translators to help non-English-speaking voters.

City officials intend to address the problems by supplying printed materials translated into Khmer, Spanish, and Portuguese. Informational signs also will be posted at polling places. Cenik said her office will deploy 21 poll workers and translators, and pay them between $90 and $125 to work on Election Day.

Assistant City Solicitor Brian W. Leahey said the measures should make this a more problem-free election. "We're hoping that we've put enough things in place to make sure this election is better than the last one."

Glenn D. Magpantay, a staff attorney for the legal defense fund, said his organization will monitor the upcoming election to see whether the city's changes are adequate.

"We are hoping that some of the things we discussed with the city last spring will come to fruition," he said. "We feel like the city has made progress but the best way to tell is by what happens on Nov. 7."

U.S. Investigates Voting Machines' Venezuela Ties (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

The federal government is investigating the takeover last year of a leading American manufacturer of electronic voting systems by a small software company that has been linked to the leftist Venezuelan government of President Hugo Chávez.

The inquiry is focusing on the Venezuelan owners of the software company, the Smartmatic Corporation, and is trying to determine whether the government in Caracas has any control or influence over the firm's operations, government officials and others familiar with the investigation said.

The inquiry on the eve of the midterm elections is being conducted by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or Cfius, the same panel of 12 government agencies that reviewed the abortive attempt by a company in Dubai to take over operations at six American ports earlier this year.

The committee's formal inquiry into Smartmatic and its subsidiary, Sequoia Voting Systems of Oakland, Calif., was first reported Saturday in The Miami Herald.

Officials of both Smartmatic and the Venezuelan government strongly denied yesterday that President Chávez's administration, which has been bitterly at odds with Washington, has any role in Smartmatic.

"The government of Venezuela doesn't have anything to do with the company aside from contracting it for our electoral process," the Venezuelan ambassador in Washington, Bernardo Alvarez, said last night.

Smartmatic was a little-known firm with no experience in voting technology before it was chosen by the Venezuelan authorities to replace the country's elections machinery ahead of a contentious referendum that confirmed Mr. Chávez as president in August 2004.

Seven months before that voting contract was awarded, a Venezuelan government financing agency invested more than $200,000 into a smaller technology company, owned by some of the same people as Smartmatic, that joined with Smartmatic as a minor partner in the bid.

In return, the government agency was given a 28 percent stake in the smaller company and a seat on its board, which was occupied by a senior government official who had previously advised Mr. Chávez on elections technology. But Venezuelan officials later insisted that the money was merely a small-business loan and that it was repaid before the referendum.

With a windfall of some $120 million from its first three contracts with Venezuela, Smartmatic then bought the much larger and more established Sequoia Voting Systems, which now has voting equipment installed in 17 states and the District of Columbia.

Since its takeover by Smartmatic in March 2005, Sequoia has worked aggressively to market its voting machines in Latin America and other developing countries. "The goal is to create the world's leader in electronic voting solutions," said Mitch Stoller, a company spokesman.

But the role of the young Venezuelan engineers who founded Smartmatic has become less visible in public documents as the company has been restructured into an elaborate web of offshore companies and foreign trusts.

"The government should know who owns our voting machines; that is a national security concern," said Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of New York, who asked the Bush administration in May to review the Sequoia takeover.

"There seems to have been an obvious effort to obscure the ownership of the company," Ms. Maloney said of Smartmatic in a telephone interview yesterday. "The Cfius process, if it is moving forward, can determine that."

The concern over Smartmatic's purchase of Sequoia comes amid rising unease about the security of touch-screen voting machines and other electronic elections systems.

Government officials familiar with the Smartmatic inquiry said they doubted that even if the Chávez government was some kind of secret partner in the company, it would try to influence elections in the United States. But some of them speculated that the purchase of Sequoia could help Smartmatic sell its products in Latin America and other developing countries, where safeguards against fraud are weaker.

A spokeswoman for the Treasury Department, which oversees the foreign investment committee, said she could not comment on whether the panel was conducting a formal investigation.

"Cfius has been in contact with the company," said the spokeswoman, Brookly McLaughlin, citing discussions that were first disclosed in July. "It is important that the process is conducted in a professional and nonpolitical manner."

DOJ_NMG_0088193

The committee has wide authority to review foreign investments in the United States that might have national security implications. In practice, though, it has focused mainly on foreign acquisitions of defense companies and other investments in traditional security realms.

Since the political furor over the Dubai ports deal, members of Congress from both parties have sought to widen the purview of such reviews to incorporate other emerging national security concerns.

In late July, the House and the Senate overwhelmingly approved legislation to expand the committee's scope, give a greater role to the office of the director of national intelligence and strengthen Congressional oversight of the review process.

But the Bush administration opposed major changes, and Congressional leaders did not act to reconcile the two bills before Congress adjourned.

Foreigners seeking to buy American companies in areas like defense manufacturing typically seek the committee's review themselves before going ahead with a purchase. Legal experts said it would be highly unusual for the panel to investigate a transaction like the Sequoia takeover, and even more unusual for the panel to try to nullify the transaction so long after it was completed.

It is unclear, moreover, what the government would need to uncover about the Sequoia sale to take such an action.

The investment committee's review typically involves an initial 30-day examination of any transactions that might pose a threat to national security, including a collective assessment from the intelligence community. Should concerns remain, one of the agencies involved can request an additional and more rigorous 45-day investigation.

In the case of the ports deal, the transaction was approved by the investment committee. But the Dubai company later abandoned the deal, agreeing to sell out to an American company after a barrage of criticism by legislators from both parties who said the administration had not adequately reviewed the deal or informed Congress about its implications.

The concerns about possible ties between the owners of Smartmatic and the Chávez government have been well known to United States foreign-policy officials since before the 2004 recall election in which Mr. Chávez, a strong ally of President Fidel Castro of Cuba, won by an official margin of nearly 20 percent.

Opposition leaders asserted that the balloting had been rigged. But a statistical analysis of the distribution of the vote by American experts in electronic voting security showed that the result did not fit the pattern of irregularities that the opposition had claimed.

At the same time, the official audit of the vote by the Venezuelan election authorities was badly flawed, one of the American experts said. "They did it all wrong," one of the authors of the study, Avi Rubin, a professor of computer science at Johns Hopkins University, said in an interview.

Opposition members of Venezuela's electoral council had also protested that they were excluded from the bidding process in which Smartmatic and a smaller company, the Bizta Corporation, were selected to replace a $120 million system that had been built by Election Systems and Software of Omaha.

Smartmatic was then a fledgling technology start-up. Its registered address was the Boca Raton, Fla., home of the father of one of the two young Venezuelan engineers who were its principal officers, Antonio Mugica and Alfredo Anzola, and it had a one-room office with a single secretary.

The company claimed to have only two going ventures, small contracts for secure communications software that a Smartmatic spokesman said had a total value of about $2 million.

At that point, Bizta amounted to even less. Company documents, first reported in 2004 by The Herald, showed the firm to be virtually dormant until it received the $200,000 investment from a fund controlled by the Venezuelan Finance Ministry, which took a 28 percent stake in return.

Weeks before Bizta and Smartmatic won the referendum contract, the government also placed a senior official of the Science Ministry, Omar Montilla, on Bizta's board, alongside Mr. Mugica and Mr. Anzola. Mr. Montilla, The Herald reported, had acted as an adviser to Mr. Chávez on elections technology.

More recent corporate documents show that before and after Smartmatic's purchase of Sequoia from a British-owned firm, the company was reorganized in an array of holding companies based in Delaware (Smartmatic International), the Netherlands (Smartmatic International Holding, B.V.), and Curaçao (Smartmatic International Group, N.V.). The firm's ownership was further shielded in two Curaçao trusts.

Mr. Stoller, the Smartmatic spokesman, said that the reorganization was done simply to help expand the company's international operations, and that it had not tried to hide its ownership, which he said was more than 75 percent in the hands of Mr. Mugica and his family.

"No foreign government or entity, including Venezuela, has ever held any stake in Smartmatic," Mr. Stoller said. "Smartmatic has always been a privately held company, and despite that, we've been fully transparent about the ownership of the corporation."

DOJ_NMG_0088194

Mr. Stoller emphasized that Bizta was a separate company and said the shares the Venezuelan government received in it were “the guarantee for a loan.”

Mr. Stoller also described concerns about the security of Sequoia’s electronic systems as unfounded, given their certification by federal and state election agencies.

But after a municipal primary election in Chicago in March, Sequoia voting machines were blamed for a series of delays and irregularities. Smartmatic’s new president, Jack A. Blaine, acknowledged in a public hearing that Smartmatic workers had been flown up from Venezuela to help with the vote.

Some problems with the election were later blamed on a software component, which transmits the voting results to a central computer, that was developed in Venezuela.

Who Needs To 'Help' America Vote? (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

The hoariest jest in conservatism's repertoire is that the three least credible assertions in the English language are "The check is in the mail," "Of course I'll respect you as much in the morning" and "I'm from the government, and I'm here to help you." Which brings us to the exquisitely named Help America Vote Act.

Having fixed Iraq and New Orleans, the federal government's healing touch is now being applied to voting. As a result, days -- perhaps weeks -- might pass after Election Day without the nation's knowing which party controls the House or Senate. If that happens, one reason might be HAVA, that 2002 bit of federal helpfulness.

For over two centuries before Congress passed HAVA, Americans voted. Really. Unlike today, those who were elected -- Clay, Webster, Lincoln and lesser lights -- often were more complex and sophisticated than the voting machinery.

Using pencils to make marks on paper and later using machines to punch holes in paper ballots, voters -- without federal help; imagine -- caused Congresses and presidents to come and go. States ran elections; some ran them better than others. Some ballots have been better designed than others, as have some voting machines. Most have been adequate. The gross defects of American voting practices were laws that established or permitted discrimination and other abuses. Tardily, but emphatically, those laws were changed and other abuses were halted.

Then came 2000 and Florida and the 36-day lawyers' scrum about George W. Bush's 537-vote margin of victory. In response to which, Congress passed HAVA, which in 2006 may produce fresh confirmation of the prudential axiom that the pursuit of the perfect is the enemy of the good.

The lesson that should have been learned from Florida was: In Florida, as in life generally, one should pursue as much precision as is reasonable -- but not more. When, as very rarely happens, a large electorate, such as that state's 6.1 million voters in 2000, is evenly divided, the many errors and ambiguities that inevitably will occur during the marking of millions of ballots will be much more numerous than the margin of victory. That is unfortunate, but no great injustice will be done, no matter who is declared the winner in a contest that is essentially tied.

Unfortunately, the lesson the nation chose to learn from Florida was that American technological wizardry could prevent such highly unusual events, and no expense should be spared to do so. Hence HAVA, which made $3.8 billion available for states to purchase the most modern voting equipment.

On Election Day, 38 percent of the nation's voters will use touch screens to record their choices, according to Election Data Services. Unlike optical scanners that read markings put on paper ballots, most touch-screen machines -- including those that the New York Times reports will be used in about half of the 45 districts with the most closely contested House races -- produce no paper that can be consulted for verification of the results if a recount is required.

Maryland's new $106 million touch-screen system melted into a chaos of mechanical and human errors in last month's primary election. Lawsuits have been filed in five states seeking to block the use of touch-screen machines.

Today's political climate -- hyperpartisanship leavened by paranoia and exploited by a national surplus of lawyers -- makes this an unpropitious moment for introducing new voting technologies that will be administered by poll workers who often are retirees for whom the task of working a DVD player is a severe challenge. Furthermore, an election is, after all, a government program, and readers of Genesis know that new knowledge often brings trouble. So we should not be surprised if, on Nov. 7, new voting machinery does what new technologies -- dams, bridges, steamships, airplanes -- have done through history: malfunction.

Football, in its disproportionate pursuit of error-free officiating, now relies on instant replays because . . . well, because it can. This technology does indeed reduce human error. But it also reduces games to coagulation as players stand around waiting for officials to study video in the hope of achieving a degree of precision and certainty more appropriate to delicate surgery than to the violent thrashing of huge padded men in what is -- lest we forget, as the judicial solemnities of instant replay cause us to forget -- a game.

DOJ_NMG_0088195

Democracy is not a mere game. But -- write this on a piece of paper, using a No. 2 pencil -- neither is it an activity from which it is sensible to demand more precision than can reasonably be expected when, on a November Tuesday, 100 million people record billions of political choices.

georgewill@washpost.com

Bishops Draft Rules On Ministering To Gays (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

The nation's Roman Catholic bishops have drafted new guidelines for ministry to gay people that affirm church teaching against same-sex relationships, marriages and adoptions by gay couples, yet encourage parishes to reach out to gay Catholics who feel alienated by their church.

The bishops' document, the result of a four-year effort, gives specific instructions on some of the conundrums now faced in many parishes.

The guidelines recommend baptizing the adopted children of same-sex couples, as long as the children will be raised as Catholics. It says that gay people may benefit from revealing their "tendencies" to friends, family and their priest, but should not make "general public announcements" about it in the parish.

The guidelines also say that gay men and lesbians have "no moral obligation to attempt" therapy, an apparent reference to therapy programs that claim to change gay people's sexual orientation. It says that while "some have found therapy helpful," there is "no scientific consensus" either on therapy or the causes of homosexuality.

The bishops will vote on the document — "Ministry to Persons with a Homosexual Inclination: Guidelines for Pastoral Care" — when the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops meets Nov. 13-16 in Baltimore. It could be amended, and needs a two-thirds majority to pass.

Bishop Arthur J. Serratelli of Paterson, N.J., the chairman of the bishops doctrine committee, which wrote the new guidelines, said that although it was difficult to predict whether it would pass, "It's a very sound document, a very clear document. My sense is that the bishops will readily embrace it."

Gay Catholic leaders who had read the draft, however, predicted that it would only further alienate gays and their families from the church.

"There certainly is some lovely language that sounds welcoming in here," said Sam Sinnett, president of DignityUSA, an organization for gay Catholics, "but essentially they're repeating all the spiritually violent things they've been saying about gay and lesbian Catholics for a couple of decades — that we are 'objectively disordered' and our relationships are intrinsically evil."

A previous document, issued by a committee of bishops in 1997, was directed primarily at parents with gay children. But it proved controversial and was never approved by the bishops conference.

This new document puts more emphasis on the church's moral teaching about sexuality. It says that although having a "homosexual inclination" is not itself a sin, homosexual sex is a sin — as are premarital sex and adultery. The answer in all these situations is chastity.

The document says that although the church teaches that homosexuality is "objectively disordered" — a teaching in the catechism that says homosexual acts violate the natural law — the church is not saying that homosexual people themselves are disordered or "rendered morally defective by this inclination."

Such distinctions will provide little comfort to gay Catholics, said Francis DeBernardo, executive director of New Ways Ministry, a gay outreach group for Catholics based in Maryland. Mr. DeBernardo criticized the document for saying that gay people should make their sexuality known only to a small group, and that gay people whose behavior "violates" church teaching should be denied leadership roles in parishes.

"Gay and lesbian people are going to read those remarks and see them as offensive, as telling them to go underground," he said.

That is not the intention, said the Rev. Thomas G. Weinandy, who worked on the document as executive director for the United States bishops' secretariat for doctrine and pastoral practices.

"The bishops would like people with homosexual inclinations to really participate in the church, but they don't want to 'give scandal,' " Father Weinandy said. "If you knew a heterosexual couple were just cohabitating and not married, you wouldn't let them be eucharistic ministers either."

DOJ_NMG_0088196

The Rev. James Martin, an editor at the Jesuit magazine America, said, “The document expresses the tension in the church between a sincere desire to minister to gays and lesbians, and the reality that many gays and lesbians feel unwelcome in the church by virtue of the church’s teaching.”

The bishops have issued statements in recent years condemning gay marriage, gay adoption and benefits for gay partners. They have historically been more attuned to gay issues, however, than some of their colleagues overseas. Last year, the Vatican issued an “instruction” saying that men with “deep-seated” homosexual attraction should not be ordained. In its wake, some American bishops commented in their diocesan newspapers or privately to their priests that they did not regard this as a ban on ordaining gay men, and would continue to accept gay candidates on a case-by-case basis.

The bishops said they felt the need for clear guidelines because there were many pastoral ministries for gay people in parishes and dioceses around the country, and “confusion” about what was an “authentic” Catholic approach, Father Weinandy said. He noted that the Vatican had disciplined the founders of New Ways Ministry, the Rev. Robert Nugent and Sister Jeannine Gramick, for preaching acceptance of gay relationships.

As such, the guidelines repeatedly say that bishops should not countenance church leaders and pastoral workers who fail to uphold its teachings on homosexuality, or who advocate harm toward gay people.

It says, “The church cannot support organizations or individuals whose work contradicts, is ambiguous about, or neglects her teaching on sexuality.”

Gay Couples' Adopted Kids May Be Baptized, Catholic Draft Says (WP)

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Children adopted by gay couples may be baptized in the Roman Catholic Church, even though the church does not support such adoptions, calling them "a pastoral concern," according to new guidelines for ministering to gay men and lesbians that will be presented to U.S. bishops next month in Baltimore.

The 23-page draft document affirms traditional church teachings on same-sex issues, such as forbidding the blessing of same-sex unions or marriages, and addresses some relatively new issues, such as discrimination against and harassment of gay men and lesbians.

The document, "Ministry to Persons with a Homosexual Inclination: Guidelines for Pastoral Care," marks the first time in nearly 10 years that U.S. bishops have addressed such ministry in detail. Bishops will debate and vote on the guidelines at their annual fall meeting, Nov. 13 to 16, in Baltimore.

An early draft of the guidelines welcomes celibate gay men and lesbians to take part in parish life while asserting the church's "right to deny roles of service to those whose behavior violates her teaching." Public announcements of one's sexual orientation "are not helpful and should not be encouraged," the draft cautions, and it says church ministers must not bless same-sex unions or marriages or promote them in any way.

The bishops' Secretariat for Doctrine and Pastoral Practices took four years to draft the document.

Gay Marriage Through A Black-White Prism (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

IN 1947, the county clerk in Los Angeles refused to marry Andrea Perez and Sylvester Davis. They were of different races, and a California law said that “all marriages of white persons with Negroes, Mongolians, members of the Malay race or mulattoes are illegal.” The next year, the California Supreme Court, by a vote of 4 to 3, struck down that law in Perez v. Sharp.

In 2003, in another 4-to-3 decision, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court authorized gay marriages, and it invoked the Perez case as a model.

Last week, in a third 4-to-3 decision, the New Jersey Supreme Court stopped just short of endorsing gay marriages. It instructed the State Legislature to provide gay unions with a full complement of legal rights but said that the question of whether to call such unions “marriages” was a political, not judicial, one.

The New Jersey court did not mention the Perez case by name and it said that interracial marriage was not a useful touchstone in thinking about same-sex marriage.

But people on both sides of the same-sex marriage issue say there are important lessons from the earlier debate over laws banning interracial marriages, about the reasoning in the Perez decision and about how, over two decades, that decision came to be accepted in the courts, in state legislatures and in the popular culture. Unsurprisingly, they differ about what those lessons are.

Gay-marriage advocates say the logic of the Perez decision applies directly to gay unions. After all, they point out, the decision said that “the essence of the right to marry is freedom to join in marriage with the person of one’s choice.”

DOJ_NMG_0088197

Chief Justice Margaret H. Marshall of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, writing for the majority in the 2003 decision, agreed. "In this case, as in Perez," she wrote, "a statute deprives individuals of access to an institution of fundamental legal, personal and social significance — the institution of marriage — because of a single trait." It made no difference, she wrote, that one trait was skin color and the other sexual orientation.

Advocates for gay marriage say there is much to be learned from Perez. "No one is saying that the experiences of racial minorities are identical to the experiences of same-sex couples," said Evan Wolfson, executive director of Freedom to Marry. "There are always differences, but there are profound similarities."

Opponents of gay marriage, on the other hand, say the judicial and legislative aftermath of Perez is more telling than the decision itself. Although 29 other states had laws barring interracial marriage at the time of the Perez case, no other state supreme court followed California. Instead, over time many state legislatures repealed the bans; in some states the laws remained on the books, but went largely unenforced.

In the end, it took two decades before the United States Supreme Court struck down in 1967 all of the 16 remaining antimiscegenation laws, in Loving v. Virginia, involving a Virginia couple who had been convicted of violating that state's interracial marriage ban.

This history, opponents of gay marriage say, shows that the Perez court usurped the democratic process, imposing a decision that most of the country, however unfairly, was not ready to embrace.

Maggie Gallagher, the president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, which opposes gay marriage, said the contrast between the political landscape when the Supreme Court acted in 1967 and that facing proponents of gay marriage today is stark and telling.

"When the court moved to strike down the interracial marriage laws," Ms. Gallagher said, "the democratic process was in the process of getting rid of these laws. What's happening now is exactly the opposite: more and more states are moving to protect marriage."

In last week's decision from New Jersey, the justices in the majority tried to find what they considered middle ground. They affirmed gay couples' right to equal treatment, even as they said there was no constitutional right to same-sex marriage. Writing for the majority, Justice Barry T. Albin noted that the Loving case concerned heterosexual couples facing "intolerable racial distinctions" and did not apply to sexual orientation.

The fate of marriage in the courts may be about to come full circle. In the next year or so, the California Supreme Court will hear a gay-marriage case. Ms. Gallagher said that if that court — the court that decided Perez almost 60 years ago — rejects same-sex marriage, "we're out of the gay-marriage question for 10 years."

That may be an overstatement, as challenges are pending in Connecticut and Maryland, too, and the New Jersey Legislature may yet allow gay marriage by statute.

Although the United States Supreme Court in 2003 struck down a Texas law making gay sex a crime, few experts believe that the court is poised to rule in favor of gay marriage anytime soon. "As I look at possible votes on the Supreme Court," said Andrew Koppelman, a law professor at Northwestern who supports gay marriage, "I have a lot of trouble getting to one."

But time may be on the side of gay marriage, he added, noting that two decades passed before the Supreme Court, in Loving, got around to endorsing the decision in Perez.

ANTITRUST:

In A Blurry World, Ownership Is Yesterday's News (NYT)

By Richard Siklos

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

IT is hard to find any public policy question that feels less relevant by the minute than whether one person or company should be permitted to own television stations and newspapers in the same market.

Rules barring cross-ownership went into effect in 1975 but were overturned by the Federal Communications Commission three years ago. But, soon after, an appellate court effectively sent the decision back for another go-round, which is under way. This month in Los Angeles, the commission held a public hearing, the first of a series around the country, to look at newspaper-TV cross-ownership but also to examine other, more pertinent questions — for instance, how many radio or television stations a single owner can have in a single market.

A Supreme Court ruling from 1945 may best sum up why the F.C.C. scrutinizes such affairs: to ensure "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources." It's too bad we can't skip months of table-thumping hearings over thousands of pages of studies and filings and just acknowledge that the media landscape is changing quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0088198

The reality is that even if media companies could own more TV stations and newspapers in the same city, they might not think that it's such a brilliant idea any more. As the F.C.C.'s chairman, Kevin J. Martin, said recently: "We need to develop a rule for cross-ownership that reflects current market characteristics, including the struggling nature of today's newspaper industry."

The Tribune Company is Exhibit A, of course. Its past success with a triple play of television, newspaper and radio in its hometown of Chicago has not translated into financial brilliance in New York and Los Angeles, where it owns Newsday and The Los Angeles Times, as well as the television stations WPIX and KTLA. Under pressure from its biggest shareholder and a slumping share price, the company has said it is exploring all options, including selling part or all of itself.

In addition to Chicago, there are markets like Atlanta, where the privately held Cox Enterprises owns The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, television, cable and much else. In these places, cross-ownership appears to have served its corporate orchestrators well.

Here is one small example: by using its media properties to promote a new Web venture, Cox has taken an early stab at fending off the efforts of the Google and Yahoo juggernauts. It has introduced a local search business in Atlanta called Kudzu.com, and, on Monday, is set to announce that it is rolling out Kudzu.com in three more markets where it has cable operations and can capitalize on its local relationships with advertisers.

The cross-media holdings by Tribune and Cox in their hometowns, by the way, were in place when the new rules took effect and so were permitted to stay. Another city that gained exemption from the rule is New York, where the News Corporation owns The New York Post and two television stations.

But what does it say about the appeal of cross-ownership that The Post has lost money since the News Corporation's chairman, Rupert Murdoch, acquired it for the second time, in 1993, and that Mr. Murdoch, whose roots are in ink and paper, has otherwise quit the newspaper business in the United States in favor of television, cable channels and the Internet?

Having asked a few media executives whether relaxed rules would lead them to pursue cross-ownership, my sense is that it's basically a one-way street: the newspaper people might like to secure a place on the TV dial, not the other way around. Most broadcasters would prefer that the F.C.C. let them gobble up more television or radio stations in a single market.

It's also worth noting that people are not exactly leaping into the local TV station business, either. The decades-old network affiliate system is in transition as most viewers across the country get their stations via satellite and cable and as more network programming is finding its way directly onto DVDs and the Web. In this environment, some station owners are starting to feel a financial pinch, though not as acutely as their newspaper counterparts.

The daily newspaper business in particular has been suffering from what management consultants politely call value destruction: even though they may reach more readers via the Web, their business model is being undermined and their profit is flat or declining. Still, there are no doubt budding media grandees or private-equity gurus who would take a crack at owning TV and newspaper outlets in the same city if given half a chance.

Big media's argument for relaxing cross-ownership rules is that the days when broadcast TV and newspapers wholly dominated their markets are dimming. Publishers and broadcasters need scale to compete effectively in an era when cable, digitization and the Internet have vastly increased the number of sources of news and information in a market.

But the most important reason that cross-ownership rules no longer make sense is this: the distinctions between print and television are starting to blur in a digital world. Video on the Web is the biggest thing since turkey and gravy. Companies like Tribune have argued that their TV expertise will increasingly lead to more attractive and useful Web sites incorporating video clips alongside articles, and vice versa.

On the other side, many people, including artists, minority groups, consumer advocates and academics, say the rules should be maintained. Their basic counter-argument is that consolidation in all its different guises — radio-TV, multiple radio stations in a market, newspaper-TV ownership and so on — has inevitably led to homogeneity and blandness.

The Consumers Union says digital media have not led to as much variety and democratization as people might think. According to a study it conducted, about 70 percent of online news consumers said an association with a traditional news source makes online news more credible. Another study found that local television stations and newspapers were by far its respondents' chief sources of news. In other words, most people either watch local television or read the local paper — and it is those outlets' Web sites that will probably carry the most clout.

ANOTHER group's study filed in the proceedings last week aimed to debunk the contention — apparently embraced by the F.C.C. in the past — that cross-ownership led to improved news and public affairs programming at the television stations in question. But the report's author, an assistant professor at the University of Michigan, lost me when he noted that he was measuring only the quantity, not the quality, of programming in markets where newspapers and TV stations are jointly owned. "Systematic tools for evaluating the quality of news programming would also be useful," he wrote. Yikes, no thanks.

DOJ_NMG_0088199

Yes, there is too much blandness in big media. Yes, television and newspapers are still the popular providers of local news. And, yes, it's probably impossible to say that consolidation has succeeded in every case in providing more news "from diverse and antagonistic sources."

But cross-media ownership is neither the solution to the industry's woes nor the potential bogeyman it might have once appeared. We're in a different game now.

ENVIRONMENT:

Climate Research Center's Oversight Up For Bidding (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

denver — Wanna run a government lab staffed by hundreds of scientists tackling climate issues like global warming?

For the first time in 46 years, management of the National Center for Atmospheric Research, perched on a ridge under the Rocky Mountains northwest of here, is up for grabs. Since 1997, National Science Foundation policy has required that all government research institutions be subject to a competitive bidding process when their contracts come up for renewal.

Foundation officials say that a formal request for bids is imminent and that the competition will be open to all organizations — academic, nonprofit and for-profit. Since its founding in 1960, the atmospheric center, based in Boulder, has been run by a nonprofit consortium of 70 universities, the University Corporation for Atmospheric Research.

The center's research on global warming and its forecasts of rising temperatures, fiercer wildfires and stronger storms have drawn the ire of some politicians. But officials in Washington say that politics will not affect the competition.

"This doesn't really have anything to do with the science that's getting done there," said Kristin Spencer, the agreements officer at the National Science Foundation who is handling the competition.

The current five-year agreement to run the atmospheric center, which ends in September 2008, is worth $548 million.

Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Chairman James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), who contends that human-caused global warming is a "hoax," wrote to the foundation in February to confirm it was putting the atmospheric center's management agreement out for bid. He also asked for lists of the roughly 1,000 employees of the center and its operating consortium, as well as the identities of such employees under contract with other government agencies or nonprofits.

Committee spokesman Matthew Dempsey said Inhofe was simply doing his job and had no interest in injecting politics into science. "As chairman of the … committee that has jurisdiction over issues of climate change, Sen. Inhofe remains committed to providing oversight of all climate change programs and ensuring accountability and transparency by government agencies," Dempsey said.

The National Center for Atmospheric Research is the last of the five federally funded research centers operated by the National Science Foundation to go out for bid. Only one has changed management as the result of competition: Last year, management of the Department of Energy's research labs at Los Alamos, N.M., switched from the University of California to a team headed by the private for-profit Bechtel Group.

The president of the University Corporation for Atmospheric Research, Rick Anthes, said the National Science Foundation warned the consortium in 2003 that it would have to compete to hold on to the atmospheric center. Anthes said he had no problem with that.

"We are very concerned with any political interference with this process," but, Anthes said, he expects "the NSF will run a very fair process."

"There's no guarantee … [but] we expect to win," Anthes added. "The success record is so strong."

nicholas.riccardi@latimes.com

Arsonist Sought As Calmer Winds Aid Firefighters (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

BEAUMONT, Calif., Oct. 28 (AP) — Calmer winds on Saturday helped crews fighting a huge wildfire that killed four firefighters and critically injured a fifth, while investigators searched for the arsonist who set the blaze roaring through the canyons of Southern California.

"It looks like things are beginning to turn in our favor," said Bill Peters, a California Department of Forestry spokesman. "We had a good overnight. It wasn't nearly as windy as it's been."

DOJ_NMG_0088200

Now in its third day, the fire that broke out in uninhabited brushland about 90 miles east of Los Angeles has blackened 39,900 acres, or more than 62 square miles, the authorities said. The fire was 40 percent contained, they added.

A reward for information leading to the arsonist rose to $500,000 on Friday, as $100,000 posted by Riverside County multiplied with matching offers from the state; neighboring San Bernardino County; a Rancho Mirage resident, Tim Blixseth; and the Morongo Band of Mission Indians, which has a casino in nearby Cabazon.

Forecasters predicted winds would ease and temperatures would drop slightly throughout the weekend, which could help as crews work in steep terrain to build fire lines around the blaze.

Investigators were looking into whether the wildfire was related to other blazes in recent months, including a canyon fire last weekend, though a sheriff's spokesman said there was no immediate indication of a serial arsonist.

Residents said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire broke out west of the San Jacinto Mountains.

The fire destroyed about 10 structures, including homes; forced 700 people to flee; and flushed coyotes and other wildlife into the open.

Santa Ana winds gusted to 45 miles an hour but kept the fire in undeveloped land, away from homes in Riverside County. About 2,700 firefighters worked to corral the flames and a DC-10 jet capable of dropping 12,000-gallon loads of retardant joined a fleet of firefighting helicopters and airtankers.

The Forest Service and the state Department of Forestry were investigating the firefighters' deaths, gathering information on weather, topography and fuel.

The four firefighters were killed Thursday when the wind blew a wall of flames down on them in the hills near Palm Springs as they tried to protect a home.

Michael Wakowski, a fire division chief in the San Bernardino National Forest, said it did not appear the crew did anything wrong.

"Sometimes things go bad, I hate to say," he said.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Rules Cut Number Of Meth Labs (FWST)

By Jan Jarvis And Heather Svokos

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 29, 2006

Several times a day, pharmacists throughout North Texas get blasted by sniffling, sneezing allergy and sinus sufferers who hate what they have to go through to get their Sudafed.

First, consumers must show a photo ID, and then they must sign their name while someone on the other side of the counter fills in a log. It can take five minutes or more to get any medication that contains pseudoephedrine, the popular decongestant that criminals have used to make methamphetamine.

"It makes me very, very aggravated and irritated," said Mandi Elias of Arlington, who shopped recently at the south Arlington SuperTarget. "It's just so frustrating because I'm used to picking it up at the counter and going."

Such retail inconvenience is succeeding, however, in making it tough for would-be meth cooks to buy enough decongestant to produce the highly addictive substance that sheriffs nationwide identify as the country's No. 1 drug problem.

New laws limiting how much pseudoephedrine consumers can buy at a time have slashed the numbers of clandestine meth labs, which have blown up in rural areas and residential neighborhoods, law enforcement experts say.

But just as quickly, Mexican drug cartels have stepped in to fill the void. Mexican manufacturers now buy large quantities of decongestant tablets from China, Panama and India to make "ice," what some experts say is a purer, more potent form of the drug.

"We got so much meth coming up from Mexico." said Herschel Tebay, commander of the Tarrant County Narcotics Unit. "Over 50 percent of the cases that we're actively working on are meth." Growing demand for treatment

The federal Combat Meth Act took effect just last month. Signed by President Bush in March, the law limits pseudoephedrine sales to 3.6 grams per day and 9 grams every 30 days.

It also requires purchasers to provide identification and sign a logbook. Sellers must keep the products behind the counter or under lock and key and must register online with the U.S. Attorney General.

Texans have had more than a year to get used to a similar state law.

Since August 2005, pharmacists have been required to keep pseudoephedrine behind the counter. No one under 16 may purchase products containing the medication. The law limits consumers to no more than 6 grams of pseudoephedrine, the equivalent of two packages, at a time. Retailers must keep a log of those who buy it and maintain the records for two years.

There's little doubt that the restrictions have helped, experts said.

"We've pretty much shut down the mom and pop labs," said Tebay, whose team coordinates drug investigations. "We've gone from having 80 to 100 a year to running across maybe 20 to 25."

Statewide, the number of clandestine meth labs has dropped as well — down about 40 percent in the past few years. In 2005, 270 meth labs were found in Texas, compared with 452 in 2004 and 677 in 2003, according to the National Clandestine Laboratory Database, a clearinghouse for all federal, state and local lab seizures. It is operated by the El Paso Intelligence Center.

Through May of this year, the Texas Department of Public Safety had seized 86 meth labs, down from 382 the previous year, the most current figures available.

But those restrictions have little impact on the meth made and distributed in Mexico.

Last year, the Dallas-Fort Worth area ranked as one of the five largest trans-shipment zones for methamphetamine in the country, according to the U.S. Justice Department. When meth comes across the border, it comes most often to New York, Miami, San Diego, Houston and Dallas-Fort Worth.

Not surprisingly, demand for meth addiction treatment is growing. Meth is one of the most addictive drugs and is one of the toughest to quit for good.

In 2001, 2,574 people — 7 percent of admissions — reported meth as their primary drug, according to the Texas Department of State Health Services.

By 2005, that number had nearly tripled to 7,714 people or 15 percent of admissions — and those were only indigent clients in need of substance abuse treatment at state-funded clinics.

In Tarrant County, 24 percent of the 4,608 adults admitted to treatment facilities in 2005 were there for because of a meth or amphetamine addiction, the state agency said.

Consider some recent area examples:

The Rev. Terry Hornbuckle, the former pastor of Arlington's Agape Christian Fellowship who was convicted in August of raping three women, tested positive for meth twice in the last year and a half. Witnesses testified during his trial that meth was Hornbuckle's drug of choice.

Scott Barnett, Bedford's former planning and community development director, was fired in February after being arrested for meth possession. Barnett was making almost $97,000 a year and had worked for the city for more than 20 years.

On Aug. 31, Fort Worth police arrested local car dealer Stephen Herman Blevins on suspicion of drug possession with intent to deliver. They found 48 pounds of methamphetamine — with a street value of $2 million (or nearly $500,000 wholesale). The bust was one of the largest meth seizures in the city's history.

And just this week, the Tarrant County medical examiner ruled that Michael Callahan, a 54-year-old found dead in a vacant lot in far south Fort Worth on Sept. 3 had died accidentally from acute methamphetamine intoxication. Reformulated products

With no sign of demand for meth slowing, some pharmaceutical companies have responded by reformulating products to include phenylephrine so they don't have to be put them behind the counter, said Darrell Spence of Fort Worth, immediate past president of the Texas Pharmacy Association.

Phenylephrine is a decongestant that, like pseudoephedrine, works by shrinking blood vessels. It can be taken orally but is also found in nasal sprays such as Neo-Synephrine. It cannot be used to make meth. The maximum daily adult dosage for phenylephrine is 60 mg; for pseudoephedrine it is 240 mg.

In January 2005, Pfizer, which makes Sudafed, began marketing Sudafed PE, which contains phenylephrine. Since then, other cold medications including Dayquil, Theraflu and Alka-Seltzer Plus have hit the market with new formulas containing phenylephrine.

But there have been questions about the effectiveness of the decongestant in the dose available.

Two University of Florida pharmacists argued that the drug was ineffective at the Food and Drug Administration's approved dose, in a July peer-reviewed letter to the Journal of Allergy and Clinical Immunology .

"When ingested, it becomes inactivated between the gut and the liver," according to Leslie Hendeles, one of the University of Florida pharmacists who warned that the drug is poorly absorbed in the bloodstream.

In 1976, the FDA said that a 10 milligram dose was safe and effective, making it possible for companies to use the ingredient without conducting studies, according to the University of Florida pharmacists.

But some people say the drug does not work at the 10 milligram dosage.

"In my experience, it is not as effective at drying up stuffy noses," Spence said.

The maker of Claritin-D, the best-selling branded cold product with $302.5 million in sales this year, used another strategy. Schering-Plough began an advertising campaign this fall telling consumers that it chose not to change its formula, which contains pseudoephedrine. The original formula — even though it's kept behind the pharmacy counter — works best, the manufacturer says.

DOJ_NMG_0088202

Still it's a hassle when someone gets sick after the pharmacy closes, said Elias, the Arlington mother.

"When the kids get sick at 11 or 12 at night, I can't get anything for them," she said. "I have to wait until the next day."

Federal Marshals, Police Step-up Effort To Nab Sex Offenders (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 29, 2006

Squads of federal marshals and police rounded up hundreds of sexual predators and gang members in the eastern half of the United States as part of a nationwide manhunt that included 26 arrests in the city of Pittsburgh on Wednesday.

Deferring to the U.S. Justice Department, Pittsburgh police said they couldn't discuss the charges or provide any details.

But some of those caught here were sex offenders; others were fugitives with warrants for a variety of other felonies.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez will announce the national results on Thursday in Washington, D.C., and locally U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan plans a news conference to detail the arrests in the 25-county Western Pennsylvania district.

The roundup is the second part of a national effort to hunt down sex offenders. The first phase was in April, when the marshals arrested 1,102 fugitives on various sex offense charges in 27 states west of the Mississippi River.

A similar operation last year, which targeted mostly violent repeat offenders, netted 10,340 fugitives across the United States, the largest fugitive apprehension in history. In this region, more than 100 were captured.

This time the marshals and local police concentrated heavily on Megan's Law violators and other sexual predators, including those who have failed to register as sex offenders or are not living at the addresses where their Megan's Law form says they should be.

Keeping track of sex offenders has long been a headache for police who are often overburdened with other duties.

But this year a new law has designated the marshals service as the lead agency to hunt them down across the U.S.

The law, the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, was signed by President Bush on July 27, the 25th anniversary of the abduction and murder of 6-year-old Adam Walsh in Florida.

Adam's father, John Walsh, is the host of "America's Most Wanted." He and his wife, Reve, attended the signing in the White House Rose Garden.

Under the law, convicted sex offenders who fail to register with local authorities will be charged with a felony in the U.S. District Courts. Previously, each state dealt with failure to register differently.

The first man in the country to be charged with the new federal crime of failure to register is John Henry Gill, 47, who was indicted last week in Salt Lake City.

The marshals' new initiative has parallels with the Justice Department crackdown on illegal guns under Project Safe Neighborhoods, in which the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is the designated agency for pursuing ex-cons caught carrying weapons, a federal crime.

The marshals will assume a similar role for convicted sex offenders. Although he was not among those caught last week, one local example of the kind of fugitive the marshals will pursue is Larry M. Williams, 33, of Lincoln-Lemington, who was arrested at a North Side mosque this summer.

In addition to being wanted on federal weapons charges, he was also wanted for failure to register as a sex offender following his rape conviction in the state of Washington.

Since the Adam Walsh law went into affect, deputy marshals have been training with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children to get up to speed on Megan's Law registry and child predator issues.

IMMIGRATION:

Critics Attack Proposed Rules For Citizenship (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Fee hikes, new tests, online filings called barriers for poor.

Immigrant advocacy groups are decrying an array of proposed federal measures, including application fee increases and online filing requirements, that they fear will sharply reduce the ability of some legal immigrants to become U.S. citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0088203

As President Bush signed a controversial bill last week authorizing 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, immigrant rights groups charge that the U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services is erecting a virtual "second wall" that would disproportionately hurt Mexican immigrants, who tend to be less educated and earn lower incomes than others.

Last week, a coalition of more than 230 religious, labor and immigrant rights groups delivered a letter to citizenship bureau Director Emilio Gonzalez, expressing strong concern about application fee increases that could double to $800, a "digital barrier" of a mandatory online filing system, extensive new paperwork and a revised history and civics test they fear could be more difficult.

"Together they appear to us a clear strategy pursued through administrative fiat to make the dream of American citizenship unattainable for many lower-income, less-educated immigrants," said the letter, which was initiated by the Chicago-based Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights.

Some activists fear the Bush administration is seeking to tighten access to citizenship to bar potential new Democratic voters. But U.S. immigration officials flatly deny any partisan motives.

They say they are merely aiming to make the system more efficient, financially self-sustaining and better able to ensure that new citizens understand foundational American values and historical events. Some of the initiatives, including the move to automation and a revised test, were recommended in 1997 by the U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform under the Clinton administration. The final proposals are expected to be announced in the next few months and take 12 to 18 months to implement.

"There is no more priceless gift a person can receive than American citizenship," said Christopher Bentley, spokesman for the citizenship bureau in Washington. "Our expectation is that people who have the opportunity to become U.S. citizens realize that the cost and sacrifice is worth the investment in their future."

Some immigrants would seem to agree. At a recent citizenship workshop in Los Angeles, where volunteers served 2,000 people who lined up for hours to apply for naturalization, machine operator Arturo Reyna said he scrimped and saved for a year to pay the $400 application fee. The native of Mexico, whose wife, Rosa, is a U.S. citizen, said the price was eminently worth the right to vote and to live here with his family.

"There are big groups trying to stop immigration," said Reyna, 30. "We don't like these things, but we can't vote. As a citizen, you can take part in decisions."

Victor Yebra, a 38-year-old silk screener who illegally crossed the U.S.-Mexico border as a boy to join his bracero father and subsequently won amnesty, said some immigrants might find higher application fees or online filing requirements onerous. But he said they would not dissuade those determined to become citizens.

"A lot of people here won't want to deal with these things, but I think they'll find a way to do it," Yebra said. "It's all for your own good future."

The proposed changes have, however, alarmed many — and not only in the Latino community. Koreans accounted for about one-fourth of the organizations signing the letter of protest to Gonzalez.

Koreans began naturalizing in greater numbers in the mid-1990s, when the Los Angeles riot and welfare cutbacks aimed at immigrants showed them the importance of civic influence, said Eun Sook Lee, executive director of the National Korean American Service & Education Consortium in Koreatown. Still, she said, about 300,000 Korean immigrants eligible to become citizens have not yet done so.

"With these measures, the message they're sending is that they want to delay full civic participation of new citizens," Lee said.

According to scholars, the politics of naturalization are nearly as old as citizenship rites themselves.

At the turn of the 20th century, urban political machines trolling for voters in several states pushed through so many fraudulent naturalizations that Congress passed a landmark immigration reform bill in 1906, said Lorraine McDonnell, a UC Santa Barbara political science professor. Among other things, she said, the reform bill required for the first time that applicants be able to speak English.

More recently, the Clinton administration was accused of "importing votes" by relaxing normal immigration procedures in its Citizenship USA campaign to register 1 million mostly Latino new voters before the 1996 elections. The charges by Republicans and other critics sparked a three-year Justice Department investigation, which ultimately rejected charges of partisan motives but found slipshod management, including lax background checks that allowed 6,000 possible criminals to become citizens.

To become citizens, legal permanent residents must reside in the United States for five years — or three years if they are married to a U.S. citizen or serve in the military. They must also pass English and civics tests, be of "good moral character" and take an oath of allegiance.

Concern about the civics test dates back to 1997, when the U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform criticized it for relying on "memorization of discrete facts rather than on substantive understanding of the basic concepts of civic participation."

DOJ_NMG_0088204

Under the Bush administration, activists feared that the tests would become more difficult and the format changed to multiple choice, which some immigrants are unfamiliar with, said Fred Tsao of the Illinois immigration coalition, which has closely tracked the issue.

Tsao and others said their anxiety mounted after the Senate passed Republican-sponsored legislation this year setting as goals for the revised test understanding of major documents, such as the Federalist Papers and Emancipation Proclamation, and important historical events, such as major court decisions and key figures in U.S. politics, science, business and art.

Those concerns, however, have abated somewhat. Immigration officials began meeting regularly with adult educators and immigrant advocates, and assured them the test's format and degree of difficulty would not change.

"We want to add meaning to the process, not make it harder, so we have assurances that this exercise empowers [new citizens] to take their rightful place in society," the citizenship bureau's Bentley said.

As one example, he said, questions about the American flag's colors might be jettisoned in favor of those about key rights, such as voting.

Activists are more concerned about proposed fee increases and mandatory online filing. The fees have increased to $400 from $95 since 1998 and are set to possibly double after immigration officials complete a fee survey later this year.

Marcelo Gaete of the Los Angeles-based National Assn. of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials Educational Fund said that hundreds of immigrants in two recent citizenship workshops could not afford to pay the current fees and would suffer if they were increased.

But Bentley said the fee hikes were inevitable because the citizenship bureau receives no regular budget appropriation and must be self-sustaining. A special five-year budget appropriation of $440 million that reduced the application backlog from 3.8 million cases in January 2004 to 120,000 as of August is set to run out, requiring new revenue to sustain the progress, he said.

To promote efficiency, Bentley said the agency also aims to eliminate paper filing and transform to an all-electronic system in the next five years. "The infrastructure we have now is broken," he said. "We have to come into the 21st century."

Activists, however, say an online filing requirement will shut out many immigrants without access to computers and open the door to abuse from unscrupulous immigration businesses.

By requiring a 19-page form simply to register for an online account, the new system will all but eliminate the ability to offer mass citizenship application workshops, said Laura Burdick deputy director for national programs at the Catholic Legal Immigration Network in Washington.

"This is not a Democratic or Republican issue," Burdick said. "Citizenship is in everyone's interest."

TAX:

Future Tax Shock (NYT)

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

One of President Bush's be-very-afraid lines this campaign season is that Democrats, if elected, will raise taxes. What he doesn't say is that if you are one of tens of millions of Americans who make between $75,000 and $500,000 a year, your taxes are already scheduled to rise starting next year — because of laws that Mr. Bush championed and other actions he failed to take.

The higher taxes stem from the alternative minimum tax, a levy that is supposed to snare multimillionaires who would otherwise get away with using excessive tax shelters to wipe out their tax bills. But these days, the alternative tax is snaring many upper-middle-income filers.

Mr. Bush set the trap in 2001 — and in 2003, 2004 and 2006. In each of those years, he flogged for new tax cuts without requiring corresponding long-term changes in the existing rules for the alternative tax. It was well known that failure to update the alternative tax would create perverse interactions with the new tax cuts, causing filers' tax bills to drop because of the cuts, only to shoot back up again from the alternative levy.

Mr. Bush said he would vanquish the problem through tax reform. Didn't happen. Congress never wrestled with lasting solutions. The truth is, the president and lawmakers are paralyzed. To fix the alternative tax while keeping the Bush tax cuts on the books would result in the loss of some $800 billion in revenue over 10 years, blowing a hole in the federal budget and exposing how utterly unaffordable the tax cuts of the last five years really are.

The taxpayers wrongly afflicted by the alternative tax are not tax dodgers. For the most part, they are couples with children who have broken into the ranks of six-figure earners, and who live in high-tax states like New York and California. They are being penalized, in effect, for claiming everyday deductions — like write-offs for dependents and property taxes — which, under the alternative tax rules, are viewed as excessive shelters.

DOJ_NMG_0088205

Meanwhile, multimillionaires are not being snared at nearly the same rate as other filers. In part, that's because much of the income of the superrich comes from investments. The tax breaks for investments — the grail of the administration's tax-cutting crusade — are not counted as shelters under the alternative tax the way, say, children are.

For the past few years, Congress has papered over the mess by passing temporary relief measures to shield most — though not all — upper-middle-income taxpayers from having to pay the alternative tax. The latest stopgap expires at the end of this year, leaving taxpayers exposed at ever lower income levels. Congress could pass another temporary stay, and it will probably do so.

But stopgaps do little to protect the families already being unfairly clobbered by the alternative tax. And they make the nation's underlying budget problems worse. Like the Bush tax cuts themselves, they result in less tax revenue than is needed, requiring the government to borrow heavily. The mounting debt of the Bush years — all of which must be paid back with interest — makes tax increases or budget cuts, or both, inevitable.

The president wants to push off the day of reckoning until he leaves the White House, while whipping up voter fear of future tax increases. But the reality is that he and his supporters have laid the groundwork for higher taxes and hamstrung government, no matter who is in office in the months and years to come.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

What He's Trying To Say (NYT)

By Ben Wallace-Wells

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

The White House, like any castle, has its own peculiar rituals, and in the five months that Tony Snow has been President George W. Bush's press secretary, he has begun to learn them. For instance, at some point in virtually every televised press briefing, a middle-aged man named Raghubir Goyal, who is The India Globe's Washington correspondent, will thrust his arm anxiously into the air, be called on and deliver a rambling monologue about the perfidies of Pakistan in general and Pakistan's president, Gen.

Pervez Musharraf, in particular. And a man named Lester Kinsolving, a radio host and reporter for a Baltimore station with a big grin and game-show-host wavy hair, will interrupt a back-and-forth on, say, the operational capacities of Al Qaeda to read confounding questions he has written out, word for word, before the press briefing began.

"Tony," Kinsolving began one morning in September, "The Washington Times noted on Page 1 that the Congressional Black Caucus will remain exclusively black. Does the president support or oppose this racial segregation, which excluded California Congressman Pete Stark — who risked his life for civil rights in Mississippi — because Stark was born white?"

Snow grinned and shook his head and began to point to some other reporter, any other reporter.

"No, wait a minute," Kinsolving said, "are you just going to evade that question?"

No," Snow said, beginning to laugh, enjoying the exchange, his deep voice booming, "I'm going to laugh at it." He did. So did the rest of the room.

Snow, who is 51, is 6-foot-4, with a genial lectern slouch and a chin that looks as if it were built for contact. But the first thing you notice about him is his facility at managing the fragile balance of a press room, its constant teeter between sincerity, open hostility and absurdity. Kinsolving's and Goyal's questions were sometimes land mines for previous press secretaries. Snow brushes past them genially. For the most part, Snow's two predecessors in the Bush White House tended to look as if they regarded the twice-daily meetings with the press as painful procedures. Still, these are anxious days for the White House, with the president's approval ratings stuck below 40 percent — the sort of number that has a way of emboldening the reporters and making the atmosphere in the press room particularly aggressive. So the Bush White House has turned to Snow, a longtime broadcaster at Fox News, in the hope that he can change the tone and project a confident, prime-time sort of calm. Gone already is the firing squad of the Scott McClellan days, and there is little echo of the testy, you-don't-need-to-know authority of President Bush's first press secretary,

Ari Fleischer. Snow's style is basically cheery: Gee, isn't it fun to run the world?

From the perspective of the White House, the classic Tony Snow moment came on Sept. 12, when he was challenged by David Gregory, the chief White House correspondent from NBC News, who has become perhaps the most consistently aggressive of the big-time correspondents. Vice President Dick Cheney had charged that the Democrats' talk of withdrawing the troops from Iraq "validates the strategy of the terrorists," and

John Boehner, the House majority leader, had phrased the matter even more harshly, saying of the Democrats, "I wonder if they're more interested in protecting the terrorists than they are in protecting the American people." Gregory began caustically:

DOJ_NMG_0088206

"As you know, this is not a campaign season about whether America is a great place or not, right? I mean, it's a lot more substantive than that, and it has to do with the path that this president took the country after 9/11." Then he asked whether the president supported Cheney's statement. Snow, who had been on the job for about four months, went further than that. "I think it's true," he said.

Then what Snow did was give an abbreviated but learned-sounding tour through the history of Al Qaeda's conflict with the United States. "Osama bin Laden has made it clear . . . if the United States is pushed from Iraq, it will be to the eternal humiliation of the United States," Snow said. "Bin Laden drew the conclusion when we left Somalia that the Americans didn't have what it took to stick it out." He continued, "So, as an objective assessment about the way in which bin Laden views the United States," Cheney's saying Democratic debates over Iraq withdrawal would strengthen terrorists "is a true statement."

It may not have survived scholarly scrutiny, but Snow's response was like a temporary pontoon bridge built to scurry the troops across the river: it got the job done. There was a desultory follow-up, but even Gregory, in his broadcast that evening, played the controversy over Cheney's comments as a simple, partisan spat. "The press briefing that day," says Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president and Snow's boss, "was amazing. Tony took a line that could have been a real problem and completely deflated it."

Snow has had to do a lot of deflating since coming on board. He has become the public face of an administration under the most sustained period of pressure that it has yet seen; his job is managing the siege. The White House has chosen not to switch course on its major policy initiatives, abroad or at home, even though its major legislative efforts, from Social Security privatization to comprehensive immigration reform, have stalled, and its initiatives in Iraq and Afghanistan are troubled at best. Nor has the administration changed the substance of its message. With midterm elections approaching and the administration keeping one eye on its legacy, the White House is simply betting that it can sell it all better this time, with a little more skill and a little more finesse. Tony Snow's tenure is becoming a study in the science — and limits — of political charm.

A few years ago, the conservative media consultant Frank Luntz did a focus group studying the on-air styles of the various Sunday talk-show hosts, including Snow. He found that Snow graded very highly among both liberal and conservative viewers, in large part because his style was different from most conservatives on television.

"Republicans for a decade have been very good at pushing their message on people," Luntz told me recently over the phone. "Tony does something completely different — he pulls you in. Watch his facial expression — he's almost always smiling, which is different from other press secretaries. He speaks softly, and so you turn up the volume on your television. You don't feel like you're being sold something. With Tony, it's a conversation. You don't stand up and cheer when Tony finishes speaking; you nod your head in affirmation."

Luntz paused, then said: "Look, Tony's good on message, but he's not great. Ari Fleischer was better. Tony's genius is his style of communication, and that's exactly what the president needs right now."

"If Tony Snow had been press secretary instead of Scott McClellan during the initial revelation of the Valerie Plame stuff," says Eric Alterman, a journalism professor at Brooklyn College and a liberal media critic, "I think it wouldn't have been nearly what it was. Snow would have known how to handle it."

The successes of press secretaries are always hidden — one-day negative stories that didn't become four-day negative stories, attacks on the president that didn't take hold. But given the tortured recent history of relations between the White House and its press corps, that's no small claim. Scott McClellan, a longtime Bush loyalist and Snow's immediate predecessor, had trouble with White House reporters from the beginning. As Jay Rosen, a journalism professor at New York University, put it to me, McClellan "was a strategic noncommunicator," and having him in the job was tantamount to "mooning the press." The situation seemed to become untenable, though, with the Plame scandal, after it turned out that Karl Rove, the deputy chief of staff, and

I. Lewis Libby Jr., the vice president's chief of staff, had discussed Plame's role as an intelligence officer with reporters; McClellan had previously insisted, steadfastly, that they had not. Members of the press corps say that that experience convinced them that McClellan couldn't be relied upon to deliver anything more than White House spin. "With Scott, you found that if you tried to debate something, you just got into a recitation of the White House's line, and with Valerie Plame this became painfully obvious," Mark Silva of The Chicago Tribune told me. When

Joshua Bolten was picked to be the new White House chief of staff early last spring, he started the search for a new spokesman. "This isn't to disparage Scott or anything, but we were looking for a game changer in that position," Dan Bartlett, the president's communications director, told me.

Mark Halperin, the political director of ABC News and the author of a recent book about politicians and the press, says he has seen a change. "More so than many of his predecessors, Tony understands that questions are being asked in the public interest, and he tries to answer in the spirit in which he's been asked," he said. "It's at the margins, but there's an improvement."

DOJ_NMG_0088207

And in the months since Bolten took over and hired Snow, this famously closed White House has become marginally more open. It has given reporters more on-the-record access to the president and has brought in more governmental experts to brief the press. White House officials say that these changes came, in part, at Snow's urging. Snow also asked for a large role in policy making. And though Snow himself says, "Let's just say I'm satisfied on that count," so far evidence of his policy influence is hard to discern. "It's not like he has more access than Scott did, because he doesn't," one senior administration official told me. "If there's a change, it's that Tony is maybe a little more assertive when he's at the table, but Scott had the same seat."

I asked Bartlett for an example of an issue on which Snow's influence was evident. He thought hard and then told me that he had pushed really hard for the president to make the speech to the N.A.A.C.P., an outreach last July to black Americans, in advance of the first anniversary of Hurricane Katrina. Bush was generally lauded for the appearance — his first at the N.A.A.C.P. since he became president — but it has hardly represented a central part of the president's agenda.

According to White House officials, Snow does play a bigger role than previous press secretaries did in helping to design the day's responses to anticipated press inquiries. But Snow's more obvious success has been within the theatrical confines of the press room — in deflecting damaging stories before they gain traction, in phrasing the president's position more eloquently and precisely than Bush himself is able to and in imposing the White House's line on the story of the day.

"I don't think Tony fully realized when he started," Bartlett told me, "how much of an elephant in the room the briefing is. When you get done preparing for the gaggle, doing the gaggle, preparing for the briefing, doing the briefing, taking reporter's calls, that's basically your day. It's not like you've got all this time left to do other stuff."

One of the peculiarities of the White House press room is that it has its own academic: a Towson University political-science professor named Martha Joynt Kumar, who has been attending press briefings since 1975 but is free from the obligations of her colleagues, who actually ask questions and then produce stories. Professor Kumar simply observes, and her scholarship is aimed at writing about White House communication with the news media.

Kumar says that the job changed in 1995, when President Clinton's press secretary, Mike McCurry, decided to televise the daily briefing in its entirety. The midday show gave the White House a daily platform to promote its message, she says, and turned the press secretary into a more visible public figure. Snow is taking greater advantage of this, she says, than any press secretary has before. He has begun to speak at fund-raisers for Congressional candidates, something no previous press secretary has done. He is scheduled as the headline act for at least a dozen such events before Election Day. All of these appearances have been booked by the White House political operation, which says it isn't keeping tabs on how much money Snow brings in. But to judge from his Oct. 14 appearance at a fund-raiser for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, at which 850 people paid $175 apiece to see him speak, it is not an insignificant sum. Kumar says that the fund-raisers, which are purely political rather than informational, represent "a real change from previous administrations, and a real danger."

There is a natural tension between these two parts of the press secretary's job — the political and the informational — and occasionally Snow has overreached on the politics. In July, defending Bush's veto of legislation that would increase federal financing of embryonic-stem-cell research, Snow told reporters that the president's position was that such research amounted to "murder." This was not a position that the president had taken previously, and a week later, Snow apologized to reporters for "overstepping my brief." It echoed a jaunty claim Snow made during his first press briefing, when he guaranteed that the Senate would pass the president's comprehensive immigration-reform bill, legislation that Snow himself lobbied vigorously for during his first weeks as press secretary (on influential conservative television shows like Lou Dobbs's and Bill O'Reilly's) but did not pass the Senate this year.

"The test for Tony is whether he doesn't just become seen as a pitchman, as advancing a position, and whether he keeps a reputation as someone who can provide accurate information," Kumar told me. "Because providing accurate information is the job — if you don't do that, you lose your credibility as press secretary. So much of that job is still in that room."

Watching Snow in that room when he is working fluently and well is really something; the press secretary is gloriously glib. One Wednesday in the middle of September, he rebuffed a grandstanding network television reporter who had brought a big dictionary into the briefing room, trying to force Snow to square the definition of "fascism," with its references to an ideology of the supremacy of a strong centralized state and powerful bureaucracy, with the president's claim that the terrorists of Al Qaeda were "Islamofascists"; Al Qaeda, obviously, has no bureaucrats at all. Snow replied that bin Laden had called for the adoption of Sharia across the Muslim world and said he wanted to re-establish the Islamic caliphate, stretching from Spain to Asia. "It fits," Snow said, not smiling, just plain and factual, "all of the descriptions you've had."

It was a classic Snow moment. Following his political hero, Ronald Reagan, Snow has developed an instinct for clarity, for boiling things down. He has a tendency to speak about even the most complex issues in simple terms, something that can lead him into clichés. ("Race relations aren't hard; people make them hard," he has said.)

When I met with Snow in his office at the end of September, he talked about the constraints on a press secretary's power. At the end of that week, the precise limitations became a little more apparent, as the White House was caught in a series of snowballing scandals: the release of a National Intelligence Estimate that found that the war in Iraq was inspiring more Muslims to join the jihadist cause; the publication of Bob Woodward's book <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="279002">"State of Denial," which described a White House too stubborn to accept the grim realities on the ground in Iraq; and the transgressions of the Republican representative

DOJ_NMG_0088208

Mark Foley, who resigned after it was revealed he'd sent sexually suggestive instant messages to male House pages. Snow looked a little less fresh and a little less happy than when I'd seen him a few weeks earlier, and he was beginning to make mistakes. He had tried to pass off the Foley scandal as "simply naughty e-mails," which made it seem as if the White House wasn't taking the scandal seriously, and he would spend much of the next several days backtracking. When he tried to debunk a series of Woodward's findings as the reporter's own invention, the press didn't buy Snow's line. As for the intelligence estimate, Snow pooh-poohed the estimate's findings and failed to keep the story from continuing for a second and third day. Referring to the N.I.E. story, Kumar told me: "Tony lost control of the room that day. That's the only time I've seen that happen."</object.title>

Snow was born in Berea, Ky., and grew up in Cincinnati. His father was a high-school principal and his mother was a nurse. (She died of colon cancer when Snow was 17.) "I was the kind of kid," Snow says, when asked about his boyhood self, "who went to summer school because I liked it."

This is the way Snow and his friends tell the story of Tony Snow: he is an earnest, bookish guy whose passion is for burrowing down into wonky issues. "With Tony, sometimes you have to say, 'No, you can't read all 300 pages of that report,' " Marty Ryan, who was Snow's executive producer at "Fox News Sunday," told me. (Like many conservatives who came of age when he did, when conservatism was still more of a philosophical project than a political one, Snow has a tendency to insist on the intellectual agility of his fellow travelers. When I asked him to describe his boss, he said that the president "reminds me of one of those guys who walks through a gym playing 40 games of chess at once and can keep all the moves in his head.")

Snow graduated from Davidson College in Charlotte, N.C., with a degree in philosophy in 1977 and then, after brief stints teaching school in Africa and then in Cincinnati, started sending out applications to newspapers. "Seemed like the best job in the world — you get to talk to all kinds of people you could never get near otherwise," Snow told me. Two years out of Davidson, he landed on the editorial page of The Greensboro Record, in North Carolina (circulation, 33,000), working for Terry Eastland, a young conservative writer who is now the publisher of The Weekly Standard. Snow would follow Eastland to The Norfolk Virginian-Pilot. From there he went to The Daily Press of Newport News, Va. At Eastland's direction, Snow once spent a couple of months on the news desk at The Greensboro Record, but otherwise he has always been an opinion writer, not a reporter. He does not have a great deal of reverence for the old-time idea of the objective, truth-seeking reporter: "God, the source of all fact and truth, is objective," he once told an audience at Hillsdale College, in Spring Arbor, Mich., "but journalists, who often know very little, are not." (This is unusually direct Godspeak from Snow, who is a Catholic convert and talks with little of the direct religiosity of the president.) Snow moved on to conservative editorial pages in bigger markets — to The Detroit News, where he spent three years and where he met the woman he would marry, Jill Ellen Walker, and then, in 1987, to Washington, where he oversaw The Washington Times's editorial pages. He has been in the capital ever since.

Snow knows everyone in Washington. This doesn't betray any particular social promiscuity — Snow spends most of his weekends with his wife and three children. It is simply a result of the forceful inertia of having spent almost two decades being affable and important in a city that values both qualities. Testimonies to his geniality are rampant. "We had political differences, but that made it fun to argue with him, not hard to argue with him like some others," Gordon Morse, a friend and a liberal editorial writer who worked with Snow at The Daily Press, told me. "We'd be 24 and going to see some Mad Max movie and happily quarreling about politics, and he's the same guy now." Snow is friends with more journalists than politicians, and more conservatives than liberals, but not to the point of exclusion. Snow is friendly with the conservative activist Grover Norquist and with the Democratic partisan Sidney Blumenthal, two of the more polarizing figures in Washington.

In 1991, Snow was hired to work as a speechwriter for President George H. W. Bush. "He had a big office over in the Old Executive Office Building," Morse told me. "He was very much taken with the place." The thrill passed quickly. With the gulf war over, the White House was becoming marked by infighting and began spiraling toward a losing election campaign. John Sununu, the chief of staff who hired Snow, resigned shortly after Snow came on board. Snow was reassigned soon after to one of the less glamorous jobs in the communications office, ghostwriting op-eds for senior administration officials. I asked Snow about the experience. "In the first Bush White House, we were undone by backstabbing," he told me fiercely. "People were just being vicious to one another. They were trying to serve their own interest, and not the president's." It is the lone bitter thing I've ever heard him say.

After he left the first Bush White House, he stayed friendly with an obscure White House employee from New Jersey named Linda Tripp, who stayed on during the Clinton administration. When Tripp decided to write a tell-all book about the Democratic administration, it was Snow, of all her Bush White House contacts, she asked for help. Snow put Tripp in touch with the conservative literary agent and columnist Lucianne Goldberg. Later Tripp befriended Monica Lewinsky, who confided that she had been having an affair with the president, and a scandal was soon born.

DOJ_NMG_0088209

Snow wrote a column for The Detroit News and sampled a number of different jobs; for a while, he was Rush Limbaugh's guest host, but it became clear that Snow was, in Eastland's words, "not inclined to bash as much as some people." There was also a philosophical difference: Snow's the kind of conservative who is at home in the modern, bourgeois world and is not particularly interested in attacking it. He went to Rock 'n' Roll Fantasy Camp; he is friendly with Ian Anderson, the singer and rock flautist who leads Jethro Tull.

In 1996, Snow switched to a different medium and signed on as the host of a new program, "Fox News Sunday." Fox's executives were looking for a fresh face and noticed Snow during some appearances he'd made on "CBS Morning News." "What he had was all the stuff you couldn't teach," Marty Ryan, Snow's producer at Fox News, told me. In the program's early days, when it was having trouble getting guests, Snow used to chat up senators and representatives, trying to get them on his show. Snow stayed at "Fox News Sunday" for more than seven years, conducting interviews and managing a panel of first three and then four other pundits. He was nimble and, for an anchor, comparatively retiring. "One of Tony's great strengths," Ryan told me, "was knowing how to give others their space." In 2004, Snow left to do his own program on Fox News Radio.

Then, in early 2005, Snow received a diagnosis of colon cancer, the same disease that killed his mother. He had chemotherapy and two operations. Having had cancer, he subsequently said, shifted his perspective. "It sounds trite, but it's true," he told me. "You have a relish and appreciation for life you didn't have before. It gives you a fresh wonder about the world, and about people."

Last spring, when Bolten talked to Snow about succeeding McClellan, he doubted his chances at persuading Snow to join the White House. But he made his case anyway: the president's "fundamentals" were sound, Bolten said. Snow agreed. Snow would be this administration's daily public face, trying to bring public opinion back into the president's favor. As a commentator, Snow called the president "something of an embarrassment." He called the White House "impotent." Snow didn't really need the job. "My first response was no," he recalls. But as he thought about it more, Snow says, he realized that he "always liked the president, from back when he worked for his father's campaign." And after all, this is the reason most people come to Washington, not just to hover around power but to wield it.

"Every administration has ups and downs in the relationship between the White House and the press — certainly Nixon had moments that were as bad as any now, and Clinton and Reagan probably did, too," says David Greenberg, a professor of history and media at Rutgers who studies presidential communication. "But two things that are going on now are genuinely new. The first is that conservatives have had a great deal of success with a political strategy that includes demonizing the liberal media, and so there is a confidence there now that didn't exist with Nixon or Reagan, that this will work politically. But the other thing is the increased partisanship of the media, the rise of cable news, of Internet news, an increasing shrillness among even newspaper columnists, has served to discredit the idea of a mainstream media, and gives politicians a way to get around them."

The Bush administration played to this demonization of the liberal media with its first two press secretaries, who were often hostile and generally withholding with the press corps. The White House seemed to be sending a message to its base: not only are the mainstream media the enemy, they're also unnecessary. With Snow they've chosen a different tone, but the changes Greenberg talks about still offer him the possibility, the hope, that presidential communication might be liberated from the press room — that he might speak directly to the people, every day, not just as a press secretary does, interrupted and directed by reporters, but as a politician might. "One thing I've noticed about Tony as press secretary is he isn't trying to only speak to the reporters in the room — it seems like he's also trying to speak past them, to people watching at home," John Moody, a senior vice president at Fox News and Snow's former boss, told me.

One of the most visible changes since Snow arrived has been the increase in the number of "fact sheets" the press office issues to challenge the interpretation of the news in the mainstream press. Before Snow became press secretary, such releases used to be comparatively rare; they now appear nearly every day. In part they're aimed at a fair-minded correcting of the record, and in part they're meant to tweak critical reporters, but they've also proved enormously helpful for conservative bloggers. "It's really useful and smart — it puts bloggers in the position of going directly to the unexpurgated text and seeing what's being spun or played or ignored, and it certainly circulates," Glenn Reynolds, a law professor at the University of Tennessee and the proprietor of the influential conservative blog Instapundit, told me. "Particularly if your administration regards the press as an essentially hostile enterprise, you want to give people more direct access."

Most of the people who work for Snow in the press secretary's office look really young. ("Seems like his whole staff is 26," I said to Kumar. She snorted. "Twenty-six? They look about 23 to me.") And that makes sense: working in the White House imposes its own brutalities on your life. Snow says he wakes up every morning before 4 and has his first meeting, with the national security adviser, at half past 6. From then, he is performing or preparing to perform for the next 12 to 14 hours. "The job is hell, it is political war," Frank Luntz says, "and it has been for 10 years" — ever since McCurry instituted the televised daily briefing. “Every day, you wake up knowing the battle is just as tough, the enemy just as ferocious. You’re outnumbered 30 to 1. You can’t just beat 29 of them, you have to beat all 30 of them, every single day.” This is the reason, Luntz says, that the “best press secretaries do their best work in their first year.” No wonder, then, that after four years, Scott McClellan began to crack.

DOJ_NMG_0088210

These are still early days for Snow, and this kind of fraying has been only intermittently visible. “Who knows how I’ll feel in two years?” Snow says. “But it’s fun right now. When you live on deadlines, it creates a pleasant pressure to perform and to deliver.”

I went to see Snow’s press briefing one Friday late in September. Over the previous 24 hours, the first excerpts from Woodward’s book had begun to trickle out, and the administration was getting pummeled. Snow had been on the phone all morning, speaking to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other foreign-policy officials, trying to figure out where the Woodward account could be challenged, trying to get the administration’s story right, and he pushed back the press briefing by almost two hours to give himself time to prepare. He undoubtedly knew that no matter how well he did that day, the lead paragraphs in the next day’s papers would still reflect poorly on the White House. The best he could hope for was that the eighth paragraph, the one with the administration’s response, would come off as sympathetic, would be carefully phrased. The reporters started to file in 10 minutes before the delayed briefing was to start. A young White House aide called out a five-minute warning, then a two-minute warning, then Snow walked out of the elevator to the lectern and put down his briefing book and a cup of coffee.

He smiled, knowing what was coming. And he genuinely looked as if he were enjoying the moment. “Hello everybody,” he said. “We’ll go right to questions.”

GAO Chief Warns Economic Disaster Looms (AP)

By Matt Crenson, Associated Press

AP, October 28, 2006

AUSTIN — David Walker sure talks like he's running for office. "This is about the future of our country, our kids and grandkids," the comptroller general of the United States warns a packed hall at Austin's historic Driskill Hotel. "We the people have to rise up to make sure things get changed."

But Walker doesn't want, or need, your vote this November. He already has a job as head of the Government Accountability Office, an investigative arm of Congress that audits and evaluates the performance of the federal government.

Basically, that makes Walker the nation's accountant-in-chief. And the accountant-in-chief's professional opinion is that the American public needs to tell Washington it's time to steer the nation off the path to financial ruin.

From the hustings and the airwaves this campaign season, America's political class can be heard debating Capitol Hill sex scandals, the wisdom of the war in Iraq and which party is tougher on terror. Democrats and Republicans talk of cutting taxes to make life easier for the American people.

What they don't talk about is a dirty little secret everyone in Washington knows, or at least should. The vast majority of economists and budget analysts agree: The ship of state is on a disastrous course, and will founder on the reefs of economic disaster if nothing is done to correct it.

There's a good reason politicians don't like to talk about the nation's long-term fiscal prospects. The subject is short on political theatrics and long on complicated economics, scary graphs and very big numbers. It reveals serious problems and offers no easy solutions. Anybody who wanted to deal with it seriously would have to talk about raising taxes and cutting benefits, nasty nostrums that might doom any candidate who prescribed them.

"There's no sexiness to it," laments Leita Hart-Fanta, an accountant who has just heard Walker's pitch. She suggests recruiting a trusted celebrity — maybe Oprah — to sell fiscal responsibility to the American people.

Walker doesn't want to make balancing the federal government's books sexy — he just wants to make it politically palatable. He has committed to touring the nation through the 2008 elections, talking to anybody who will listen about the fiscal black hole Washington has dug itself, the "demographic tsunami" that will come when the baby boom generation begins retiring and the recklessness of borrowing money from foreign lenders to pay for the operation of the U.S. government.

"He can speak forthrightly and independently because his job is not in jeopardy if he tells the truth," said Isabel Sawhill, a senior fellow in economic studies at the Brookings Institution.

Walker can talk in public about the nation's impending fiscal crisis because he has one of the most secure jobs in Washington. As comptroller general of the United States — basically, the government's chief accountant — he is serving a 15-year term that runs through 2013.

This year Walker has spoken to the Union League Club of Chicago and the Rotary Club of Atlanta, the Sons of the American Revolution and the World Future Society. But the backbone of his campaign has been the Fiscal Wake-up Tour, a traveling roadshow of economists and budget analysts who share Walker's concern for the nation's budgetary future.

DOJ_NMG_0088211

"You can't solve a problem until the majority of the people believe you have a problem that needs to be solved," Walker says.

Polls suggest that Americans have only a vague sense of their government's long-term fiscal prospects. When pollsters ask Americans to name the most important problem facing America today — as a CBS News/New York Times poll of 1,131 Americans did in September — issues such as the war in Iraq, terrorism, jobs and the economy are most frequently mentioned. The deficit doesn't even crack the top 10.

Yet on the rare occasions that pollsters ask directly about the deficit, at least some people appear to recognize it as a problem. In a survey of 807 Americans last year by the Pew Center for the People and the Press, 42% of respondents said reducing the deficit should be a top priority; another 38% said it was important but a lower priority.

So the majority of the public appears to agree with Walker that the deficit is a serious problem, but only when they're made to think about it. Walker's challenge is to get people not just to think about it, but to pressure politicians to make the hard choices that are needed to keep the situation from spiraling out of control.

To show that the looming fiscal crisis is not a partisan issue, he brings along economists and budget analysts from across the political spectrum. In Austin, he's accompanied by Diane Lim Rogers, a liberal economist from the Brookings Institution, and Alison Acosta Fraser, director of the Roe Institute for Economic Policy Studies at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

"We all agree on what the choices are and what the numbers are," Fraser says.

Their basic message is this: If the United States government conducts business as usual over the next few decades, a national debt that is already $8.5 trillion could reach $46 trillion or more, adjusted for inflation. That's almost as much as the total net worth of every person in America — Bill Gates, Warren Buffett and those Google guys included.

A hole that big could paralyze the U.S. economy; according to some projections, just the interest payments on a debt that big would be as much as all the taxes the government collects today.

And every year that nothing is done about it, Walker says, the problem grows by $2 trillion to $3 trillion.

People who remember Ross Perot's rants in the 1992 presidential election may think of the federal debt as a problem of the past. But it never really went away after Perot made it an issue, it only took a breather. The federal government actually produced a surplus for a few years during the 1990s, thanks to a booming economy and fiscal restraint imposed by laws that were passed early in the decade. And though the federal debt has grown in dollar terms since 2001, it hasn't grown dramatically relative to the size of the economy.

But that's about to change, thanks to the country's three big entitlement programs — Social Security, Medicaid and especially Medicare. Medicaid and Medicare have grown progressively more expensive as the cost of health care has dramatically outpaced inflation over the past 30 years, a trend that is expected to continue for at least another decade or two.

And with the first baby boomers becoming eligible for Social Security in 2008 and for Medicare in 2011, the expenses of those two programs are about to increase dramatically due to demographic pressures. People are also living longer, which makes any program that provides benefits to retirees more expensive.

Medicare already costs four times as much as it did in 1970, measured as a percentage of the nation's gross domestic product. It currently comprises 13% of federal spending; by 2030, the Congressional Budget Office projects it will consume nearly a quarter of the budget.

Economists Jagadeesh Gokhale of the American Enterprise Institute and Kent Smetters of the University of Pennsylvania have an even scarier way of looking at Medicare. Their method calculates the program's long-term fiscal shortfall — the annual difference between its dedicated revenues and costs — over time.

By 2030 they calculate Medicare will be about $5 trillion in the hole, measured in 2004 dollars. By 2080, the fiscal imbalance will have risen to $25 trillion. And when you project the gap out to an infinite time horizon, it reaches $60 trillion.

Medicare so dominates the nation's fiscal future that some economists believe health care reform, rather than budget measures, is the best way to attack the problem.

"Obviously health care is a mess," says Dean Baker, a liberal economist at the Center for Economic and Policy Research, a Washington think tank. "No one's been willing to touch it, but that's what I see as front and center."

Social Security is a much less serious problem. The program currently pays for itself with a 12.4% payroll tax, and even produces a surplus that the government raids every year to pay other bills. But Social Security will begin to run deficits during the next century, and ultimately would need an infusion of $8 trillion if the government planned to keep its promises to every beneficiary.

Calculations by Boston University economist Lawrence Kotlikoff indicate that closing those gaps — $8 trillion for Social Security, many times that for Medicare — and paying off the existing deficit would require either an immediate doubling of personal and corporate income taxes, a two-thirds cut in Social Security and Medicare benefits, or some combination of the two.

DOJ_NMG_0088212

Why is America so fiscally unprepared for the next century? Like many of its citizens, the United States has spent the last few years racking up debt instead of saving for the future. Foreign lenders — primarily the central banks of China, Japan and other big U.S. trading partners — have been eager to lend the government money at low interest rates, making the current $8.5-trillion deficit about as painful as a big balance on a zero-percent credit card.

In her part of the fiscal wake-up tour presentation, Rogers tries to explain why that's a bad thing. For one thing, even when rates are low a bigger deficit means a greater portion of each tax dollar goes to interest payments rather than useful programs. And because foreigners now hold so much of the federal government's debt, those interest payments increasingly go overseas rather than to U.S. investors.

More serious is the possibility that foreign lenders might lose their enthusiasm for lending money to the United States. Because treasury bills are sold at auction, that would mean paying higher interest rates in the future. And it wouldn't just be the government's problem. All interest rates would rise, making mortgages, car payments and student loans costlier, too.

A modest rise in interest rates wouldn't necessarily be a bad thing, Rogers said. America's consumers have as much of a borrowing problem as their government does, so higher rates could moderate overconsumption and encourage consumer saving. But a big jump in interest rates could cause economic catastrophe. Some economists even predict the government would resort to printing money to pay off its debt, a risky strategy that could lead to runaway inflation.

Macroeconomic meltdown is probably preventable, says Anjan Thakor, a professor of finance at Washington University in St. Louis. But to keep it at bay, he said, the government is essentially going to have to renegotiate some of the promises it has made to its citizens, probably by some combination of tax increases and benefit cuts.

But there's no way to avoid what Rogers considers the worst result of racking up a big deficit — the outrage of making our children and grandchildren repay the debts of their elders.

"It's an unfair burden for future generations," she says.

You'd think young people would be riled up over this issue, since they're the ones who will foot the bill when they're out in the working world. But students take more interest in issues like the Iraq war and gay marriage than the federal government's finances, says Emma Vernon, a member of the University of Texas Young Democrats.

"It's not something that can fire people up," she says.

The current political climate doesn't help. Washington tends to keep its fiscal house in better order when one party controls Congress and the other is in the White House, says Sawhill.

"It's kind of a paradoxical result. Your commonsense logic would tell you if one party is in control of everything they should be able to take action," Sawhill says.

But the last six years of Republican rule have produced tax cuts, record spending increases and a Medicare prescription drug plan that has been widely criticized as fiscally unsound. When President Clinton faced a Republican Congress during the 1990s, spending limits and other legislative tools helped produce a surplus.

So maybe a solution is at hand.

"We're likely to have at least partially divided government again," Sawhill said, referring to predictions that the Democrats will capture the House, and possibly the Senate, in next month's elections.

But Walker isn't optimistic that the government will be able to tackle its fiscal challenges so soon.

"Realistically what we hope to accomplish through the fiscal wake-up tour is ensure that any serious candidate for the presidency in 2008 will be forced to deal with the issue," he says. "The best we're going to get in the next couple of years is to slow the bleeding."

Elections May Bring New Accord In Senate (WP)

By Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

McConnell, Reid Have History of Deal-Making

Regardless of whether Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) or Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) prevails as the Senate's next majority leader, one thing seems certain: Either one will show more interest in the institution's often obscure traditions than the departing majority leader, Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

What that means as a practical matter, however, is less certain. Some congressional scholars say it could mean greater bipartisan accord because McConnell and Reid are consummate deal-makers whose top priority is legislative achievement, whereas Frist's presidential ambitions have shadowed his comments and deeds as majority leader. But both men are also dogged by questions about financial dealings that could provide ammunition for opponents in the next Congress, which is virtually sure to be narrowly divided.

DOJ_NMG_0088213

McConnell and Reid rose through the Senate ranks by mastering the rules and building strong relationships with colleagues. Both are combative lawyer-politicians who overcame childhood challenges and are now in their mid-60s. Unlike Frist, a surgeon, they are veteran practitioners of the Senate's opaque, clubby brand of politics, with no apparent desire to become president or grab television time to espouse their parties' goals.

Many senators say that either Reid or McConnell, because of their backgrounds, can lead the Senate with more skill than Frist, 54, who struggled to build winning coalitions on issues such as immigration, Social Security and the nominations of several judges and John R. Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Former senator Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.) said McConnell and Reid are tenacious politicians steeped in the Senate's ways. McConnell, he said, "is one of the savviest political operatives that I've ever worked with." He called Reid, a former amateur boxer, "an old fist-fighter and a hell of a trial lawyer."

Each has shown an occasional independent streak. McConnell was one of three GOP senators to vote against a constitutional ban on flag desecration, which failed this year by one vote. Reid was among 14 Democrats who backed it. Reid bucks Democratic orthodoxy by opposing legalized abortion in most circumstances.

Still, both men, Simpson said, will have to play down their partisan tendencies and emphasize their desire for legislative accomplishments if the next Congress is to succeed. "It doesn't matter who the leader is if there's no outreach to the other party," he said.

Such efforts have begun. Reid phoned McConnell shortly before Congress recessed last month "to discuss his desire to work together next year on a bipartisan basis to work on the priorities of the American people," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley. He said McConnell "expressed a similar desire and willingness."

In a recent interview, McConnell said he especially hopes the next Congress will address the long-term financial needs of Social Security and Medicare. He blamed Democrats for blocking President Bush's 2005 bid to revamp Social Security. "When are we going to deal with these problems?" he asked.

Reid said last week: "If Republicans are serious about addressing this nation's fiscal problems and strengthening Social Security and Medicare, Senate Democrats are willing to reach across the aisle and get to work." But he ruled out "privatizing Social Security."

Former Senate majority leader Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.), now with a Washington lobbying firm, said that partisans and colleagues will pull Reid and McConnell in different directions and that the next Senate's fate will largely turn on how they react.

"They will be under great pressure from some in their ranks to engage in partisan combat, especially with the presidential election only two years away," Daschle said. "But regardless of who has the majority, they will also be under equal pressure to prove that they can govern."

In their combined 42 years in the Senate, McConnell and Reid have toiled energetically for their parties, raising funds and recruiting candidates while becoming personally well off. But their energies have triggered criticisms. Recent hard-hitting news articles have focused on questionable land transactions by Reid and aggressive fundraising by McConnell.

The two men say they have played by the rules and have broken no laws, and neither appears subject to a serious challenge from party colleagues. But the recent round of articles suggests that both continue to test the limits on raising and spending campaign money -- a practice almost certain to draw more scrutiny when one of them assumes the Senate's top post.

"The no-quarter-asked, no-quarter-given atmosphere is not going to disappear after this campaign," said Ross K. Baker, a Rutgers University scholar on Congress. "Any weakness will be highlighted; any lapse will be emphasized."

McConnell, 64, who battled polio as a child, is best-known for his fierce resistance to a series of campaign finance changes generally dubbed McCain-Feingold. He argues unapologetically that politicians should raise as much money as legally possible to further their goals and attack their enemies.

His no-holds-barred approach to fundraising has endeared him to many GOP colleagues but has prompted criticism from others. Most recently, the Lexington (Ky.) Herald-Leader published a series of articles portraying the senator as an insatiable solicitor of political money from interest groups -- including tobacco companies, car makers and pharmaceutical firms -- with whom he is cozy.

The articles concluded that McConnell has raised nearly $220 million during his Senate career, and pushes so hard that even his closest allies sometimes rebel. "Are you feeling a choking sensation?" a vice president for R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. was quoted as saying in an e-mail after the senator had asked the firm for $200,000 in "soft money" to aid Republican campaigns.

McConnell defends his aggressive fundraising, equating political advocacy with free speech. "You must have money in politics, because it's the only way the candidates can get their message across," he said.

Reid, 66, has occasionally been forced to explain his involvement in transactions that mixed politics with profits. In 2003, the Los Angeles Times published lengthy articles chronicling his sponsorship of legislation that promised benefits to Nevada developers, corporations and institutions whose lobbyists included the senator's sons and son-in-law. Reid's staff later barred relatives from lobbying his office.

DOJ_NMG_0088214

This month, the Associated Press reported that Reid did not disclose to Congress that he sold land in Nevada to a friend's company in 2001 and took part ownership of the firm. He collected a sizeable profit when the land was sold again in 2004. Reid, who had a hardscrabble childhood, said he had never tried to hide his ownership of the land, but later he amended his ethics reports to more fully reflect the transactions.

Reid said these issues are behind him, and he promised a new tone in Washington if Democrats take over the Senate.

Project Chugs Along With Senator's Help (LAT)

By Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

John Thune has given steam to railroad plans of an ex-lobbying client.

washington — When John Thune, a congressman from South Dakota, narrowly lost a bid for the Senate in 2002, his career followed a familiar pattern: He became a Washington lobbyist.

He soon gained as a client a little-known Midwestern railroad. The Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad Corp. may have been small, but its ambitions were not. It was seeking more than $2 billion in federal loan guarantees to help finance a major renovation of its entire rail network and an expansion into the coal fields of Wyoming's Powder River Basin.

DM&E paid Thune about $220,000 in 2003 and 2004 for his lobbying, but the loan guarantee request languished at the Federal Railroad Administration. Without the government's backing, the company said, its upgrade would not be possible.

Today, Thune is a U.S. senator. And after the South Dakota Republican helped attach a provision to last year's huge transportation bill, prospects for DM&E's $2.3 billion in loan guarantees are looking brighter.

The federal government now is in a position to approve one of the largest loan guarantees in its history, apparently the biggest since its 1980 bailout of Chrysler Corp. The transportation bill did not mention DM&E, but by raising the government's loan guarantee authority tenfold, to $35 billion, it made the railroad's request more likely to succeed.

Whatever the outcome of the DM&E aid request, the fact that a lawmaker who is a former lobbyist helped it along speaks volumes about how business sometimes gets done in Washington, where members of Congress frequently attach pet projects to broader legislation.

The DM&E project has broad support in the Upper Midwest from farmers and miners who say they need the expanded rail capacity to move their coal, corn and ethanol to market. Supporters say it would create thousands of jobs in the region.

The project "advances a lot of federal policies that are important in different ways — energy, agriculture and transportation," said DM&E President and Chief Executive Kevin Schieffer.

Thune takes pride in helping the venture along. "The project could transform South Dakota's economy for generations," he said in a news release after the transportation bill became law.

But the railroad expansion is not without critics, foremost among them the world-famous Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., which does not want more freight trains rumbling past its hospital complex.

Some opponents also charge that such a large federal loan guarantee for one company is a classic example of pork-barrel spending, and that Thune's recent connection to DM&E makes it unseemly.

"The DM&E subsidy and its backing by a former lobbyist turned senator represents many of the things that are wrong with Washington today," said Walter Mondale, the former vice president and a former U.S. senator from Minnesota. Mondale, now a lawyer in Minneapolis, used to be a trustee of the Mayo Clinic and opposes the rail project.

Mondale sees the potential DM&E loan guarantee as a giant earmark — a funding provision, usually of a few million dollars, that a lawmaker inserts into a spending bill for the benefit of his or her constituents. The transportation bill had more than 6,000 earmarks, including the storied "bridge to nowhere" intended to connect the Alaskan mainland to an island with 50 inhabitants.

"I consider the DM&E earmark to be even more egregious," Mondale said.

Matthew K. Rose, chairman and president of Burlington Northern Santa Fe Corp., whose BNSF Railway competes in the same region as DM&E, has called the loan guarantee "bad public policy."

"If the government allows non-market-based loans of this magnitude for certain carriers," he told a conference this month, "that will have a negative effect on railroads' ability and willingness to invest private capital."

The aid package is not an actual loan and would cost the U.S. nothing if the railroad paid its lenders back. Only if DM&E were to default on its loans would taxpayers have to foot the bill.

Still, the request has run afoul of budget watchdog groups.

DOJ_NMG_0088215

The National Taxpayers Union, in a report this month, noted that DM&E already had the biggest federal rail rehabilitation loan guarantee ($233 million), and said the coal fields of the Powder River Basin were already served by two bigger railroads, the BNSF and the Union Pacific.

More fundamentally, it said, "floating a taxpayer-backed credit line to a private company is simply wrong."

Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste, said the sequence of events surrounding DM&E's request and the increasing of the government's loan guarantee authority raised the question of whether "Thune is still working for the railroad."

Thune declined to comment for this article, but his staff rejected any suggestion of impropriety. Spokesman Kyle Downey called it "a desperate attempt to smear the senator."

"The senator has spent his entire professional career in this area. He has a level of expertise going back two decades," Downey said. Thune is a former South Dakota state railroad commissioner.

In any case, Thune's staff says, he was a bit player in writing the loan authority increase into the transportation bill.

But a news release issued by Thune's office last year quoted Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), a key author of the highway bill, as saying, "Sen. Thune's leadership and hard work were essential to making the [loan guarantee] provision a reality."

The accounting firm BearingPoint said in a report in May that even if DM&E were to secure the loans, the company's cash flow would fall short of the amount needed for debt repayment for at least two decades.

"The company appears to be a poor credit risk," BearingPoint said.

"We have serious concerns about the ability of DM&E to repay such a loan" — an outcome that would leave Washington holding the bag.

DM&E has dismissed the BearingPoint audit as based on incomplete information.

BearingPoint acknowledged that its analysis was imprecise because DM&E, as a privately held company, withheld financial data that publicly traded companies would have to divulge.

The railroad company aims to replace 580 miles of old track and lay an additional 280 miles of new track with the $2.3 billion it could borrow with its loan guarantee. It intends to spend $4 billion in private funds modernizing its fleet of freight cars.

The proposal might have been clear sailing if DM&E's tracks did not run within blocks of the Mayo Clinic, which has organized a lobby called the Rochester Coalition to fight the railroad over safety concerns.

"In any category you want to look at — collisions, derailments, worker accidents — they are the least safe railroad in the country," said Rochester Coalition consultant Lawrence Mann, a Washington lawyer specializing in railroad safety.

In 2004, a DM&E train derailed when it hit an improperly aligned switch in Balaton, Minn., spilling 15,000 gallons of flammable alcohol and forcing the evacuation of 100 residents.

"If the Balaton accident had occurred in Rochester, it would have been catastrophic," said Mayo spokesman Chris Gade.

If Mayo is so concerned about safety, DM&E said, it ought to welcome the rehabilitation of track that dates back 80 years in some spots.

"From a safety standpoint," said CEO Schieffer, "it would be irresponsible not to be for this."

joel.havemann@latimes.com

Ethics Rules Send NIH Scientists Packing (AP)

By Rita Beamish

AP, October 28, 2006

Nearly 40% of the scientists conducting hands-on research at the National Institutes of Health say they are looking for other jobs or are considering doing so to escape new ethics rules that have curtailed their opportunity to earn outside income.

Most scientists say the ethics crackdown is too severe, and nearly three-quarters of them believe it will hinder the government's ability to attract and keep medical researchers, according to a survey commissioned by the government's premier medical research agency.

The tightened rules were put in place last year after NIH found dozens of scientists had run afoul of existing restrictions on private consulting deals that had enriched them with money from drug and biotechnology companies.

Outside income from such companies is now banned. NIH also is placing greater restrictions and disclosure requirements on employees' financial holdings.

"Of course we are concerned when any employees are saying they might consider leaving as a result of a change of policy," said Dr. Raynard Kington, the agency's principal deputy director. But he said in a telephone interview Friday that the survey results are muddy because they combine both those actively seeking to leave and those thinking about it.

NIH Director Elias Zerhouni, in a letter Thursday to the staff, said the survey "does suggest concerns about the impact of the regulations on recruitment and retention." But he added, "At this time we do not anticipate revisions in the regulations."

About 8,000 NIH employees, or about half the workforce, responded to the Internet-based survey.

Employee job satisfaction was high overall, the survey found. But 39% of the scientists researching disease and cures — known as tenure and tenure-track scientists — said they actively were seeking new work or considering leaving NIH because of the rules.

Overall, 3,336 NIH scientists responded to the survey, including 512 tenure and tenure-track researchers.

Among all NIH scientists, only 18% said they were trying to leave or considering it. Those who are not in the tenure group typically do not conduct research themselves and instead manage outside research conducted with NIH money by universities and other non-federal entities. They are less likely to have private consulting opportunities.

One-third of all NIH scientists said they believed the new rules will hurt NIH's ability to fulfill its mission, and most said the old rules could have been enforced better rather than tightened.

NIH officials said they now want to question former and potential employees to see how the changes influenced their decisions.

Kington highlighted a finding that nearly nine in 10 scientists reported they still intend to work at NIH a year from now. Despite rumblings of low morale, he said the scientists' job satisfaction rate of 81% reflects one of the government's most positive workforces.

Officials also emphasized employees' belief that the new rules will boost the agency's credibility with the public. Seventy-three% of the employees who responded agreed with that, the survey found.

"We have to monitor closely and we'll continue do that, and if we show through our evaluations objective evidence of an impact on our ability to recruit and retain the smartest staff, scientific and non-scientific, that we can, then we will be the first ones to make the case for modifying the rules, but we're not there yet," Kington said.

One NIH administrator who left over the ethics rules said the agency's changes were handled poorly.

"Dedicated public servants were harassed right out of NIH. That's a disservice to us all," said Edward Maibach, the former associate director of the biggest NIH component, the National Cancer Institute. He is now director of Public Health Communication at the George Washington University. Maibach said he left the NCI nearly two years ago because new financial disclosure requirements invaded his privacy.

The changes are "a dramatic backlash," to earlier policies encouraging outside work by NIH scientists to speed practical application of scientific advances, he said.

Arthur Caplan, medical ethics chairman at the University of Pennsylvania, said tighter rules were needed but "we still haven't figured out exactly how to manage conflict of interest."

"To have a large number of the senior scientists unhappy spells trouble. You don't want them to retire or leave," he said.

"The leaders of the NIH and in Congress have to think a bit harder about giving a tiny bit of breathing room so that NIH scientists are not sent into a monastery from which they can't ever come out in the name of scientific integrity."

NASA Deciding Whether To Close A Window Into Space (WP)

By Marc Kaufman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Future of Hubble Telescope to Be Announced on Tuesday

As NASA learned when it canceled a planned shuttle mission to keep alive the Hubble Space Telescope almost three years ago, its orbiting source of jaw-dropping intergalactic images and deep insights into the early days of the universe had become something of an astronomic rock star.

The scientific and public response was overwhelming: The then-14-year-old Hubble had to be saved before its batteries and gyroscopes failed, and NASA was seriously misguided for refusing to send a shuttle crew to keep it running. This view was strongly endorsed by an expert panel convened by the National Academy of Sciences in late 2004.

Soon after, Michael D. Griffin became NASA administrator and agreed to reconsider the Hubble mission. On Tuesday, he will announce whether the telescope will be repaired or will be allowed to gradually run out of steam.

NASA said Friday that a series of events and briefings will follow the announcement at Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt -- the kind of activity that often accompanies a decision to go ahead with a big mission. But agency officials said that no decision had been reached and that Griffin will study the pros and cons over the weekend.

"Every scientist on the face of the globe, and many people in the general public, are watching this, looking forward to a decision," said Mario Livio, head of the science program at the Space Telescope Science Institute in Baltimore, which manages the Hubble's scheduling and research for NASA. "I'm cautiously optimistic, but there are so many factors involved."

DOJ_NMG_0088217

For Griffin, it is a tough choice -- balancing the undeniable success of the Hubble against the equally undeniable risks to the astronauts who would fix it, as well as the unforgiving schedule of shuttle flights needed to complete the international space station.

The decision by his predecessor, Sean O'Keefe, to scrub the Hubble repair mission was made after the 2003 Columbia disaster, when it was not clear when the shuttles would get back into space.

Griffin has often said that he believes the telescope is one of the great scientific instruments of all time and that it deserves to be repaired.

"If we can do it safely, we want to do it," Griffin said at a September briefing after the successful landing of the space shuttle Atlantis. "But we have new constraints on . . . the space shuttle system. We have a new understanding of its fragility and vulnerability."

An aerospace engineer, Griffin worked for two years in the early 1980s on issues related to the Hubble project.

Among the major constraints are that the space shuttle fleet is aging fast and that NASA is eager to finish assembly of the space station by 2010, so the three remaining spacecraft can be retired. A mission to Hubble could interfere with the schedule.

After two fatal shuttle disasters, NASA is also increasingly focused on safety and on having backup systems for crews if their spaceship gets damaged. In theory, the international space station is the standby shelter for a spacecraft in trouble, but it would be unreachable on a flight to the Hubble. That is because the orbits of Hubble and the space station are very different, and a shuttle launched to the Hubble would not have the fuel and power to shift orbits to reach the station.

As a result, the crew of a Hubble-bound shuttle has only about three weeks' time to repair any damage to the spaceship. That would hardly leave time for the final contingency, preparing and launching a second shuttle for a rescue mission.

"We've had three successful shuttle missions since Columbia, and we've learned a lot about inspecting and repairing the vehicle," NASA spokesman Allard Beutel said. "So we have a lot more capability and flexibility, but clearly some safety issues remain."

Griffin met with his top lieutenants Friday for a final discussion of whether the mission can be done safely and without too much disruption to the space station assembly schedule.

Reflecting Griffin's hope to make room for the mission, a Hubble launch has been penciled in for spring 2008, though officials say the date is a place-holder rather than a sign that a positive decision has been made.

The Hubble, which has been repaired and upgraded four times by astronauts since it was launched in 1990, has had a remarkable record of scientific breakthroughs.

Because it orbits 380 miles above Earth, away from the haze of the atmosphere, it can identify and photograph distant galaxies and matter never before examined. Astronomers have used Hubble images to fix the age of the universe at 13.7 billion years, to discover massive black holes at the center of many galaxies, and to explore a mysterious force called dark energy, which, by acting against the forces of gravity, is causing the universe to expand. Livio of the Space Telescope Science Institute said dark energy is probably the most significant issue in physics today, and losing Hubble would freeze promising research into its nature for as much as a decade.

But some believe Hubble's greatest accomplishment lies in a less rarified realm -- that it has greatly popularized astronomy with its stunning and awe-inspiring images of the universe.

Each of the four earlier Hubble repair missions included some upgrading of instruments, and a possible fifth mission would similarly increase its capacities. Two powerful -- and very expensive -- instruments have been manufactured specifically for the Hubble. They would greatly increase the telescope's ability to look deep into space and to study the chemical composition of the far-distant gas between galaxies.

Livio said the unprecedented power of the new Wide Field Camera 3 would, for instance, enable astronomers to learn about even earlier phases of the universe's formation by making observations in the infrared and ultraviolet wavelengths. The new Cosmic Origins Spectrograph will examine the subatomic baryon particles that inhabit the space between galaxies. The instruments cost $200 million and may have no other use if they cannot be delivered to the Hubble, Livio said.

If Hubble is not repaired, NASA estimates that it will probably keep working into 2008 or 2009. The James Webb Space Telescope, a replacement of sorts but with different capabilities, is scheduled to be launched in 2013.

NASA officials say the Hubble repair decision will be made on the basis of safety, engineering and scheduling concerns, but it will also say a lot about NASA's priorities. The speed-up in assembly of the space station is both because it is well behind schedule, and because NASA is eager to get out of the space shuttle business so it can focus on President Bush's initiative to return to the moon by 2020 and then explore Mars.

The costs of both the shuttle program and the new manned exploration mission are great, and NASA has said the basic science budget will grow more slowly or be cut as a result. Because the telescope is one of the gems of the NASA science directorate, some see the fate of Hubble as indicative of where the agency is headed.

DOJ_NMG_0088218

"This is a terribly important decision, and it has so many political and scientific overtones," said J. Craig Wheeler, astronomy professor at the University of Texas at Austin and president of the American Astronomical Society.

"It's very important for those who want to continue working with Hubble, important for those who want to do other space science, and it's important as an indication of that evolving balance between space science and human space exploration," he said. "And it shows that NASA has an enormous number of big issues on its plate right now."

OTHER NEWS:

It's Not The Economy, Stupid (WP)

By Jacob S. Hacker

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

In the final days of this fall's campaign, Republicans have turned to an unexpected issue: the economy. President Bush touted the nation's prosperity last week, insisting that "a strong economy is going to help our candidates."

And why not? The Dow is soaring. Unemployment is low. Inflation is tame. Gas prices are falling. And the overall economy has been growing steadily. If Americans practice what political scientists call "retrospective voting" (captured by President Ronald Reagan's famous question: "Are you better off today than you were four years ago?"), then one would think that incumbent politicians should be cruising to victory.

There's just one problem: Despite the sunny talk and favorable numbers, voters aren't happy with the economy. Though they've become somewhat more positive in recent weeks, they remain strikingly dissatisfied -- and favor Democrats by wide margins on economic issues.

Many observers have attributed the disconnect to the war in Iraq. Unhappiness over the conflict, they argue, is coloring voters' economic perceptions. Yet a similar disconnect played out in the early 1990s, when voters also felt much more negative about economic conditions than the numbers would have suggested. Then, as now, conventional economic indicators didn't seem to capture voters' fundamental anxieties -- the sense that their jobs, health care, pensions and family finances were ever more at risk.

In this climate, Republicans bragging about the economy may appear not as saviors, but as out of touch -- much as the administration appears on the other dominant campaign issue, the war in Iraq. Just as events in Iraq undermine GOP reassurances about the conflict, so anxious financial discussions in American homes help explain why Republicans are gaining so little from today's economic numbers -- numbers that once would have seemed like tickets to victory.

In the past, the link between economic conditions and election results seemed simple. Economist Ray Fair's landmark 1978 paper "The Effect of Economic Events on Votes for President" in the Review of Economics and Statistics showed that a simple forecast based on election-year economic numbers (primarily inflation and economic growth) did a remarkably good job of predicting the result of presidential elections in the 20th century.

But models such as Fair's are becoming increasingly less reliable, according to Dartmouth political scientist Joseph Bafumi in a recent paper, "The Stubborn American Voter." For example, Fair's approach overshot President Bush's margin of victory in 2004 by 6.5 percentage points. And the last president to lose an election when the raw economic numbers predicted otherwise in Fair's equation was George H.W. Bush, running for reelection in 1992.

Some analysts have described current voter angst as a hangover of economic success. "Americans have developed perfectionist standards," economics columnist Robert J. Samuelson has argued. "We expect total prosperity and are disappointed by anything less." And conservative pundit George Will recently decried the nation's "economic hypochondria" -- an entitlement mentality characterized by a low threshold for economic pain.

But the problem isn't the public -- it's the standard statistics used to judge the economy. Inflation, unemployment and economic growth all capture economic performance at a particular moment or period. Yet a growing body of theory and evidence suggests that to understand public perceptions, one should look at the security and stability of family finances over time. With that perspective, the grounds for unease suddenly look much clearer.

Consider the evidence of rising income inequality in the United States. In a path-breaking recent paper, "The Evolution of Top Incomes: A Historical and International Perspective," Thomas Piketty of Ã‰coles Normales SupÃ©rieure in Paris and Emmanuel Saez of the University of California at Berkeley have shown that the share of national income held by the richest 1 percent of Americans -- stable at about 32 percent throughout the middle decades of the 20th century -- began to rise sharply in the late 1970s and by 2002 had surpassed 40 percent. In the past few years, most income gains have gone to people at the very top of the income ladder, with middle-class Americans seeing only a small boost in their economic standing.

DOJ_NMG_0088219

Yet there's another reason for middle-class dissatisfaction. Many assume that growing income inequality means that rich people are becoming steadily richer. But virtually all income statistics are based on annual snapshots of Americans' finances, so they cannot tell us whether rich people stay rich -- or whether poor people stay poor. In other words, these statistics tell us about inequality, but not about mobility -- either up the income ladder or down it.

This is a major oversight, because there's good reason to think that our economic lives are more unstable than they used to be. Bankruptcy, for instance, is much more common today than it was just 25 years ago, and research by Elizabeth Warren of Harvard Law School -- presented in a 2003 law review article, "Financial Collapse and Class Status" -- shows that many of those who file for bankruptcy were once squarely middle class. Princeton economist Henry Farber, in his article "What Do We Know About Job Loss in the United States?" has found that the likelihood that a worker will lose a job over a three-year period has been rising -- and is now about as high as it was in the early 1980s, which saw the worst economic downturn since the Great Depression.

In my own research using the Panel Study of Income Dynamics -- a survey that has traced a large sample of Americans over time -- I've found that family incomes have become much more unstable since the 1970s; the gap between our income in a good year and our income in a bad year has expanded. Increasingly, it seems, Americans are living on a financial roller coaster.

Of course, roller coasters go up as well as down, so it's tempting to think that the net effect of economic instability is a wash. But instability causes hardship even when the "average" experience stays constant. In their seminal 1979 article "Prospect Theory: An Analysis of Decisions Under Risk," psychologists Daniel Kahneman and Amos Tversky showed that people dislike losing things they already have much more than they like gaining things they don't have -- a phenomenon known as "loss aversion." As a result, losses in income are psychologically difficult even when followed by equal or even larger gains. And, of course, it's on those downward trips that people lose their houses, their jobs, their retirement savings and other staples of middle-class life.

Loss aversion is surprisingly strong. In a recent nationwide survey by the polling firm Lake Research Partners, respondents were asked whether they preferred "the stability of knowing your present sources of income are protected" or "opportunity to make money in the future." By a two-to-one margin, Americans chose stability over opportunity.

This helps explain why Americans are so dissatisfied with the current economy. They see the overall gains, but they don't think that those gains have translated into greater security for their families, and they're worried about the risk -- whether it be the loss of a job, unexpected medical costs or some other setback. A majority of registered voters say the economy is getting better, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll last week. But more than three-quarters still say they are either falling behind or just holding steady. The actual or possible erosion of safety nets (such as Social Security, guaranteed pensions and workplace health insurance) only heightens such concerns.

Loss aversion may also help explain the muted public reception to Bush's "Ownership Society" agenda, which was shelved after his proposal for private Social Security accounts crashed and burned (though, much to the dismay of Republican candidates, Bush recently said he wants to tackle the issue again). According to polls, many voters thought they would do better with private accounts. Yet they intensely feared the risks, such as a stock-market downturn or outliving their savings.

Does all this foretell a major shift in U.S. politics, as increasingly insecure Americans demand change? Democratic pollster Nancy Wiefek thinks so. "The main political cleavage now is no longer income but risk," she said. And in Europe, according to recent studies by Harvard scholar Torben Iversen, voters appear capable of figuring out how at risk they are, and supporting or opposing specific social policies in response.

However, competitive left-of-center parties in Europe put ambitious alternatives on the agenda. In the United States, despite public unease, Democrats have talked mostly about the minimum wage and Wal-Mart, rather than trying to mobilize the risk-fraught middle class.

The continuing economic disconnect carries a clear prescription: Republicans would do better to acknowledge middle-class strains, rather than to just repeat the strong-economy mantra. In a 2005 strategy memo, Republican political consultant Frank Luntz put "insecurity" at the top of his list of "words that work" in connecting with voters on the economy. It still works -- but it's likely to be working for Democrats, not Republicans, on Nov. 7.

jacob.hacker@yale.edu

Jacob S. Hacker, a Yale University professor and New America Foundation fellow, is author of "The Great Risk Shift" (Oxford Univ. Press).

Where We Went Wrong (WP)

By Dick Armey

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088220

Somewhere along the road to a "permanent majority," the Republican Revolution of 1994 went off track. For several years, we had confidence in our convictions and trusted that the American people would reward our efforts. And they did.

But today, my Republican friends in Congress stand on the precipice of an electoral rout. Even the best-case scenarios suggest wafer-thin majorities and a legislative agenda in disarray. With eight days before the election, House speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi has already begun her transition planning.

Where did the revolution go astray? How did we go from the big ideas and vision of 1994 to the cheap political point-scoring on meaningless wedge issues of today -- from passing welfare reform and limited government to banning horsemeat and same-sex marriage?

The answer is simple: Republican lawmakers forgot the party's principles, became enamored with power and position, and began putting politics over policy. Now, the Democrats are reaping the rewards of our neglect -- and we have no one to blame but ourselves.

In 1989, Newt Gingrich rose to the number two leadership position in the House after a contentious three-way race pitting young backbench conservatives such as myself, Bob Walker, Joe Barton and others against old bulls such as Minority Leader Bob Michel and other ranking members. We thought they suffered from a minority party mindset and were too accommodating of the Democrats. Out of congressional power for nearly two generations, Republicans had become complacent. Senior members of the party were happy to accept the crumbs afforded by Democratic chairmen. Life was comfortable in the minority as long as you did not rock the boat. Members received their perks -- such as travel abroad and special banking privileges -- and enough pork projects for reelection. The entire Congress lived by the rule of parochial politics.

Gingrich and I and a handful of true believers in Ronald Reagan's conservative vision set the goal of retaking the House. The "Contract With America" outlined our platform of limited government. This vision appealed to both the social and economic wings of the conservative movement; equally important, it included institutional reforms for a Congress that had grown increasingly arrogant and corrupt. The contract nationalized the vision of the Republican Party in a way that unified our base and appealed to independents. We championed national issues, not local pork projects or the creature comforts of high office.

In 1994, this vision was validated when Republicans took 54 seats in the House, eight seats in the Senate and control of both houses of Congress.

Welfare reform in 1996 only affirmed the revolution. Bureaucrats, special interests and the White House all claimed that the sky would fall if we touched this failed Great Society program, but we held firm. When you take on a sacred cow, you must kill it completely -- tinkering on the margins is ineffective. In the end, the reform proved so successful and popular that President Bill Clinton (who rejected the original bill twice) considers it one of the best ideas his administration ever had.

At one point during the welfare reform debates, a member approached me and said, "Dick, I know this is the right thing to do, but my constituents just won't understand." I told him, "So you're telling me they are smart enough to vote for you but not smart enough to understand this?" He ended up voting to pass the bill.

Yet despite such successes, we didn't learn the right political lessons. A few months before the victory on welfare, we lost the battle over the federal government shutdown of 1995, when we were outmaneuvered by Clinton, a masterful political operator. After that fight, too many Republicans apparently concluded that America wanted bigger government. This misreading was the first step on the road away from the Reagan legacy.

We emerged as a wounded party; we stopped trusting the public; and we internalized the wrong lesson. Since the party won the majority in 1994, the GOP Conference had been consistent in requiring offsetting spending cuts for any new spending initiatives. (In fact, during the aftermath of a large Mississippi River flood, Rep. Jim Nussle even waited to find and approve offsets before moving the relief legislation for his own state of Iowa.) But by the summer of 1997, the appropriators -- rightly called the "third party" of Congress -- had begun to pass spending bills with Democrats. As soon as politics superseded policy and principle, the avalanche of earmarks that is crushing the party began.

Now spending is out of control. Rather than rolling back government, we have a new $1.2 trillion Medicare prescription drug benefit, and non-defense discretionary spending is growing twice as fast as it had in the Clinton administration. Meanwhile, Social Security is collapsing while rogue nations are going nuclear and the Middle East is more combustible than ever. Yet Republican lawmakers have taken up such issues as flag burning, Terri Schiavo and same-sex marriage.

They're fooling only themselves.

If Democrats take control of Congress on Nov. 7, they will form an accidental majority. They are not succeeding because of their principles or policy proposals, but simply because they have kept their heads down. Republicans, fearful of taking on big tasks and challenges, may be defeated next month by a party that offers nothing on the key issues of our day.

Pelosi says she would preside over a moderate Democratic majority, and has committed to raising taxes only as a last resort. But Democratic policy goals such as nationalized health care and low-interest student loans are expensive, and dozens of new spending "priorities" will crop up as soon as the election results are tallied. Democrats have promised that all new spending will be offset by tax increases, so will they raise taxes in the run-up to the 2008 race?

DOJ_NMG_0088221

In essence, Pelosi will be forced to choose between a vocal base -- expecting immediate satisfaction on issues such as withdrawing from Iraq, legalizing same-sex marriage and the impeachment of President Bush -- or policies that are tolerable to a majority of Americans. That's quite a dilemma: appeasing a base that has been hungry for political revenge since 2000 and 2004, or alienating moderate and swing voters.

Pelosi has stated that House committee chairmen will be chosen by seniority. This could backfire on the Democrats, because members from the most consistently partisan districts are usually the ones who stick around the longest. Chairmen have the power of the subpoena; Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), the would-be judiciary chairman, has already drafted articles of impeachment for Bush, while others are calling for investigations on the war in Iraq and the federal reaction to Hurricane Katrina. A revenge-hungry Democratic majority, substituting political grudge matches for serious policy, will not remain a majority for long.

How can the Republicans respond?

The leadership must remember that the modern conservative movement is a fusion of social and fiscal conservatives united in their belief in limited government. The party must keep both in the fold. Republicans also need to get back to being the party of big ideas. The greatest threat to American prosperity today is a catastrophic fiscal meltdown resulting from long-term entitlements. Democrats have already lined up behind the solution of raising taxes and reducing benefits. But Americans want more freedom and choice in education, health care and retirement security. Republicans -- too busy dreaming up wedge issues to score cheap points against Democrats -- have lost sight of their broad national agenda.

The likely Republican losses in next week's elections will not constitute a repudiation of the conservative legacy that drove the Reagan presidency and created the Contract With America. To the contrary, it would represent a rejection of big government conservatism. When we get back to being the party of limited government, putting a national agenda ahead of parochial short-term politics, we will again be a party that the American voters will trust to deal with the serious challenges facing our nation.

The 2006 midterm elections will be a success for the Democrats. Republicans will have to manage their own disappointment. Fingers will be pointed, and various villains will be fashioned out of recent events. But the plain fact is that Republicans have been setting the stage for this outcome for nearly a decade, running from themselves and their own principles. We will not find ourselves by conforming to the status quo, but by returning to our Reagan roots.

When we act like us we win. When we act like them we lose. Let's win.

darmey@freedomworks.org

Dick Armey, the House majority leader from 1995 to 2003, is currently chairman of the think tank FreedomWorks.

Return Of The Yellow Dog (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

In a remarkable editorial on Wednesday, the New York Times endorsed Diane Farrell for Congress from a district in Connecticut.

Who is Diane Farrell? I have no idea, and the Times seemed to have not a lot. After eight years as first selectman of Westport, the paper noted somewhat desperately, "she has a better understanding than most legislators of the impact of federal mandates and tax policy on local government." By contrast her opponent, Christopher Shays, has held the seat for almost 20 years and been endorsed by the Times "in every race in which he has faced a serious opponent" -- until now.

Shays is a Republican, but not excessively so. He's moderate in policy and in temperament. In fact, he's just the kind of Republican that the Times ordinarily likes to dig up and endorse to prove that it's not blindly Democratic. And they still like him: "[W]e have admired his independence and respected his leadership."

Yet the Times decided to "strongly endorse" Shays's opponent, entirely because she's a Democrat. Or rather, because she is not a Republican: "Mr. Shays has been a good congressman, but not good enough to overcome the fact that his re-election would help empower a party that is long overdue for a shakeup."

One of the axioms of small-d democratic piety in this country is that you vote for the person and not the party. People just love to say, "I evaluate each candidate on his or her own merits" -- even when it's not true.

But this year does seem to be different. You hear people say -- though rarely as forthrightly as the Times -- that they are voting for the party and not the person. The Republican candidate for the Senate or House may be saintlike in general, no worse than muddled on the war in Iraq and good on stem cell research. She may never even have met Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0088222

Meanwhile, the Democrat may be a grotesque hack just inches from indictment, whose views on Iraq are equally muddled with less excuse (since loyalty to the president is not a factor). Nevertheless, these New Yellow Dogs are voting for the Democrat, simply out of anger at or frustration with the Republican Party.

The term "yellow dog Democrats" used to mean someone who would vote for any Democrat over any Republican, even if the Democrat were a yellow dog. In recent decades there has been no such person, but this year the dog might have a shot.

And for those who might feel sheepish (to introduce another animal) about voting the party line, my advice is: Relax. There is nothing wrong with voting for the party rather than the person. In fact, there is even nothing wrong with blindly voting for the Democrat (or, I suppose, the Republican) even if you know nothing else about him or her.

In other democracies, such as Britain, this person-not-the-party piety is not just unknown; it would be hard to comprehend. Whatever Burke may have said, a member of Parliament is your representative. He or she runs on a party platform promising various things, and if that party wins a majority of seats it "forms a government." You would be silly to vote for the person and not the party. The party's views are what counts. The person's views are almost irrelevant.

Even under the American arrangement, there is nothing ignoble about voting the party line. It is an efficient way to minimize your information costs. A candidate's party affiliation doesn't tell you everything you would like to know, but it tells you something. Indeed, it tells you a lot -- enough so that it makes sense to vote your party preference even when you know nothing else about a candidate. Or even vote for a candidate you actively dislike.

True, people might question your sanity if you were to declare that you were voting for the Democratic Party agenda. The what? If there's anything worse than ignoring that famous elephant in the room, it's imagining a donkey that's not in the room. Even so, a vote for the Democrat is a vote against the Republican. And voting "no" to a record of failure is more important for the functioning of democracy than voting "yes" to any number of promises about the future.

It was not Newt Gingrich's Contract With America that caused the great Republican sweep of 1994: It was disgust, skillfully nurtured by Republicans, with the Democratic-controlled Congress.

Disgust for Congress is higher than ever. But this time around, at least until recently, the disgust has seemed to be less partisan. The Democrats were not as ruthless or as skilled about associating the sins of Congress with the party that controls it.

So what do you need? Permission? You've got it. I give you permission to vote for -- or against -- the party and not the person. And don't forget to vote.

kinsleym@washpost.com

What Democrats Would Do (WP)

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Their agenda is a hodgepodge of good ideas, bad ideas and no ideas.

PERHAPS, AS President Bush says, it's too early for Democrats to be "measuring their drapes" in congressional leadership offices. But with it looking increasingly as if Democrats, after 12 years in the minority, will take over the House at least, it's worth looking at their stated agenda -- "A New Direction for America" -- for a glimpse at what a Democratic majority might entail.

On national security, the House Democrats' plan offers more goals than details. Who could disagree with promises to "eliminate Osama Bin Laden, destroy terrorist networks like al-Qaeda, finish the job in Afghanistan and end the threat posed by the Taliban" or "redouble efforts to stop nuclear weapons development in Iran and North Korea?" But the hard part -- on which Democrats offer no details -- is how that is to be done.

On Iraq in particular, the agenda calls for "the responsible redeployment of U.S. forces," with "Iraqis assuming primary responsibility for securing and governing their country." Again, what's missing are the details of what "responsible redeployment" might look like. "Insist that Iraqis make the political compromises necessary to unite their country and defeat the insurgency," the Democrats say. Okay, what if that insistence doesn't yield the desired result?

As to another piece of the security agenda, energy independence, the Democrats assert that they will "achieve energy independence for America by 2020 by eliminating reliance on oil from the Middle East and other unstable regions of the world" -- a super-sized version of Mr. Bush's pledge to "replace more than 75 percent of our oil imports from the Middle East by 2025." The Democratic plan for doing this -- tax credits and research funds -- sounds remarkably like the Bush approach, down to increased use of switch-grass ethanol. Unlike the president, the Democrats rightly frame energy independence as an environmental as well as national security issue; like the president, they're unwilling -- for the obvious reason that they don't want to be branded as tax-raisers -- to recommend a carbon tax.

The agenda is heavy on ideas -- raising the minimum wage, letting the government negotiate Medicare drug prices -- that may have more popular appeal than real-world impact, though we agree it's past time for the minimum wage to go up. Other proposals sound good but are bad policy. Screening 100 percent of cargo containers at the point of origin would be expensive, time-consuming and impractical. The vow to "prevent outsourcing of critical components of our national security infrastructure -- such as ports, airports and mass transit -- to foreign interests that put America at risk" is more Dubai ports demagoguery.

DOJ_NMG_0088223

Making the first $3,000 of college tuition tax deductible would be a wasteful way -- albeit one that resonates with voters -- of ensuring affordability if Democrats don't impose an income cutoff; none is mentioned in the proposal. The laudable pledge to lift the ban on federal funding for embryonic stem cell research passed the Republican-controlled House and would almost certainly again face a presidential veto.

The Democrats promise a return to "pay as you go" budget discipline, something that is sorely overdue. But the agenda does not then explain how to pay for a raft of new spending and tax credits, from cutting college loan interest rates in half to doubling funding for basic research to giving a $1,000 match to middle- and working-class families that contribute at least that much to a retirement account.

The agenda is best on outlining a specific new ethics package (though it's questionable whether even a Democratic-controlled Senate would be willing to go along) and promising a legislative process that is more open and fair to the minority. It's weakest in what it doesn't say about how to tackle the looming surge in entitlement spending. Predictably, Democrats renew their vow not to "privatize Social Security in whole or in part"; equally predictably, they are silent about what, precisely, they would do to put Social Security and, even more important, Medicare on a sustainable and affordable course. Also unmentioned are trade and immigration, issues on which the party, as well as voters, are divided.

Campaign documents are, almost by definition, gauzy things -- long on poll-tested rhetoric and short on specifics. Elections aren't the best time for politicians to be playing up sacrifice and hard choices. House Democrats say their document isn't meant to be a comprehensive menu, just an indication of priorities. But Democrats will need to do better than what they've proposed in 2006 if they are given the chance to govern in 2007.

Running Against The Boogeyman (LAT)

Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Jonathan Chait: Party of ideas? Not the GOP

WHEN Republicans explain their strategy for the upcoming election, the two phrases they always use are "referendum election" and "choice election" — and the latter is how they want to frame this year's vote.

A referendum election is one in which voters make their decision on the basis of whether the party in power deserves to stay there. From the Republicans' point of view, that's very bad because almost everybody believes they have failed miserably.

A choice election, on the other hand, is one in which voters weigh the two parties against each other. That kind of election gives the Republicans a fighting chance. The subtext of a choice election is: We may have screwed everything up, but the other party is worse. That's how President Bush won reelection.

In principle, the Republicans are right about this. Democracy is a process of compromises and imperfect choices. Asking the voters to compare the two sides is the right thing to do. The trouble is, that isn't really what the Republicans want to do at all.

How do I know this? Because the Democrats running for the House of Representatives actually have an agenda. Republicans aren't saying why the Democratic agenda is wrong, or why their own is better. They're just ignoring it.

If you're like most people, you probably have no idea what that agenda is. Let me list it:

· Put new rules in place to break the link between lobbyists and legislation.

· Enact all the recommendations made by the 9/11 commission.

· Raise the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour.

· Cut the interest rate on federally supported student loans in half.

· Allow the government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients.

· Broaden the types of stem cell research allowed with federal funds.

· Impose pay-as-you-go budget rules, requiring that new entitlement spending or tax cuts be offset with entitlement spending cuts or tax hikes.

Republicans disagree with all these items. Indeed, the reason these items are on the Democratic agenda is that Republicans in Congress have blocked them from coming up for a vote. So where's the Republican rebuttal?

Now, I'm not saying that the GOP needs to hold some Oxford-style intellectual debate. But shouldn't the party offer some rebuttal?

You know, "Raising the minimum wage would kill millions of jobs," or, "Pay-as-you-go budget rules will require tax hikes or cuts in your Medicare benefits," or, "Why should we waste billions of dollars preventing terrorist attacks that haven't even happened yet?" These are just some off-the-cuff suggestions. I'm sure Republican political consultants could do better.

DOJ_NMG_0088224

My point is, we're not even getting a debate about a caricature of the Democratic position, let alone the actual one. Instead, we're getting things like this: GOP Rep. John Hostettler of Indiana is running an ad warning that if Democrats take power and California Democrat Nancy Pelosi becomes House speaker, she "will then put in motion her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda, led by Barney Frank, reprimanded by the House after paying for sex with a man who ran a gay brothel out of Congressman Frank's home."

What is the homosexual agenda? The ad does not say. (Apparently it involves raising the minimum wage and cutting the interest rate on government-backed student loans. I can just see it if the Democrats win — all those gay Wal-Mart employees, cackling with glee as they use their fat $7.25-an-hour salaries to pay off their suddenly puny college debts.)

Which is my point. Republicans don't want an actual choice election, they want to run against a mythological Democratic Party so frightening that the voters overlook all the GOP's failures.

Not all the Republican campaigns are as vicious and mindless as Hostettler's. But nearly all of those campaigns are trying to run against a boogeyman. They raise the specter of a radical Democratic agenda, but they refuse to say what they don't like about that agenda. And there's a good reason for that: It's popular.

Racism Enters The Races (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

The ads may not be overt, but across the country campaigns are trying to tap into a vein of fear and bigotry.

IT'S THAT TIME of year. A nip is in the air, the football season is nearly halfway over, the holidays are almost upon us and right on schedule — just before the Nov. 7 elections — the airwaves are full of racially tinged politicking. Republicans and Democrats, Northerners and Southerners alike, are attempting to tap a vein of voter fear and bigotry.

Commercials clearly pandering to prejudice, such as the infamous 1988 Willie Horton spot that painted Gov. Michael S. Dukakis as soft on crime and Sen. Jesse Helms' 1990 ad blaming affirmative action for taking jobs from white men, are yesterday's style. Today's is all about suggestion.

In Massachusetts, white Republican Kerry Healey, in a contest for governor with black Democrat Patrick Deval, is running a commercial that shows a nervous white woman being stalked. It ends with: "Deval Patrick, he should be ashamed — not governor," alluding to Deval's support for a rapist he believed was not guilty until a DNA test proved him wrong.

The spot is filmed from the perspective of the would-be attacker, and viewers are divided on what they see. Is the camera a stand-in for Deval? For black men in general? For attackers regardless of race?

Then there is the appalling flier recently put out by Democrats attacking Georgia Gov. George Ervin "Sonny" Perdue. It shows a photograph of a civil rights marcher being beaten to the ground by a white officer with the caption: "Remember this? Their last attempt to stop us from voting." Beneath is a photo of Perdue, the state's white governor, signing a voter identification bill into law, and the words: "Their current attempt to stop us from voting. Don't let the Bush/Perdue Republican Mafia take away our vote!"

Requiring an ID to vote is hardly the equivalent of racial disenfranchisement, but the ad taps into the anguish of the civil rights period and smears it all over the Republican leadership — without, of course, actually calling them baton-wielding racists.

The most masterful of the genre is the television spot in Tennessee targeting Harold Ford Jr. Ford is a black Democrat running for the Senate against Republican Bob Corker, and the commercial ends with a bare-shouldered blond urging Ford, a bachelor, to call her.

Ford admitted that he attended a Super Bowl party sponsored by Playboy, and social conservatives in Tennessee might be offended by this regardless of anyone's race. So isn't the issue fair game? Probably. And would it be better or worse for the ad's sponsors to insinuate that Ford's flirting must be with a black Playboy hostess instead?

Context provides the moral thicket. Consider that when South Carolina finally repealed its Constitution's ban on interracial marriage in 1998 — 31 years after the U.S. Supreme Court struck down such laws — almost half of white voters voted to keep it in place. These ads and commercials themselves may not be overtly racist, they just hope you are.

On Campaign Stop, Bush Rallies Loyalists (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Indiana Event Kicks Off Stretch-Run Appearances for Embattled GOP Candidates

SELLERSBURG, Ind., Oct. 28 -- After months of fundraising, President Bush plunged into retail politicking for the first time this campaign season, telling a raucous crowd of several thousand Republican partisans on Saturday that the Democrats would raise taxes and retreat from Iraq if they win control of Congress next week.

DOJ_NMG_0088225

The cheers were deafening inside the packed gymnasium at Silver Creek High School here when Bush emerged beaming, with his blue shirt-sleeves rolled up, alongside endangered Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R-Ind.).

The crowd interrupted the president repeatedly with loud applause and chants of "USA! USA!" as he cast the Nov. 7 midterm elections as a decisive turning point in the affairs of the country.

"The outcome of this election will determine how much money you have in your pocket," Bush shouted, his voice seeming to crack at points. "The outcome of this election will determine whether this government does its most fundamental job, and that is to protect the American people."

Bush has devoted considerable time and energy raising money for GOP candidates around the country, but Saturday's event represented the first time he has tried to rally grass-roots Republican voters. White House officials have said the new campaign finance law restricting the use of unregulated campaign contributions for such events has made it harder for candidates to stage such rallies.

But Bush has also had to be careful about where to go, since in many states and congressional districts his presence could work against GOP candidates. Democrats have aired television ads targeting an assortment of Republican candidates by showing footage of them with Bush, whose popularity has slid markedly in the last year.

With 10 days to go until the election, Bush said Saturday he was going to "sprint to the finish line," and rallies are planned in the coming week in Georgia, Texas, Nevada and Montana, where incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns (R) is in a desperate battle to save his seat. White House officials are hoping the president's visits will energize GOP voters, a key factor in their assessment that they can still retain their congressional majorities.

In an interview Friday, White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten indicated Bush will not back away from his sharp focus on national security, and discounted polls suggesting the administration may be driving away independent voters with its policy on Iraq.

"The Iraq war has been a strain on this country for good reason. Nobody should like seeing on the screen the losses that we and the Iraqis are suffering there," Bolten said. "But I think when you vacillate on the principles you believe in, you end up alienating your base without winning the middle."

Bolten said that Bush remains undeterred from his basic approach to governing.

"A lot of the winning and losing here is going to be done in individual races that have almost nothing to do with the national policies," he said. "Clearly this is going to be a very close election for control. And there's a number of Republican seats now in jeopardy because of the Foley scandal, Bob Ney. . . . I don't think that actually implicates the fundamental policy or political strategy. I don't expect either a defeat or a repudiation."

Following the Indiana rally, Bush flew to South Carolina for a Republican National Committee fundraiser and a spirited rally with troops at Charleston Air Force Base.

Indiana, a heavily Republican state, is shaping up as a critical battleground in next week's elections, with at least three GOP incumbents high on the Democrats' target list. In the 9th District, which includes Sellersburg and other southern parts of the state, Sodrel ousted Democratic incumbent Baron Hill by 1,425 votes in 2004. He now faces a fierce rematch with the former high school basketball star.

Many high-profile figures of both parties have been here on behalf of the candidates, with former president Bill Clinton appearing for Hill and first lady Laura Bush and Vice President Cheney helping Sodrel raise campaign funds. Sodrel told the crowd Saturday that he was "proud to stand" with the president.

Hill used Bush's visit to attack Sodrel as a "rubber stamp for the administration."

In Washington, meanwhile, Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) reacted sharply to Bush's latest attacks on Democrats, saying that this Halloween the Bush administration was "running its national security policy like a Charlie Brown special" and was disguising the "scary facts" about the war.

Although the Indiana crowd was wild in its enthusiasm, at least one backer of the president voiced some anxiety about Iraq. Samantha Grimm, a registered nurse, said she "absolutely" supports the president on the war but asked: "When is it going to be over -- when do you say enough is enough?"

Bush reprised familiar themes about taxes and the war. However, he employed a new rhetorical device, as he once again accused congressional Democrats of repeatedly trying to block his anti-terrorism policies. Democrats say they simply want to carry out such policies while safeguarding rights.

"In all these vital measures for fighting the war on terror, the Democrats in Washington follow a simple philosophy: Just say no," Bush said. "When it comes to listening in on the terrorists, what's the Democratic answer? 'Just say no.' When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democrat answer?"

"Just say no," the crowd replied.

DOJ_NMG_0088226

Bush Rallies Base To 'Just Say No' (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

SELLERSBURG, Ind. -- President Bush yesterday yelled himself hoarse in his first public political rally of the 2006 election campaign, whipping thousands of supporters into chants of "USA!" as he criticized Democrats for being weak on national security and anxious to increase taxes.

Swooping into a Republican stronghold that on Election Day will be an early harbinger of whether Republicans hold control of Congress, Mr. Bush led the crowd in a chant that gave new meaning to an old Reagan-era slogan.

"The Democrats in Washington follow a simple philosophy: Just say no," the president said.

"When it comes to listening in on the terrorists, what's the Democratic answer? Just say no. When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democrat answer?" Mr. Bush asked.

"Just say no!" the crowd shouted.

"So when the Democrats ask for your vote on Nov. 7, what are you going to say?"

"Just say no!" the audience replied.

With just nine days to go before the midterm elections, the White House has settled on a simple strategy: Turn out the base.

Yesterday's rally in the Ohio River Valley was aimed at boosting Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel, who is in a tough re-election battle with former Rep. Baron Hill. It was the first of Mr. Bush's nearly 90 political events this season that was open to the public. The latest poll shows Mr. Hill opening up a double-digit lead on Mr. Sodrel, who won the seat in 2004 by fewer than 1,500 votes. The president beat Sen. John Kerry in 2004 with 59 percent of the vote in this southern Indiana district.

Mr. Bush has spent the past few weeks visiting other districts he won handily in 2004, but where Republican candidates are struggling to hold on to conservative voters.

Last week, Mr. Bush raised funds for a Republican in Sarasota, Fla., where the president beat Sen. John Kerry by a 13-point margin in 2004. Even though Republicans outnumber Democrats 2-to-1 in the district, the party's candidate, car salesman Vern Buchanan, trails his opponent by 11 points in the latest poll.

The White House views a handful of races along the borders of Indiana, Kentucky and Ohio as pivotal to holding control of the House.

"The Ohio River Valley is the problem," a senior administration official said last week on the condition of anonymity. "I think we've got three seats really at risk."

Rep. John Hostettler, an incumbent whose district is in the southwestern part of Indiana, is trailing by seven points in the most recent poll. Several candidates in Ohio, including Rep. Steve Chabot, whose district borders Kentucky, are locked in tossup battles.

In Kentucky, another handful of races in districts along the river could determine who controls Congress. Rep. Anne M. Northup, who recently split with the president by calling for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, is in a tossup race. Rep. Geoff Davis, the Republican running in a district that in 2004 delivered a 27-point victory for Mr. Bush, cannot pull away from his opponent, former Rep. Ken Lucas.

"If we lose three and [zero], it's going to be a very close-run thing, but we'll probably keep the House. ...That is to say, lose two or three in Indiana and lose none in Kentucky," the administration official said. "If it's two and [zero], we'll keep the House. If it's two and one, it's going to be a very close-run thing."

The White House knows the stakes in the Ohio River Valley: First lady Laura Bush, former first lady Barbara Bush and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, have all made recent visits to Clark County, Ind. Press secretary Tony Snow drops into nearby Jeffersonville tomorrow.

Yesterday's presidential visit to Clark County, the first since Lyndon B. Johnson stopped here in 1964 to dedicate a post office, sent this tiny town into a tizzy. Residents lined the streets awaiting the motorcade, and businesses along Indiana Avenue posted "Welcome President Bush" signs.

The 4,000 supporters packed into a high school gymnasium remained on their feet throughout the president's 33-minute speech. They booed whenever Mr. Bush mentioned Democrats such as "the member from California, the ranking leader, the minority leader in the House, who wants to be the speaker ...."

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, he said, claims to "love tax cuts."

"Given her record, she must be a secret admirer," he said. Ticking off a list of votes the San Francisco liberal has cast against tax cuts, he broke the crowd up when he leaned into the microphone and shouted: "If this is the Democrats' idea of love, I wouldn't want to see what hate looks like."

DOJ_NMG_0088227

Afterward, as the crowd filed out of Silver Creek High School, David Blocker of Elizabeth, Ind., said he "loved the speech."

The owner of a trucking company, who was wearing a shirt that said, "W -- Still the President," said he supports Mr. Bush's war on terrorism.

But Annette Dailey, a part-time UPS worker, said she will cast her vote against Mr. Sodrel, based on the president's Iraq policy.

"I've got three little boys, and I'd really like to see us get out of the role of being the world's bully," she said inside the family room of her home, which bore a yard sign for Mr. Hill. "I'm worried that 15 years from now, when they're of age, we're still going to be at war. I'd like for us to get back to where we take care of our own country first."

A Warm Welcome For Bush The Campaigner, In Indiana (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

SELLERSBURG, Ind., Oct. 28 — In an appearance that amounted to his first traditional campaign rally of the election season, President Bush on Saturday told wildly cheering supporters here that Democrats did not want to investigate, prosecute or even detain terrorists and had no plan for Iraq.

And, introducing a relatively new line in his election-year stump speech, Mr. Bush criticized the "activist" New Jersey Supreme Court's ruling this week that same-sex couples were entitled to the same legal rights and benefits as heterosexual couples.

"We believe that marriage is a union between a man and a woman and should be defended," Mr. Bush said, reminding the crowd of his two conservative Supreme Court appointees, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. "I will continue to appoint judges who strictly interpret the law."

Aides said Mr. Bush's appearance on Saturday was the first of many planned for the final days before the Nov. 7 election, as he pivots from the role of fund-raiser in chief to that of cheerleader in chief.

For Mr. Bush, it was a return to the kind of campaigning he likes best. He gave his speech in rolled-up shirtsleeves, standing before an ecstatic crowd packed into a high school gymnasium. They waved pompoms and held signs that said "Welcome to Bush Country" or simply "W," and hooted their support with deafening enthusiasm. Their cheers nearly overwhelmed the shouts of an antiwar demonstrator, whose protests were barely audible, and occasionally drowned out the president.

Mr. Bush went onstage with Representative Mike Sodrel, one of three Indiana Republicans facing tough Democratic opposition this year. The president's list of Democrats' deficiencies included their votes against the administration's program to wiretap phone conversations of terrorism suspects without warrants and their opposition to trying terrorism suspects in special military tribunals without habeas corpus.

"In all these vital measures for fighting the war on terror, the Democrats in Washington follow a simple philosophy: Just Say No," Mr. Bush said, borrowing the line from Nancy Reagan's 1980s campaign against drugs. He continued that theme in a call-and-response with the crowd, asking, "When it comes to listening in on the terrorists, what's the Democratic answer?"

"Just say no," the audience answered.

"When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democratic answer?" Mr. Bush asked.

"Just say no," the crowd of roughly 4,000 answered.

"When the Democrats ask for your vote November the seventh, what are you going to say?" Mr. Bush asked.

"Just say no," the crowd replied.

Democrats and some Republicans in Congress have pushed for greater restrictions on the president's authority to order wiretaps without warrants. Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said they had called for a more solid legal foundation in trying terrorism suspects.

Mr. Manley said the president was practicing "the politics of fear and smear."

"Of course we want to listen to and detain terrorists," Mr. Manley said. "We just don't want to give the president a blank check."

Continuing his national security theme, Mr. Bush left here for South Carolina to attend a rally for troops at the Charleston Air Force Base.

To a crowd of hundreds of servicemembers gathered on the tarmac, Mr. Bush gave a streamlined version of his stump speech, removing direct mention of Democrats or the coming election, and appeared to direct criticism at the opposition.

"I know some in America don't believe Iraq is the central front in the war on terror — that's fine, and they can have that opinion," Mr. Bush said. "But Osama bin Laden knows it's the central front in the war on terror."

And he offered words for those who have lost loved ones in the war.

DOJ_NMG_0088228

"I make them this pledge," he said. "We will honor their sacrifice by completing the mission, by defeating the terrorists and laying the foundation of peace for generations to come."

Mr. Bush has not set aside his fund-raising duties entirely. On Saturday evening, he appeared at a private event for the Republican National Committee on Kiawah Island, a resort community off the coast of South Carolina, that organizers said raised about $1 million.

In Campaign Mode, Bush Takes On Dems (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

SELLERSBURG, Ind. (AP) — President Bush, campaigning aggressively ahead of the high-stakes Nov. 7 elections, said Saturday Democrats should not be trusted to control Congress because they have no idea how to win in Iraq.

"I want you to think about the Democrat plan for success. There isn't one," Bush told thousands of energized Republicans packed into a high school gymnasium. "They are in agreement on one thing — they will leave before the job is done, and we will not let them."

The rally was aimed at boosting GOP Rep. Mike Sodrel, facing former Democratic Rep. Baron Hill for the third time in a rural southern Indiana district so evenly divided between the parties that each man has won once.

Before leaving Washington, the president spoke for 50 minutes with Iraq's prime minister, seeking to ease recent tensions over a U.S. plan for benchmarks for reducing the violence.

Until the Indiana campaign stop, all of Bush's approximately 90 political events in the 2005-2006 election season were fundraisers with donors willing to pay a high price to see him.

The rally was the president's first free appearance and came in the final stretch of an election that will determine whether Republicans retain their majorities in the House and Senate.

The president has five more rallies scheduled so far through Thursday, in Texas, Montana and Nevada, and two in Georgia.

Later Saturday in South Carolina, Bush spoke to troops on a tarmac at Charleston Air Force Base, repeating his full-throated defense of his Iraq policy in a speech that was stripped of its earlier partisan jabs. But the appearance created potent images, as Bush, surrounded by troops in camouflage, strode into his audience's view from between hulking C-17 cargo planes as soaring music blared.

"It's a hard fight," the president said of Iraq. "And we've got a lot of brave citizens of ours in the midst of the fight. But we have a plan for victory."

The president also raised money for the Republican National Committee at a resort and spa on picturesque Kiawah Island. That fundraiser and one with Vice President Dick Cheney on Friday night, also on Kiawah, were expected to bring in $1 million total.

At the Indiana rally, a large group of protesters gathered across the road. But inside the steamy gym, the president basked in the reception. The screaming, foot-stomping audience frequently drowned out his words with applause, chants and cheers.

He was interrupted several times by people calling for the troops to come home, but supporters countered with "USA" chants.

Bush — his sleeves rolled up, a wide grin on his face — gave out hugs and handshakes, cuddled babies passed up to him over the crowd and waved at his supporters. The wear of the campaign season showed in his voice, which sounded as if it might soon give out.

To support his claim that Democrats are offering no clear alternative to his leadership on Iraq, the president noted some Democrats have urged an immediate pullout of U.S. troops from Iraq, while others have advocated a specific date by which all American soldiers will come home or cutting off money for the war.

"Five years after September the 11th, too many Democrats still do not get it," Bush said. "The best way to protect the homeland is to find the enemy and defeat them overseas."

A new Associated Press-AOL News poll that found likely voters — angry at Bush and citing Iraq and the economy as their top issues — overwhelmingly prefer Democrats over Republicans. The poll found voters think Democrats would do a better job on Iraq by a 15-point margin.

And though Democrats have not coalesced around one Iraq strategy, the president's talk of benchmarks, tactics and goals has been criticized as also not clear. Bush refuses, for instance, to say what the consequences would be for the Iraqi government if it does not meet benchmarks.

"Since 2003, President Bush has laid out nine different plans for victory in Iraq, none of them serious and none of them workable. And most seriously, this incompetence has hindered our ability to fight international terror," said the Democratic candidate for Senate in Virginia, Jim Webb. A decorated Vietnam combat veteran whose son is on active duty in Iraq, Webb was selected to speak for his party in delivering the weekly radio response to Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0088229

In recent days, a feud between the Bush administration and the Iraqi government has put the White House on the defensive and undermined the president's attempt to put a new face on his much-criticized Iraq strategy. After the videoconference, Bush and al-Maliki issued a joint statement saying they were "committed to the partnership."

Bush has taken lately to pleading with voters not to see the election as a done deal, trying Saturday to prevent GOP complacence with criticism of Democratic votes against his controversial proposal for detaining, interrogating and trying suspected terrorists

"In all these vital measures for fighting the war on terror, the Democrats in Washington follow a simple philosophy: Just say no," he said.

"So when the Democrats ask for your vote on November the 7th, what are you going to say?" Bush yelled. "Just say no!" the audience yelled back.

Also Saturday, on a conference call aimed at boosting Republican turnout, Bush told 3,000 local-level Republican activists of his electoral confidence.

In his speech, Bush stuck to his theme that Democrats would raise taxes if they gain control of Congress. "They want to get in your pocketbook," he said. "We're not going to let them."

Bush Picks His Battles In Friendly Country (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske And James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

The president is in public campaign mode for Republicans -- and making sure to go only where he's wanted.

At his first campaign rally this election season, President Bush on Saturday galvanized supporters in a packed high school gym by pledging to oppose gay marriage, a theme Republican candidates have revived in the wake of a New Jersey court ruling in favor of gay couples.

"Activist judges try to define America by court order," Bush told the crowd of 4,000 at Silver Creek High School, flanked by Rep. Mike Sodrel (R-Ind.), who is running for reelection. "Just this week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage. We believe marriage is the union between a man and a woman."

At that, the raucous crowd went wild, shouting "USA," stomping their feet and shaking dozens of red, white and blue pompoms.

The New Jersey Supreme Court last week ruled that gay and lesbian couples in that state should have all the rights and benefits of marriage; the justices left it up to legislators to decide whether to call such partnerships marriages or civil unions. Same-sex marriage was a motivating issue for social conservatives in the 2004 election, but has been overshadowed in this year's campaign by the war in Iraq.

Constitutional amendments banning same-sex marriage will be on the ballot in eight states this November, including South Carolina, which Bush visited late Saturday to greet troops and attend a campaign fundraiser outside Charleston.

Bush has appeared at private fundraisers for individual candidates, but now is launching a string of five preelection public rallies in the next four days. He's speaking out on tax cuts, national security and same-sex marriage while playing to his base of conservative Republicans in such strongholds as Sellersburg, Statesboro, Ga., and Sugar Land, Texas.

With Republican control of Congress at risk, the president's visits and tone could determine the fate of a handful of close races.

Besieged Republican candidates have distanced themselves from the president in recent debates, TV ads and closed fundraisers as his approval rating remained below 40% this month. It has become increasingly difficult for the party to take advantage of the office of the president, GOP strategists say.

Democrats in Maryland, Missouri and Pennsylvania have launched ads that remind voters of their opponents' support for Bush.

"Michael Steele: Right for Bush, wrong for Maryland," says one of the latest TV ads from Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, which features Lt. Gov. Steele praising Bush at the 2004 Republican National Convention. Steele is challenging Cardin.

On Friday, Democrat Jerry McNerney invited Bush to return to California's 11th District and campaign for Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Tracy), whom the president visited last month, because he "reminds voters that both Bush and Pombo are satisfied with the lack of ethics and integrity in Congress." McNerney is trying to unseat Pombo.

Bush's travel schedule was plotted last week based on where he could do the most good for candidates who are in close races in Republican areas, said Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto. Sodrel won his southern Indiana district two years ago by 1,425 of 283,000 votes. The president carried the district that year with 59% of the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0088230

"He's going to tight races where we think his presence can help put a guy over the line," Fratto said.

The campaign landscape has changed dramatically since the midterm election of 2002, when Bush's approval rating was 64%. Back then, Bush targeted battleground districts for large, boisterous rallies.

But he has been more low-key this campaign season. At a Thursday fundraising rally in Michigan that brought in $700,000 for the Senate campaign of Mike Bouchard, a catering hall smaller than a high school gymnasium was less than half full.

Bush is to focus on red states during the coming week in the hope of drawing crowds and boosting beleaguered Republican House campaigns in states he won by large margins in 2004.

"That's where he's more useful," said Charles Black, a Republican strategist close to presidential advisor Karl Rove.

In a blue state like Pennsylvania, a presidential visit could hurt Republican Sen. Rick Santorum more than it helps, Black said. The state is home to 600,000 more Democrats than Republicans, voter registration records indicate.

"To win, [Santorum] needs to get all the Republicans and some of the Democrats. Well, the president's influence is good on the Republicans but could work against him among Democrats, so why put him there?" Black said.

Bush plans to campaign Monday in Sugar Land, where former Rep. Tom DeLay was a political fixture for more than a decade — more evidence of the degree to which Republicans are struggling. DeLay carried 63% of the vote two years ago and Bush won 64% in 2004. But the former House majority leader abandoned his reelection bid and resigned his seat after former aides pleaded guilty in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

The president is also scheduled to make repeat visits Monday and Tuesday to two Georgia districts, starting with a rally Monday in Statesboro for Max Burns, a Republican seeking to unseat incumbent Democratic Rep. John Barrow.

The district is so Republican, and so pro-Bush, that even Barrow is airing television ads that proclaim: "I agree with George Bush."

On Thursday, Bush is to hold a rally in Billings, Mont. — he won the state with 59% of the vote two years ago — then stop in Nevada.

Bush will probably make 20 stops before election day to help House candidates, possibly in Ohio, North Carolina, Iowa, Indiana and Florida, according to GOP strategist Scott Reed.

"In this phase of the game, it's about winning a day in the news, and a visit by the president will about guarantee you win the day," Reed said.

He called Bush's agenda "a last-minute flurry to limit the losses … and keep the House from going Democrat."

molly.hennessy-fiske@
latimes.com
james.gerstenzang@
latimes.com

Hennessy-Fiske reported from Indiana and Gerstenzang from Washington.

Partisan Rhetoric Even In Wartime Sets Bush Apart (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

President Bush and Republicans in many of the nation's key races are presenting divergent, even contradictory, visions of how Washington should operate after next week's election.

Around the country, GOP incumbents and challengers alike are running against the relentless partisan conflict that defined the final years of Bill Clinton's presidency and have colored virtually every day of Bush's.

From House members such as Christopher Shays in Connecticut to Sens. Jim Talent in Missouri and Mike DeWine in Ohio and Senate challengers in Maryland, New Jersey and Tennessee, Republicans almost everywhere are presenting themselves as flexible and independent problem solvers who will reach across party lines to build consensus on difficult issues.

Bush is moving in the opposite direction. As he often does when he's under political pressure, he's accentuating the disagreements between the parties and presenting the differences in the starkest possible terms. He's displayed that instinct most clearly in the highly charged way he has framed the debate over Iraq and the war on terrorism.

Bush now routinely labels Democrats "the party of cut-and-run." At a recent Republican fundraiser, Bush went much further. "The Democrat Party … has evolved from one that was confident in its capacity to help deal with the problems of the world to one that … has an approach of doubt and defeat," he declared.

Bush has absorbed his share of body blows from Democrats criticizing his management of the war. But tagging his rivals as the party of "defeat" is nonetheless extraordinary language for a commander in chief to use in a political campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0088231

Other wartime presidents have been much more reluctant to argue that only their party was committed to success. Consider the way President Johnson approached the 1966 elections as the Vietnam War was escalating. To begin with, Johnson spent most of that October away from the campaign, on a 17-day tour of Asia that included Vietnam.

Then, at a news conference just before election day, Johnson dismissed the idea that congressional losses for the Democratic Party would affect either the thinking of the North Vietnamese or America's support for the troops in the field. If Republicans gained seats, he continued, "They may talk, and argue, and fight, and criticize, and play politics from time to time, but when they call the vote on supporting the men … in the Senate it will be 83 to 2 and in the House it will be 410-5."

In 1942, the first election after Pearl Harbor, President Franklin D. Roosevelt was even more emphatic about separating war and politics. Roosevelt spent much of that fall visiting defense facilities on a tour during which he barred press coverage and insisted on being accompanied by Republican as well as Democratic local officials. When the chairman of the Democratic National Committee suggested that a GOP takeover of the House would be bad for the country, Roosevelt publicly rebuked him.

Even President Nixon displayed more restraint during the 1970 midterm election. Nixon barnstormed the country asking voters to elect members of Congress who would support his war policy. But he took pains to avoid claiming that only his party wanted to win. "This is not a partisan issue," Nixon declared that October at a rally for a Texas Republican Senate candidate named George H.W. Bush.

Can that Bush's son succeed with his more polarizing strategy? It depends on how success is defined. His sharp attacks on Democrats could rally the conservative base enough to maintain a slim Senate majority by holding GOP seats in enough right-leaning states, such as Missouri and Tennessee. Though it seems much less likely, it might even help the GOP hold enough Republican-leaning House seats to eke out a tiny majority in that chamber.

But even if Bush succeeds, such a result still will measure how much he has retreated from his hopes of building a broad majority coalition. From Connecticut to Colorado, he is facing enormous resistance this fall from voters outside his bedrock base of conservatives and Republicans. In polls, he now looks less like the president of all the people than the champion of a single faction.

In the latest Gallup poll, just 28% of independents and 24% of moderates approved of Bush's job performance. His support among Democrats and liberals registered in the single digits. In Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg polls last week of four states Bush carried in 2004 — Ohio, Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia — only majorities of Republicans and conservatives said the country should continue on the course he's set out. In each case less than one-third of independents, and less than one-fifth of moderates, agreed. Don't even ask what Democrats and liberals think.

Even if Republicans hold one or both congressional chambers, future presidential candidates in both parties are likely to question a political strategy that generates so much division. Matthew Dowd, the senior strategist for Bush's 2004 reelection campaign, says the smart candidates for 2008 will learn more from the politicians this year pursuing common ground.

Example A may be California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, whom Dowd is advising. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, is heading for a convincing victory in the biggest blue state of all by offering a hybrid left-right agenda that bridges the ideological differences Bush routinely inflames. Schwarzenegger "is going to win primarily because of his leadership style over the last year: bipartisan, consensus, let's not look at things as an ideology," Dowd predicts. "It should send a signal to anybody running in '08."

More immediately, the response to Schwarzenegger and the other candidates promising reconciliation should tell Bush and lawmakers in both parties that after November's vote, America wants them to put aside their own war long enough to find a new direction in Iraq and more consensus on stubborn problems at home.

ronald.brownstein@latimes.com

Ronald Brownstein's column appears every Sunday. See current and past Brownstein columns at http://www.latimes.com/brownstein .

Iraq War's Unpopularity Sours Many Voters On The Republicans' Swagger (BOS)

By Susan Milligan

The Boston Globe, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- They strode into Washington talking tough and wearing cowboy boots. One warned of faceless terrorists who "drive taxi cabs in the daytime and kill at night." Others linked homosexuality to bigamy and incest. Together, they unapologetically froze out the minority Democrats on Capitol Hill.

Now, the Republican Party's chief swashbucklers are a politically endangered species. Lawmakers who have been running Washington with a strong hand and even stronger rhetoric are themselves scrambling for reelection in Senate races in Pennsylvania, Montana, and Virginia.

DOJ_NMG_0088232

Republicans built and expanded their majorities with a commanding style and tough stances on terrorism and other issues, a leadership style many voters found appealing in a post-9/11 world, analysts say. And the GOP is still hoping to hang on to some critical seats by portraying Democrats as weak-kneed and soft on terrorism.

But the increasing unpopularity of the Iraq war is making some voters tire of the defiant demeanor showcased by the majority party in recent years, analysts say -- a special problem for those whose political style most resembles President Bush.

"The less successful the war has been, the less plausible it has been for Bush to be stomping around in his cowboy boots," said Ralph Whitehead , a professor at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. "The plausibility of Bush's electoral swagger as the campaigner-in-chief for his party depends to some extent on the plausibility of his military swagger as commander-in-chief of his country's presence in Iraq."

House and Senate leaders are suffering too, from a voter backlash against the "hubris" of the GOP majority, said Marshall Wittmann , a former staffer to Republican Senator John McCain who now works for the Progressive Policy Institute.

When the nation was united in the drive to find Osama bin Laden -- "dead or alive," as Bush vowed -- Americans were attracted to the hard-line talk of Washington's Republican leaders. But with bin Laden still at large and the death toll mounting in Iraq, some voters are opting for candidates favoring a less rigid approach.

Several of the party's most outspokenly partisan lawmakers have already been forced out of office. Former House majority leader Tom DeLay , the Texas Republican and onetime exterminator who brazenly -- and very successfully -- marginalized Democrats in the House, is now out of his job and facing a trial for allegedly misdirecting campaign funds.

Representative Bob Ney , who pleaded guilty to corruption charges, said he will quit his Ohio seat. And California's swaggering former Representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham -- who once warned that Senator John F. Kerry of Massachusetts would become a "Jane Fonda commander-in-chief" -- is now in prison for taking bribes.

President Bush's approval ratings are running about 40 percent, while Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld -- whose irascible nature charmed much of Washington five years ago, making him a model of an alpha male, now faces frequent demands for his resignation, including from Republicans in close election campaigns.

California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger -- who once called his Democratic opponents "girlie men" -- has dialed down his rhetoric since he lost several statewide referendums and is now widely favored to win reelection Nov. 7.

But several sitting senators who have defined Washington's swaggering Republican are fighting to keep their jobs. Two-term Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum, who chairs the GOP Conference in the Senate and who once was considered a contender for his party's 2008 presidential nomination, is now trailing badly in the polls against Democrat Bob Casey Jr.

Santorum's blunt rhetoric against abortion and homosexuality won him points among Christian conservatives, but his comments about working women and gays have come back to haunt him this year. His comments to the Globe last year blaming Boston's "liberalism" for the Catholic church sex abuse crisis has also hurt him in some swing communities, analysts said, but Santorum has not toned down his demeanor.

"With Santorum, there's no warm. It's hot or cold with him," said Jon Delano , a political scientist at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh. Added Whitehead: "He's gone from talking to his base to yelling at his base. He's not talking to any swing voters."

Senator George Allen , too, is facing a tough fight for reelection. The cowboy-boot-wearing Allen, with his penchant for Confederate memorabilia, has been a mainstay of the GOP's conservative base. But a series of gaffes this year have damaged him.

Since then, Allen has softened his demeanor somewhat, noting in a CNN interview that his recently discovered Jewish heritage has reinforced his commitment to equality. "I have been a leader for fighting against anti-Semitism and intolerance, but now it's personal," Allen said.

In Montana, Senator Conrad Burns is in an uphill fight against Democrat Jon Tester. Burns -- who once referred to Arabs as "ragheads" -- this year called his house painter "a nice little Guatemalan man," and said the United States is under threat from terrorists who "drive taxi cabs in the daytime and kill at night," prompting criticism from Muslims.

Howard Reiter , a political science professor at the University of Connecticut, said female voters especially are being turned off this year by the tough-talking Republicans, accounting for a substantial gender gap in some close races.

And the mere fact that Republicans have controlled both chambers of Congress and the White House for most of the last six years has made voters less patient with the politicians' style, Delano said. What sounded like confidence and decisiveness in past campaigns now seems arrogant, he said.

"I think people are tired of division and partisan politics," Delano said. "And because Republicans are running the show, they bear the brunt of the blame, fairly or not."

Democrats Push To Counter G.O.P. In Turnout Race (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0088233

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

VINITA PARK, Mo., Oct. 28 — Democrats are pushing into high gear this weekend a sharply expanded campaign to get their voters to the polls, even as some party leaders expressed anxiety that Republicans would again out-organize them in the approximately 20 House and 3 Senate races that both sides agree will determine the outcome of the midterm elections.

After two national elections in which Republicans' sophisticated get-out-the-vote operation helped them triumph over their opponents, Democrats have invested heavily in catching up.

The success of that effort could be crucial to their hopes on Nov. 7. Notwithstanding polls that show broad Democratic strength, control of Congress appears to rest on a relatively few races in which the candidates are separated by razor-thin margins. Those are precisely the kinds of races where turnout efforts can make a difference, and the Republicans' track record on getting their supporters to the polls in districts they focus on is a primary reason that the White House continues to express confidence that it can at least limit Democratic gains this year.

Howard Dean, the Democratic national chairman, said Friday that he was confident that a swell of enthusiasm among Democratic voters, combined with what he characterized as despondency among Republicans, would push Democrats to victory, an assessment that even some Republican strategists said they shared. But in an interview, Mr. Dean said that Republicans continued to have a clear superiority in identifying voters they can persuade to vote for their candidates and then getting them to cast ballots.

"I think we've closed the gap, but I don't think we are there yet," Mr. Dean said. "It's going to take some time. I think we could match them in 2008, if everything goes right, in voter turnout."

Other Democratic leaders disputed Mr. Dean's view, saying they were increasingly confident about their party's ability to achieve parity, and perhaps regain its dominance, against the Republican get-out-the-vote machinery. Democrats pointed to evidence of what the party's $35 million in spending on turnout programs, nearly matching Republicans, has given them in tight races like the Senate campaign here in Missouri, where Senator Jim Talent, a Republican, won office in 2002 by just 21,000 votes.

But Democratic Party leaders acknowledged structural shortcomings that could continue to give Republicans the advantage. Republicans have spent the past three years building a detailed national database of voters, including their voting history and consumer data that the party has used to predict their political leanings and identify the issues that most motivate them. The Democrats' voter list is not as expansive or comprehensive, though Mr. Dean said he hoped that would be repaired by the next presidential election

And while Republicans have centralized their turnout operation under the Republican National Committee, Democrats have been forced to maneuver within a fractured system involving a series of different committees and private groups, sometimes working at cross purposes, from district to district across the country.

"These other groups are calling: stem cell research, labor unions," said Charlene Zeni Connolly, 57, a retired teacher who was making calls near here recently on behalf of Claire McCaskill, the Democratic candidate for Senate. "People are getting really irritated. They are saying, 'If you call again, I won't vote for her.' "

For all that, evidence of newfound Democratic attention to getting out the vote, an area of politics where the party once dominated, was on display here and in other parts of the country this week as turnout operations, many in the making for nearly two years, began to unfold their final 10-day plans.

For two cold and rainy hours the other night, Brendan Fahey, 27, a two-time Iraq war veteran, led a team of three Democratic workers on a door-knocking mission through a trim, middle-class neighborhood of two-family brick homes in this city northwest of St. Louis. They careened from house to house — holding street maps and a computer-generated list of likely supporters gleaned from two years of market research, telephone calls and earlier visits — as they executed the final stages of a plan began when Democratic Party strategists opened offices here 15 months ago.

In Florida, the campaign of Ron Klein, a Democrat challenging Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr., a Republican, made a final telephone canvass of voters who live in the state but spend the summers elsewhere, typically thousands of miles outside Mr. Shaw's district in Southern Florida, to make sure they were returning to their winter homes by Election Day or had voted by absentee ballot. As part of the "Snowbird Program," the Klein campaign said it had tracked down the Northern addresses and telephone numbers of thousands of Democratic and independent voters in anticipation of this week.

Through it all, Republicans have shown no sign of backing off, matching Democrats door for door and telephone for telephone.

"Do you want a lawn sign?" Tom Applewhite, 20, a St. Louis University student working for Mr. Talent, asked a woman who answered a door near here after she promised that she would indeed vote for Mr. Talent.

DOJ_NMG_0088234

Mr. Applewhite, who had guided a squad of Republican volunteers for a relatively early afternoon tour to avoid the misstep of upsetting St. Louis Cardinals fans by banging on the door in the middle of the World Series games, went to his red Chevrolet pickup and returned with a "Talent for Senate" sign.

On Saturday, while in Indiana, Mr. Bush held a conference call with 300 Republican activists from around the country, to fire them up going into the final week, said Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman.

The emphasis on this fundamental element of campaigns came as the two parties made final, frenetic decisions about where to put advertising money and other resources, with Democrats trying to expand the playing field and Republicans building defenses around what they hope will be enough House and Senate seats to cling to control of Congress. Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to win the House, a prospect of which they are increasingly confident, while facing the tougher task of winning 6 seats to capture the Senate.

Emboldened by polls showing rising public unhappiness with Republicans, Democrats tried to open new fronts in some unlikely places, including Kansas, where Nancy Boyda, a Democrat, is challenging Representative Jim Ryun, who is seeking a sixth term. The race is so overlooked nationally that some Democratic officials in Washington joked they would not have been able to name the Democratic challenger before this week.

Republicans said they saw no evidence that Mr. Ryun was in trouble and suggested that Democrats were trying to rattle them. Still, the Republican Party began running advertisements to defend five more incumbents, in states including Colorado and New York, who are showing signs of slipping. And President Bush on Saturday began another series of swings into what had been solidly Republican territory to help generate more enthusiasm and raise money to help pay for the late advertising and voter turnout push.

In his assessment of his party's get-out-the-vote apparatus, Mr. Dean said he thought Republicans did have an advantage by running a centralized operation. He said that after the election he intended to call the leaders of the House and Senate Democratic committees "to try to build a relationship the way the Republicans do it."

He added, "I don't admire anything that Republicans have done to this country, but I greatly admire their election model, and that's what we intend to build, if not surpass, by 2008."

Mr. Dean's assessment that Democrats are still being outpaced by Republicans stood in contrast to the views offered by leaders of the House and Senate Democratic committee, some of whom have clashed with Mr. Dean about basic party-building strategies this year.

"We believe we are now equal to them," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is heading his party's campaign to take back the Senate. Referring to the Republican triumph in 2004, Mr. Schumer said: "We saw what they did and we said we can't be caught again that way. From the outset, we put a very large effort into this."

Karin Johanson, the executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that given the efforts of her committee and labor unions, "I think we are in very good shape right now."

Republicans said they noted, with concern but not surprise, that Democrats had taken lessons from them. "Democrats are smart, and they have learned from what we are doing," said Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee. "But I certainly think we learned a lot from what they did in 1998 and 2000."

Still, Republicans are hardly sanguine going into this election storm, even with the backstop of a get-out-the-vote operation.

Some party strategists, speaking on the condition of anonymity in offering a critique of their own operation, said they were worried that the Republican demoralization would sap some of the energy from the program, discouraging the final-weekend surge of volunteers that they found during happier campaigns. By contrast, Democrats are getting help this year in recruiting volunteers from an arena that has more often taunted Democratic officialdom, bloggers and groups like the A.F.L.-C.I.O. and MoveOn.org, which has started sophisticated Internet-based turnout operations that rival what even some party committees are doing.

"We're in about 40 districts right now," said Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org. Mr. Pariser said his group had trained 70,000 people to use its Web-based program to call prospective Democratic voters on lists that MoveOn.org had assembled.

The two parties are planning to spend around $70 million on turnout operations, according to interviews, and in the process, they are expanding the very nature of what voter turnout means.

Republicans are using their phone callers not only to find supporters but also to push Republican lines of attacks, calculated to reflect the messages these same voters are presumably seeing in television advertisements or by watching Mr. Bush on the news. In recent days, Republicans working telephone banks were instructed to say that a Republican victory was crucial to holding down taxes and protecting the nation's security, the two messages that have proved particularly effective with Republican base voters.

DOJ_NMG_0088235

Democrats, who have dutifully studied Republican successes in 2002 and 2004, have used consumer, demographic and polling data to predict the political leanings of infrequent voters. Here in Missouri, for example, canvassers are more likely to talk to single women about health care.

Because of Mr. Talent's narrow victory last time, Republicans and Democrats landed here hard and early this campaign, and both sides think that is what will make the difference in a race that could well determine which party controls the Senate next year.

"They are proud of their turnout operation," Ms. McCaskill said. "They think they have a machine-like operation in the Republican Party. They are just pouring money into it."

As Elections Near, Dueling With Dollars (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Party Operatives Try To Influence Races

John Lapp, a 35-year-old Democratic strategist in charge of spending $60 million to defeat Republicans, had reason to feel aggressive. Internal party polls late last week showed 30 GOP House incumbents tied or behind. Armed with that information, Lapp approved a series of television ads attacking Rep. Jim Ryun, a Republican from a conservative corner of Kansas who suddenly looked a lot more vulnerable than before.

A few blocks away on Capitol Hill, Carl Forti, with a similar budget to protect the GOP majority, was playing defense. His own polls showed a growing number of House Republicans in serious trouble. Forti, 34, had little choice but to buy ads to protect suddenly at-risk Reps. Charles Bass (N.H.) and John R. "Randy" Kuhl Jr. (N.Y.).

Lapp and Forti make dozens of decisions like these every day, and the outcomes will only grow in importance during this final full week of the 2006 campaign. Betting right could well decide who controls the House after the Nov. 7 midterm elections, and by how many seats, according to strategists in both parties.

Forti and Lapp run the independent expenditure arms of their parties' campaign committees, the place where many of the negative ads that voters are seeing are financed, produced and strategically placed on television stations across the country. In the final days of the campaign, they will easily outspend the candidates themselves in many of the most competitive House races. They will decide the final images that many voters see in this campaign. Warning for the fainthearted: Most of the ads will be dark and accusatory.

One bad call could make or break a House race, officials in both parties said. There is no precise formula for determining the smartest choices. There are only polls, historical trends, anecdotal evidence and instinct, all of which can be flawed. Operatives in both parties described the process by which these decisions are made, in most cases on the condition that they not be quoted by name.

At the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, where Lapp works, officials are more confident than ever that they will gain a minimum of 18 seats, three more than they need for a majority, and possibly more than 40 if they catch a bunch of breaks in the remaining nine days. Expectations have evolved from simply winning a majority to setting the stage for a blowout.

The committee recently commissioned polls in almost 20 "bubble districts" that once looked difficult to win but now appear within reach. These include the open seat in Nevada's 2nd District and the one held by Rep. Gil Gutkneckt (R-Minn.). Lapp's team has polls showing Democrats close in all the races.

Over at the National Republican Congressional Committee, where Forti operates, officials said they see the situation as less bleak than they did a few weeks ago, immediately after the Mark Foley page scandal broke.

Based on polling, Republican strategists say a half-dozen seats, including open seats in Colorado, Arizona and Ohio, appear unwinnable. Six other races, including one for the seat held by Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), are looking dire but not hopeless.

Most worrisome, GOP strategists say, is that 20 or more additional Republican incumbents are essentially tied or holding very small leads -- a danger zone for a sitting member of Congress in a tough political environment. This has left Forti and colleagues in survival mode.

A look at recent expenditures by the NRCC reveals the wide range of seats Forti must find a way to win. In a two-day period last week, the committee paid for polls in 14 races. Ten of those surveys were in districts of Republican incumbents, including previously safe seats such as that of Rep. Mark Edward Souder in Indiana.

It is Forti's job to decide whom the NRCC can save.

Under campaign law, the independent organizations are prohibited from coordinating with candidates they assist. There are limits to the discussions Forti and Lapp can have with even their bosses, as well as with other staffers on campaign committees. This leaves both with enormous power.

DOJ_NMG_0088236

Forti ran the NRCC's independent expenditure effort in the previous two election cycles. He maintains a spartan staff, relying on his own campaign know-how as well as the legal guidance of NRCC general counsel Don McGahn.

At the White House, such strategists as Karl Rove have boasted publicly that Republicans' superior program for turning out voters -- which exceeded expectations in 2002 and 2004 -- will work again to save them from defeat Nov. 7. But a senior Republican operative involved in party planning said the GOP's turnout operation can usually make a decisive difference only in races decided by about one percentage point. Moreover, the operative said, it is difficult to set up turnout operations during the homestretch of races that Republicans previously did not expect to be so competitive, such as Souder's. "It is easier to move financial resources than human resources," the operative said.

So Forti is moving the financial resources around to improve his odds, sometimes for reasons that are not obvious to outsiders. (He declined to comment on party strategy.)

The NRCC, for instance, is spending money to win the open seat vacated by Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), who has been indicted, and to defend Rep. John N. Hostettler (Ind.), despite what polls and operatives suggest are fading prospects for victory in both races. "It forces them to spend money," said a GOP strategist familiar with endgame planning.

Most of the time, spending is a more straightforward investment in self-preservation. Republicans late last week started running ads to defend Bass and have already spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to protect Rep. Richard W. Pombo (Calif.). Democrats have bought television time in both districts.

"If they go anywhere, we will just follow them in," the GOP strategist said. Republicans on Capitol Hill are more concerned about Pombo than Bass.

The calculations change by the day. Republicans had all but written off Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.) a few weeks ago after Democrats ran ads highlighting allegations from his former mistress that he had tried to strangle her. But GOP polling now shows the race tightening after an appearance by President Bush increased to 70 percent from 50 percent the percentage of conservatives who said they were excited about turning out to vote for the incumbent. Democrats said their polls still show Sherwood being clobbered.

"Republicans are playing a game of whack-a-mole while we are expanding the number of races in play by the day," Lapp said.

Lapp -- who was picked for the job after a three-minute first-time meeting with DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) in 2004 -- has slowly expanded the number of seats Democrats are targeting, but not as broadly and quickly as some strategists would like. Lapp runs a much larger operation than Forti; it includes a personal team of opposition researchers. He is called a "maniac, but in a good way," by Bill Burton, a longtime DCCC colleague.

Lapp, like Forti, lives on polling these days. He reviews a half-dozen new polls each day and can turn data into an on-air ad within 24 hours.

But there is more to smart spending than voter surveys.

In Washington's 5th District, Lapp is running ads hitting freshman Rep. Cathy McMorris despite the strong Republican tilt of the district. That's because ad time in the Spokane media market, which covers almost the entire district, is relatively inexpensive, allowing the DCCC to fund a week of ads for just over $300,000. It is a cheap bet, even for a long shot.

But Lapp is not running ads against Rep. Jean Schmidt (Ohio) who, despite woeful reelection numbers, benefits from the high price of television time in the Cincinnati market. This decision could save Schmidt's job, strategists in both parties say.

The DCCC is set to launch an ad against Rep. Ron Lewis in Kentucky's 2nd District with what one operative described as "guilt money," after committee officials played a major role in persuading state Rep. Mike Weaver to challenge the incumbent.

Lapp also plays mind games. Because both parties have a staff member who monitors potential ad buys, Lapp will spend time calling television stations to inquire about ad buys he never plans to make -- just to confuse or intimidate Republicans.

Most times, the calls are for real. Take Illinois' 6th District, where Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth (D) is running low on cash in her race against state Sen. Peter Roskam. The DCCC recently stepped in, raising its commitment to $2.7 million in the costly Chicago media market in hopes of keeping her chances alive in the last week.

Howard Wolfson, who sat in Lapp's chair during the 2002 election cycle, said knowing where to spend and, as important, where not to spend is by far the most difficult part of the job.

"Where Republicans choose to defend and where Democrats choose to attack are critically important," he said.

Research database editor Derek Willis contributed to this report.

Can Bush Cross The Aisle? (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088237

With all the parsing that was needed to make sense of President Bush's convoluted explanations of his Iraq policies during last week's lengthy news conference, it's not surprising that another question -- on another topic -- received little notice.

It was, in the president's judgment, "a tricky little question" that Stephen Dinan of the Washington Times asked -- one that seemingly caught him by surprise.

"With a Republican Congress," Dinan said, "you failed to achieve three major goals of your second term: Social Security reform, a tax code overhaul and a comprehensive immigration bill. Why shouldn't Americans give Democrats a chance to work with you on those issues, especially when divided government seemed to work in the late 1990s on the budget?"

When the president recovered from his surprise at the question from the conservative newspaper's correspondent, he went into his familiar, assertive, told-you-so mode. "First," he said, "I haven't given up on any of those issues. I've got two years left to achieve them. And I firmly believe it is more likely to achieve those three objectives with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate. And I believe I'll be working with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate."

Bush went on for four paragraphs spelling out his belief that Republicans would defy the pollsters and pundits and win the Nov. 7 election, segued into a rap about the joys of electioneering and wound up by telling the questioner, "Anyway, thanks for asking about the campaign."

At no point did he venture within six feet of the original question -- and it's not hard to see why. He's not yet ready to think of Democrats except as opponents.

But the premise of Dinan's question is historically correct. It was the combination of a Democratic president, Bill Clinton, and the Republican Congress elected in 1994 that finally got a grip on budget deficits and produced the only balanced budgets of modern times.

It was not a smooth or easy process; indeed, in 1995, the first year after the Republican takeover of the House and Senate, the budget negotiations collapsed and government shut down for a few days amid bitter partisan recrimination.

But both sides were chastened by the experience. When Clinton was reelected with a Republican Congress in 1996, he and House Speaker Newt Gingrich cut the deal the next year that moved the budget out of the red for the first time in 29 years.

They discussed a similar fix for Social Security, using some of the new surplus to ease transition costs to a reformed system. But then Monica happened, and all bets were off.

What are the chances that divided government could also be productive in the final two years of the Bush presidency? Better than might be imagined -- especially given the president's agenda.

Comprehensive immigration reform? The bill embodying most of what the president wanted was co-sponsored by Republican John McCain and Democrat Ted Kennedy. On the vote for passage, Democrats were 38 to 4 in favor, Republicans 32 to 23 against. Clearly, the president's best allies on immigration are on the Democratic side.

Tax reform? Well, the last major successful reform of the code took place in 1986, when Republicans controlled the White House and the Senate and Democrats held the House. Instrumental in its passage was Democrat Bill Bradley, then a senator from New Jersey. Last week Bradley was back in Washington to support another Democratic senator, Ron Wyden of Oregon, who offered an open invitation to Bush to join in moving forward a long-overdue cleanup of the tax code.

Social Security reform, the third of the president's objectives, will be politically difficult no matter which party controls Congress. For most Democrats, the president's proposal to carve out room for individually owned accounts is a nonstarter. But if Bush is willing to do what his ally, Sen. Bob Bennett of Utah, suggested long ago and postpone private accounts until steps are taken to solve the system's long-term fiscal problems, he may find the Democrats ready to listen to his other ideas for reform.

None of this would be easy, and all of it would require a new willingness on Bush's part to open himself to genuine negotiations with the next Congress. But the rewards for the country could be very large.

davidbroder@washpost.com

Poll Puts Maryland Democrats In The Lead (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Matthew Mosk, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Races Are Much Closer, GOP Candidates Say

A strong Democratic tide in Maryland threatens to swamp Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s reelection bid and bolsters the party's efforts to retain control of an important U.S. Senate seat, according to a new Washington Post poll.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) held a 10 percentage point lead over Ehrlich, and Democratic Senate nominee Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin had a similar advantage over Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele among likely voters in the Post poll, which was conducted last Sunday through Thursday. The leads were well beyond the survey's three percentage point margin of error.

DOJ_NMG_0088238

The poll of 1,000 voters showed that the state's overwhelmingly Democratic electorate is highly disturbed about national issues -- extremely critical of President Bush, more upset about the war in Iraq than voters in the rest of the country and eager to shift power in Washington from the Republican Party.

Those strong feelings are a heavy weight for Ehrlich and Steele, who four years ago claimed the state's top offices for the GOP for the first time in nearly 40 years and have tried to foster a Republican resurgence in the state.

Steele, whose campaign to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D) has sought to play down his past Republican activism and project an independent image, doesn't do much better in the poll with Democratic voters than Republicans who have gone before him. His appeal to fellow African Americans has not swayed that group.

In the governor's race, those surveyed did not seem to view the contest as a referendum on Ehrlich, unlike most reelection campaigns. A majority of voters had a favorable opinion of the governor and said they believe he has done a good job. Nevertheless, one in five of those who approved of Ehrlich's performance as governor said they would vote for O'Malley.

Ehrlich's support among Democrats was half of what exit polls showed it to be four years ago, and voters who described themselves as political moderates returned to the Democratic fold, the poll showed.

The Republican candidates disputed the poll, saying it was too different from recent polls that they had seen that showed the races much closer.

"It is a dead heat, and Michael Steele is gaining ground every day," said Doug Heye, Steele's campaign spokesman.

Ehrlich's campaign was especially dismissive of the findings.

"It is simply unrealistic to think that a governor with approval ratings as high as this, who has provided record education funding and cut crime around the state is losing by 10 points to the mayor of the deadliest city in the country," said Bo Harmon, Ehrlich's campaign manager.

Harmon also called the poll's demographics "wildly skewed" since the results reflected few undecided voters. Nearly all the likely voters gave their opinion on how they would cast their ballots if the election were held the day they were interviewed. In a follow-up question, about 15 percent of each candidate's supporters said there was a chance they could change their minds by Election Day.

The poll is not a prediction of Election Day but a portrait of the Maryland political landscape completed 12 days before voters go to the polls. Last-minute developments, campaign spending, get-out-the-vote efforts and enthusiasm for the candidates all could affect the final results.

Especially important will be the African American turnout, which heavily favors Democrats. Blacks make up 28 percent of Maryland's adult population and 25 percent of likely voters in the poll, but some strategists wonder whether the actual turnout will be that high.Invading Ehrlich Territory

Ehrlich's hopes rest with voters such as Patrick Aldrich, a 39-year-old account manager from Owings Mills in Baltimore County.

"I just find his manner down-to-earth and real. He's not the typical politician," Aldrich said last week, as his 2-year-old son squawked in the background. "His views are things that I agree with."

White, male, parent, in a suburb distant from Washington -- Aldrich represents the kind of voter with whom Ehrlich connected four years ago when he defeated then-Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend (D).

But O'Malley, whom the poll shows leading 55 to 45 percent, has cut into Ehrlich's support among such voters and draws strong allegiance from groups that have traditionally supported Democrats but that strayed four years ago.

"These results show that Marylanders want new ideas to help their families, not more dirty tricks and misleading attack ads from a desperate politician," said Hari Sevugen, O'Malley's communications director. "They want a governor who will fight for Maryland families, not one who will fight for the special interests and George Bush."

O'Malley retains support in the overwhelmingly Democratic Washington suburbs, and he also cuts into Ehrlich's previous strongholds in the counties surrounding Baltimore, according to the poll. O'Malley has a 26 percentage point advantage among women, who narrowly supported Townsend four years ago. Many of those who described themselves as moderates abandoned the Democrats in 2002; O'Malley has a 15 percentage point advantage among moderates in the current poll.

The poll continued to show Ehrlich with relatively high favorability ratings and job approval numbers, and unlike in a Post poll in June, a majority of Marylanders now believe that the state is headed in the right direction.

Respondents were just as likely to describe O'Malley as honest, a strong leader and someone with a vision for the state's future. Voters also said they thought O'Malley would do as well as Ehrlich confronting the issues of crime, taxes and the state economy and gave him a slight advantage on the issue they said was most important for the next governor: public education.

O'Malley was seen as more likely to understand "the problems of people like you" and had a nearly 2 to 1 advantage on "working effectively with the state legislature."

DOJ_NMG_0088239

Ehrlich has bombarded the state with ads that skewer O'Malley's leadership of Baltimore, blaming him for the city's failing schools and high crime rate. But voters' views of how things are going in Baltimore did not change from the Post poll in June, and of those who said O'Malley had changed the city, 44 percent said it was for the better, as opposed to 9 percent who said he'd made things there worse.

Just as then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening's unpopularity at the end of his tenure hindered Townsend four years ago, Ehrlich seems to suffer from the national political climate. Although 75 percent of the voters said Bush would not be a factor in the governor's race, nearly 20 percent said one reason for their vote for governor would be to express opposition to Bush.

Henry Evans, 60, a postal carrier from Prince George's County, said he has no problem with the way Ehrlich has done his job but is backing O'Malley. "My reason is that Governor Ehrlich has supported the president and what's going on in Iraq," Evans said. "I'm against that."Factoring In Bush

The issue is more pronounced in the Senate race, where nearly one in three voters in the poll said their opposition to Bush would be a factor.

Nearly six in 10 likely voters said they "strongly" believe the war in Iraq was not worth fighting, far higher than other Americans, according to a Washington Post-ABC poll this month, and 53 percent of Marylanders polled said it would be a good thing if control of Congress switched from Republican to Democrat, as opposed to 21 percent who said it would be a bad thing.

National GOP leaders have invested more than $1 million in Steele's campaign, in part because they view his effort as a critical first step in any broader attempt to break the virtual lock on the African American vote that Democrats have held.

Steele has tried to present himself as a different kind of candidate with his out-of-the-box campaign advertisements, criticisms of both political parties and such high-profile supporters as hip-hop recording mogul Russell Simmons and Cathy L. Hughes, the Radio One founder and chairwoman.

But Democrats have sought to link Steele with Bush -- who has a 6 percent approval rating among African Americans surveyed. Steele has support from 14 percent of black voters, not significantly higher than the support Ehrlich is receiving, the poll shows. Overall, Cardin leads Steele 54 to 43 percent, with independent candidate Kevin Zeese receiving 1 percent of the vote.

"Michael Steele's problem is that . . . he's a Republican at the absolute worst time in the world for a politician to be a Republican," said David Bositis, an expert on black voting patterns at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies.

Steele's spokesman Heye disagreed: "Michael Steele's message is resonating with African American voters. . . . His message of opportunity, hope and bringing change to Washington has resonated and is continuing to resonate with African American voters."

But Kenneth Kirby, 52, a former airline worker from Annapolis who is black, said he supports Cardin because he's a loyal Democrat. He said he stopped considering Steele "after I learned he was, essentially, a Bush appointee."

Steele gets more than 90 percent of the Republican vote and leads among independents, but, like Ehrlich, he has made little headway among the half of the voters who identify themselves as Democrats. Statewide, 55 percent of voters are registered as Democrats.

Cardin has maintained strong support in spite of projecting a somewhat bland persona during much of the campaign. Likely voters said they consider him the more honest and trustworthy of the two and the one more likely to share their values.

"Michael Steele's attempts to hide his support for the Bush agenda have failed," said Oren Shur, Cardin's spokesman.

But one aspect of Steele's folksy television ads has resonated with voters: He is considered by twice as many voters to have the more appealing personality.Closing the Gap

The poll's depiction of where the race stood between last Sunday and Thursday presents a hefty burden for the two Republican candidates, said Paul S. Herrnson, a political science professor at the University of Maryland, College Park.

"It's really hard for a candidate to close a double-digit lead in two weeks, particularly if the candidates are already very well known," Herrnson said.

Still, some variables could change the dynamics during the closing weeks. The biggest is turnout. The two Republicans could close the gap if fear about the validity of the state's voting system depresses turnout, or if African Americans -- the most Democratic of voting groups -- aren't enthusiastic about the race.

The Post poll showed that based upon answers to questions such as certainty to vote, enthusiasm about the candidates and interest in the races, about 25 percent of the "likely voters" would be African American.

That is numerically higher than past exit polls have shown: In the past seven elections for president, Senate and governor, the estimate of black voters ranged from 19 percent to 24 percent. But even if the black turnout is as low as it was in the 2002 election -- 22 percent, according to exit polls -- Cardin and O'Malley would still hold leads, although they would be narrower.

DOJ_NMG_0088240

Another factor is the financial advantage Ehrlich apparently holds, according to the most recent financial statements the gubernatorial candidates have submitted. As of last week, O'Malley had $600,000, and Ehrlich had more than $2 million left to spend during the campaign's closing days.

And one sign of the Ehrlich campaign's get-out-the-vote effort is the record number of absentee ballots that have been requested. Almost as many have been requested by Republicans as Democrats, despite the huge registration differences.

Polling director Jon Cohen and database editor Dan Keating contributed to this report.

Steele Hits Cardin For Paying Lip Service To Black Voters (WT)

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele yesterday made an unscheduled appearance at the NAACP state convention and criticized Democratic U.S. Senate nominee Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin for paying only lip service to black voters.

"I'm tired of listening to leadership that fails to deliver," Mr. Steele, Republican nominee for senator, said after Mr. Cardin listed statistics showing inequalities for blacks, including their elevated high school dropout rate.

"I'm tired of hearing people quote statistics of our communities and over the 20 years that they have served in Congress have done nothing," said Mr. Steele, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland. "I'm tired of leadership that fails to lead, but blames and name calls and points fingers."

Mr. Cardin, a 10-term congressman, later told The Washington Times the criticism would not stick to his campaign. "My record speaks for itself," he said.

Mr. Cardin told the leaders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People that returning a Democrat to Maryland's Senate seat would help the party take control of the chamber and challenge President Bush's policies.

"Mr. Steele does not like to be identified with George Bush, but he was recruited by George Bush," he said. "He brought George Bush into Maryland for fundraising. He agrees with George Bush's agenda."

Mr. Steele had not been scheduled to participate in the forum, but he decided to after Mr. Cardin skipped a debate Thursday sponsored by the NAACP branch in Charles County.

Mr. Cardin has been criticized for missing the debate because the move might have offended black Southern Maryland voters, and also for stumbling and stammering through a televised debate Wednesday. Their next scheduled -- and perhaps final -- debate before the Nov. 7 election takes place this morning on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Mr. Steele blasted Mr. Cardin for helping gut the state teacher pension system as House speaker of the General Assembly, voting in Congress against prison-sentencing reform and failing to address school problems in his congressional district.

"I've spent an academic year taking school buses, taking classes and teaching classes in our public school system," Mr. Steele said. "Mr. Cardin, have you visited Frederick Douglas High School, have you been to Carver High School, have you been to Fairmont Heights High School in Prince George's County? We've missed you, sir."

Green Party nominee Kevin B. Zeese and write-in candidate Lee Young also participated in the 45-minute forum. Each candidate gave an opening statement and had one minute to respond to questions from the audience.

Black voters could decide the election. They account for about 40 percent of Democratic voters in Maryland, where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans nearly 2-to-1. Mr. Cardin has struggled to woo black voters amid criticism that the state Democratic Party blocked the candidacy of former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume, who narrowly lost the primary despite Mr. Cardin spending about $3 million more on his campaign. Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black voters has helped make his party competitive in the state for the first time in a generation.

Candidates from other Maryland races also spoke at the forum, including Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican seeking re-election, and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic challenger.

O'Malley Assails Ehrlich On Race (WP)

By John Wagner, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley accused Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. yesterday of using racially "coded, charged language" when talking about Baltimore's schoolchildren and accused the Republican incumbent of pursuing policies unfriendly to African Americans.

The broadside by the Democratic challenger came during a candidate forum sponsored by the NAACP in Baltimore that also drew contenders in the U.S. Senate race and other contests.

DOJ_NMG_0088241

Ehrlich, who entered the room after O'Malley had finished speaking, offered no direct response from the podium, instead listing the African Americans he has appointed to key positions and the programs he has supported. Afterward, he called the mayor "uniformly negative."

The pointed remarks underscored the importance of black voters in an election nine days away.

O'Malley hammered the governor for his past assertion that "multiculturalism is bunk," accused him of working to strip the NAACP of its tax-exempt status and said Ehrlich has been "talking out of both sides of his mouth" about Baltimore's arrest policies -- delivering different messages to white and black audiences.

"Our current governor of Maryland declares over and over and over again that multiculturalism is bunk, that history has shown that a multicultural people can never thrive and survive," O'Malley said. "Obviously, the governor does not come to Baltimore City very often. We are a multicultural city in a multicultural state in the strongest and greatest multicultural nation ever created on God's multicultural planet."

Ehrlich took a very different tack minutes later when he took the stage, by which time O'Malley had left for a funeral. Ehrlich ran through a list of 15 African Americans, starting with Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, whom he has appointed in the past four years.

He followed that with a list of such initiatives as construction projects at historically black colleges and universities, changes to minority business contracting rules and the renaming of Baltimore-Washington International Airport to honor Thurgood Marshall.

"And we have more to do, and thank you for your attention," he concluded, then walked off stage.

Asked later what he thought of O'Malley's message, Ehrlich said: "He's uniformly negative. I just got up and talked about the successes of our administration."

Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver said O'Malley was "trying to create a division that doesn't exist between Governor Ehrlich and Maryland's black voters."

Marvin "Doc" Cheatham, president of the Baltimore NAACP, bemoaned the animosity between the candidates.

"The mayor and the governor have both failed us and our children because they have not come together," he said in an interview. "They need to set aside the politics."

Exchanges between the Senate candidates, who shared the stage, also grew testy at times.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D) argued that Steele would do President Bush's bidding. Steele (R) responded that Cardin's long tenure in politics has left him out of touch.

Cardin said their biggest policy difference was on the Iraq war. "I opposed the war in Iraq four years ago," Cardin said. "Michael Steele to this day believes it's the right thing to do."

Steele later said that a lack of international involvement in Iraq had made it "a mess" and cautioned against pulling out too soon. "We need to focus on bringing our troops home but be mindful of the Iraq that we leave behind," he said.

O'Malley's remarks came after Ehrlich has spent months airing ads about Baltimore's low-performing schools. O'Malley has expressed frustration with the tactic, noting that scores are improving, particularly in younger grades. Yesterday's remarks were his most spirited thus far.

"Why is he spending so much money belittling the progress of our people, talking in coded, charged language about those city kids and those city schools, as if the children of our city are not blessed with the same brains that God has given the children in every part of our state?" O'Malley asked.

O'Malley also brought up a 2001 letter that Ehrlich, then a congressman, sent to the IRS asking the agency to follow up on a request for an investigation of the NAACP's tax-exempt status. Ehrlich's fundraising chief, Richard E. Hug, was among several Republicans who made the request.

"Rather than work to bridge the divide, he decided to use his wealthy and influential friends like Dick Hug to try to influence the IRS to shut down the NAACP," O'Malley said yesterday.

The mayor criticized Ehrlich's veto of legislation increasing the minimum wage and said Ehrlich's record on promoting use of African American contractors is "abysmal" -- something Ehrlich aides strongly dispute.

For Zeese, Third-Party Campaign Is Not A Matter Of Odds (WP)

By William Wan, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

It was early in the morning, and already you could hear the edge creeping into Kevin Zeese's voice.

The night before was supposed to be the crowning moment for him, a chance to ignite his struggling campaign for U.S. Senate. The night before, he had finally pushed his way into a rare three-way debate in Baltimore.

DOJ_NMG_0088242

The next morning, however, he woke to find a sharp dose of reality waiting at his doorstep. Newspaper headlines recounted a heated debate between Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Democrat Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin. The front-page photo in The Washington Post, Zeese angrily pointed out, had cut him out of the picture entirely. His name wasn't mentioned until the 11th paragraph.

And so, he turned to his computer, as he often does in such moments, and began sending messages out into the Internet ether -- e-mails and postings expressing his frustration, anger and, most of all, his urge to fight the establishment.

It's a tough world for independent candidates such as Zeese, pleading for attention only to be treated as a crazy Quixote tilting at the windmills, rationing campaign funds that look like crumbs compared with your opponents', and dreading that pesky question that dogs you at every turn: Do you really expect to win?

But for this role, Zeese is uniquely qualified. He has spent his life fighting for the impossible.

For 26 years, he worked as a lawyer trying to legalize marijuana and end the war on drugs. In 2004, at a point when Ralph Nader's own Green Party refused to support him, Zeese signed up to become Nader's spokesman.

Now Zeese, 51, is running an uphill campaign of his own and looking to win, he insists. But can he?

That is missing the point entirely, his parents say. "With Kevin, it's always been a question of right and wrong," said his father, Charles, 74.

Born in Queens, N.Y., into a middle-class family, Zeese grew up as the stubborn son of a public school teacher and an intensive-care nurse. In elementary school, after a music teacher refused to acknowledge the accordion as a wind instrument, Zeese marched to the library and came back armed with books to prove his teacher wrong.

"We were called to school a lot," said his mother, Barbara, 74.

His father tells this story: When Zeese was about 9, he took his younger brother's most valuable baseball card and tore it apart. "He was always pushing his siblings to be better, and he told Mark, 'You'll never be known or famous collecting baseball cards. You have to do something more important.' "

Zeese has spent his entire life looking for that something. "I tend to take on tough causes," he said. "If it's easy, it's not worth doing, because someone else will do it."

For years he was a registered Democrat. But in 1996, disillusioned with President Bill Clinton, Zeese cast a vote for Libertarian Harry Browne.

In 2000, he voted absentee for Nader, then rushed to Michigan to campaign for Vice President and Democratic candidate Al Gore -- a mistake he swears he will never repeat: "I wasn't fully committed. I was hedging my bets, falling into the trap of lesser evilism."

When he finally committed, Zeese discovered the ultimate windmill: an uphill struggle with high stakes, fierce arguments and issues clearly divided, at least in his eyes, between right and wrong.

Last year, he courted and united several parties, becoming, according to his campaign, the first candidate in U.S. history to represent the Libertarians, Greens and Populists. The alliance is crucial, Zeese said, for him to have any prayer at electability.

Even now, however, the numbers suggest that may be a difficult, perhaps impossible, goal.

It's hard to measure Zeese's support. (He is rarely included in polls and earned less than the margin of error in the most recent.) The voter registration numbers look just as bad. Democrats make up 55 percent of Maryland's voters; Republicans about 29 percent. Altogether, the Greens, Libertarians and Populists make up less than half of a percent. Even adding in every unaffiliated voter in Maryland, the total hovers around 14 percent.

To make matters worse, Zeese has raised about $70,000 -- a drop in the bucket compared to Steele and Cardin's millions.

So Zeese and his supporters have focused on gaining access to debates. A debate, after all, means free air time, guaranteed media presence and a chance to reach hundreds of thousands of voters.

Appearing on stage with Steele and Cardin would also give Zeese's candidacy an air of legitimacy, the appearance of equal footing. Without that come the questions: Isn't a vote for you a wasted vote? Isn't a vote for you a spoiler vote?

His answer: There is nothing to spoil. Zeese, who is liberal on many issues, calls Cardin and Steele equally bad choices. "People have grown up listening to a lie," he said. "The two parties give you a choice of A or B. But it's a false choice, because there's really a C."

So what does "C" represent?

For Zeese, it means addressing the "real issues," including the war in Iraq, the deepening gap between the wealthy and the poor and the need for a national health care plan.

But most of all, it means ending "corporate control of government." Corporate influence is the most common target of his tirades. It is also, scholars say, a pervasive theme among third parties, who see politics less about left and right and more as clean versus corrupt.

DOJ_NMG_0088243

Both of Zeese's opponents have acknowledged the problem of corporate influence. In television ads and speeches, Cardin and Steele have positioned themselves as outsiders -- independent from corporate influence (although both have accepted donations from corporate interests) and from their own parties (although Steele has served as state Republican chair and Cardin has voted largely with his party).

If voters could see all three of them side by side, Zeese reasoned, then they would see what a real independent looks like. If only he could get into a debate.

This month, in an old gothic Baltimore church, Zeese finally got his wish. He took to the stage with Steele, who had the polished look of a businessman, and Cardin, who was working his typically calm countenance into an angry scowl.

Zeese -- with his legs splayed and his hands running through his hair -- appeared more policy wonk than politician.

On Iraq, while Steele fumbled a vague response and Cardin talked about international efforts, Zeese called for an immediate withdrawal in four to six months. When Steele talked about empowering black entrepreneurs and Cardin opposed tax cuts, Zeese talked of making higher education free and overhauling the income tax system.

When the debate ended, Cardin was encircled by a crowd of reporters, almost crushing him. Others made a rush for Steele, who had slipped quietly out the back. Zeese's supporters tried hard to steer reporters toward him. One chatted with him briefly but left when he spotted Cardin. Another approached only to pose the spoiler question. Zeese, nonetheless, looked invigorated. "A slugfest, don't you think? Cardin hitting Steele. Steele hitting Cardin. Me hammering both."

The enthusiasm stayed with him through the night, as he drove back to Takoma Park in his hybrid car, and into the morning, when he picked up his newspaper and began to read with anger. By late morning, he decided an obvious winner had emerged. "It was such a clear, decisive victory," he said. "I don't think there's any question who won the debate last night. Do you?"

Researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

Webb Defends Novels Against Attacks (WP)

By Tim Craig And Michael D. Shear, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Allen Has Crossed a 'Line That Should Never Be Crossed,' Candidate Says

Virginia U.S. Senate candidate James Webb yesterday delivered his strongest criticism of incumbent Sen. George Allen of the fall campaign, vigorously defending himself against Allen's charges that he wrote sex-laced passages in his fiction novels.

He called on voters to reject what he called the "smear tactics" of Allen and his campaign, who released excerpts Thursday from Webb's novels to the Drudge Report Web site and said the writings were lurid and inappropriate for a man seeking to serve in the Senate.

"The fish rots from the head down," Webb (D) said, referring to his belief that Allen (R) is responsible for his campaign staff's tactics and has now shown his true character. "Our government should no longer be in the hands of a group of unprincipled, small-minded, power-hungry character assassins."

Allen, speaking to reporters near Richmond yesterday after winning the endorsement of the National Rifle Association's political action committee, said Webb's career as an author of fictional works was part of his record.

"My record as a United States senator is an open book. My opponent has a record as well," Allen told reporters. "He, in his advertisements, points out that he's an author, that he's a writer of books. That's part of his record. These passages in his books are part of his open record. I'll let the people of Virginia be the judge as to whose record they are more comfortable with."

Allen's attack is the latest twist in a nasty, close campaign that is central to the Democrats' hopes of retaking the Senate.

Webb, joined at a rally in Fairfax County by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) and former governor Mark R. Warner (D), said that the Allen campaign is belittling his life as a soldier and the service members who study his works. Kaine and Warner predicted that Allen's late campaign maneuver would backfire.

With some of the most forceful language he has used on the campaign trail, Webb said he was proud of his writing because it reflects the things he saw as a combat Marine in Vietnam and later as a journalist reporting on war-torn regions such as Beirut in the early 1980s.

The one-time boxer charged that Allen, the son of a former Washington Redskins head coach, has lived a life of privilege as a "a pampered public official." Allen, who did not serve in the military, was a college football player at the University of Virginia and spent one summer working on a ranch.

"When George Allen and his campaign take some small excerpts from my novels and not only criticizes them but uses them to question my ethics, my profession, my character, that is a line that should never be crossed," Webb said at Edgar Allen Poe Middle School in Annandale.

DOJ_NMG_0088244

"I have lived in the real world, and I have reported the real world in my writings. I started working when I was 12 years old, and I fought in a brutal war. I saw its ugliness while George Allen was hanging out at a dude ranch," Webb said at a get-out-the-vote rally attended by about 300 people.

Allen said he spent time at a "real ranch" in Winnemucca, Nev., well after the end of the Vietnam War.

On Friday, Webb, a former secretary of the Navy, said Allen's sister, Jennifer, wrote a book that included descriptions of her brother's harsh physical treatment of her. Allen said yesterday, "Her book is a novelization. . . . I didn't write those passages in my sister's book."

Kaine drew comparisons to his campaign last year against Republican Jerry W. Kilgore, who aired a TV ad saying Kaine opposed the death penalty even for people like Adolf Hitler. "It's the same kind of nonsense," Kaine said. The Republicans "never know when to stop. They always go over the top, and it always backfires."

Warner noted that Republican Sen. John McCain, an Allen supporter, has praised Webb's novels. "All they do is smear, smear, smear," Warner said of the Allen campaign.

Allen said he stood by his release of Webb's racy book passages, saying that they are an indication of what Webb will do.

"Not just me, but others find those passages to be demeaning to women," Allen said. Allen's campaign also has released a 1979 magazine article by Webb questioning women in combat and saying a Naval Academy dormitory was "a horny woman's dream."

Yesterday, House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith (R-Salem) called Webb's writings "disrespectful and demeaning." Del. Terrie Lynne Suit (R-Virginia Beach) said Webb's books were "not suitable for children and, frankly, many adults."

Webb has apologized for the magazine article, saying he used needlessly harsh language. But Webb made no apologies yesterday for his novels, among which are "Lost Soldiers," "Something to Die For," "A Sense of Honor" and "Fields of Fire."

Webb said yesterday that "Fields of Fire," a novel about the Vietnam War, has been on the Marine Corps reading list for 20 years and is the "most-taught piece of literature regarding the Vietnam War" on college campuses. He said that a "A Sense of Honor" is published by the U.S. Naval Institute, an independent organization that produces books about the military, and added that the book frequently is read by service members.

Interviews with voters yesterday suggested that Allen's attack may reinforce what people already think about Webb.

Donald L. Boswell, 55, director of law enforcement for the state Department of Motor Vehicles, said it was fair for Allen to criticize Webb's books. "He did freely choose to write," said Boswell, who was at the NRA event near Richmond. "I think holding him accountable for that is the same as holding Hollywood and the movie industry accountable for the movies they produce."

At Webb's rally in Annandale, Joan Brookshire said Allen was engaged in the "sleaziest campaigning. I now feel like knocking on every door in Virginia," said Brookshire, 75, of Alexandria. "Why would they use excerpts like this out of books that are classics?"

Also yesterday, Webb gave a Democratic response to President Bush's weekly radio address, saying he opposed the war before it began. A Democratic Congress, he predicted, would demand from Day One that Bush find "a real way forward in Iraq."

Allen traveled through the Shenandoah Valley before ending his day at the rally outside Richmond with the NRA.

Allen "is someone who Virginia gun owners and sportsmen know, like and trust," said Chuck Cunningham, the NRA's federal affairs director and chairman of Sportsmen for Allen. The NRA's political action committee has given an A rating to Webb and an A-plus rating to Allen.

Webb Defends Sexual Explicitness Of His Novels (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

Virginia U.S. Senate candidate James H. Webb Jr. said yesterday that incumbent Sen. George Allen crossed the line when he used salacious excerpts from his wartime novels to question his character and respect for women.

"I've lived in the real world, and I reported the real world in my writings," Mr. Webb, a Democrat, told about 300 people at the Edgar Allan Poe Middle School in Annandale.

His remarks came after the campaign of Mr. Allen, a Republican, issued a press release Thursday highlighting the excerpts, which include apparent father-son incest, an acrobatic young stripper and the homosexual behavior of prison guards in Vietnam.

The Allen camp said the novels portrays women as "servile, subordinate, inept, incompetent, promiscuous, perverted or some combination of these."

Mr. Webb, joined yesterday by fellow Democrats Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner, responded by reading reviews that praised his novels as masterpieces and described him as "a moral philosopher of the military ... when fiction seems to find it harder and harder to address moral issues."

DOJ_NMG_0088245

"I have written what I have seen, and that is the duty of a writer -- to help people understand the world around us with all of its beauty and all of its flaws," said Mr. Webb, a Vietnam veteran and former U.S. Navy secretary.

Chris LaCivita, an Allen campaign spokesman, said Mr. Webb's response showed he was becoming "unhinged."

"George Allen's record as governor and U.S. senator has been an open book for years," he said. "Now that Jim Webb's books have been opened, he can't take any scrutiny."

The Allen campaign's decision to introduce the excerpts, in a close race that will be decided Nov. 7, angered Democrats and disappointed at least one Republican.

"It's so dirty," Michelle Malkin, a conservative columnist, said on Fox News. "It looks desperate. It looks pathetic, and it looks so immature. ... This is fiction."

However, others saw the excerpts as further proof that Mr. Webb does not respect women.

"Sadly, the degrading manner in which women are depicted in his novels fits a larger pattern that is evident in his nonfiction writings as well," said state Delegate M. Kirkland Cox, Colonial Heights Republican.

This is the latest salvo in a race muddied with character attacks. Mr. Allen's 20-plus years of public service and Mr. Webb's push for economic fairness and opposition to the Iraq war have often been lost amid the attacks.

The race started devolving in August when Mr. Allen was videotaped calling an Indian-American volunteer for the Webb campaign "macaca." He also faced accusations he used the "N-word" in the 1970s and stumbled over questions about his Jewish heritage.

Mr. Webb yesterday said he could have used the situations against Mr. Allen, but has chosen not to because they are "not relevant to what I'm trying to do."

Mr. Webb has faced criticism for an article he wrote in 1977 that questioned a woman's place at the U.S. Naval Academy.

It appeared Mr. Allen would refocus his campaign on his record when he pledged in a rare statewide address Oct. 2 to spend the final five weeks of the campaign talking about the issues that matter most to voters.

"The Allen campaign has made smear tactics the centerpiece of their entire effort," Mr. Webb said. "If you want to find accountability for this, remember that the fish rots from the head down."

Mr. Webb yesterday also used the weekly Democratic radio address to criticize President Bush and his supporters, such as Mr. Allen, for what he regards as botching the Iraq war. "With the right leadership, the situation in Iraq is solvable, in a way that will increase stability in the Middle East and reduce the threat of international terrorism," he said.

The Senate Race In Connecticut (NYT)

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

The Congressional elections are very much about America's problems in Iraq. But the campaigns have shed little light on exactly what should happen next. Nowhere is that more true than in Connecticut. The two leading candidates, Ned Lamont and Joseph Lieberman, have clear disagreements over whether invading Iraq was a good idea in the first place, but grow much fuzzier when the question of future strategy comes up.

Mr. Lieberman, a three-term Democratic senator now running as an independent, talks about the threat of Islamic terrorism. Mr. Lamont, who beat Mr. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, reminds voters what a mess the invasion created. When it comes to the next step, Mr. Lieberman seems to mimic the Bush administration's proposal to stay the course (while no longer mentioning that toxic phrase) with new tactics. Mr. Lamont is close to the Senate Democrats (minus Mr. Lieberman) who demanded a timetable for withdrawal without being too firm on what that ought to entail.

No one expects legislators to dictate military tactics. But what we need from the next crop of elected officials in Washington is a willingness to face reality, to choose from among difficult options and have the courage to be honest with the public about the consequences. On those points, Mr. Lamont is by far the better candidate.

Two months ago, Connecticut's Democratic voters sent Mr. Lieberman what should have been a jarring wake-up call when they rejected him for Mr. Lamont, a relative newcomer. We have been waiting to see what lessons the state's best-known politician took from his defeat, and from the daily evidence of the deterioration of the situation in Iraq.

We wanted to see a capacity for growth and change in Mr. Lieberman. The country is full of Republicans who now realize the Iraq invasion was a disaster, either in its basic concept or in its execution. The most honorable of them are in agony over what has happened. Mr. Lieberman, who had not only continually defended the administration's Iraq policy but also attacked Democrats who criticized the president, had more cause for soul-searching than most.

But instead of re-evaluating his own positions, Mr. Lieberman blamed his constituents for failing to notice that he had offered some negative comments about the conduct of the war, too, mainly when he was running for the Democratic nomination for president in 2004. He did not protest when Dick Cheney said that people who voted for Mr. Lamont were giving comfort to "Al Qaeda types." His only reflection seemed devoted to a re-examination of the rules for getting back on the ballot.

DOJ_NMG_0088246

Since his primary defeat, Mr. Lieberman has run a well-packaged campaign built around his self-assigned bipartisan image — "It's not about politics," say his ads. But it is very much about politics — from the flood of special interest campaign donations that has been running Mr. Lieberman's way to the old Karl Rove lesson that political winners never admit to error.

We are living in perilous times. Being able to work with the opposition party — Mr. Lieberman's claim to fame — is hardly a sign of moral courage when the opposition party controls the White House, Senate and House of Representatives. President Bush did not need Mr. Lieberman's persistent support on Iraq when he had the deference of his own party members in Congress. What the country needed — and what Connecticut had the right to expect — was for Mr. Lieberman to risk some of his bipartisan clout to call attention to the way Iraq was spiraling out of control.

The fatal problem with Mr. Lieberman's candidacy is not that he was wrong about the invasion, but that he has not shown any capacity to grow and change. Suggesting that getting rid of Donald Rumsfeld might be a good idea is hardly a breakthrough at a time when the secretary of defense's supporters are pretty much limited to the president and members of the Rumsfeld family.

Mr. Lieberman has changed his tone but not his underlying conviction that he has been right all along. He and Mr. Bush are still on the very same page, encouraging the American people to believe that there is a happy ending for American involvement in Iraq, and that all it takes is the perseverance to keep marching toward the end of the rainbow.

Ned Lamont has run a far less polished campaign than Mr. Lieberman, but the more we see of him, the more impressed we are by his intelligence and his growing sophistication about the issues facing the nation. He is very much in the Connecticut mold of basically moderate, principled politicians, and his willingness to take on Mr. Lieberman when no one else dared to do it showed real courage and conviction. He would make a good senator. More important, he has the capacity to continually become a better one. We endorse Ned Lamont for Senate.

A Senate Race Riding On Cash Flow (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

HARTFORD, Oct. 27 — While Senator Joseph I. Lieberman may have lost the Democratic primary to a novice politician, his bid in the general election has come with all the financial advantages of a major party candidate and an 18-year incumbent.

Meanwhile, his financial prowess has prompted his opponent, Ned Lamont, to dig deeper into his pockets, putting $12.7 million into the campaign so far.

Mr. Lieberman, who has run for national office twice, has tapped into millions of dollars from the networks of major Republican and Democratic donors, as well as from business groups and lobbyists who have rallied around him, and several out-of-state independent groups who do not coordinate directly with the campaign.

The hotly contested Senate race has quickly become the most expensive in the state's history, with Mr. Lieberman spending $11.5 million and Mr. Lamont spending $8.6 million through the end of September.

And there is no sign of slowing down. There have been fund-raising meals for Mr. Lieberman several times a week. Mr. Lamont, a cable executive from Greenwich, Conn., has twice contributed $2 million to his campaign in the last two weeks. Late Friday, the Lamont campaign said that he would lend an additional $2 million toward the election effort.

Mr. Lieberman, who has kept up a brisk fund-raising schedule since losing the primary in August, has been able to deftly use his experience and career ties all over the county at a time that he needs it most to battle for his seat in the Senate. At the same time Mr. Lamont, who hoped for considerable financial support from major Democratic donors, has struggled somewhat to match Mr. Lieberman's resources.

In August, Mr. Lamont's advisers said they expected to spend roughly $6 million in the general election, but that number was quickly eclipsed. Mr. Lieberman raised that amount in just more than a month, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission. He has raised a total of $14.8 million, another record for a campaign in this state.

Advisers to Mr. Lamont say they made a decision not to focus on fund-raising efforts, using the events more as political rallies.

Last week, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton played host to a fund-raiser for Mr. Lamont at a home on the Upper East Side. Earlier this year, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV played host to an event on Mr. Lamont's behalf.

The campaign has also worked with Mr. Lamont's longtime friends in Greenwich to organize a "Republicans for Lamont" fund-raiser.

As of the end of September, roughly 70 percent of Mr. Lamont's money has come from his own pocket.

Filings show there are far more Republican donors rallying to the side of Mr. Lieberman, who has crisscrossed the country and raised about $5 million since losing the primary, campaign finance records show.

DOJ_NMG_0088247

Prominent Republican donors listed in Mr. Lieberman's campaign filings are Joseph Allbaugh, one of President Bush's close advisers during the 2000 campaign, and Don Nickles, the former assistant leader in the Senate. Several outside groups, known as 527s, have also rallied to Mr. Lieberman's side.

The Connecticut Issues Project, which is sending out mailings praising Mr. Lieberman for his work on the submarine base in Connecticut, is being financed largely by out-of-state donors who typically give to Republicans. The Free Enterprise Fund, which is running ads against Democrats in several other states, has also run television ads criticizing Mr. Lamont's business.

Each campaign has tried to use the source of financing as a line of attack, with the Lieberman campaign accusing Mr. Lamont of trying to buy the election, while the Lamont campaign has said Mr. Lieberman's support from prominent Republicans is a sign that he is too chummy with the White House.

The latest sparks came early this week, when the Lamont campaign filed a complaint with the Federal Election Commission about nearly $380,000 the Lieberman campaign listed as "petty cash" to pay for volunteers in the final two weeks of the primary. Tammy Sun, a spokeswoman for Mr. Lieberman, said the money was used to pay for young workers used in the field operation in the last days of the campaign.

By law, a campaign must keep a journal of petty cash payments of less than $100, but it is not required to make the contents of the journal public. Ms. Sun declined to allow reporters to examine the journal, saying there is no evidence of wrongdoing.

Several campaign finance experts said that while the expenditure was an unusually large sum of money to be listed as petty cash, it would be legal as long as each of the payments was less than $100.

Bloomberg Raises Cash For Lieberman (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

HARTFORD, Connecticut (AP) -- If Sen. Joe Lieberman wins a fourth term on November 7, it's a safe bet New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg will be high on his thank-you list.

Bloomberg, a Republican who shares Lieberman's independent streak, is playing a prominent role helping to raise money for the Democratic senator, the Lieberman campaign said Saturday.

The mayor has also dispatched several campaign operatives to Connecticut to help Lieberman reach GOP and independent voters as the race closes. Lieberman is running as an independent after losing to wealthy businessman Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary.

"The mayor has been extremely generous personally in being willing to help us raise money," Lieberman spokesman Dan Gerstein said.

Bloomberg appeared at a major Chicago fundraising event for Lieberman recently. He will campaign with Lieberman on Monday in Stamford, greeting commuters and formally endorsing him. Bloomberg will also host a fundraiser next week at his home, Gerstein said.

Bloomberg operatives are helping to build Lieberman's get-out-the-vote effort, which is targeting a mix of Democratic, Republican and independent supporters.

Because of Lieberman's independent status, he cannot rely on his party's organization to help him identify voters and get them to the polls.

"We're leveraging the very relevant experience of the Bloomberg operation to help us in what can charitably be described as a unique situation," said Gerstein.

The Bloomberg team has valuable experience identifying such voters in New York City, which is considered Democratic turf, said Gerstein.

"They have a fine-tuned understanding of how to reach across party lines," said Gerstein. "Mayor Bloomberg is a very independent-minded leader with broad appeal who was operating in a very Democratic electorate."

Bloomberg also is backing Connecticut Republicans Gov. M. Jodi Rell and Rep. Christopher Shays, who is locked in a tough re-election fight.

Lamont, who founded a cable television company, has put more than $14 million of his family's money into his campaign, including a $2 million loan he made to the campaign on Friday, his campaign confirmed.

Lieberman enjoys a double-digit lead in the latest statewide polls. Republican Alan Schlesinger trails far behind in the polls.

Waterfront Project Reflects 2 Images Of A Senator (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski And Ray Rivera

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088248

BAYONNE, N.J. — Senator Robert Menendez is not directly involved in building the new waterfront development that will soon rise here in the shadow of the Statue of Liberty. But his influence can be seen throughout it.

The project, which occupies the 437-acre site of the abandoned Military Ocean Terminal, is being built with the help of nearly $30 million in federal funds that Mr. Menendez secured using his trademark policy expertise and aggressive politicking. His work provided the seed money for a plan to produce movie studios and shops, marinas and waterfront parks, and 6,600 homes.

The project has also produced considerable work for some of his chief political supporters.

The first major contract to develop the site went to a company that hired a Menendez friend and political confidant, Donald Scarinci, to lobby for it. That developer later took on Mr. Menendez's former campaign treasurer, Carl Goldberg, as a partner. Bonds for a portion of the project were underwritten by Dennis Enright, a top campaign contributor, while Kay LiCausi, a former Menendez Congressional aide and major fund-raiser, received lucrative work lobbying for the project.

Mr. Menendez said he had no role in securing the contracts for any of his friends. But the project, known as the Peninsula at Bayonne Harbor, nonetheless displays the two contrasting images of Mr. Menendez — one a fiery advocate who brings home federal aid for his constituents, the other a political empire builder who detractors say pushes too much largess toward his friends.

Whether the considerable clout wielded by Mr. Menendez in Congress is matched by cronyism, or worse, at home, has become one of the central issues in the Senate race he is waging against State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., his Republican challenger.

Republicans have portrayed Mr. Menendez as a modern-day political boss, presiding over an apparatus not of union stewards, ward heelers and precinct captains, but of lawyers, developers and lobbyists who fill his campaign coffers.

In a year when Republican candidates are on the defensive, Mr. Kean's steady attacks on Mr. Menendez's ethics have made the New Jersey race one of nation's closest and nastiest. A defeat here, where Democrats have not lost a Senate race since 1972, would endanger the party's hopes of winning control of the upper chamber.

Mr. Menendez brushes aside the questions about his ethics as "guilt by geography," a reference to his rise in politics in Hudson County, where the reputation for machine politics and official mischief is notable even by New Jersey standards. Mr. Menendez asserts that in 32 years in political office he has never once used his power to steer a contract to an ally.

Mr. Menendez's supporters say the attacks are simply a way for Republicans to avoid talking about issues he has campaigned on, including Iraq, terrorism and stem cell research. "Those are the things that matter to people, which Senator Menendez is far superior on, both in his knowledge and in his ability to articulate," said State Senator Bernard Kenny, chairman of the Hudson County Democratic Organization.

Even Mr. Menendez's critics concede his success in bringing federal transportation and environmental funds to the state while serving in the House for 13 years. That money helped revitalize blighted communities in his district, particularly a stretch along the Hudson that has come to be known as New Jersey's Gold Coast.

It should not be odd then, Mr. Menendez says, that developers and business leaders have expressed their approval by contributing to his campaigns.

"If someone agrees with your policy goals, is it surprising that they would support you?" he said in a recent interview. "What are they supposed to do? Give to someone who opposes their vision?"

A Land of Scandal

In many ways Mr. Kean has tried to turn the election into a referendum on Hudson County and its checkered political history.

The densely packed county was once a destination for generations of Irish, Italian and Cuban immigrants, including Mr. Menendez's parents, drawn by low rents and the promise of work in the factories and shipyards that stared across the harbor at the New York City skyline.

Today, the county functions almost like New York's sixth borough, as young professionals, families and banking firms flee to cities like Hoboken and Jersey City in search of rents that are lower than in Manhattan.

But while the county's demographics have shifted, and many of its communities have gained new vibrancy, its reputation for corruption has endured. It was here that Frank "Boss" Hague, Jersey City mayor from 1917 to 1947, famously declared "I am the law," while ruling over a machine that controlled governors, judges and United States senators. When he died, he had a net worth of $10 million though his salary never eclipsed $8,000 a year.

In the 1980s, after an onslaught of corruption cases hit the county, The Jersey Journal declared in a headline, "No Hudson officials indicted today."

DOJ_NMG_0088249

These days, the political power structure is less influential and more decentralized than in the past. The taint of scandal continues, however. Since 2002, about 20 public officials, including former County Executive Robert Janiszewski, have been indicted or convicted of corruption charges.

But Mr. Menendez, who grew up in Union City, says he is proud of his roots and of the way that he fought his way up, unlike his opponent, the scion of a famous New Jersey political family who was appointed to his first posts in the State Assembly and Senate.

In fact, Mr. Menendez's reputation as a tenacious infighter was born challenging the political establishment. In 1981, as a young lawyer serving as school board secretary, he became a government witness after discovering that the mayor, William V. Musto, who had been both mentor and father figure to him after his own father committed suicide, was diverting school funds to organized crime.

To many, the act was seen as a shameful betrayal, stirring so much resentment that Mr. Menendez said he took to wearing a bulletproof vest during the trial. When he made a bid to run against Mr. Musto for mayor, fliers filled the streets depicting him as a plump bird in a cage, with the caption, "Once a canary, always a canary."

Mr. Menendez lost the election, but four years later he ran again and won, becoming the state's first Hispanic to be elected mayor.

He went on to become the first Hispanic elected to the State Assembly, the State Senate and, in 1993, the first to represent New Jersey in the House of Representatives, where he rose to be the third-ranking Democrat. Jon S. Corzine appointed him to finish out the final year of his Senate term after Mr. Corzine was elected governor in 2005.

In Washington, he has become a respected voice on issues like immigration and transportation, and a staunch defender of liberal causes like stem cell research and abortion rights. He has also broken with his party to support deregulation of the financial services industry, a growing force in the New Jersey economy, and his devout opposition to Fidel Castro has won him near folk-hero status, and generous campaign contributions, in South Florida.

But critics from both parties say that some of Mr. Menendez's most ardent battles have been fought to preserve his own power, and protect government contracts of his patrons.

"If you're going to cross him or his people, you're in for the fight of your life," said William O'Dea, a Democratic freeholder from Hudson County who has clashed with Mr. Menendez over the apportionment of county contracts.

A Friend's Good Fortune

Perhaps no one has done more to foster Mr. Menendez's political success than Mr. Scarinci, a childhood friend who has stood by him from the days when he was battling Mr. Musto, and before. And few have benefited more from that success: among Mr. Menendez's first acts as Union City mayor was to name Mr. Scarinci city attorney.

Mr. Scarinci has since contributed more than $250,000 to state Democrats and helped raise millions more; he and his wife and members of his law firm have contributed more than $40,000 to Mr. Menendez's Congressional campaigns since 1997. As his chief campaign fund-raiser, Mr. Scarinci was so closely associated with Mr. Menendez that many elected officials came to view him as the congressman's emissary.

As he raised money for Mr. Menendez and helped him navigate the treacherous currents of Hudson County politics, Mr. Scarinci also won millions of dollars in state and local contracts for his law firm, many of them with government entities over which Mr. Menendez and his allies hold immense influence.

For example, after Mr. Menendez was named to head Gov. James E. McGreevey's transition team, he lobbied vigorously to help Mr. Scarinci win a legal contract with the Casino Reinvestment Development Authority, according to three officials familiar with the appointment. Mr. Scarinci's firm has made $2.8 million from that contract since 2002.

Mr. Scarinci does not deny that his firm has benefited from his political activity.

"It's not the political connections as much as you're involved," he said in an interview earlier this year. "So when they win, you're not going to hire some stranger, you're going to hire someone you're comfortable with, someone you trust."

Mr. Menendez insists that he has never helped Mr. Scarinci get or keep a contract, except when he was mayor and it was his duty to appoint legal counsel.

But in 1999, Mr. Menendez led a fierce recall effort against his former protégé, Mayor Rudy Garcia of Union City, because, Mr. Garcia says, he had fired Mr. Scarinci as city attorney. Mr. Menendez says it was because Mr. Garcia wanted his job in Congress. Whatever the cause, there was no mistaking who won: Mr. Garcia resigned as mayor in 2000, and his successor promptly rehired Mr. Scarinci.

Mr. Scarinci was forced to sever his ties with the campaign last month, after the release of audio tapes recorded in 1999 in which he is heard advising a client who held a lucrative psychiatric contract with Hudson County to hire another physician as a "favor" to Mr. Menendez.

DOJ_NMG_0088250

The psychiatrist with the contract, Oscar Sandoval, who is being sued by the county for allegedly bribing Mr. Janiszewski, the former county executive, to win contracts in the first place, said in an interview that Mr. Scarinci's message was clear: hire Mr. Menendez's friend or risk losing the contracts.

After the tapes were released, Mr. Scarinci issued written statements denying Dr. Sandoval's allegations and insisting that his dealings with him were never directed or requested by Mr. Menendez.

True or not, the tapes have provided fodder to Mr. Kean, who in ads has promised to free New Jersey from "the clutch of corruption."

In September, United States Attorney Christopher J. Christie also subpoenaed the records of a Hudson County social services agency that leased a building, for $300,000 over nearly 10 years, from Mr. Menendez while, as a House member, he helped it win millions in federal financing. Mr. Kean has used the subpoenas to assert that Mr. Menendez is under criminal investigation, which Mr. Christie's office has never confirmed. Mr. Menendez denies that he is under investigation and says that the House Ethics Committee's legal counsel cleared the deal.

Questions About Contracts

Mr. Menendez's involvement in the Bayonne project began in the mid-1990s, as he fought to save the base, which provided 2,500 jobs and was Bayonne's largest employer. Once that fight was lost, he began a new battle for federal financing necessary to transform the site into a thriving addition to the local economy — including $11.6 million from the Army for environmental cleanup, $7 million in Defense Department funds to stabilize the shoreline, and $3.2 million for road improvements to make the area more accessible to the New Jersey Turnpike.

Project officials say that Mr. Menendez had no role in awarding contracts and that without his support the development would never have gotten off the ground.

But the board created to oversee the project, the Bayonne Local Redevelopment Authority, was appointed by one of his allies, Mayor Joseph V. Doria Jr. The selection process for a developer — which was based not on price but on the subjective assessment of the redevelopment authority — was also led by people who are Menendez allies.

And the redevelopment authority's first executive director was Nicholas A. Chiaravalloti, a lawyer who had once worked in Mr. Scarinci's office. After assembling the contract specifications for the project, Mr. Chiaravalloti left in late 2002 to accept a job on Mr. Menendez's Congressional staff.

Dozens of companies expressed interest in the development, and two submitted detailed written proposals. The new executive director, Nancy Kist, who had worked as Mr. Doria's legal counsel before being appointed to the authority, said she forwarded both proposals to the board.

But at least one board member remembers seeing only the plan submitted by Fidelco Bayonne Realty — Mr. Scarinci's client. Two principals of the second group, George Figliolia, president of BG Builders, and Angelo Cali, a co-owner in Cali Futures, said they were never asked to give a presentation.

Maria Karczewski, who served on the seven-member board from 2002 until this January, said the Fidelco offer was the only one presented, though she said she did not believe Mr. Menendez had an influence on that decision. Three other board members said they recalled a presentation by Fidelco but could not recall whether they had seen the second one.

In public hearings, Ms. Kist urged the board to accept Fidelco's proposal because it included movie and television production facilities as well as housing, and also gave local officials a voice in shaping the project.

But some city officials said that once Fidelco hired Mr. Scarinci, it was clear who would get the contract.

"People knew that Menendez was running the show because he brought all the federal money," said City Councilman Anthony Chiappone, a rival of Mr. Doria who said he is frustrated that he and others have been excluded from the decision-making process. "And everyone in Hudson County politics know that Scarinci is his No. 1 guy, so any contractor who hires him gets treated like they have Menendez's seal of approval."

Steve Kalafer, a principal in Fidelco, said he hired Mr. Scarinci's firm because it had a long track record of getting waterfront development projects through Hudson County's maze of legal and governmental regulations.

"In every community there's one firm that has the experience and credibility with the local governing agencies to get projects done," he said. "I didn't bother to interview any other firm because I didn't want to try and reinvent the wheel."

Mr. Kalafer said that Fidelco's decision to bring Mr. Menendez's former campaign treasurer, Carl Goldberg, into the project as a partner in 2005 was based on his track record as a developer rather than any political connections. He said that Mr. Menendez played no role in Fidelco's decision to hire Mr. Scarinci or team up with Mr. Goldberg.

"Other than a smile and an occasional passing comment like, 'how's the project going?' I've never had any discussions with the senator about it," Mr. Kalafer said.

Royal Caribbean Cruises, one of the development's first tenants, hired a former Menendez staffer and fund-raiser, Kay LiCausi, who was vice chairwoman of the Hudson County Democratic Organization, to lobby for state and federal support.

Ms. LiCausi left her job on Mr. Menendez's staff in 2002, but she has maintained a close relationship with the congressman, who has acknowledged helping her get more than $200,000 in lobbying work for campaign committees over which he controlled or had strong influence. He has also recommended her for other lobbying work, which he compared to writing a reference letter for any deserving former employee.

In August 2004, just months after Royal Caribbean hired her, paying her more than $180,000 over the next two years, Mr. Menendez announced the first of two appropriations totaling $9.5 million to repair shoreline and extend a berth for the company's huge cruise ships.

Mr. Menendez said in an interview last week that Ms. LiCausi's role with the firm did not affect his actions, and that he did not consider it a conflict of interest to be obtaining tax dollars for companies who hire his own fund-raisers as lobbyists.

"If these people, these companies have success, that's their own initiative," he said, adding that several of the contractors involved in the project have never contributed to him or hired any of his supporters.

Royal Caribbean also hired Dennis Enright, a top contributor to Mr. Menendez, to underwrite a $16.5 million bond issue to help pay for terminal repairs.

A Royal Caribbean spokesman said the company never discussed the hires with Mr. Menendez, and that Ms. LiCausi and Mr. Enright were chosen because they were the best people for the job. Ms. LiCausi and Mr. Enright did not return repeated phone calls seeking comment for this article.

Mr. Menendez says that he is being held to a different standard because of where he comes from, saying that Mr. Kean has accepted campaign contributions from government contractors, and asserting that his opponent would never have received his first Assembly and State Senate appointments without his family's considerable "political muscle."

"You do that when you come from Hudson County, it's called bossism," Mr. Menendez said. "But I guess when you come from my opponent's background, it's just leadership."

Caution Prevails In Last TV Debate (MCA)

By Richard Locker

Memphis Commercial Appeal, October 29, 2006

Ford, Corker sidestep controversy, criticize attack ads

NASHVILLE -- Democrat Harold Ford Jr. drove home his message for change while Republican Bob Corker emphasized his "Tennessee life" and values in Saturday night's final televised debate of Tennessee's U.S. Senate race.

Neither unveiled new themes in their meeting at Vanderbilt University. And some attacks that dominated the previous two debates in Memphis and Chattanooga were absent.

But the negative TV attack ads of the past three weeks surfaced at the end of the face-off as veteran WTVF-TV anchor Chris Clark asked both to comment.

"I was a little surprised to see the smut and the slime coming into my living room during family time," Ford said of two ads sponsored by the Republican National Committee. One featured a bare-shouldered blond woman saying she had met Ford at the "Playboy party" and asking him to "call me."

Corker said he didn't like the ads and that he asked his national party to remove them. He asked Ford to join him in calling for all ads not put up directly by the two candidates' campaigns to cease. But he said after the debate that the national Democratic Party is spending $2.7 million on ads compared to $813,000 by the national GOP over the last two weeks.

The two sparred most pointedly over tax and spending issues. Corker charged that Ford had voted 78 times to raise taxes during his 10 years in the House -- to which Ford responded that he had never voted for a final federal budget bill that was not balanced.

Ford in turn said Corker had raised taxes three times as mayor of Chattanooga, and he tried to link Corker to the state income tax that former governor Don Sundquist proposed. But accusing Ford of "taking liberties with the facts throughout the campaign," Corker said the income tax didn't surface until more than 21/2 years after he stepped down as Sundquist's finance commissioner and returned to Chattanooga.

The two also responded to audience questions, prescreened by the League of Women Voters, on illegal immigration, Social Security, health care, the minimum wage, the federal deficit, human rights and how to deal with North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

Ford said President Bush should appoint "three emissaries" -- former senator Howard Baker, former secretary of state Madeleine Albright and former Georgia senator Sam Nunn -- to deal with North Korea and former secretary of state Colin Powell to work with the Iraqi government on a new strategy there.

Corker said he believes the six-party diplomatic talks underway over North Korea "are very healthy" but its neighboring countries should take a more active role in persuading North Korea's leaders to back down on nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0088252

Ford used several of the questions to say that Corker's GOP has been in control of Congress and the White House for the last six years but has done little to resolve the nation's problems.

Both said Social Security must be made solvent. Corker said he would favor allowing younger workers to set up private accounts with a portion of their Social Security taxes but only after Social Security is "made structurally sound."

Ford said, "I think Social Security should go first to people who need it the most -- people who have worked 30 to 40 years who have earned it should get it before" others more affluent. He renewed his call for a program in which every newborn gets $500 deposited in a special account at birth that he, she or anybody can contribute to and which can be used only for college, a down payment on a house or retirement.

"This race boils down to a very simple premise," Ford said. "If you like what has gone on in Washington for the last six years, you don't want to vote for me ... (But) if you believe your children deserve a better America than we have today, I'm asking you to vote for me. I'm not going to be a parrot for anyone in Washington other than you."

Corker emphasized the dominant theme of his campaign's biographical TV ads, that he has the experience and Tennessee values to represent Tennesseans in the Senate. "I've lived a Tennessee life. I grew up in Tennessee, went to public schools, graduated from UT ...

"This is not a referendum," Corker said. "This is a choice between two individuals who could not have led a more different life and who have had different life experiences. I think you want someone who thinks like you think, someone who has the ability to solve complex problems."

Political Theater And The Real Rick Santorum (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

Every poll suggests that Rick Santorum will lose his race to return to the U.S. Senate. That's probably good news in Pennsylvania's bobo suburbs, where folks regard Santorum as an ideological misfit and a social blight. But it's certainly bad for poor people around the world.

For there has been at least one constant in Washington over the past 12 years: almost every time a serious piece of antipoverty legislation surfaces in Congress, Rick Santorum is there playing a leadership role.

In the mid-1990s, he was a floor manager for welfare reform, the most successful piece of domestic legislation of the past 10 years. He then helped found the Renewal Alliance to help charitable groups with funding and parents with flextime legislation.

More recently, he has pushed through a stream of legislation to help the underprivileged, often with Democratic partners. With Dick Durbin and Joe Biden, Santorum has sponsored a series of laws to fight global AIDS and offer third world debt relief. With Chuck Schumer and Harold Ford, he's pushed to offer savings accounts to children from low-income families. With John Kerry, he's proposed homeownership tax credits. With Chris Dodd, he backed legislation authorizing $860 million for autism research. With Joe Lieberman he pushed legislation to reward savings by low-income families.

In addition, he's issued a torrent of proposals, many of which have become law: efforts to fight tuberculosis; to provide assistance to orphans and vulnerable children in developing countries; to provide housing for people with AIDS; to increase funding for Social Services Block Grants and organizations like Healthy Start and the Children's Aid Society; to finance community health centers; to combat genocide in Sudan.

I could fill this column, if not this entire page, with a list of ideas, proposals and laws Santorum has poured out over the past dozen years. It's hard to think of another politician who has been so active and so productive on these issues.

Like many people who admire his output, I disagree with Santorum on key matters like immigration, abortion, gay marriage. I'm often put off by his unnecessarily slashing style and his culture war rhetoric.

But government is ultimately not about the theater or the light shows of public controversy, it's about legislation and results. And the substance of Santorum's work is impressive. Bono, who has worked closely with him over the years, got it right: "I would suggest that Rick Santorum has a kind of Tourette's disease; he will always say the most unpopular thing. But on our issues, he has been a defender of the most vulnerable."

Santorum doesn't have the jocular manner of most politicians. His colleagues' eyes can glaze over as he lectures them on the need to, say, devote a week of Senate floor time to poverty. He's not the most social member of the club. Many politicians praise family values and seem to spend as little time as possible with their own families, but Santorum is at home almost constantly. And there is sometimes a humorlessness to his missionary zeal.

But no one can doubt his rigor. Jonathan Rauch of The National Journal wrote the smartest review of Santorum's book, "It Takes a Family." Rauch noted that while Goldwaterite conservatives see the individual as the essential unit of society, Santorum sees the family as the essential unit.

DOJ_NMG_0088253

Rauch observed, “Where Goldwater denounced collectivism as the enemy of the individual, Santorum denounces individualism as the enemy of the family.” That belief has led Santorum in interesting and sometimes problematical directions, but the argument itself is a serious one. His discussion of the philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre, for example, is as sophisticated as anything in Barack Obama’s recent book. If Santorum were pro-choice, he’d be a media star and a campus hero.

The bottom line is this: If serious antipoverty work is going to be done, it’s going to emerge from a coalition of liberals and religious conservatives. Without Santorum, that’s less likely to happen. If senators are going to be honestly appraised, it’s going to require commentators who can look beyond the theater of public controversy and at least pretend to care about actual legislation. Santorum has never gotten a fair shake from the media.

And so after Election Day, the underprivileged will probably have lost one of their least cuddly but most effective champions.

GOP Hopes Fade For Taking District Bush Calls Home (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

WACO, Texas -- Texas Republicans spent much of this year thinking they had a good chance to defeat an eight-term Democrat in this central Texas congressional district.

Today, Republican Van Taylor's campaign in the 17th District, though well-funded, seems bogged down. Several polls indicate that incumbent Chet Edwards, 54, will easily retain the seat he has held for 16 years.

The Republican Party promised to campaign heavily for Mr. Taylor when he won the primary in March. He was told he could expect money, rallies featuring party stalwarts and national press exposure.

For the Republicans, Mr. Taylor seemed like the perfect fit.

The 10-year Marine veteran who served in Iraq seemed likely to blend in perfectly with the pro-military constituency that permeates this area near Fort Hood.

Some local conservatives also saw an excellent opportunity to rid themselves of an embarrassing situation -- a Democrat representing President Bush, whose Crawford ranch is in the district.

"It's an embarrassment," said M. A. Taylor, the McLennan County Republican chairman, who is not related to the candidate. "This area overwhelmingly supports the president and is overwhelmingly Republican, and yet we have a congressman who supposedly represents our interests. It is nothing short of personally humiliating."

But something happened along the way that turned the odds against Mr. Taylor.

Mr. Edwards refused to attack Mr. Bush, unlike most Democrats across the country, and he has spoken about his efforts to protect the Waco VA hospital and to fight for the military.

He reminds voters that he is a member of the Appropriations Committee and is the top-ranking Democrat on its military quality of life and veterans affairs subcommittee.

"In a Congress where committee assignments really make a difference, the fact that I am the ranking member on the committee that funds the VA health care system has given me the experience and insight into the political process and the VA system itself," Mr. Edwards said at a recent debate in College Station.

Meanwhile, Mr. Taylor tells voters he served two tours in Iraq as a captain with the 4th Marines, 3rd Recon Battalion, and comes from a long line of soldiers, dating back to the Civil War.

The race has not been cheap. According to Congressional Quarterly's Political Money Line, Mr. Taylor has raised almost $2 million, while Mr. Edwards has raised more than $2.8 million, among the most of any Democrat running for Congress.

Though Mr. Edwards has used much of his campaign war chest to promote past service, Mr. Taylor has attacked the Democrat as a "career politician," a man out of step with "family values" in the district.

Some of Mr. Taylor's television ads have been called "fanciful" or less than fair. In fact, "some of his attacks on Edwards' voting record are simply not true," said Gary Halter, professor of political science at Texas A&M University.

As the criticism of Mr. Taylor's campaign increased, the excitement from Republican leaders in Washington has cooled.

The National Republican Congressional Committee canceled $1.5 million in television ads it had scheduled to run in the waning days of the campaign, but the Taylor campaign is still fighting.

"We're prepared to win this race," said Mike Spellings, a campaign spokesman. "We're confident voters are responding to his message."

Democrats Aim To Regain Majority Of Governors (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088254

Democrats are quietly poised to win a majority of the nation's gubernatorial offices in the midterm elections next week, as most of the attention focuses on the battle for control of Congress.

Republicans currently hold 28 gubernatorial seats. However, a number of them are in what are considered liberal states that appear to have stronger Democratic candidates than in recent years.

According to the latest polls, Democrats could win in eight states: Alaska, Colorado, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, Nevada and Ohio.

"It's a volatile climate out there," said Bernie Campbell, communications director for the Democratic Governors' Association (DGA). "A combination of things is working in our favor -- voter confidence in Democrats and building on the past accomplishments of our current governors."

Gov. Bill Richardson, New Mexico Democrat, said during a recent appearance in Washington that his party is benefiting from a bounce in the polls because of voter dissatisfaction with President Bush and Congress. Mr. Richardson, the president of the DGA, is far ahead in his own re-election campaign.

Republican governors who are running competitive races in the so-called "blue" states this year have been successful by embracing a more independent agenda and distancing themselves from the administration.

"The issues environment has been challenging for Republicans," said Phil Musser, executive director of the Republican Governors Association (RGA).

Mr. Musser cited gubernatorial races in California and Oregon as evidence that Republicans can still buck the national trend working against others in their party. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is leading his Democratic opponent, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, in the polls. In Oregon, Republican nominee Ron Saxton is running a surprisingly close race against incumbent Gov. Theodore R. Kulongoski.

"You still need the core base, but it's less about ideology and more about being pragmatic," Mr. Musser said of their success.

Some Republicans have complained privately that the White House has focused too much on maintaining a majority in Congress and has virtually ignored Republican gubernatorial races, both in fundraising and in appearances by Mr. Bush and other leading party figures.

"They gave up on us a long time ago," said one source, who asked to remain anonymous because of a continued involvement in Republican campaigns.

"The top priority has been Congress," Mr. Musser acknowledged, "especially early in the cycle."

However, he said that the RGA has raised $20 million for its races this year and has an estimated $6 million to $7 million advantage over the DGA.

A significant part of that money will be used to get voters to the polls on Election Day. "Money is critical to it," he said.

Novice Stands Her Ground On Veterans' Turf In Alaska (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

WASILLA, Alaska — Voters have not elected a woman as governor of Alaska in 47 years of statehood, and just a few months ago, before she trounced Gov. Frank Murkowski in the Republican primary, Sarah Palin was hardly known outside this growing suburb of Anchorage.

Now Ms. Palin, 42, has a sizable lead in most polls over Tony Knowles, a former Democratic governor who has survived in a conservative state by working closely with the powerful oil industry and cultivating ties across party lines.

Her secret?

"She's a suburban mom," said Dan Newman, the pastor of Wasilla Christian Fellowship, one of several evangelical churches here, and a Palin supporter. "It's almost the opposite of what you'd expect from Alaska."

Ms. Palin, the former mayor of Wasilla, stands out in a state that has seen few fresh faces in politics. She is untainted by government scandal and unburdened by political debt. She is a conservative Christian who opposes abortion. She runs marathons. She fishes. She hunts.

"We always have a choice," Ms. Palin, who was an infant when her family moved to Alaska so her father could take a job teaching school, said in an interview. "We can go backwards and be real negative or we can go forward and be positive."

Still, political analysts say Ms. Palin is not a lock to win.

Mr. Knowles has been able to keep the race competitive, in part by questioning whether Ms. Palin has the experience to lead a state where voters measure politicians on issues as wide-ranging as energy exploration, aerial wolf hunting and subsistence fishing in the arctic bush.

DOJ_NMG_0088255

Mr. Knowles, 63, tries to sell his experience, having served eight years in the governor's office in Juneau, leaving in 2002 because of term limits. He also casts Ms. Palin as provincial.

More specifically, Mr. Knowles has suggested that Ms. Palin lacks the backbone and skills to negotiate with oil companies to build a new natural gas pipeline, something they agree is critical for the state economy as oil production declines on the North Slope. About 85 percent of the state's general revenue comes from taxes on the oil industry and many people view the new gas pipeline as Alaska's next natural resource boom.

Ms. Palin is portraying herself as a needed outside agent of change at a time when the Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating links between Republican leaders in the Legislature and a major player in the oil industry. The tactic worked well in the August primary, with only 19 percent of voters supporting Governor Murkowski's bid for a second term.

Two of the three members of the state's Congressional delegation, Senator Ted Stevens and Representative Don Young, have been in office for a total of 71 years. The third, Senator Lisa Murkowski, has been in office since 2002 in the seat her father held for 22 years before that.

Ms. Palin's rise to prominence has come in part by turning the spotlight on the failings of her party. She accused one of her fellow members of the Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission of misusing his office to do political work.

Some of the accusations proved true, but Ms. Palin was striking close to home. The person she accused was Randy Ruedrich, the chairman of the state Republican Party.

Mr. Ruedrich, who says he and the party are actively supporting Ms. Palin in the election, has refused her suggestion that he should resign.

"When Ms. Palin becomes governor she will be a member of my 90-member executive committee," Mr. Ruedrich said in an interview. "I have one vote and she has one vote in that 90-member body."

Adding to the party tension is the candidacy of Andrew Halcro, who was a Republican during his two terms in the State House and is running for governor as an independent. The three candidates have appeared together frequently in forums and debates around the state. While Mr. Halcro, 42, trails far behind the others, he receives coverage in the news media, and opinions differ on whether he will draw more voters from Ms. Palin or Mr. Knowles.

Dreams of a new economic boom in natural gas development have dominated the race for all three candidates.

Mr. Knowles talks confidently about the benefits of squeezing as much as 100 trillion cubic feet of natural gas deposits from the North Slope through a 48-inch pipeline for decades into the future. He says the project, estimated to cost more than $20 billion, could give the rest of Alaska's economy time to diversify, a long-sought goal many say was overlooked during the oil rush of the 1970s and 1980s.

Mr. Knowles said the gas pipeline, which could take 10 years just to build, would provide money to improve state education. Noting a rise in average temperature in the state, he also said Alaska could position itself as "a research center for climate change and how to deal with it."

Some economists have said that the state has already increased the tourism and cargo shipping industries, and they say that a gas pipeline, while a boost for the state, would not have the same kind of impact as the Trans-Alaska oil pipeline.

"I'm not going to say that booms and busts are gone forever, but we're a little less susceptible now," said Neal Fried, an economist with the Alaska Department of Labor.

Still, nearly every Alaska resident recently received an annual dividend check from oil production. This year the amount was $1,106.96, and the belief that the state's natural resources will remain its economic backbone is deeply held, whether the resource was gold a century ago or gas in the future.

The gas pipeline seems to take on particular urgency in an election year, just as it did four years ago when Governor Murkowski, then a senator, returned from Washington. He has worked for more than two years but failed to strike a deal.

Ms. Palin, like Mr. Knowles, said she wanted the state to expand negotiations beyond BP, Exxon Mobil and Conoco Phillips, the three oil companies with which Governor Murkowski has been negotiating.

But Ms. Palin also recalled that the pipeline was a topic of discussion when she was a child and said that Mr. Knowles is being "disingenuous" when he says urgently that he wants pipeline proposals on his desk in the governor's office by Jan. 31, 2007.

New Governor's Name Is ... Crist. Or Davis. The Race Remains Too Close To Call. (STPETE)

By Adam Smith

St. Petersburg Times, October 28, 2006

Republican Charlie Crist may be trouncing Jim Davis in money and sheer number of TV commercials, but a new St. Petersburg Times poll shows Davis remains solidly in the game as Election Day looms.

DOJ_NMG_0088256

The poll found Attorney General Crist leading Democratic U.S. Rep. Davis by six percentage points, 48 percent to 42 percent, with 10 percent of voters still undecided. Independent voters stand to tip the election Nov. 7, with one in five still unsure between the two.

"I would not put my hand in my pockets and place a heavy bet on either one of these candidates. I think it's too close to call," said pollster Rob Schroth. "I think on Election Day, it's going to be close."

The Oct. 22-25 statewide telephone survey of 800 voters was conducted for the St. Petersburg Times by Schroth/Eldon & Associates, which usually works with Democrats, and the Polling Co., which typically works with Republicans. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

"The fact that the governor's race is still in play shows that Florida is still a red and blue state - more of a purple state," said pollster Kellyanne Conway of the Polling Co.

Crist is clearly better positioned, but both candidates head into the final stretch with some advantages.

For Davis, who has been unable to afford nearly as much TV advertising as Crist, anti-Republican sentiment is a big help. More than four in 10 Davis supporters said they're backing him mostly because of his political party or because they don't trust or dislike his opponent.

"As far as politicians go Charlie Crist is probably not that bad, but on the other hand he's a Republican, and right now I'm not too happy with the Republican Party," said 57-year-old Wes McKenzie, a county employee from St. Petersburg who has no party affiliation and has already voted for Davis.

Crist, though, is winning over about one in five Democrats, while Davis is backed by about one in 10 Republicans. The attorney general also is effectively tied with Davis among independents, and was leading 47 percent to 42 percent among woman. Democrats typically need an advantage in both those groups to win statewide.

What's more, the voters surveyed this week also trusted Crist slightly more than Davis to improve public schools, stand up to special interests and handle hurricane insurance reform. All are centerpieces of Davis' campaign message.

"I want to vote for Crist because he says he's going to try to do something about property taxes and insurance, so hopefully he's not lying," said 59-year-old Republican nurse Barbara Martin of Cape Coral, who has heard little about Davis.

Crist was leading Davis in every region except Democrat-rich South Florida, where the Tampa congressman leads 55 percent to 38 percent. Ground zero for the race is Tampa Bay, home of both Crist and Davis, and the attorney general leads there 48 percent to 40 percent.

In increasingly Republican Hillsborough County, Davis' home county, Crist has a 12 percentage point lead. In Crist's home county of Pinellas the attorney general leads by six percentage points.

"I don't think Davis has done very well for us in Congress and in Washington, so what makes you think he's going to do better as governor," asked David Hammons, a retired Democrat from Largo. "Crist seems like he wants to do what's right for the people."

Republicans in Florida have a far better voter mobilization operation than Democrats, but the poll points to potential trouble spots for Crist in energizing the conservative base.

A social moderate who is ambivalent on restricting abortions and espouses a "live and let live" philosophy, Crist had a smaller lead in conservative North Florida, 47 percent to 37 percent, than Republicans typically expect. A small majority of voters who described themselves as born again Christians backed Crist.

"You have to wonder if there's still some doubt about whether Charlie Crist is a true conservative," said pollster Tom Eldon.

That's precisely the concern of 31-year-old Shane Abbott, a Republican pharmacist from the Panhandle town of De Funiak Springs. For the first time, he may skip voting in the governor's race.

"I can't feel good about voting for either one of them," Abbott said. "Morally, ethically , I see no Christian values or a large lack of Christian values."

The poll found Florida voters, if not happy with the way things are going in their state, then at least far happier with Florida's direction than the country's.

They were evenly divided when asked whether things are moving in the right or wrong direction in the Sunshine State.

Davis made history in picking the first African-American running mate, former state Sen. Daryl Jones, but the poll found no evidence that's helping Davis. Democrats in Florida typically win nine of 10 African-American votes, but the St. Petersburg Times poll found 69 percent of black voters with Davis and 16 percent with Crist. Fourteen percent were undecided.

Among Hispanic voters, another heavily coveted voter group, Crist led 59 percent to 32 percent. But the margins of error for both minority groups are high - plus or minus nearly 10 percent for African-Americans and nearly 11 percent for Hispanics.

The strikingly different takes of African-American and Hispanic Floridians highlight the nuances of the state's diverse electorate.

DOJ_NMG_0088257

"Florida can really teach a lesson for the rest of the country as a bellwether in terms of not muddying together the so-called 'minority vote,' " Conway said.

So how would the pollsters advise the candidates to finish off the race for the Governor's mansion?

Crist, they said, needs to closely ally himself with popular outgoing Gov. Jeb Bush. And, Conway suggested, he should probably avoid becoming too negative in his campaign given that he has been winning over Democrats, independents and women who are likely to be alienated by attacks on Davis.

Davis, on the other hand, needs to ramp up attacks on Crist to raise doubts about him among swing voters, which could be tough given Davis' limited resources. The pollsters also said Davis should work to mobilize African-American voters and stress his opposition - and Crist's support for - how the unpopular FCAT test is used in Florida.

Times staff writer Joni James contributed to this report. Adam C. Smith can be reached at 727893-8241 or asmith@sptimes.com

Politician Disputes Waitress' Claim (LAT)

From Times News Reports

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Five-term U.S. Rep. Jim Gibbons, the GOP gubernatorial candidate, said he'd be willing to take a polygraph to prove he did not assault a Las Vegas cocktail waitress.

Chrissy Mazzeo, 32, has said Gibbons pushed her up against a wall at a Las Vegas restaurant Oct. 13 and made a sexual advance while he and a prominent GOP operative were walking her to her truck. Gibbons, 61, says she tripped and he caught her, then walked away.

She called police that night but withdrew her complaint the next day, saying she had been threatened and pressured by someone claiming ties to the Gibbons campaign.

Winning Women? (NYT)

By Alexandra Starr

The New York Times Magazine, October 29, 2006

Darcy Burner has never held public office — the former Microsoft project manager is just 35 — but nonetheless she appears to have a good shot at becoming the first Democratic representative from Washington's Eighth District. The timing of her bid is propitious: in this scandal-saturated election year, her lack of political experience may be a boon. And the fact that Burner is an adept fund-raiser has fueled her quick rise. There's another, slightly more intangible factor at play, too: Evergreen-state residents are accustomed to female leadership. "You don't have the hurdle of convincing voters that women can do the job when the models include people without a Y chromosome," Burner told me recently. And in fact, Washington is the only state in the nation where both senators and the governor are women.

The West has always been known for "breaking the bonds of custom," as the historian Fredrick Jackson Turner put it. That has provided opportunities to enterprising men, but women have left their mark as well. In politics, they've become a fixture to an extent not seen even in liberal bastions like Massachusetts. Women have resided in Arizona's gubernatorial mansion for nearly a decade. Neighboring California's two senators are female, as is nearly a third of that state's House delegation. And the November elections could sweep more Western women into office. State Senator Dina Titus, Democrat of Nevada, is waging a campaign for governor, headlining an almost all-female ticket. Gabrielle Giffords is favored to win Arizona's Eighth District for the Democrats. And one of the most tightly fought races in the country — a showdown between a four-term representative, Heather Wilson (Republican of New Mexico), and Attorney General Patricia Madrid — will send a woman to Congress no matter which party prevails.

While plenty of Republican female stars — like former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor — got their starts out West, most of the region's female candidates for high office this year are Democrats. Representative Rahm Emanuel of Chicago, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, says that regional and national trends make Democratic female candidates ideal standard-bearers. "Education, the environment and livability issues are coming to the forefront in that part of the country, and these women speak to the changing nature of the region," he says.

To be sure, these candidates will not win or lose their races on the basis of their sex alone. Talent on the stump, credentials and fund-raising will be decisive. The fact that they have the opportunity to make their case, however, speaks to Western states' receptivity to women in public life. That legacy dates back to the pioneer era and was partly born of necessity. The agricultural model of the ranch — unlike, say, the Southern plantation — often demanded that the sexes work side by side. Western states were the first to grant female suffrage, and allowing women access to the ballot was followed by electing them to high office: the first U.S. congresswoman hailed from Montana, the first female state senator from Utah.

DOJ_NMG_0088258

To this day, political parties in Western states tend to be more open to women than the networks that reign in parts of the East Coast. “The process for getting on the ballot isn’t as transparent in states with entrenched machines,” says Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. She points to her home state, New Jersey, where county chairmen — and they are almost always men — often determine who will run. “In part because those decisions are generally made behind closed doors, it makes it harder for women to get involved,” Walsh says. Indeed, the Garden State and Massachusetts — two states with strong machines — have all-male Congressional delegations, despite their progressive political leanings.

Of course, even this year, some of the Western women challengers will fall short. Incumbents aren’t shoo-ins, either. Senator Maria Cantwell, a Washington State Democrat, is facing a tough re-election challenge. Nevertheless, given the region’s more transparent political parties and history, it is well poised to retain its status as an incubator of female leadership. That may bode well for Senator Hillary Clinton if she decides to make a bid for the presidency. She would have trouble carrying states in the South, but if Western voters extend their embrace of female leadership to the highest levels of government, a promotion from the Senate to the White House could be within her reach.

Candidates, Parties Target Web Audience (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Increasing numbers of people looking for political news are going online - with more than a third now saying they check the Internet for such information.

That group is more likely to be younger, better educated and male than the population in general, an Associated Press-AOL News poll found.

While 35 percent say they go to the Internet for political updates about campaigns and candidates, that number grows to 43 percent of likely voters - and they tend to be more liberal than conservative.

With midterm elections less than two weeks away, the online audience is getting deluged with e-mail and election updates from the news, campaign and political Web sites.

Those who use the Web point to the convenience, the wide variety of information and the range of intense emotion available.

The poll found that four in 10 men search the Web for political news compared to three in 10 women. About four in 10 of those under age 50 search the Web for political news, compared with fewer than two in 10 of those 65 and over. And more than half of those with college degrees look to the Web for politics, compared with a third of those who have some college and fewer than one in six with a high school education or less.

The most popular destinations are the news sites, with nine of 10 in the online political audience saying they go to news sites. Just over a third go to candidate's sites and almost half check out political sites.

The number who go online has grown from about a fourth in this country six years ago, according to the Pew Research Center. Fewer than half of those who go online are regular users of the Web for political news.

While the online browsers go to a wide variety of sites, they overwhelmingly trust what they see on the news sites,

Seven in 10 said news sites are the most trustworthy, according to the poll of 2,000 adults taken Oct. 20-25. It has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 2.5 percentage points, larger for subgroups.

Mental Health Reform, Please (WP)

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Virginia's mental health laws are stuck in the past.

VIRGINIA OFFICIALS are taking some encouraging steps aimed at fixing the state's broken mental health system, but this much-needed effort has come under attack. The assault is misplaced.

Increasing numbers of mentally ill people in Virginia end up on the streets, in court or in jail, instead of in treatment, where they belong. Chief Justice Leroy R. Hassell Sr. of the Virginia Supreme Court has launched a commission to revamp state mental health laws, including the state's outmoded criteria for civil commitment, which provide emergency treatment only when people are an "imminent danger" to themselves or others. Justice Hassell wants those laws examined, with the hope of presenting "reform legislation" to the 2008 General Assembly.

At a recent hearing, however, Sen. Kenneth W. Stolle (R-Virginia Beach) warned the court not to overstep its role by getting involved in policy. According to the Richmond Times-Dispatch, Mr. Stolle, chairman of the Senate Courts of Justice Committee, said he didn't think judges should "tell us how we should deal with mental health." Justice Hassell should be applauded instead of criticized. Judges see firsthand the impact of untreated people on the criminal justice system and the inadequacy of laws that deal with the problem. Their advice to lawmakers is invaluable.

DOJ_NMG_0088259

There is a precedent, too. In the 1990s, family violence was spotlighted as an issue by then-Chief Justice Harry L. Carrico, and reform followed.

Coincidental with the state effort, Fairfax County, through its so-called Beeman Commission, is analyzing its own mental services during a time of increased need and dwindling resources. These two efforts highlight Virginia's desperate situation and the need for solutions.

Islam, Terror And The Second Nuclear Age (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times Magazine, October 29, 2006

I.

For nearly 50 years, worries about a nuclear Middle East centered on Israel. Arab leaders resented the fact that Israel was the only atomic power in the region, a resentment heightened by America's tacit approval of the situation. But they were also pretty certain that Israel (which has never explicitly acknowledged having nuclear weapons) would not drop the bomb except as a very last resort. That is why Egypt and Syria were unafraid to attack Israel during the October 1973 Yom Kippur War. "Israel will not be the first country in the region to use nuclear weapons," went the Israelis' coy formula. "Nor will it be the second."

Today the nuclear game in the region has changed. When the Arab League's secretary general, Amr Moussa, called for "a Middle East free of nuclear weapons" this past May, it wasn't Israel that prompted his remarks. He was worried about Iran, whose self-declared ambition to become a nuclear power has been steadily approaching realization.

The anti-Israel statements of the Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, coupled with Iran's support for Hezbollah and Hamas, might lead you to think that the Arab states would welcome Iran's nuclear program. After all, the call to wipe the Zionist regime from the map is a longstanding cliché of Arab nationalist rhetoric. But the interests of Shiite non-Arab Iran do not always coincide with those of Arab leaders. A nuclear Iran means, at the very least, a realignment of power dynamics in the Persian Gulf. It could potentially mean much more: a historic shift in the position of the long-subordinated Shiite minority relative to the power and prestige of the Sunni majority, which traditionally dominated the Muslim world. Many Arab Sunnis fear that the moment is ripe for a Shiite rise. Iraq's Shiite majority has been asserting the right to govern, and the lesson has not been lost on the Shiite majority in Bahrain and the large minorities in Lebanon and Saudi Arabia. King Abdullah of Jordan has warned of a "Shiite crescent" of power stretching from Iran to Lebanon via Iraq and (by proxy) Syria.

But geopolitics is not the only reason Sunni Arab leaders are rattled by the prospect of a nuclear Iran. They also seem to be worried that the Iranians might actually use nuclear weapons if they get them. A nuclear attack on Israel would engulf the whole region. But that is not the only danger: Sunnis in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere fear that the Iranians might just use a nuclear bomb against them. Even as Iran's defiance of the United States and Israel wins support among some Sunnis, extremist Sunnis have been engaging in the act of takfir, condemning all Shiites as infidels. On the ground in Iraq, Sunni takfiris are putting this theory into practice, aiming at Shiite civilians and killing them indiscriminately. Shiite militias have been responding in kind, and massacres of Sunni civilians are no longer isolated events.

Adding the nuclear ingredient to this volatile mix will certainly produce an arms race. If Iran is going to get the bomb, its neighbors will have no choice but to keep up. North Korea, now protected by its own bomb, has threatened proliferation — and in the Middle East it would find a number of willing buyers. Small principalities with huge U.S. Air Force bases, like Qatar, might choose to rely on an American protective umbrella. But Saudi Arabia, which has always seen Iran as a threatening competitor, will not be willing to place its nuclear security entirely in American hands. Once the Saudis are in the hunt, Egypt will need nuclear weapons to keep it from becoming irrelevant to the regional power balance — and sure enough, last month Gamal Mubarak, President Mubarak's son and Egypt's heir apparent, very publicly announced that Egypt should pursue a nuclear program.

Given the increasing instability of the Middle East, nuclear proliferation there is more worrisome than almost anywhere else on earth. As nuclear technology spreads, terrorists will enjoy increasing odds of getting their hands on nuclear weapons. States — including North Korea — might sell bombs or give them to favored proxy allies, the way Iran gave Hezbollah medium-range rockets that Hezbollah used this summer during its war with Israel. Bombing through an intermediary has its advantages: deniability is, after all, the name of the game for a government trying to avoid nuclear retaliation.

Proliferation could also happen in other ways. Imagine a succession crisis in which the Saudi government fragments and control over nuclear weapons, should the Saudis have acquired them, falls into the hands of Saudi elites who are sympathetic to Osama bin Laden, or at least to his ideas. Or Al Qaeda itself could purchase ready-made bombs, a feat technically much less difficult than designing nuclear weapons from scratch. So far, there are few nuclear powers from whom such bombs can be directly bought: as of today, only nine nations in the world belong to the nuclear club. But as more countries get the bomb, tracing the seller will become harder and harder, and the incentive to make a sale will increase.

DOJ_NMG_0088260

II.

The prospect of not just one Islamic bomb, but many, inevitably concentrates the mind on how Muslims — whether Shiite or Sunni — might use their nuclear weapons. In the mid-1980's, when Pakistan became the first Islamic state to go nuclear, it was still possible to avoid asking the awkward question of whether there was something distinctive about Islamic belief or practice that made possession of nuclear technology especially worrisome. Most observers assumed that Islamic states could be deterred from using nuclear force just like other states: by the threat of massive retaliation.

During the last two decades, however, there has been a profound change in the way violence is discussed and deployed in the Muslim world. In particular, we have encountered the rise of suicide bombing. In historic terms, this development is new and unexpected. Suicide bombing has no traditional basis in Islam. As a technique, it was totally absent from the successful Afghan jihad against the Soviet Union. Although suicide bombing as a tool of stateless terrorists was dreamed up a hundred years ago by the European anarchists immortalized in Joseph Conrad's <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="130290;147096;43433;133169;43434;109253;109292">"Secret Agent," it became a tool of modern terrorist warfare only in 1983, when Shiite militants blew up the U.S. Marine barracks in Lebanon. </object.title>

Since then, suicide bombing has spread through the Muslim world with astonishing speed and on a surprising course. The vocabulary of martyrdom and sacrifice, the formal videotaped preconfession of faith, the technological tinkering to increase deadliness — all are now instantly recognizable to every Muslim. And as suicide bombing has penetrated Islamic cultural consciousness, its list of targets has steadily expanded. First the targets were American soldiers, then mostly Israelis, including women and children. From Lebanon and Israel, the technique of suicide bombing moved to Iraq, where the targets have included mosques and shrines, and the intended victims have mostly been Shiite Iraqis. The newest testing ground is Afghanistan, where both the perpetrators and the targets are orthodox Sunni Muslims. Not long ago, a bombing in Lashkar Gah, the capital of Helmand Province, killed Muslims, including women, who were applying to go on pilgrimage to Mecca. Overall, the trend is definitively in the direction of Muslim-on-Muslim violence. By a conservative accounting, more than three times as many Iraqis have been killed by suicide bombings in the last 3 years as have Israelis in the last 10. Suicide bombing has become the archetype of Muslim violence — not just to frightened Westerners but also to Muslims themselves.

What makes suicide bombing especially relevant to the nuclear question is that, by design, it unsettles the theory of deterrence. When the suicide bomber dies in an attack, he means to send the message "You cannot stop me, because I am already willing to die." To make the challenge to deterrence even more stark, a suicide bomber who blows up a market or a funeral gathering in Iraq or Afghanistan is willing to kill innocent bystanders, including fellow Muslims. According to the prevailing ideology of suicide bombing, these victims are subjected to an involuntary martyrdom that is no less glorious for being unintentional.

So far, the nonstate actors who favor suicide bombing have limited their collateral damage to those standing in the way of their own bombs. But the logic of sacrificing other Muslims against their own wills could be extended to the national level. If an Islamic state or Islamic terrorists used nuclear weapons against Israel, the United States or other Western targets, like London or Madrid, the guaranteed retaliation would cost the lives of thousands and maybe millions of Muslims. But following the logic of suicide bombing, the original bomber might reason that those Muslims would die in God's grace and that others would live on to fight the jihad. No state in the Muslim world has openly embraced such a view. But after 9/11, we can no longer treat the possibility as fanciful.

Raising the question of Islamic belief and the bomb, however, is not a substitute for strategic analysis of the rational interests of Islamic governments. Like other states, Islamic states act on the basis of ordinary power politics as much as or more than on the basis of religious motivation. Pakistan, which tested a series of warheads in 1998, at the height of tensions with India, has not used its atomic power as a tool of the faithful in a global jihad. The proliferation operation spearheaded by the nuclear scientist — and sometime Pakistani national hero — Dr. Abdul Qadeer Khan appears to have been based on a combination of national interest and greed, not on religious fervor. Khan found buyers in Iran and Libya, but also in decidedly non-Islamic North Korea. (In a twist much stranger than fiction, Saddam Hussein apparently turned down the offer.)

Some observers think that Iran, too, wants the bomb primarily to improve its regional position and protect itself against regime change — not to annihilate Israel. According to this view, Iran's nuclear push reflects a drive to what is sometimes called national greatness and might more accurately be defined as the ability of a country to thumb its nose at the United States without fear of major repercussions. A televised pageant hastily arranged to celebrate Iran's atomic program in April of this year featured traditional Persian dancing and colorful local garb intermixed with make-believe vials of enriched uranium. To an Iranian audience accustomed to decoding official symbols, these references were nationalist, not pan-Islamic. (They were also subtly subversive of the mullahs: singing and dancing are not favored forms of expression in the clerical enclave of Qom.)

DOJ_NMG_0088261

But at the same time, Ahmadinejad has emphasized Iran's pan-Islamic aspirations to act on behalf of Muslims everywhere. An emerging nuclear power needs friends. Right now Iran wants to reduce, not promote, division between Sunnis and Shiites — and promoting broader "Islamic" interests by going after Israel is one way to lessen Sunni fears about Iran's rise. Ahmadinejad has put his money where his mouth is, providing Hezbollah with medium-range missiles — though apparently not chemical warheads — to use against Israel. The nationalist language he has sometimes used at home may be a cover for sincerely held pan-Islamic ends — a version of the old revolutionary strategy of making nationalist claims in order to attract the support of those fellow Iranians who do not respond well to Islamist ideology. That it is convenient for Iran to emphasize Islamic unity does not mean that at least some of its leaders do not believe in it as a motivating goal.+

It is common among foreign-policy realists to suppose that a country acting on nationalist motives is easier to deter than a country moved by religious ones. There is no especially strong evidence for this assumption — plenty of nationalist regimes have done crazy things when they logically should have been deterred — but the claim has a common-sense ring to it. Nationalists care about peoples and states, which need to be alive to prosper. It is a basic tenet of nationalism that there is nothing higher than the nation-state itself, the pinnacle of a people's self-expression. Religious thinkers, on the other hand, believe almost by definition that there is something in heaven greater than government here on earth. Under the right circumstances, they might sacrifice lives — including their own — to serve the divine will as they interpret it.

III.

We urgently need to know, then, what Islam says about the bomb. Of course there is no single answer to this question. The world's billion-plus Muslims differ regarding many aspects of their 1,400-year-old religious tradition. Furthermore, nuclear weapons are a relatively new technology, unforeseen by the Prophet and unmentioned in the Koran. Nevertheless, contemporary Muslims are engaged in interpreting their tradition to ascertain how and when nuclear power may be used. Their writings, contained in fatwas and treatises that can be found on the Web and in print, tell a fascinating and disturbing story.

The Islamic discussion of nuclear weapons is profoundly intertwined with a parallel discussion of suicide bombing that is also taking place in the Muslim world. Suicide bombing and nuclear weapons typically kill without discrimination, murdering soldiers or civilians, men or women or children. And using nuclear force against another nuclear power can be suicidal, in the broad sense that retaliation may destroy the nation that attacked first. Beyond these commonalities is the fact that the rise of suicide bombing is driving a historic reconsideration of what might be called the Islamic ethics of violence. To consider Islam and the bomb today must thus inevitably draw us into the complex legal and political thinking of those Muslim authorities who justify the use of force.

The story starts with traditional Islamic law. The Shariah never followed the Roman adage that in war the laws are silent. Because jihad is a pillar of Islam, and because in Islam God's word takes legal form, the classical scholars devoted considerable care to identifying the laws of jihad. In common with the just-war doctrine developed in Christian Europe, the law of jihad governed when it was permissible to fight and what means could lawfully be adopted once warfare had begun. There were basic ground rules about who was fair game. "A woman was found killed in one of the battles fought by the Messenger of God," runs a report about the Prophet Muhammad considered reliable and binding by the Muslim scholars. "So the Messenger of God forbade the killing of women and children." This report was universally understood to prohibit the deliberate killing of noncombatant women and children. Some scholars interpreted it to mean that anyone incapable of warfare should be protected and so extended the ban to the elderly, the infirm and even male peasants, who as a rule did not fight. Muslims living among the enemy were also out of bounds. These rather progressive principles were broadly accepted by the Islamic legal authorities, Sunni and Shiite alike. For well over a thousand years, no one seriously questioned them.

Such black-and-white rules were well suited to the hand-to-hand or horse-to-horse combat characteristic of limited medieval wars. A few quirky challenges did arise, and the Muslim lawyers had to deal with them. The great theologian and jurist al-Ghazali, who wrote in the 11th and 12th centuries and was widely noted for his revival of religious piety and his skepticism of secular philosophy, dealt with the problem of human shields. He ruled that if the enemy drove captured Muslims before him, the Muslim army could still fight back, even if it might mean killing some of those Muslims. The reason he gave was that "we know that the law intends minimizing killing." There was also the catapult — precursor of artillery and air power — which was capable of sending a burning projectile into a populated city, where the resulting fire might kill women or children. Authorities differed on whether that tactic was permissible. Some disallowed the catapult when children or Muslim captives were in the city. In support, they cited a verse from the Koran that reads, "Had they been separated clearly, then We would have chastised the unbelievers among them with a painful chastisement." According to this school of thought, the "separation" of permissible targets (i.e., non-Muslim men) from impermissible targets is the precondition for a general attack. Another school of thought, by contrast, permitted the use of the catapult regardless of collateral damage in order to serve the general interest of the Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0088262

No law can exist for a millennium without being broken, and there are scattered historical reports, mostly from Christian chroniclers, of Muslim forces acting outside the bounds of lawful jihad, without the authorization of the scholars. Men were always considered legitimate targets, and Muslim armies sometimes slaughtered them just as Muslims could be slaughtered by their enemies. Remarkably enough, though, the legal principles of jihad protecting women, children and fellow Muslims survived well into the modern era, when the secular regimes of the Muslim world began to fight according to secular ideas. The World War I Armenian genocide, which took place in the last, secularizing gasp of the declining Ottoman Empire, was the first really substantial systematic violation of the ban on killing women and children in recorded Islamic history. In the bloody 20th century, when mass exterminations took place in Europe, Africa and Asia, Muslim states had a relatively better record, marred of course by Saddam Hussein's gassing of the Kurds. And there have been the genocidal killings in Darfur in this new century. Even these horrific events, however, were not dignified by the claim that they were permitted under the law of jihad.

IV.

The last two decades have seen a challenge to this Islamic tradition of warfare under law, a challenge driven mostly by the attempt to justify suicide bombing despite its evident inconsistency with Islamic tradition. On the subject of suicide, the Koran could hardly be clearer: "Do not kill yourselves; for surely God has been merciful to you." Faced with this explicit text, the solution of the militant Islamist ideologues has been to avoid the category of suicide altogether and to treat the bomber as a martyr rather than as one who has taken his own life. This interpretation is not very convincing in historical terms: martyrdom classically meant that another person killed the Muslim warrior, not that he pushed the button himself. Nevertheless, many Muslims now seem to find the argument convincing. Even among rather secular Muslims, it has become standard to refer to suicide bombers as martyrs.

The killing of women, children and Muslim men, however, has proved harder to explain away as a permissible exercise of jihad. The reaction to 9/11, which has (so far) been the high-water mark of suicide bombing, illustrates the nature of the difficulty of reconciling suicide bombing with Islamic law. One problem concerns the offensive nature of the attack at a time when the United States was not at war with any Muslim entity. Offensive jihad requires the authorization of a legitimate Muslim leader, absent on 9/11. A more serious concern was the obvious reality that the 9/11 attacks were certain to kill — and did kill — women, children and Muslims, all in direct contravention of classical jihad principles. Since the whole point of 9/11 was to announce and embody jihad on the international stage, the attacks quickly became the centerpiece of a high-stakes debate about whether they did or did not qualify as legitimate acts of jihad.

In the immediate aftermath of 9/11, it was sometimes asserted in the West that there were no Muslim voices condemning the attacks. This was never true. Prominent Muslim scholars expressed their disapprobation in public arenas like television and the Internet. These included senior Sunni scholars like the grand mufti of Saudi Arabia and the head of Al-Azhar, in Egypt, nominally the flagship institution of Sunni higher learning — who gave a news conference. More popular figures, like Al Jazeera's resident cleric, Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi, explained that Islam "considers the attack on innocent human beings a grave sin." Shiite scholars also spoke out, including Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the supreme leader of Iran.

The position of the Muslim scholars and observers who condemned the 9/11 attacks was simple and consistent across the Sunni-Shiite divide: this was not jihad but an unlawful use of violence. Offensive jihad was prohibited in the absence of formal authorization by a Muslim leader. But even if the attacks could somehow be construed as defensive, the perpetrators of 9/11 broke the rules with their willingness to kill women and children. In confident and insistent tones, these critics cited the classical scholars and insisted that nothing in Islamic law could justify the tactics used by Al Qaeda. Ayatollah Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah, the Lebanese cleric whose spiritual authority is recognized by Hezbollah, gave an interview to the Beirut newspaper Al Safir in which he asserted that given their impermissible choice of targets, the 9/11 bombers were not martyrs but "merely suicides."

At the same time, it is important to note that in 2001 few prominent Muslim scholars — the Saudi grand mufti was the main exception — condemned the use of suicide bombings in all circumstances. Fadlallah approved the attack on the U.S. Marines in 1983 and, according to the United States, played a role in ordering it. Qaradawi, whose television presence gives him reason to stay within the Islamist mainstream, distinguished the 9/11 attacks from the permissible defensive jihad of the Palestinians. He was happy to praise a God who "through his infinite wisdom ... has given the weak a weapon the strong do not have, and that is their ability to turn their bodies into bombs as Palestinians do." Qaradawi has also repeated the common view that the killing of Israeli women is justified on the grounds that all Israelis must serve in the military, and so no Israeli is a true noncombatant: "An Israeli woman is not like women in our societies, because she is a soldier."

The equivocation by Muslim scholars with respect to the technique of suicide bombing reflected the reality that throughout the Muslim world, Palestinian suicide bombers were by 2001 identified as martyrs dying in a just cause. This, in turn, was the natural outgrowth of the decades before suicide bombing, when Palestinian terrorists were applauded for killing Israeli civilians, including women and children. Given that embracing Palestinian suicide bombing had become a widespread social norm, it would have been essentially unthinkable for an important Muslim scholar to condemn the practice without losing his standing among Muslims worldwide. In the Islamic world, as in the U.S. Supreme Court, the legal authorities cannot get too far away from their public constituency without paying a price.

DOJ_NMG_0088263

What happened, in other words, is that without the scholars paying too much attention to the question, the killing of Israeli women and children had become a kind of exception to the ordinary laws of jihad. Opportunists like bin Laden then began to widen the loophole to include new victims. With respect to the unauthorized nature of his offensive jihad, bin Laden asserted that in fact the attacks were defensive, since in his mind the U.S. was occupying the sacred soil of Saudi Arabia — just as Israel was occupying the Muslim land of Palestine. Once all of Saudi Arabia was placed on a par with the holy cities of Mecca and Medina, traditionally closed to non-Muslims, the presence of American soldiers anywhere on the Arabian Peninsula (even if their presence was with the permission of the Saudi government) could be depicted as a profanation, a violation of the Prophet's deathbed directive to "banish the pagans from the Arabian Peninsula."

Bin Laden was embroidering on the theories of his onetime mentor Abdullah Azzam, the intellectual godfather of Al Qaeda. Azzam was a Palestinian Islamist who made his way to Afghanistan via Saudi Arabia and established the so-called Bureau of Services to channel Arab youth into the Afghan jihad. As Azzam trod his personal path from Palestinian militancy to universal pan-Islamic jihadism, he wrote an influential treatise called "Defense of Muslim Lands." In it, Azzam argued that not a single hand span of Muslim territory anywhere could ever be ceded to the enemy "because the land belongs to Allah and to Islam." Though Azzam would never have acknowledged it, his account of the divine ownership of Muslim lands was probably influenced — unconsciously, to be sure — by religious-Zionist claims about the holiness of the Land of Israel.

When it came to the killing of civilians, bin Laden's thought developed more gradually. In early pronouncements, before 9/11, he spoke as if the killing of women and children was inherently an atrocity. "Nor should one forget," he admonished an interviewer in 1996, "the deliberate, premeditated dropping of the H bombs [sic] on cities with their entire populations of children, elderly and women, as was the case with Hiroshima and Nagasaki." After 9/11, however, the argument changed. Now bin Laden began to suggest that American civilians were fair game. He could not argue that like Israelis, all Americans were subject to mandatory military service. Instead he proposed that because "the American people are the ones who choose their government by their own free will," and because they "have the ability and choice to refuse the policies of their government," attacks on American civilians were justified. Voting was now playing the role for Americans that military service played in the case of Israelis: the active step transforming civilians into fair game.

Such an appeal to collective responsibility was, however, pretty weak in Islamic legal terms. It might suffice for bin Laden's videotaped self-justifications, and it might salve the consciences of potential jihadis hoping to join the rank and file of Al Qaeda. But it would never satisfy serious students of classical Islamic law, who found the 9/11 attacks problematic from an Islamic legal perspective.

In Saudi Arabia in particular, radical Muslim scholars with much more learning than bin Laden have sought to develop legally persuasive justifications for civilian killings. Probably the most sophisticated effort from a legal standpoint is a document titled "A Treatise on the Law of the Use of Weapons of Mass Destruction Against the Unbelievers," written in 2003 by a brilliant Saudi dissident named Sheik Nasir bin Hamad al-Fahd. (Fahd, a theorist rather than an activist, is currently back in prison, as he has been off and on for almost a decade.) The treatise begins with the assumption that the world's Muslims are under attack. But how are today's Muslims supposed to defend themselves, given their military inferiority? Fahd's response is that, if they have no other choice, they may use any means necessary — including methods that would otherwise violate the laws of jihad. "If the unbelievers can be repelled . . . only by using" weapons of mass destruction, then "their use is permissible, even if you kill them without exception."

Lest his argument prove too much, Fahd tempers it by the claim that the Muslims fighting the jihad may not inflict disproportionately more harm on the enemy than the enemy has inflicted on them. That raises the question of the extent of American guilt. "Some Brothers have added up the number of Muslims killed directly or indirectly by [American] weapons and come up with a figure of nearly ten million," the treatise states. This total, Fahd concludes, would authorize the use of weapons of mass destruction to kill 10 million Americans: indeed, "it would be permissible with no need for further [legal] argument." (The number is never explained or analyzed, and you might assume that it was meant to correspond very roughly to the population of New York.)

Fahd's arguments sit uneasily with the classical Islamic discussions of the laws of jihad. The classical Islamic law never explicitly says that women and children may be intentional targets if it is the only way to win the jihad. It does not allow violations of the law just because the enemy has broken the rules or killed many Muslims. So the treatise must fall back on whatever evidence it can muster from the classical sources that seems to modify the basic rules. The catapult rears its head and is cited as precedent for nonspecific killing. The right to fight even when Muslim hostages may be killed is brought out as proof of the permissibility of collateral damage when there is no other choice.

DOJ_NMG_0088264

The legal arguments in use here are stronger than bin Laden's makeweights, but they, too, would probably not be sufficient on their own to justify the deviation from the legal traditions of jihad wrought by today's jihadis. The notion that it's right because it's necessary is doing the real work, and old-fashioned legal arguments are following along. It is no accident that the argument from necessity has been so prominent in modern Western writing about modern warfare in general and the nuclear bomb in particular. If the technology of mass destruction can be exported, why not the justification that comes with it?

Within the world of radical Islam, there are those who believe that the erosion of the laws of jihad has gone too far. There are reports of difficulty recruiting foreign candidates for suicide missions directed at Iraqi civilians. The debate about how jihad may be prosecuted is not over by any means. But it is an unavoidable fact that the classic restrictions on the killing of women, children and Muslims in jihad have been deeply undermined in the last decade.

V.

If the Islamic laws of war are under revision, or at least the subject of intense debate, what does that mean for the question of the Islamic bomb? The answer is that the expanding religious sanction for violence once thought unacceptable opens the way for new kinds of violence to be introduced and seen as legitimate in turn. First Israeli women and children became acceptable targets; then Americans; then Shiites; and now Sunnis of unstinting orthodoxy. It would seem that no one is out of bounds.

It is therefore now possible to imagine that the classical Islamic principles governing war would not be applied even by a self-consciously Islamic regime deciding when and if to detonate a nuclear device. The traditional ban on killing women, children and fellow Muslims would have gone a long way toward banning most potential uses of nuclear power by a sincerely Islamic state actor. As those prohibitions have eroded, the reassurance that might be afforded by a state's Islamic commitments has waned.

This means that a nuclear Islamic state would be at least as willing to use its weapons as a comparable non-Islamic state. But would an Islamic state be prepared to take the jihad to the enemy even if it would result in what amounts to collective suicide through the destruction of the state and its citizens? If the leaders of Iran or some future leaders of a radicalized, nuclear Saudi Arabia shared the aspiration to martyrdom of so many young jihadis around the world, might they be prepared to attack Israel or the United States, even if the inevitable result were the martyrdom of their entire people?

The answer depends to a large degree on whether you consider Islam susceptible to the kind of apocalyptic, millennial thought that might lead whole peoples, rather than just individuals, into suicidal behavior. It is important to note that for all his talk of the war between civilizations, bin Laden has never spoken of the end of days. For him, the battle between the Muslims and the infidels is part of earthly human life, and has indeed been with us since the days of the Prophet himself. The war intensifies and lessens with time, but it is not something that occurs out of time or with the expectation that time itself will stop. Bin Laden and his sympathizers want to re-establish the caliphate and rule the Muslim world, but unlike some earlier revivalist movements within Sunni Islam, they do not declare their leader as the mahdi, or guided one, whose appearance will usher in a golden age of justice and peace to be followed by the Day of Judgment.

From this perspective, the utter destruction of civilization would be a mistake, not the fulfillment of the divine plan. Even the most radical Sunni theorists of jihad invoke a passage from the Koran according to which civilization itself — "the crops and the cattle" — must not and cannot be destroyed completely. Bin Laden might seem to have few qualms about killing millions of Americans or other Westerners. He might well use a nuclear device if he gambled that there would be no enemy for the United States to bomb in retaliation. But even he might not be prepared to unleash a global nuclear conflagration on the expectation that a better order would emerge once many millions of Muslims and infidels died. (Bin Laden has called for Muslims to acquire nuclear weapons, and in the 1990's reportedly tried to acquire them himself — but there is little hard evidence that he has made subsequent efforts in that direction.)

With respect to Shiite eschatology, there is greater reason for concern. Iran's Shiism is of the "Twelver" variety, so called because the 12th imam in the line of succession from the Prophet disappeared into a state of occultation — or being hidden — from which he is expected to return as the mahdi. Ayatollah Khomeini played on the messianic overtones of this belief during the Iranian revolution, in which some of his followers went so far as to hint that he might be the returning imam. Moktada al-Sadr's Shiite militia in Iraq is called Army of the Mahdi. Recently, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, contributed to renewed focus on the mahdi, by saying publicly that the mission of the Islamic revolution in Iran is to pave the way for the mahdi's return, and by visiting the mosque at Jamkaran, on the outskirts of Qom, where, according to one tradition, the vanished imam was last seen. Some reports suggest that youth religion in Iran in increasingly focused on veneration of the vanished imam.

Islam has a vision of the end of days, with wars between the faithful and the tribes of Gog and Magog (Yuj and Majuj in their Arabic incarnation). Twelver Shiism is, at its core, an eschatological faith, focused on the ultimate return of the imam-mahdi, who will restore the Shiites to their rightful place and redeem their generations of suffering. Since the vanished imam is by tradition a human who has never died, but remains in occultation, he is also believed to affect the course of events even from his hidden place. And Shiite tradition fills in the picture of the mahdi's return with an elaborate account of signs that will herald the event, including advance messengers, earthquakes and bloodshed.

DOJ_NMG_0088265

But belief in redemption — even accompanied by wars and death and the defeat of the infidels — need not translate into a present impulse to create a violent crisis that would precipitate the messianic situation. Like their Jewish counterparts, Shiite religious authorities have traditionally sought to resist speculation about the imminence of a messianic return. Shiite messianic thought is less focused than its messianic Christian counterpart on generating global crisis and letting God sort things out. Khomeini himself believed that the mahdi's advent could be hastened — but by social justice, not by provoking war. This put him on the activist side of Shiite teaching about the mahdi, much as he was also an activist about the exercise of worldly power by the mullahs. A popular revolutionary slogan urged the imam's coming but asserted that Khomeini would govern alongside him.

Other Shiite thinkers, by contrast, take a more fatalist stance, and prefer to believe that the mahdi's coming cannot be hastened by human activity — a view that corresponds loosely to Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani's belief, with regard to Iraq and elsewhere, that the clerics should not themselves govern. One small, semi-secret Iranian organization, the Hojjatiya Society, was banned and persecuted by Khomeini's government in part for its quiescent view that the mahdi's arrival could not be hastened.

Ahmadinejad is not the only or even the most important player in Iran's nuclear game. The supreme leader, Ayatollah Khamenei, still makes the ultimate decisions on armaments and other matters, and there are numerous factions in the country with opposed interests and ideology and goals. Nevertheless, Ahmadinejad has in some respects succeeded in making the nuclear issue his own, and as a result his personal views about the end of days have been the subject of much speculation and innuendo, inside Iran and out. The Mideast scholar Bernard Lewis, in a recent Wall Street Journal column, hinted darkly and without much evidence that Ahmadinejad might be planning a nuclear attack on Israel for the Night of Power (this year it fell on Aug. 22), when the Prophet Muhammad made his mystical journey to the Furthest Mosque, associated in tradition with al-Aqsa in Jerusalem. Rumors, possibly spread by Ahmadinejad's enemies, have tied him to the outlawed Hojjatiya — a link mistakenly interpreted outside Iran as evidence that he might want to bring back the imam by violence, rather than that he might prefer to wait piously and prepare for the imam's eventual return on his own schedule. It is of course impossible to gauge the man's religious sensibilities perfectly. Yet the relative absence of a contemporary Shiite trend to messianic brinkmanship suggests that Ahmadinejad's recent emphasis on the mahdi may be interpreted more in terms of an attempt to summon Khomeini's legacy and Iran's revolutionary moment than as a desperate willingness to bring the nation to the edge of war. When Ahmadinejad invoked the mahdi in his now-famous letter to George Bush, he seemed to be using the doctrine in ecumenical terms, emphasizing the Islamic tradition that Jesus — revered as a prophet, though not as the Son of God — will return alongside the mahdi and govern in tandem with him.

So although a renewed Shiite messianism does create some cause for concern about the potential uses of an Iranian bomb — in particular because it suggests that Ahmadinejad may be more a utopian than a realist — it is almost certainly a mistake to anticipate that Iran would use its nuclear power in a way that would provoke large-scale retaliation and assured self-destruction. Iranian leaders have been more than ready to sacrifice their own citizens in large numbers. During the Iran-Iraq war, major efforts went into recruiting young boys to the Basij militias, which were then sent to the front lines on what were essentially suicide missions. Religion played the central part in motivating the teenage soldiers, and it is reasonable to believe that religion helped salve the consciences of those who ordered these children into battle. Yet even this discounting of the value of human life — in a war started by Saddam Hussein, not by Iran — fell short of voluntarily putting an entire nation at risk. Ahmadinejad surely understands the consequences of using a nuclear bomb, and Shiite Islam, even in its messianic incarnation, still falls short of inviting nuclear retaliation and engendering collective suicide.

VI.

These worries about an Islamic bomb raise the question of why we trust any nation with the power that a nuclear capacity confers. Why, for instance, do we trust ourselves, given that we remain the only nation actually to have used nuclear weapons? The standard answer to why we keep our nuclear bombs — a response developed during the cold war — is that we must have the capability to deter anyone who might attack us first. The promise of mutually assured destruction was its own kind of collective suicide pact, albeit one supposed to scare both sides out of pushing the button. That is why, throughout the heyday of the unilateral disarmament movement, critics of this justification pointed out that our threat was only credible if we were, in fact, prepared to kill millions of civilians in a rapid act of retaliation. If this kind of killing was morally unjustified, went their argument, then the threat to use it was also immoral.

The truth is that we hold on to our nuclear capability not only as a matter of deterrence but also to maintain our own global strategic position. If we do not want Islamic states — or anyone else for that matter — to have a nuclear capability, it is not necessarily because we consider them especially likely to bring on their own destruction by using it. It is, rather, that we do not want to cede some substantial chunk of our own global power to them. This principle — if it is a principle — lies behind the general strategy that is embedded in the international nuclear-nonproliferation treaty. Everybody involved understands that if any government got a chance to acquire nuclear power before the other treaty members had a chance to notice and impose sanctions, it would jump at the opportunity.

DOJ_NMG_0088266

So the nonproliferation regime is not and could never be based on some principle of international fairness. But it does not follow that the United States and its allies should simply accept the development of nuclear technology by just anyone. It should be relevant to our deliberations that a particular candidate is our enemy. When it comes to Islamic states, there is serious reason to worry that, both now and in the immediately foreseeable future, popular anti-American sentiment is especially likely to play an important role in the shaping of foreign policy. Over the next quarter-century, it is conceivable and certainly desirable that Islamism and anti-Americanism may be unlinked. But we must be honest and acknowledge that in the short term at least, the U.S. democratization strategy has done almost nothing to reduce Islamist anti-Americanism, whether Shiite or Sunni — this despite the fact that the same strategy has benefited Islamists across the region by allowing them to run for office and enter government.

Much of the reason for this close linkage between Islamism and anti-Americanism comes from Iran. As an enemy of the United States, which has worked consistently against American interests, Iran is in a category by itself, most nearly matched by North Korea, the other still-standing member of President Bush's axis of evil. In this, Iran's motives have been primarily Islamic-ideological, not pragmatic.

For many years under the shah, Iran was a natural American ally — precisely because it was Shiite and non-Arab, and uncomfortably close to the Soviet Union and its fantasy of a warm-water port. Even after the 1979 revolution and the hostage crisis, it is possible that the United States would have eventually reopened relations with an avowedly Islamic Iran had the government softened its anti-Americanism. The United States has never made secularism a condition of friendship. It has been fully prepared to support Islamic states like Saudi Arabia, and even used religion to cement the anti-Communist alliance during the cold war. The Iraqi Shiite Islamists have been willing to work alongside the Americans, and the United States has in return treated them as its allies, democratically chosen by the Iraqi electorate.

Islamist anti-Americanism is the direct legacy of Ayatollah Khomeini's success in marrying Islamic faith to anti-imperialism — making "Death to America" into a religious chant, not just a political slogan. Of course the United States was hardly blameless. It did everything it could to open itself to the imperialist charge, including, in Iran, backing the famous 1953 countercoup that removed from power Iran's first democratically legitimate prime minister, Mohammed Mossadegh. Contemporary Islamists can also point to America's continuing hypocritical support of regional authoritarian regimes.

Iranian-rooted Islamist anti-Americanism has worked far better than its designers might have imagined, spreading to Sunni Islamists who have little love to lose for Iran. The marriage of Islamism and anti-Americanism will probably be considered by history as the most significant consequence of the Iranian revolution. Anti-Americanism has become a staple of Islamist sermons and Web postings, an effective tool for drawing to the movement angry young people who might not naturally be drawn to religion. Bin Ladenism, in this sense, owes much to the Iranian revolution even though Al Qaeda was never Iran's direct ally. United States support for Israel has always been an important part of the argument for Islamist anti-Americanism, but today it is by no means a necessary component. If U.S. support of Israel were to weaken, the American presence in Iraq and elsewhere in the gulf would easily substitute as a basis for hatred.

The United States therefore has strong reason to block its enemy Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons — not simply because Iran will seek to become a greater regional power, as any nation might do, but because the Islamic Republic of Iran as currently constituted is definitionally anti-American. There need not be a direct threat of Iranian first use against either the United States or Israel for this reason to weigh heavily. A nuclear Iran will be a stronger and more effective enemy in pursuing anti-American policies under the banner of Islam. That will not change until the Iranian state abandons either its Islamic identity or its association between Islam and anti-Americanism. Iran's eagerness to acquire nuclear capacity need not be a result of a particularly Islamic motivation, but if and when Iran does have the bomb, its enhanced power and prestige will certainly be lent to policies that it conceives as promoting the Islamic interest.

Whether force, negotiation or some combination is the right path to take to keep Iran from going nuclear is of course a hugely important question. It turns on many uncertain facts, like the true progress of Iran's nuclear program and how much it can be affected by air attack; Iran's capacity and will to retaliate against an attack; whether there is any chance Iran would respond to negotiations; and the ability of the United States to withstand any retaliation while 150,000 U.S. troops are in Iraq. As we have recently learned in Iraq, it is not enough to think you have a good reason to go to war — you must also have a realistic understanding of the practical and moral costs of things going horribly wrong. Any choice, though, must be made against the backdrop of the reality that the Islamic government of Iran is not only unlikely to collapse soon — it is also very unlikely to become less anti-American in the near future.

The same, unfortunately, is true of the world's Islamist movements, for whom anti-Americanism remains a rallying cry and a principle of belief. Perhaps the promotion of democracy in the region, pursued consistently by the United States over the long term, might someday allow the rise of leaders whose Islamism is tempered by the need to satisfy their constituents' domestic needs — and who eschew anti-Americanism as wasteful and misguided. Iraq was the test case of whether this change could occur in the short term. But we failed to make the experiment work and gave Iraq's Islamist politicians, Shiite and Sunni alike, ample grounds to continue the anti-American rhetoric that comes so easily to them. In the wake of our tragic mismanagement of Iraq, we are certainly a generation or more from any such unlinking of Islamism and anti-Americanism, if it is to occur at all. And Islamism itself shows no signs of being on the wane as a social or political force.

DOJ_NMG_0088267

That means that the best we can hope for in nuclear Islamic states in the near term is a rational dictator like Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan, who sees his bread buttered on the side of an alliance with the West. Such rulers can be very strong and can bring stability, but we also know that their rule (or reign) promotes Islamist opposition, with its often violent overtones. When such rulers die or otherwise fall from power, the Islamists will be poised to use the international power conferred by nuclear weapons to pursue their own ends — ends for now overwhelmingly likely to be anti-American.

None of this is inherent in the structure of Islam itself. Islam contains a rich and multivocal set of traditions and ideas, susceptible to being used for good or ill, for restraint or destruction. This interpretive flexibility — equally characteristic of the other great world religions — does not rob Islam of its distinctiveness. An Islamic bomb would not be just the same as the nationalist bomb of a majority-Muslim state, nor would it be the same as a Christian bomb or a Jewish one. But its role in history will depend, ultimately, on the meaning Muslims give it, and the uses to which they put their faith and their capabilities. In confronting the possibility of the Islamic bomb, we — Muslims and non-Muslims alike — need to remember that Islam exists both as an ideal system of morals and values and as a force that motivates actual people living today, with all the frailties and imperfections that make us human.

Iran Sounds An Awful Lot Like Iraq (LAT)

By Jon Sawyer, Jon Sawyer Is Director Of The Washington-based Pulitzer Center On Crisis Reporting. He Has Reported
The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

There is a disturbing sense of déjà vu in Washington's actions and rhetoric.

AN EMBATTLED president, a Congress distracted by a sex scandal, looming midterm elections — and yet overwhelming agreement, with scant debate or publicity, on fateful legislation that set the nation on a path to war.

It happened eight autumns ago, when three-quarters of the House of Representatives and every single senator voted for regime change in Iraq.

Has it happened again, on Iran?

Four weeks ago, Congress enacted and President Bush signed the Iran Freedom Support Act, a resolution very much in the spirit of the 1998 Iraq Liberation Act. It mandates sanctions against any country aiding Iran's nuclear programs, even those to which that country is legally entitled under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The new law got virtually no coverage in the congressional rush to adjourn and amid the controversy surrounding e-mails between Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and teenage boys serving in the House page program. It has been overshadowed since by North Korea's explosion of a nuclear device and the world's debate about how to respond.

But if the confrontation over Iran's alleged nuclear weapons program ends in war — initiated by this administration or the next — you can bet this law will be cited as proof that Congress was onboard all along.

The congressional action isn't the only sign of déjà vu. Recent months have seen the creation of an "Iran directorate" at the Pentagon, using some of the same personnel as the Office of Special Plans, the shadowy Pentagon outfit led by former Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Douglas J. Feith that was accused of massaging raw intelligence on Iraq to make the case for war look far more solid than in fact it was.

Iran has now supplanted Iraq as the greatest single threat to the United States, according to the National Security Strategy released earlier this year. Articles in the New Yorker and Time describe an accelerated rate of contingency military planning in an environment in which many senior officials — on the military and civilian sides — consider war with Iran more a question of when rather than if.

As in the run-up to the Iraq war, there are assertions of a broad consensus of experts' views that Iran is intent on developing a nuclear weapons capability; and, just as in 2003, there are muted voices questioning how definitive the evidence is. (The most recent National Intelligence Estimate found that Iran's progress toward weapons capability was actually slower than previously thought, and Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte says that, in his view, Iran is still four to nine years away from having the bomb.)

Once again, U.S. officials are discounting the work of U.N. weapons inspectors on site, and, once again, those inspectors — and the agencies for which they work — are saying that the best way to contain the nuclear threat is to keep them in place.

DOJ_NMG_0088268

"People confuse knowledge, industrial capacity and intention," Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, told Newsweek magazine in an interview last week. "A lot of what you see about Iran right now is assessment of intentions."

He and other IAEA officials warn that the Bush administration's hard-line suspicions of Iran could make reading those intentions even harder. Tehran has already suspended IAEA access to some nuclear facilities and could expel the international inspectors entirely. It happened in Iraq in 1998 — and the vacuum that followed made possible ever-more speculative estimates as to Iraq's imagined progress toward fielding weapons of mass destruction.

The run-up to possible war is also marked, yet again, by the absence of firsthand knowledge of the enemy.

The war to topple Saddam Hussein came 12 years after the rupture of diplomatic relations, with U.S. policymakers dependent on questionable exile groups long removed from direct knowledge of conditions inside the country. In the case of Iran, the gap is longer still — nearly 27 years since Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini seized power.

Assistant Secretary of State R. Nicholas Burns announced earlier this year that State Department diplomats would be based in Dubai and elsewhere in the Middle East and Europe to monitor Iran, in a move he likened to Riga Station, the Latvian capital where, during the 1920s and 1930s, diplomats such as George Kennan kept tabs on the Soviet Union. The effort comes late. As Burns himself acknowledged, as recently as early last year, "there were exactly two people focusing full time on Iran" at the State Department.

To be sure, war with Iran is nowhere near as inevitable as the neoconservative proponents of aggressive action would make it appear. The U.S. military is mired in Iraq. The combination of vast oil reserves and 70 million people make Iran a formidable adversary, one that has shown itself more than willing to rely on groups such as Hezbollah or Hamas to wage terrorism on the United States, Israel and allied nations. Here at home, meanwhile, public opinion surveys show little appetite for another go at preventive war.

In the face of those hurdles, and the acknowledged gaps in proven facts, it is remarkable that the neoconservative handmaidens of the Iraq war are so assertive on Iran, as to the inevitability of war and the rightness of waging it.

Last April, the Weekly Standard ran an article nearly 8,000 words long laying out the case for war, why diplomacy and sanctions are doomed to fail and why letting Tehran actualize its nuclear weapons potential would be more threatening to the U.S. and to the world than the consequences of whatever it takes — even land invasion on the scale of Iraq — to prevent that from happening. The article's author was Reuel Marc Gerecht, a former CIA Middle East specialist and resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute who has a record of being articulate, confident and — in the case of Iraq — wrong.

An issue brief that Gerecht wrote for the American Enterprise Institute in August 2002 predicted that the U.S. invasion of Iraq would likely prompt "simultaneous uprisings" by freedom-seeking Iranians. A November 2002 column dismissed concerns that war with Iraq would destabilize the Middle East. "The one truly unsettling thing a second Persian Gulf war might unleash," Gerecht wrote, "is Iraqi democracy." In February 2003, he brushed aside concerns that the Iraq war might inspire acts of terrorism by Muslims in Europe. "The coming war in Iraq," he wrote, "will probably diminish, not enhance, the odds that young Muslim males will become holy warriors…."

But at a time when a majority of Americans have turned against the Iraq war, when Bush's long advantage on national security issues is under fire and when Democrats dream of wresting control of not just the House of Representatives but the Senate too, the most extraordinary parallel to the pre-Iraq-war environment is that so many Democrats have given the administration a vote on Iran that amounts to yet another blank-check endorsement of U.S. unilateralism — even as diplomats struggle in New York to craft a multilateral approach to Iran.

Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Los Angeles) voted for the Iran Freedom Support Act. So did House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.). So did all but 21 members of the House and every member of the Senate, which approved the measure by unanimous voice vote.

The law they backed codifies existing U.S. sanctions against Iran — and extends those sanctions to any countries or companies deemed to have aided Iran in the development or acquisition of nuclear weapons or of "destabilizing numbers and types" of advanced conventional weapons. It states the sense of Congress that the United States shall not enter into any form of cooperation with the government of any country that so aids Iran, unless and until Iran has suspended all uranium enrichment-related and reprocessing-related nuclear activity and has "committed to verifiably refrain from such activity in the future" — even though such activities are permitted under the terms of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Democrats who voted for the measure were at pains to distinguish it from the Iraq Liberation Act, noting, for example, that the legislation specifically rejected military aid to opponents of Iran's current government, and that it calls for Iran's "democratic transformation," not regime change. Among those who favor both, however, this is seen as little more than a wink and a nod.

Michael Ledeen, an American Enterprise Institute scholar, has beaten the Iran war drums for years. He told the House International Relations Committee in testimony last March that he was untroubled that the new law stops short of explicitly calling for regime change. "People are just afraid of coming out and using the language," he said. "You cannot have freedom in Iran without bringing down the mullahs, so what are we talking about?"

DOJ_NMG_0088269

In 1998, the Clinton administration went along with the Iraq Liberation Act reluctantly, fearing that the law's stark anti-Saddam Hussein line would tie its hands. Republican leaders were demanding a tough line, and Democrats, facing midterm elections in the shadow of President Clinton's pending impeachment, were eager to go along.

For all its bellicose rhetoric on Iran, the Bush administration appeared to have similar reservations about the Iran Freedom Support Act. It staved off congressional action for more than a year, contending that mandatory sanctions would short-circuit the delicate diplomacy of taking Iran to the U.N. Security Council. To critics within the administration, the law raised the specter of U.S. unilateralism at a moment when Washington needed allies more than ever.

The administration eventually gave in to congressional insistence on tough talk — not just from Republicans but from Democrats, the latter seizing the chance to draw a foreign policy red line while at the same time assailing Bush for wasting lives and dollars in Iraq.

Smart politics? Most Republicans and most Democrats appear to believe that it is — that it's a good idea to take Iran off the table, to make sure it doesn't figure as an issue in the Nov. 7 elections. It's reminiscent of the decision many of them made before the midterms in 1998 and again in 2002, when the bipartisan vote authorizing use of force against Iraq made the looming war almost a nonissue in that year's midterm elections.

Maybe this time, on Iran, someone will yet decide that it's worth taking the debate to the people.

Russia Led Arms Sales To Developing World In '05 (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 28 — Russia surpassed the United States in 2005 as the leader in weapons deals with the developing world, and its new agreements included selling $700 million in surface-to-air missiles to Iran and eight new aerial refueling tankers to China, according to a new Congressional study.

Those weapons deals were part of the highly competitive global arms bazaar in the developing world that grew to $30.2 billion in 2005, up from $26.4 billion in 2004. It is a market that the United States has regularly dominated.

Russia's agreements with Iran are not the biggest part of its total sales — India and China are its principal buyers. But the sales to improve Iran's air-defense system are particularly troubling to the United States because they would complicate the task of Pentagon planners should the president order airstrikes on Iran's nuclear weapons facilities.

The Bush administration has vowed a diplomatic solution in dealing with Iran. But as United Nations diplomats argue over potential sanctions against Iran for its nuclear ambitions, Russian officials have expressed reluctance to vote for the most stringent economic sanctions, partly owing to Moscow's extensive trade relations with Tehran.

Russia's weapons sales to China also worry Pentagon planners. Although China has joined the United States in partnership to press for a resumption of six-party talks to end North Korea's nuclear weapons program after its recent test, Taiwan remains a potential flash point between Beijing and Washington.

Thus, China's ability to refuel its attack planes and bombers to enable them to fly farther from Chinese soil could require the United States Navy to operate even farther out to sea should the United States military be called to deal with a crisis in the Taiwan Strait. That would have an impact on the range and number of air missions of United States Navy aircraft launched from carriers.

Details of the specific weapons deals in the global arms trade last year are included in an annual study by the Congressional Research Service that is considered the most thorough compilation of statistics available in an unclassified form. The report was delivered to members of Congress on Friday.

Among other arms transfers described in the study was a statistic that a single, unnamed nation — but one identified separately by Pentagon and other administration officials to be North Korea — shipped about 40 ballistic missiles to other nations in the four-year period ending in 2005, the only nation to have done so. Transfers of these weapons are prohibited under international agreements to control the trade of ballistic missiles.

United Nations sanctions passed earlier this month after the North Korean nuclear test include a new and specific ban on trade or transport of ballistic missiles and missile parts to or from North Korea.

The report, entitled "Conventional Arms Transfers to Developing Nations," found that Russia's arms agreements with the developing world totaled $7 billion in 2005, an increase from its $5.4 billion in sales in 2004. That figure surpassed the United States' annual sales agreements to the developing world for the first time since the collapse of the Soviet Union.

France ranked second in arms transfer agreements to developing nations, with $6.3 billion, and the United States was third, with $6.2 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0088270

The leading buyer in the developing world in 2005 was India, with $5.4 billion in weapons purchases, followed by Saudi Arabia with $3.4 billion and China with $2.8 billion.

The total value of all arms sales deals worldwide, when counting both developing and developed nations, in 2005 was $44.2 billion.

The Russian sales in 2005 included 29 of the SA-15 Gauntlet surface-to-air missile systems for Iran; Russia also signed deals to upgrade Iran's Su-24 bombers and MIG-29 fighter aircraft, as well as its T-72 battle tanks.

"For a period of time, in the mid-1990s, the Russian government agreed not to make new advanced weapons sales to the Iran government," wrote Richard F. Grimmett, author of the study by the Congressional Research Service, a division of the Library of Congress. "That agreement has since been rescinded by Russia. As the U.S. focuses increasing attention on Iran's efforts to enhance its nuclear as well as conventional military capabilities, major arms transfers to Iran continue to be a matter of concern."

Russia also agreed in 2005 to sell China eight of the IL-78M aerial refueling tanker aircraft, according to the study.

In 2005, the United States led in total arms transfer agreements, when deals to both developed and developing nations are combined. The total was $12.8 billion, down from $13.2 billion in 2004.

The report charted no blockbuster military sales deals by the United States in 2005, and the total in many ways was reached by sales of spare parts for weapons purchased under previous contracts.

France ranked second in total sales, with $7.9 billion, up from $2.2 billion in 2004. Russia was third when sales to developing and developed nations were combined, with $7.4 billion, up from $5.6 billion in 2004.

The study uses figures in 2005 dollars, with amounts for previous years adjusted to account for inflation.

Report: U.S. Mulls Defenses For Tokyo (AP)

By Hans Greimel

AP, October 29, 2006

The U.S. is considering deploying its advanced Patriot missile defense system near Tokyo after North Korea's recent missile and nuclear tests, a newspaper reported Sunday.

Washington unofficially informed the Japanese government it is considering putting Patriot Advanced Capability 3 surface-to-air interceptor missiles around Yokota Air Base in Tokyo's western suburbs and around Yokosuka Naval Base, south of the capital, the Nihon Keizai newspaper reported without saying how it got the information.

The added defenses would cover critical U.S. military installations on the outskirts of Tokyo.

The move would be part of a previously announced U.S.-Japanese effort to deploy PAC-3 missile defense systems around the country as the two allies look for ways to counter what is seen as a growing threat from neighboring North Korea.

North Korea alarmed the region in July by test firing several missiles, including a long-range model believed capable of striking the western U.S. Earlier this month, the isolated communist country sparked global outrage by its first-ever test of a nuclear bomb.

Analysts doubt North Korea's ability to accurately deliver atomic weapons atop its missiles. But after the missile test, the U.S. and Japan announced plans to deploy the Patriots, which are designed to destroy ballistic or cruise missiles and aircraft.

U.S. military officials have already confirmed that the first batch of equipment for the PAC-3 missiles arrived in Okinawa in southern Japan, where the bulk of U.S. forces in the nation are stationed.

The Patriots would be used as a last resort if Standard Missile-3 interceptors fired from U.S. and Japanese ships fail to knock out incoming missiles, the report said.

U.S. May Deploy Patriot Missiles (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

The United States is considering deploying its advanced Patriot missile defense system near Tokyo after North Korea's recent missile and nuclear tests, a Japanese newspaper reported today.

Washington unofficially informed the Japanese government that it was considering the surface-to-air interceptor missiles around two U.S. bases, Yokota Air Base in Tokyo's western suburbs and Yokosuka naval base, south of the capital, the Nihon Keizai newspaper reported.

The move would be part of an ongoing U.S.-Japanese effort to counter what is seen as North Korea's growing threat.

U.S. Jobs Shape Condoms' Role In Foreign Aid (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

DOJ_NMG_0088271

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

EUFAULA, Alabama — Here in this courtly, antebellum town, Alabama's condom production has survived an onslaught of Asian competition, thanks to the patronage of straitlaced congressmen from this Bible Belt state.

Behind the scenes, the politicians have ensured that companies in Alabama won federal contracts to make billions of condoms over the years for AIDS prevention and family planning programs overseas, though Asian factories could do the job at less than half the cost.

In recent years, the state's condom manufacturers fell hundreds of millions of condoms behind on orders, and the federal aid agency began buying them from Asia. The use of Asian-made condoms has contributed to layoffs that are coming next month.

But Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, has quietly pressed to maintain the unqualified priority for American-made condoms and is likely to prevail if the past is any guide.

"What's wrong with helping the American worker at the same time we are helping people around the world?" asked the senator's spokesman, Michael Brumas.

That question goes to the heart of an intensifying debate among wealthy nations about to what degree foreign aid is about saving jobs at home or lives abroad.

Britain, Ireland and Norway have all sought to make aid more cost effective by opening contracts in their programs to fight global poverty to international competition. The United States, meanwhile, continues to restrict bidding on billions of dollars worth of business to companies operating in America, and not just those that make condoms.

The wheat to feed the starving must be grown in United States and shipped to Africa, enriching agribusiness giants like Archer Daniels Midland and Cargill. The American consulting firms that carry out antipoverty programs abroad — dubbed beltway bandits by critics — do work that some advocates say local groups in developing countries could often manage at far less cost.

The history of the federal government's condom purchases embodies the tradeoffs that characterize foreign aid American-style. Alabama's congressmen have long preserved several hundred factory jobs here by insisting that the United States Agency for International Development buy condoms made here, though, probably in a nod to their conservative constituencies, most have typically done so discreetly.

Those who favor tying aid to domestic interests say that it not only preserves jobs and supports American companies, but helps ensure broad political support for foreign aid, which is not always popular.

On the other hand, skepticism of foreign aid is frequently rooted in the perception that the money is not well spent. Blame often falls on corrupt leaders in poor countries, but aid from rich nations with restrictions requiring it to be spent in the donor country can also reduce effectiveness.

The United States government, the world's largest donor of condoms, has bought more than nine billion condoms over the past two decades. Under President Bush's global AIDS plan, which dedicates billions of dollars to fight the epidemic, a third of the money for prevention must go to promoting abstinence. But that leaves two-thirds for other programs, so the federal government's distribution of condoms has risen, to over 400 million a year.

Over the years, Usaid could have afforded even more condoms — among the most effective methods for slowing the spread of AIDS — if it had it bought them from the lowest bidders on the world market, as have the United Nations Population Fund and many other donors.

Randall L. Tobias, who heads Usaid, declined through a spokesman to be interviewed on this topic. His predecessor, Andrew Natsios, sought to weaken the hold of what he sometimes called a cartel of domestic interest groups over foreign aid. He tried, for example, to persuade Congress to allow the purchase of some African food to feed Africa's hungry. Congress killed that proposal last year and again this year.

Hilary Benn, Britain's secretary of state for international development, said in an interview that in 2001 his country untied its aid from requirements that only British firms could bid for international antipoverty work.

"If you untie aid, it's 100 percent clear you're giving aid to reduce poverty and not to benefit your own country's commercial interests," he said.

In recent years, most of the low-end condom business has moved to Asia, including Australia-based Ansell, which used to have plants in Alabama. American makers cannot compete with Asia on price — unless they have the federal contract.

The last American factory making condoms for Usaid sits anonymously in a pine-shaded industrial park here in Eufaula. Inside a modern, low-slung building owned by Alatech Healthcare, ingenious contraptions almost as long as a football field repeatedly dip 16,000 phallic-shaped bulbs into vats of latex, with the capacity to turn out a billion condoms a year.

The equation of need is never straightforward. Africa's need to forestall its slow-motion catastrophe of AIDS deaths is vast. But there is need here, too.

Most of the 260 people employed at this factory and the company's packaging plant in Slocomb are women, some the children of sharecroppers and textile factory workers, many of them struggling to support families on $7 to $8 an hour.

The most vulnerable among them — single mothers and older women with scant education — are the most fearful of foreign competition. All feel the looming threat.

"It's cheaper, yeah," said Lisa Jackson, 42, a worker in the packaging plant. "But we Americans should have first choice. We need our jobs to stay in America. We got to feed our families. I just wish it had never come to sending manufacturing jobs overseas."

From 2003 to 2005, Alatech and one other company making condoms for Usaid fell behind on their orders, agency officials said. Last year, the other company went bankrupt. So Usaid ordered condoms from Asia, the first of which were shipped last year. With only a single American company still in line for the federal contract, agency officials are wary of ruling out Asian suppliers.

At such moments in the past, Alabama's politicians have come to the rescue of the state's condom industry. This time was no exception.

Senator Richard C. Shelby, a Republican on the Appropriations Committee, had a provision tucked into the 2004 budget bill requiring that Usaid buy only American-made condoms to the extent possible, given cost and availability. His spokeswoman, Kate Boyd, said the agency did not tell him it was worried about the relative cost of American and Asian-made condoms.

Senator Sessions wrote Usaid a letter last year saying it should purchase condoms from foreign producers only after it had bought all the condoms American companies could make, noting it was "extremely important to jobs in my state."

Usaid assured the senator in writing that it "remains committed to prioritizing domestic suppliers."

On the strength of that, Alatech bought the more modern Eufaula plant from its bankrupt rival. Without the government contract, the company's president, Larry Povlacs, said, Alatech would go out of business.

In interviews, agency officials were noncommittal about whether they would halt all purchases in Asia. Condoms made there cost around 2 cents each, opposed to about 5 cents for those made here.

"At the end of the day, it's all a political process," Bob Lester, who recently retired after 31 years as a lawyer at Usaid, said of such decisions. "The foreign aid program has very few rabbis. Why make enemies when you don't have to?"

Duff Gillespie, a retired senior Usaid official who is now a professor at the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health, said that over the years officials at Usaid raised the prospect of foreign competition to tamp down what he called "the greed factor" of Alabama condom manufacturers.

But whenever the staff pushed to buy in Asia, Alabama politicians pushed right back.

During the Reagan years, the offices of two Alabamans, Representative William Dickinson, a Republican, and Senator Howell Heflin, a Democrat, caught wind of one such move. Mike Houston, chief of staff to Senator Heflin, recalled being tipped off by Mr. Dickinson's chief of staff.

"He says, 'Well, A.I.D. is going to buy condoms from Korea,' " Mr. Houston recalled. " 'The reason is they can get three condoms for the price of one that they're paying us.' " Mr. Houston said he asked in amazement, "You mean we're making rubbers in Alabama?"

The congressmen's staffs threatened to introduce amendments to require that condoms be made in America. The agency backed off.

Further attempts to open up bidding proved fruitless. Representative Jim McDermott, a Democrat from Washington State, had seen the devastation of AIDS firsthand in the 1980s as a State Department medical officer in Africa. But he said he could not break what he called the "stranglehold" of Alabama congressmen on the condom rules.

In the mid-to-late 1990s, Representative Sonny Callahan, a Republican from Alabama, served as chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee that shaped Usaid's budget. Brian Atwood, who headed Usaid in those years, said no administrator "in his right mind" would have tried to cut Alabama out of the condom contract at a time when many Republicans were deeply hostile to foreign aid.

Then in 2001, after decades of negotiation, the United States and other wealthy donor nations reached a nonbinding agreement to open at least some foreign aid contracts to all qualified bidders. Included were those for commodities bound for the world's poorest nations.

Usaid decided the agreement did not apply to condoms since some went to more advanced developing countries. Alabama's manufacturers kept the condom business once again.

William Nicol, who heads the poverty reduction division of the Development Assistance Committee at the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a group of economically advanced countries, scoffed at Usaid's interpretation. "That's rubbish," he said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0088273

The condom companies' inability in recent years to fulfill Usaid's orders accomplished what the gentleman's agreement did not: the entry of Asian competitors.

Usaid has asked Alatech to make 201 million condoms next year, less than half of this year's order, and ordered another 100 million made in Korea and China.

Come Nov. 15, Alatech will lay off more than half its work force. Those jobs fell victim to Usaid's smaller orders for condoms, foreign competition and automation.

The reactions of these workers ranged from philosophical to panicked.

One, Garry Appling, a 41-year-old single mother, has worked before as a $6-an-hour cashier at Krystal, the fast food restaurant, and another at $7.15 an hour in a chicken processing plant. She said her 10-year-old daughter, Anterria, worries that she will have to go back to the chicken plant, a place so cold and wet Ms. Appling often fell ill.

But even facing her own impending job loss, Ms. Appling took a moment to empathize with the women making condoms on the other side of the world.

"We need a job — I guess they do, too," she said, during a brief pause from feeding condoms into an intricate, rotating, whooshing machine that tested them for holes. "It's sad.

"At the same time, the United States can't just keep helping overseas. They've got to help us, too."

Fueling U.S. Adversaries (WT)

By David R. Sands, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

Special Report

These are flush times for some of America's most determined adversaries.

Exploiting tight global energy markets and soaring gas prices in recent years, leading energy producers around the globe are using their export windfalls to challenge U.S. interests, intimidate U.S. allies and, in some cases, bankroll terrorist and insurgent groups fighting U.S. forces.

Major producers such as Venezuela, Russia and Iran have teamed up with emerging energy consumers -- notably China -- in an "axis of oil" to frustrate U.S. foreign-policy objectives, according to Flynt Leverett, a former top Middle East adviser in the Bush administration, and Pierre Noel, a research fellow with the French Institute of International Relations.

"The political consequences of recent changes in global energy markets are posing the most profound challenge to American hegemony since the end of the Cold War," the two concluded in a recent survey in the journal National Interest.

Even Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a veteran of both Bush administrations and a longtime foreign-policy scholar, conceded earlier this year she underestimated the ways the "energy question" distorted international relations.

"I can tell you that nothing has really taken me aback more as secretary of state than the way the politics of energy is -- I will use the word 'warping' -- diplomacy around the world," she told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in April.

"It has given extraordinary power to some states that are using that power in not very good ways for the international system, states that would have otherwise have very little power," she said.

Andrei Illarianov, top economic adviser to Russian President Vladimir Putin before resigning last year in protest at the government's anti-democratic policies, said reform at home and cooperation with the West both declined sharply as the Kremlin seized control of the country's biggest energy companies.

"The correlation was very direct," said Mr. Illarianov, now a research fellow at the Cato Institute, a Washington-based libertarian think tank.

While oil prices have retreated from the mid-July record of $78 a barrel, the current $57-a-barrel price remains far above the levels of just a few years ago.

The result: hundreds of billions of dollars swelling the coffers of regimes hostile to the United States.

Mr. Noel, in a talk last week, said the idea of a direct link between terrorism and oil is "simplistic," saying it was not likely that a different U.S. energy policy and drastic reductions in American energy imports from the Middle East would make a dent in terrorist-financing networks.

Iran aside, he added, none of the countries that have most recently obtained nuclear weapons, from India and Israel to North Korea, relied on oil money to fund their research programs.

Still, some of the main problem countries on the U.S. diplomatic horizon all have one thing in common: deep energy pockets.

· Iran's Islamist regime, sitting on the world's third-largest known oil reserves and second-largest natural-gas reserves, so far has dismissed U.S.-led efforts to sanction and isolate its economy over its suspected nuclear-weapons programs.

DOJ_NMG_0088274

Even before this year's surge in prices, Iran was earning $30 billion more annually from its oil exports alone compared with a decade ago, according to the D.C.-based Institute for International Economics.

The windfall has not only allowed hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to boost social spending at home, but to finance groups considered terrorist by the State Department, such as Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and Hamas and Islamic Jihad in the Palestinian territories.

GlobalSecurity.org, which tracks international terrorist groups, said Hezbollah was founded by Iranian agents in the early 1980s and the group "receives substantial amounts of financial, training, weapons, explosives, political, diplomatic and organizational aid" from both Iran and Syria, putting Tehran's annual assistance at between $25 million and $50 million.

Iran is also widely thought to be the source of the wads of cash Hezbollah leaders were distributing to followers in the aftermath of this summer's 34-day war with Israel.

· Analysts also see oil as the lubricant enabling Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez to conduct an outspokenly anti-American foreign policy as head of the world's fifth-largest oil exporter.

Planning Minister Jorge Giordani said last week that oil revenues for the state-owned energy company have soared from $9.84 billion in 2003 to $33.5 billion so far in 2006, with transfer payments from the oil sector to the government up 65 percent in the past two years.

The flamboyant Mr. Chavez has used the petrodollars to finance a foreign policy sharply at odds with Washington -- even though the United States is Venezuela's single biggest oil-export market.

He has openly promoted leftist political allies in Bolivia and other Latin American countries, subsidized the ailing economy of Cuban dictator Fidel Castro and recently conducted an expensive global lobbying campaign in a failed bid to win a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

The State Department's annual global terrorism survey concluded it was "unclear" whether any of Venezuela's oil wealth had made its way to leftist guerrilla groups fighting the U.S.-backed government in neighboring Colombia. But the report found Caracas' cooperation in the global war on terror "negligible."

Mr. Chavez "persisted in public criticism of U.S. counterterrorism efforts, publicly championed Iraqi terrorists, deepened Venezuelan collaboration with state sponsors of terrorism such as Cuba and Iran, and was unwilling to deny safe haven to members of Colombian terrorist groups," the State Department report found.

· Sudan began exporting oil only seven years ago, but energy riches have left it largely indifferent to outside critics of its brutal campaign against rebel groups in the country's western region of Darfur, a campaign the U.S. government has formally labeled a "genocide."

Despite a decade of U.S. sanctions and pressure on investment by international energy companies, Sudan's economy grew by 8 percent in 2005 and is expected to expand by 12 percent this year -- almost entirely because of oil exports. Sudan is now sub-Saharan Africa's third-largest oil producer, trailing only Nigeria and Angola.

Khartoum has had no difficulty financing its army and Arab militias known as the "Janjaweed" in the Darfur conflict. Former Finance Minister Abda Yahia el-Mahdi recently told the New York Times that 70 percent of the government's oil revenues are devoted to defense and to arms manufacture.

Mr. Leverett and Mr. Noel say the Iran and Sudan cases illustrate another way the "axis of oil" distorts global politics and frustrates U.S. foreign-policy goals.

Major energy importers such as China, they say, shield hostile governments from U.S. pressure.

With a veto as a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, China has acted as a brake on U.S. plans for tough action against Iran and Sudan. China's state energy companies are busy locking up supplier deals and joint oil-field development projects.

"China's search for oil is making it a new competitor to the United States for influence, especially in the Middle East, Central Asia and Africa," the analysts say.

A report from a Council on Foreign Relations task force on U.S. energy policy chaired by former Energy Secretary James R. Schlesinger and former CIA chief John M. Deutch concluded earlier this month that competition among major importers will only increase, harming U.S. influence.

"Large oil consumers have tended to become especially focused on securing supply and ignore the effects of their investments on corruption and mismanagement," the task force found. "In Sudan, for example, despite civil war and widespread human rights abuses, the Chinese government and its oil enterprises are funding extensive oil supply and infrastructure projects."

Energy clout is even playing a growing role in the sectarian tensions dividing Iraq and the Middle East. Plans for greater autonomy for Iraq's warring regions have foundered over the basic fact that most of the country's oil wealth is found in provinces dominated by Iraq's Kurds and Shi'ite Muslim Arabs -- leaving Sunni Arabs out in the cold.

DOJ_NMG_0088275

Mamoun Fandy, an influential Arab newspaper columnist and a professor of Middle East Studies at the National Defense University, said the region's leading Sunni governments fear a loss of major oil-producing assets with the rise of Shi'ite political movements linked to Iran.

Even in strictly Sunni Saudi Arabia, many of the country's most productive fields are found in the eastern part of the country inhabited by the country's small Shi'ite minority.

"It sometimes seems that every place you find an oil well, there is a Shi'ite standing by it," he said.

Accentuating the trend of mixing oil and politics is the increasing clout of state-owned national oil companies, or NOCs, most under close supervision of their parent governments, in global energy markets.

NOCs hold nearly three-quarters of the world's proven oil reserves.

The largest private firm on the list of oil-reserve giants -- ExxonMobil -- now ranks only 12th in the world in known reserves, far behind the state-owned oil companies of Saudi Arabia, Russia, Mexico, Venezuela, Iraq and Iran.

The transforming power of oil and natural gas can be seen clearly in the evolving foreign policy of Russia.

In the 1990s, when global oil prices plummeted, the near-bankrupt government of then-President Boris Yeltsin posed few challenges to U.S. and Western European foreign-policy goals, including the expansion of NATO to Russia's doorstep and the bombing campaign against Serbia, Moscow's ally, in the 1999 Kosovo war.

After 2000, the Kremlin under President Vladimir Putin first moved to bring Russian energy firms such as Yukos under its direct control, and used the money and market clout to revitalize Russian foreign policy.

In talks with the European Union and the countries on its border that are dependent on Russian oil and natural gas, Moscow has not been shy about advertising its new clout.

"It is the ultimate weapon they can use against us," said Nikoloz Rurua, deputy chairman of the committee on defense and security in Georgia's parliament.

Add Mr. Leverett and Mr. Noel: "Moscow is using its market power to push back against the United States in arenas where it perceives U.S. infringement on its interests."

Just last week, Russian newspapers reported that Ukraine -- target of a brief cutoff by Moscow last winter -- was being asked to make political concessions in return for a new natural-gas supply deal with Russia.

The concessions included slowing Ukraine's drive to join NATO and linking Ukraine's bid to join the World Trade Organization to Russia's own stalled application.

"I would say quite openly that we need to synchronize the negotiation process of our countries on WTO," Russian Prime Minister Mikhail Fradkov said after a meeting Wednesday to conclude the deal with his Ukrainian counterpart, Viktor Yanukovych.

But Ukrainian opposition leader Yulia Tymoshenko denounced the natural-gas deal as "treason" and warned Ukraine was losing its independence from Russia.

Chirac's Last Act: Lion In Winter, Wolves All Around (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 28 — From afar, Jacques Chirac is the embodiment of France. Charming, debonair, skilled in the national art of social discourse, France's president since 1995 seems to be gliding toward retirement and a respectable place in history.

But here at home, he has been under unrelenting — indeed unprecedented — attack, so much so that the newspaper Libération has named "Chiracophobia" as "the new national sport."

The assaults have crescendoed since Mr. Chirac suffered what has been called a mild cerebral attack a year ago, focusing on his age, his leadership and his legacy. The newspaper Le Monde described him as "the absent one" and even suggested that he consider resigning.

A TNS Sofres poll this month gave him an approval rating of 24 percent, up from 16 percent last July, but still making him the most unpopular French president since the firm began presidential polling in 1978.

The disillusionment with Mr. Chirac is not only personal but also a reflection of the dread among the French public that their nation has lost its glory abroad and its way at home. That feeling is especially acute on the anniversary this week of the brutal unrest that gripped several suburbs a year ago.

Widespread criticism that little has changed to improve the plight of the country's underclass underscores a larger point: that Mr. Chirac's 1995 campaign promises to "mend the social fracture" in France and reduce unemployment, among other things, have been unfulfilled.

The most recent bludgeoning came on two evenings this week, in a four-hour documentary of his political career that aired on France 2 television — the first time an assessment of a sitting president has been shown on public television in prime time.

DOJ_NMG_0088276

France's political elite — many of them onetime friends and colleagues of Mr. Chirac — lined up to tell stories about his thirst for power, his betrayals, his opportunism and his policy U-turns that have earned him the nickname "the Weathervane."

"A sort of political Don Juan, more preoccupied with the conquest or the preservation of power than by its execution," said Philippe Séguin, a minister in the 1980s.

A "chevalier of opportunism" who put into place a system of "corruption" in the years he was mayor of Paris, said Raymond Barre, the former prime minister who was part of Mr. Chirac's own camp.

Olivier Stirn, a former minister who worked under Mr. Chirac in the 1970s, described him even more brutally. "Chirac," he said, "is a killer."

Certainly, Patrick Rotman, the historian who made the television documentary, whose two parts were titled "The Young Wolf" and "The Old Lion," had a lot of material to work with.

Mr. Chirac, who turns 74 next month, has held no jobs outside of government. He joined the civil service in the 1950s, was elected to Parliament in 1967 and became a junior minister for the first time later that year. He was prime minister in the 1970s and again in the 1980s.

He is the only sitting politician who has served every Fifth Republic president since Charles de Gaulle. Many French people have never known politics without him.

"Chirac was a wild cat who eliminated everyone in his way to the Élysée," Mr. Rotman said. "Now he is rather alone and isolated. It's the tragedy of powerful men who were kings, who gave their lives to win power and at the end of their reign are abandoned."

Mr. Rotman's documentary is perhaps the most authoritative but only one of many attempts to write Mr. Chirac's political history — and obituary — in the past year. As the end of his political career draws near, the fear of him has receded, and the time to settle scores has come.

In his third volume of memoirs published this month, for example, former President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing accuses Mr. Chirac, a fellow politician of the center-right, of a double betrayal in the 1981 presidential election, which brought François Mitterrand, the Socialist leader, to power. Instead of supporting Mr. Giscard d'Estaing against Mr. Mitterrand, Mr. Chirac ran as well. Even worse, Mr. Giscard d'Estaing recounts a deathbed conversation in which Mr. Mitterrand credits his victory in the second round to secret support from Mr. Chirac.

"What motivates him is a fanatical desire to reach the presidency of the Republic," Mr. Giscard d'Estaing wrote in the book, already a best seller. "This obsession wipes out everything else — convictions as well as respect for the rules."

In "The Irresponsible," another best seller, Hervé Gattegno, a journalist for Le Monde, accuses Mr. Chirac of transforming France into an autocracy, using his presidency with "political and judicial irresponsibility, as a debtor without scruples uses his insolvency."

Earlier, "The Tragedy of the President," an unforgiving portrait by veteran journalist Franz-Olivier Giesbert, drew on private conversations with Mr. Chirac and pictured him as personifying the decline of France. The book was a runaway best seller.

"By cowardice as much as blindness, he persists in pursuing policies that have been leading the country to ruin for more than 20 years," Mr. Giesbert wrote.

As Mr. Giesbert explained to an interviewer after the book was published, "We are in the world of Shakespeare now, and the king is alone because he killed off any rivals and many friends."

But Mr. Chirac is not a politician who can go quietly into the night. The aura of the presidency is too powerful, the adulation of the crowd intoxicating. The French have already looked beyond him, but he is unready to say adieu.

Mr. Chirac has refused to announce that he will not run for a third term next spring, saying that he will announce his decision next March.

Last weekend, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin perpetuated the notion that there might be a third term for Mr. Chirac, praising his experience and calling the question of his running again "legitimate."

The conventional wisdom is that Mr. Chirac plans to retire but refuses to become a lame duck, even though others seem to have made him one already. An IFOP poll last week said that only 2 percent of the French people want him to run again as the ruling, right-wing UMP party candidate in next spring's presidential election.

So for the moment, he is busily doing what he does best — schmoozing, breaking bread with farmers and carrying the French tricolor around the world.

This week, this perpetual campaigner is in China. There is of course business to do — billions of dollars of contracts were signed as France joined the rush to profit from China's boom.

It was a good week to be away given the anniversary of the civil unrest and the episodic acts of violence in recent days.

Mr. Chirac seemed happy in China, playing the role of the "lapin Duracell" or Energizer bunny — the unstoppable politician plunging into a sea of Chinese and being honored with a full military parade at Tiananmen Square.

DOJ_NMG_0088277

This welcome seemed appropriate since Mr. Chirac's main achievements, many here believe, have been on the world stage. According to a Paris-Match poll earlier this month, 78 percent of those polled approved of his handling of foreign affairs.

Part of that popularity stems from his opposition to the American-led war in Iraq in 2003. That may turn out to have been his best political move.

Indeed, in a 48-page special report on the "enigma" of Mr. Chirac in the journal L'Histoire this month, Jean-Luc Parodi, one of France's leading research directors, suggested that there will be only one moment in which Mr. Chirac was "totally in balance with French society: when he refused to engage France in the Iraq adventure."

Youths Set Fire To Bus In Marseille, Seriously Burning Woman (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

MARSEILLE, France (AP) — A group of marauding teenagers set fire to a bus Saturday in the southern French port city of Marseille, seriously wounding a passenger and leaving three others suffering from smoke inhalation, police said.

French police have braced for a surge of violence this weekend, a year after three weeks of riots swept through France's poor neighborhoods, where many immigrants and their French-born children live. Scattered violence was reported Friday, the one-year anniversary of the 2005 riots, and another attack was reported Saturday in Marseille.

Three or four young people burst onto a bus in the southern French city and tossed inside a bottle of flammable liquid before fleeing, police said, citing witnesses' accounts. A fire stared, seriously injuring a 26-year-old woman who suffered second- and third-degree burns on her arms, legs and face.

Three others were brought to a hospital to be treated for smoke inhalation, police said. The bus was destroyed.

In scattered violence from Friday night to Saturday morning, six police officers suffered minor injuries and 47 people were arrested, the Interior Minister said. Bands of youths torched two public buses, and in troubled neighborhoods around the country, youths set fire to a total of 277 vehicles, police said.

On an average night in France, up to 100 cars are torched. In a statement, the Interior Ministry described the anniversary night as "relatively calm."

Tne unrest could have been much worse.

At the height of last year's rioting, about 1,400 cars were burned nationwide in a single night. The rioting was fueled by anger at France's failure to offer equal chances to many minorities — especially Arabs and blacks — and France's 5 million-strong Muslim population.

The rioting was sparked by the deaths of two teens who were electrocuted in a power substation in Clichy-sous-Bois on Oct. 27, 2005, where they were hiding after what they thought was a police chase.

Ahead of the weekend, the national police said about 4,000 people extra police and riot officers were deployed across the country to cope with a possible resurgence of violence. Some 7,000 police are at the ready on an average night in France, officials have said.

Reforms Roiling Eastern Europe (WT/AP)

By Vanessa Gera, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

WARSAW -- Anti-government rallies rock Budapest, the Hungarian capital. Political intrigue in Poland holds up new roads and housing. Populists take power in Slovakia, vowing to undo economic reforms. And the Czech Republic goes without a functioning government for months.

Political life has fallen into disarray in Eastern Europe, and many are asking what has gone wrong in the 2½ years since these former communist countries joined the European Union, expecting to reap the fruits of democracy and open markets.

Many specialists on the region say people are simply exhausted after years of economic sacrifices made to join the EU and NATO. They now lack the clear goals that drove them toward the West after the fall of communism in 1989.

And their discontent is mounting as the instant riches many thought would come from EU membership have failed to materialize.

"The common phenomenon in all these countries is transition fatigue," said Gergely Hudecz, a political analyst with the DZ Bank in Budapest. "The electorate has had enough of reforms."

Gone is the strong external pressure that pushed governments in Warsaw, Budapest, Prague and Bratislava, Slovakia, to shutter unproductive factories and sell off state companies, in the face of opposition from newly unemployed workers hurt by rising costs.

All four countries have replaced the leaders who took them into the bloc, and some have opted for parties pledging to restore the welfare benefits that were slashed to qualify for membership.

DOJ_NMG_0088278

The greatest disruption has been in Hungary, where Socialist Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany outraged the country by saying in a recording leaked last month that the government had "lied morning, evening and night" about the economy. That sparked weeks of daily anti-government protests, including two nights of riots.

To the north in Poland, twin brothers with prickly nationalist views -- President Lech Kaczynski and Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski -- lead a country bogged down in frequent Cabinet reshuffles and convoluted political maneuverings.

The bickering has slowed down construction to ease a housing shortage and modernization of the dilapidated road system.

In the latest twist, the prime minister brought back into his Cabinet Andrzej Lepper, a fiery populist known for organizing anti-EU protests, less than a month after booting him out for demanding more spending.

In Prague, politics have been stalemated since a June election delivered a lower house of parliament divided evenly between left and right.

And in neighboring Slovakia, Prime Minister Robert Fico took power this summer on pledges to undo many of the economic reforms that have made his nation the darling of foreign investors.

His left-wing party generated anxiety when it built a coalition with an ultranationalist party.

After admission to the EU, "what we see now is a rise of populists and nationalism. Frustrations, sentiments and emotions, which were suppressed during the process of admission, are now coming to the surface," said Jiri Pehe, a political analyst and director of New York University in Prague.

But Mr. Pehe also stressed that the "democratic framework is very strong, and it's supported by the outside," thanks to the region's integration with the West.

Mikulas Dzurinda, the former prime minister of Slovakia, oversaw major pro-market reforms, including a flat tax that created strong economic growth. He acknowledges that voters are disillusioned to find themselves still lagging so far behind the West.

"People thought there was something like a Marshall Plan for the eastern part of Europe that would automatically allow us to reach the richest countries in the union," Mr. Dzurinda said. "Now I notice something like frustration."

Abbas Eyes PLO Troops In Jordan (WT/AP)

By Amy Teibel, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas hopes to beef up his loyalist forces with Palestine Liberation Organization troops from Jordan, Palestinian officials said, as rival Palestinian factions bolstered their ranks in anticipation of a feared civil war.

Israel has objected in the past to letting members of the Jordan-based Badr Brigade enter Palestinian areas.

But with clashes intensifying between Mr. Abbas' Fatah Party and forces loyal to the militantly anti-Israel Hamas government, Israeli officials said they would consider allowing them in, according to the Palestinian officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because no decision had been made.

Israeli authorities were not immediately available for comment yesterday.

Palestinian officials did not say how many Badr forces Mr. Abbas hopes to mobilize. What is most important to him is that he would command their loyalty as head of the PLO, the officials said.

Mr. Abbas, elected separately last year, is nominally the supreme commander of all seven Palestinian security branches, and most security personnel were hired by Fatah, which controlled the Palestinian Authority for more than a decade.

But after Hamas swept Fatah from office in January elections, it set up its own militia, which now numbers 5,700 armed men, and announced plans to recruit an additional 1,500 in the West Bank, Fatah's stronghold.

The rival security forces have clashed frequently in the Gaza Strip in recent weeks as political tensions between the two sides grow. The violence has left more than a dozen dead and stoked fears of a bloody showdown.

The European Union, U.S. and other donors cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas took power in March. Despite growing hardship in the Palestinian areas, Hamas has rejected international calls to renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

Mr. Abbas plans to dissolve the Hamas-led government within two weeks if the Islamic militant group does not agree to a coalition with Fatah, Palestinian officials said Friday.

Meanwhile, Palestinian factions that kidnapped an Israeli soldier four months ago offered conflicting assessments yesterday on whether a prisoner swap was imminent.

Abu Mujahed, a spokesman for the Popular Resistance Committees, said his faction has agreed to an Egyptian proposal to release Cpl. Gilad Shalit in return for hundreds of Palestinian prisoners.

But a spokesman for the military wing of the Palestinians' ruling Hamas party said prospects for an imminent deal have faded.

DOJ_NMG_0088279

Israeli officials have said they were unaware of any progress to win Cpl. Shalit's release.

Cpl. Shalit was captured on June 25 in a cross-border raid and is thought to be held in Gaza.

Police Ordered To Oaxaca After 3 Killings In Strike (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Oct. 28 -- President Vicente Fox on Saturday ordered federal police to seize control of strike-ravaged Oaxaca de Juarez, a popular tourist destination where a U.S. journalist was among three people killed Friday.

Despite pressure from Oaxaca's tourist industry, Fox had been reluctant to intervene in a five-month conflict that has pitted the governor of the state of Oaxaca against a coalition of citizen groups and striking teachers demanding his ouster. But the shooting death of Brad Will, 36, a volunteer correspondent for the Web site Indymedia.org, and two Mexican protesters prompted the president to respond with force for the first time.

Several Mexican newspapers published front-page photographs of the mortally wounded Will lying in the street with blood trailing from a gunshot wound in his stomach. Photographs also showed rifle-wielding men in civilian clothes roaming the streets. Indymedia, citing a witness account, said Will was pulled to safety after being shot but died before reaching the hospital.

Strikers blamed the killings on plainclothes paramilitary members affiliated with Gov. Ulises Ruiz's Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI. The governor's office accused members of the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, or APPO, an umbrella group that includes union members and indigenous groups that have joined the teachers' protest.

Fox did not say how many federal police he planned to send to Oaxaca. Officers began arriving there by plane Saturday. In a statement, he said the mobilization was a response to events that threaten "the order and peace of citizens in the region."

Strike leaders reinforced barricades and vowed not to budge.

"These forces coming here are only going to make things worse," Florentino LÃ³pez MartÃ-nez, an APPO organizer, said in a telephone interview from downtown Oaxaca. "This is not a solution to the problem."

Mexican presidents are often reluctant to use force because federal officers have been accused in the past of inciting violence, most notably during student protests before the 1968 Olympics in Mexico City. Nonetheless, Fox ordered federal police to take over the city of Nuevo Laredo last year to quell an outburst of drug violence.

In Oaxaca de Juarez, the teachers' protest is an annual rite that began 26 years ago. The protests are usually peaceful and generally last a week or two, but this year the teachers became infuriated when Ruiz sent hundreds of police to forcefully remove demonstrators from the city's idyllic squares. APPO soon took on a greater role in the demonstrations, pushing an agenda of economic, social and political reform in Mexico's second-poorest state.

The demonstrations have left the region a shambles and scared away the tourists who are the foundation of the city's economy. Death estimates during the strike range from nine to 14, and APPO leaders say that more than a dozen of their members have disappeared. Countless downtown businesses have closed, buses have been set on fire, demonstrators have barricaded themselves in government buildings and protest blockades have cut off main thoroughfares. At times in the past five months, residents have been warned not to leave their homes. Shots have been fired at a university radio station, and more than a million students have been unable to attend classes.

"The city is practically kidnapped by all this," Luz Divina Sarate, a Ruiz spokeswoman, said in a telephone interview. "The people are tired of this."

Friday's shootings at several flash points in and around Oaxaca de Juarez took place despite signs of progress in negotiations with the striking teachers. Last week, teachers tentatively ratified an agreement that would allow them to return to classes at some unspecified date and receive 30 percent raises spread over six years.

But their unmet central demand -- the resignation of Ruiz -- threatened to undermine the fragile pact. Even as Friday's deaths reignited passions Saturday, federal negotiators continued to meet with teachers union leaders in Mexico City.

The spike in violence also seemed to suggest that there will be a long wait before Oaxaca's stunning colonial streets are once again crawling with camera-toting tourists. After the shootings, the U.S. ambassador in Mexico, Tony Garza, warned Americans to stay away.

3 Killed In Mexican Protest; Police Move In (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 28 — Hundreds of federal riot police officers and soldiers took up positions outside this besieged tourist city in southern Mexico on Saturday, poised to end an increasingly violent protest that has shut the downtown for five months and left about a dozen people dead.

DOJ_NMG_0088280

Tension hung heavily in the air as night fell. Protesters appeared to be digging in at the barricades that they had constructed around town from sand bags, old tires, barbed wire and burned-out vehicles.

The federal government issued a statement ordering the protesters to "immediately hand over streets, plazas, public buildings and private property" so that officials could "guarantee public order and adherence to the law, as well as preserve respect for the population's individual guarantees."

But the protesters' response was blunt.

"We're going to resist the attack," declared Florentino López, spokesman for the Oaxaca People's Popular Assembly, or A.P.P.O., a loose coalition of interests that has laid siege to the city's central square, or Zócalo, taken over radio stations and defaced much of the town with protest messages.

President Vincente Fox, in his final month in office, on Saturday ordered the federal troops in after three people, including a New York photographer, were killed in Oaxaca the evening before. The photographer, Bradley Roland Will, 36, who was shot twice in the abdomen, was a well-known activist on the Lower East Side who lived at times as a squatter in city-owned buildings.

The crisis in Oaxaca began in May when schoolteachers went on strike, an annual exercise that had usually led to a pay raise. But when Ulises Ruiz, the governor of Oaxaca State, ordered the protests broken up, leftists came to the teachers' aid.

Soon, Oaxaca's picturesque downtown was in the hands of the demonstrators, all with their own grievances against a local government they accuse of heavy-handed tactics.

"The roots of a revolution are gestating in Oaxaca," says Zenén Bravo Castellanos, a teacher who heads the Revolutionary Popular Front, one group leading the protests. "The people of Oaxaca are tired of so many corrupt governments."

After five months of standoff, with occasional bursts of violence, Mr. Fox's patience apparently ended with the latest deaths. It was unclear, however, whether the federal troops intended to take over Oaxaca by force or to merely put pressure on the protesters to continue the monthslong negotiations to end the impasse.

The teachers have reached a deal to return to classes, although some glitches remain. The other protesters, however, have vowed to continue to control the town until Governor Ruiz resigns.

Mr. Will, active in left-leaning political causes, was filming the standoff for an organization called Independent Media Center, or Indymedia. He was among the plaintiffs who had won a $120,000 settlement from New York City after officials demolished an East Fifth Street building despite a judge's order that it remain standing until people squatting there could retrieve their belongings.

Mr. Will worked as a freelance photographer and reporter for the New York City chapter of the Indypendent, a radical collective that published a weekly newspaper and maintained a Web site dedicated to subjects like immigration, the Iraq war and the struggles of the developing world. In recent years he traveled widely in Latin America.

In Manhattan on Saturday night, about 100 people gathered outside the Mexican Consulate for a somber remembrance of Mr. Will. People lighted candles and incense and held a large banner that read, "Bring Brad Will's Assassin to Justice."

Witnesses in Oaxaca said a plainclothes police officer was responsible for his death. Protest leaders said such violence by the authorities would only inflame the already volatile situation.

The Oaxaca attorney general, Lizbeth Cana, labeled the protesters urban guerrillas and said it was understandable that local people were lashing out at them violently. "The people are fed up with permanent violence, threats and kidnappings," she said, according to The Associated Press. But the mayor of a nearby town said the five men being detained for possible involvement in Mr. Will's killing were not disgruntled ordinary local citizens but police officers and local officials.

"Oaxaca is a question mark," Flavio Sosa, a leader of A.P.P.O., said before the federal forces arrived. "No one knows what's going to happen."

Mexican President Sends Police To Oaxaca (AP)

By Rebeca Romero

AP, October 29, 2006

Shop owners shuttered their businesses and demonstrators built up street barricades Saturday after President Vicente Fox ordered federal police to intervene in this picturesque city torn by more than five months of protests and violence.

Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, had refused repeated requests to use force in Oaxaca even as the southern city slid into chaos. But gunbattles Friday that killed a U.S. journalist and at least two Mexicans apparently exhausted his patience.

Fox's Interior Department issued an ominous statement late Saturday demanding protest leaders "immediately hand over streets, plazas, public buildings and private property" so that federal authorities can "guarantee public order and adherence to the law, as well as preserve respect for the population's individual guarantees."

Mexican Deputy Interior Secretary Arturo Chavez said late Saturday that the police operation would not begin Saturday night or early Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0088281

It was unclear how many officers of the Federal Preventative Police were converging on this long popular tourist destination, though police in gray uniforms and carrying riot shields poured off of transport planes at Oaxaca's airport, which was closed to commercial traffic.

Teacher's union leader Daniel Rosas said protesters believed 4,000 federal police had arrived.

In unrest that began with a teacher strike for higher pay, leftists have blocked streets for months demanding the ouster of Oaxaca state Gov. Ulises Ruiz. They claim the state government has sent gunmen and thugs to provoke them.

After Fox announced he was ordering in federal police, protesters fortified their positions by piling up sandbags and parking large trucks and buses across roads leading into the center of Oaxaca.

Some demonstrators rolled enormous tree trunks across the main highway leading into Oaxaca from Mexico City, waving Mexican flags and chanting "Get out Ulises!"

With neat piles of rocks behind them ready for confrontation should police try to storm town, the demonstrators left just one lane open and were only allowing taxis and other local through. Nearby a sign trumpeted tourist attractions and proclaimed "Welcome to Oaxaca!"

"I think there's going to be violence," said Eutelma Cruz, a 54-year-old housewife and protester. "I hope (federal forces) intervene and find a peaceful solution."

Men also were seen removing broadcast equipment from one of the local radio stations seized by protesters months ago. A second station held by leftists remained on the air, urging Oaxaca's residents to prevent federal police from entering the city.

"We're not afraid. We were born to die," said Iris Hernandez, 29, who was guarding a roadblock.

Few people ventured from their homes. Across the heart of the city, nearly all shops and restaurants closed early. Street vendors packed up their wares and disappeared.

"We're afraid there is going to be more shooting," said Juan Lopez said as he pulled metal shutters down over the glass storefront of a sporting goods shop a half block from Oaxaca's leafy central plaza surrounded by arcaded colonial-era buildings.

Friday's deadly violence began when gunmen tried to remove a street blockade in a rough neighborhood. Journalist Bradley Roland Will, 36, of New York, was hit in the abdomen and died later at a Red Cross hospital.

Oaxaca resident Esteban Zurrita was shot dead and the bullet-ridden body of another man, Emilio Alonso Fabian, was discovered about two miles away. A photographer for the Mexican newspaper Milenio was slightly injured.

Will worked for Indymedia.org, an independent Web-based media organization and sold video on a freelance basis, said friends and Indymedia colleague Hinrich Schuleze. He had been documenting the upheaval in Internet dispatches that showed strong sympathy for the protesters.

"What can you say about this movement, this revolutionary moment," he wrote in a dispatch dated Oct. 16. "You know it is building, growing, shaping, you can feel it, trying desperately for a direct democracy."

Oaxaca Attorney General Lizbeth Cana, who has likened the protesters to urban guerrillas, said the shooting was sparked by angry townspeople defending themselves against the demonstrators.

"The people are fed up with permanent violence, threats and kidnappings," she said.

But U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza said in a statement that the shooters may have been Oaxaca police, and the Mexico City newspaper El Universal published photos Saturday identifying some of the men firing at protesters as local officials.

Mayor Manuel Martinez Feria of the nearby town of Santa Lucia del Camino said five men who appeared in the photos brandishing pistols had been turned over to state officials for possible involvement in Will's killing. He identified them as two members of Santa Lucia's city council, two of that town's police officers and a former justice of the peace from another town.

Local police officers — often out of uniform — and armed gangs have staged sporadic attacks on protesters, and at least five other people have been killed.

Several other shootings and clashes were reported in Oaxaca on Friday, and Red Cross officials said Saturday they treated 18 additional victims of violence, though none suffered gunshot wounds.

Teachers went on strike in May demanding higher pay and better working conditions. But after police attacked one of their demonstrations in June, they extended their demands to include a call for Ruiz's resignation and were joined by leftists, students and Indian groups.

The struggle escalated into a fight for control of Oaxaca's streets as demonstrators occupied the central plaza, built barricades, seized radio and television stations, drove off local police and burned buses.

The protesters contend the 2004 governor's election was rigged by Ruiz, a member of the former longtime governing Institutional Revolutionary Party, which lost its hold on Mexico's presidency when Fox was elected six years ago.

Ruiz repeatedly has asked federal authorities to send troops to restore order, but Fox's government had insisted on trying to solve the dispute through negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0088282

Friday's clashes came a day after teachers agreed to end their strike, which has kept 1.3 million children out of classes across the southern state. The deal had been expected to take the sting out of the protests. But Rosas, the teacher's union leader, said late Saturday that Fox's decision to send federal forces could negate the agreement.

Oaxaca, famed for its colonial architecture and as a center of Indian handicrafts and cuisine, is one of the most famous inland tourist attractions in Mexico. Mountains overlooking the city hold the imposing ruins of the Zapotec city of Monte Alban.

Mexican Forces Converge On Oaxaca City (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez And Reed Johnson, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Fox sends soldiers and police to try to end a standoff between striking teachers and the governor's backers.

Federal riot police and soldiers toting shields and automatic weapons massed around this beleaguered colonial city Saturday in a bid to end a five-month standoff between striking teachers and supporters of state Gov. Ulises Ruiz, amid escalating violence that included the Friday shooting deaths of a U.S. journalist and two Mexican men.

But by Saturday evening, there were signs that both the protesters and federal officials might be stepping back from a confrontation that has caused at least nine deaths and paralyzed Oaxaca city, the state capital, since the strike began in May.

Hundreds of army troops and officers of the Federal Preventive Police began arriving here Saturday morning by plane and bus. They were dispatched by President Vicente Fox, who for months had resisted calls by Ruiz and Oaxacan businessmen for the federal government to intervene directly to end the occupation of Oaxaca by the striking teachers and an umbrella protest group, the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, known by its Spanish-language initials APPO.

Some APPO members had pledged to fight to the death to maintain the occupation. In recent days the group has barricaded city streets with tree trunks, sandbags and overturned buses and vans.

But APPO leader Flavio Sosa, reached late Saturday night, indicated that his group would continue to maintain its barricades but would not fight back if the federal forces attempted to dismantle them.

"We're going to maintain our barricades in the city. If the PFP wants to clear them, let them clear them," he said, referring to the federal police. "We won't resist, but tomorrow we'll march to show our disapproval for the presence" of the federal police and troops.

Sosa said the group was willing to attend negotiations.

"We'll go together with the striking teachers. We'll continue with our movement demanding Ulises Ruiz step down, and we'll state our disapproval of the PFP's presence," he said.

About the same time Saturday night, Arturo Chavez Chavez, deputy secretary of state, said at a Mexico City news conference that the federal forces had been sent only to prevent more violence and were not "contemplating any type of action" on Saturday or today.

He also said that the Oaxaca union representing the 70,000 striking teachers had agreed that they would return to their classrooms Monday.

As darkness fell, many streets were virtually deserted as businesses shuttered their storefronts and fearful residents hunkered down inside their homes.

The smell of burning wood and rubber hung in the air, and a local radio station operated by the protesters urged people to resist any takeover attempt by police and the army. About 200 to 300 protesters gathered in the Zocalo, or central square, listening to impassioned speeches exhorting them to stick together in opposing the federal forces.

'They can shoot me'

But on the city's periphery, the resistance appeared to be minimal. Only about 50 protesters were massed along the main highway that connects the central city to the airport, in contrast to the thousands who had taken part in previous actions. Some carried tree branches for self-defense. Twenty-four Coke bottles filled with gasoline stood at the ready.

"They can shoot me, they can kill me," one elderly male protester said.

At nightfall, it was still unclear how many police officers had taken up positions in and around the capital.

Protesters estimated that 2,000 to 4,000 police had arrived, but federal officials refused to confirm those numbers.

Carlos Abascal, Mexico's interior minister, said Saturday night that the federal police had been sent to maintain civic order, not to take sides or "to curtail the freedom of expression or the liberty of demonstrating of all Oaxacans."

Late Saturday afternoon, the federal government issued an ultimatum demanding that APPO leaders "immediately hand over streets, plazas, public buildings and private property" so that federal authorities could "guarantee public order and adherence to the law."

Fox's decision to send federal police came one week after the state's teachers tentatively agreed to return to work in exchange for a 30% raise over six years. On average, Oaxacan elementary school teachers earn about $600 a month.

DOJ_NMG_0088283

U.S. journalist killed

The decision also was made just hours after the death of Bradley Roland Will, 36, a New York City political activist and photojournalist with Independent Media Center, or Indymedia, an Internet-based alternative news agency, who had been in the region for four weeks documenting the conflict with photographs and video.

Will was shot in the abdomen Friday afternoon while attempting to conduct interviews at a street barricade and died en route to the hospital, according to witnesses and Indymedia's website.

Some witnesses said that Will was shot by a plainclothes undercover policeman.

Tony Garza, U.S. ambassador to Mexico, issued a statement calling Will's death "senseless" and saying that it "underscores the critical need for a return to lawfulness and order in Oaxaca."

A Oaxaca resident also was shot to death Friday, and the bullet-riddled body of a third man was discovered about two miles away, according to news reports.

Once a popular tourist destination famed for its pre-Columbian ruins and colorful Indian culture, Oaxaca has been transformed into a tense encampment of streets blocked with concrete hunks and sheet metal, public buildings slathered in graffiti and scores of shuttered businesses.

Deadly dispute

At least nine people have been killed during the dispute, which began in the spring when teachers went on strike to demand better wages and working conditions.

Teachers subsequently occupied the Zocalo, pitching tents and raising banners there and in surrounding streets. Gradually the teachers were joined by trade unionists, leftist activists, indigenous groups and others demanding the governor's resignation and conducting a campaign of mostly peaceful civil disobedience.

On June 14, Ruiz sent police officers to try to oust the protesters, prompting a melee in which police pummeled demonstrators with truncheons, according to Mexico's human rights commission. Since then protesters have seized radio stations, and both sides have taken up rocks, clubs, machetes, Molotov cocktails and firearms.

Though much of the violence reported to date has been inflicted against the protesters by cruising vigilantes, protesters contend that Ruiz and his supporters have been attempting to goad them into retaliation that would justify crushing the occupation.

Among other grievances, the protesters say that Ruiz, a member of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, which dominated Mexican politics for seven decades, manipulated votes in the 2004 governor's election. Ruiz, who has denied those charges, has spurned calls for his resignation while beseeching Fox to use force to end the demonstrations.

sam.enriquez@latimes.com

reed.johnson@latimes.com

Enriquez reported from Oaxaca and Johnson from Mexico City. Times staff writer Carlos Martínez in Mexico City and special correspondent Rafael Bucio in Oaxaca contributed to this report.

Castro Appears On TV, Scoffs At Rumors Of His Death (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

HAVANA, Cuba (AP) -- The ailing Fidel Castro appeared on Cuban state television for the first time in more than a month Saturday, looking thin and tired but walking and ridiculing recent rumors of his death.

The 80-year-old Cuban leader temporarily ceded power to his brother Raul in July following intestinal surgery for an undisclosed ailment. Fidel Castro had not been seen since mid-September, when photographs of him greeting world leaders at a summit in Havana were released.

Saturday's video showed him walking slowly but steadily in an unidentified room and reading a newspaper in a loud voice.

"They've declared me moribund prematurely," he said, holding a copy of Saturday's edition of Granma, the Communist Party daily newspaper.

"But it pleases me to send my compatriots and friends this small video."

He said his recovery would be long and not without risk.

But he added: "I'm not the least bit afraid of what will occur."

The Cuban dictator said he was "coming along just as planned" and called rumors of his death ridiculous and insulting, claiming they were the work of his enemies.

"Let's see what they say now," he said.

The Cuban government has treated Castro's ailment as a state secret.

Rumors that he might have died intensified in recent weeks. He has not made a public appearance since July 26, a few days before he underwent surgery.

DOJ_NMG_0088284

On Friday, Castro's close friend and ally Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said the Cuban leader was up and about and taking trips at night into the countryside.

Cuba TV Shows Pictures Of Castro (BBC)

BBC.com, October 29, 2006

He was shown walking unassisted and reading Saturday's newspaper Cuban television has broadcast the first images of President Fidel Castro in more than a month, defiantly addressing rumours that he had died.

Mr Castro said his recovery would be long and not without risk, but said he was "coming along just as planned."

He called the rumours "ridiculous" and said: "Let's see what they say now."

The 80-year-old, who temporarily handed over power to his younger brother in July following intestinal surgery, had not been seen since mid-September.

In the new video footage the ailing president was pictured walking unassisted and - to underscore that it is not archive material - reading a copy of Saturday's edition of Granma, the Communist Party daily newspaper.

"Now, when our enemies have prematurely declared me moribund or dead, I'm happy to send to our compatriots and friends around the world this short film footage," he said.

Cuban officials attending a ballet festival in Havana said they were delighted to see the images of President Castro.

"This is excellent news for everyone - all Cubans, and all of Cuba's friends," Vice President Carlos Lage said.

"We are really happy to see that Fidel is better and that every day he is moving forward," Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said. "He's not been lost, just working on his [recovery] plan."

State secret

Images of Mr Castro were shown in September to quell rumours Earlier this month, Time magazine quoted an unnamed US official alleging that the president had terminal cancer.

Mr Castro's younger brother, Raul, denied this, saying the president, was "getting better all the time".

Mr Castro handed temporary power to his brother in July, prompting speculation that his 47-year rule was nearly over.

Cubans were told that details of the ailment would be kept secret to prevent Cuba's enemies from taking advantage of them.

Images of a frail Mr Castro were released on his birthday, on 13 August, in an attempt to quell rumours that he had died.

More recently, video images were broadcast showing Mr Castro, in his hospital bed and wearing pyjamas, greeting visiting Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Former Contra Fighters Divided Over Ortega (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

One pair of brothers stopped speaking after the younger defected.

The old guerrilla fighter has many battle scars. He'll roll up his pant leg and show you his prosthetic device if you're interested. Years ago, during the war, he lost his leg when he stepped on a mine laid by his enemies, the Sandinistas.

It's been a long time since Jose "the Jackal" Talavera has tried to kill Sandinistas. The leftists haven't ruled the country for 16 years, but the onetime Contra commander still despises them.

"They filled the country with Cubans and Bulgarians," Talavera, 46, said of the Sandinistas, who had close ties to the former Soviet bloc. "Our war against them was just and heroic."

The Talavera family lost three brothers in the 1980s to the U.S.-backed war against the leftist regime. Now, like many other Contra families, the surviving brothers are split over whether they should support the Sandinistas in next month's presidential election.

Last month, "the Jackal" turned on his TV and saw his younger brother, Salvador "the Little Jackal" Talavera, not only shaking hands with Sandinista leaders but embracing them.

Salvador Talavera is the president of the Nicaraguan Resistance Party, the conservative political group started by the demobilized Contras a decade ago. Last month, the 40-year-old signed a "peace agreement" with the Sandinistas by which the Contras promised not to go to war again should their bitterest foe, Daniel Ortega, win the Nov. 5 presidential election.

The agreement was a big boost for Ortega, and the Little Jackal is now featured in Sandinista campaign commercials.

"We Contras are becoming conscious of our rights for the first time," Salvador Talavera said, explaining his party's decision to break with its conservative allies, who've won every presidential election since 1990.

"Years of bad decisions by these right-wing governments have brought Daniel Ortega to the brink of power," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0088285

Jose Talavera said he told his younger brother that supporting the Sandinistas was immoral. The brothers haven't talked since. "Like good democrats, we have to respect the political decisions other people make," Jose Talavera said.

The split in the Contras highlights a growing frustration among the rural population that makes up the movement's rank and file, analysts say.

Thousands of peasants who were granted land in exchange for giving up their armed struggle against the Sandinistas have yet to receive formal title to those properties, despite 16 years of right-wing government. And Nicaragua's adoption of free-trade policies has hurt the nation's agricultural sector.

"There's a lot of frustration in the Contra corridor," said Oscar Rene Vargas, a political analyst here, referring to a stretch of rural Nicaragua reaching from the Honduran border southward. "Promises were made to them, and those promises were not kept." As a result, Vargas said, the Sandinista National Liberation Front was gaining ground in rural areas that have long been conservative strongholds.

Several Contra leaders who have defected to the Sandinista cause say they feel the movement's right-wing political allies have taken them for granted.

"Seven thousand of our wounded war veterans are neglected," Salvador Talavera said. "We've been working in this alliance, but what's in it for us? We left our companions buried in shallow graves to bring these people to power. And now they have forgotten about us."

The younger Talavera believes that guerrilla veterans have been used as right-wing political props in three consecutive victories over the Sandinistas in presidential elections.

"They've used us as their shock troops," he said. "When the elections come, they go and get the old Contra commanders and give us new suits."

Talavera's decision to sign the agreement with the Sandinistas on Sept. 15 was a stunning setback to the presidential aspirations of Eduardo Montealegre of the conservative Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance.

The Nicaraguan Resistance had backed Montealegre until Salvador Talavera's appearance last month with Ortega on a stage in Managua, the capital. Montealegre is the favored candidate of the U.S. Embassy here and is seen by many Nicaraguan conservatives as the best hope for preventing an Ortega victory.

"It was a low blow against Montealegre … and also very astute on the part of Salvador Talavera," said Carlos Tunnermann, a political analyst and former Nicaraguan ambassador to the United States. "And it allowed Daniel Ortega to put forward an image of reconciliation."

Salvador Talavera said many Contras also felt "a profound resentment" toward their old U.S. allies. "We kept gringo blood from being shed here, and we stopped what was then known as communism from reaching the frontiers of the United States," he said. But recently, the U.S. has "not considered even a small budget to help those heroic fighters who served them."

Jose Talavera understands his brother's frustrations, but not the decision to aid the family's old enemies.

"We have to keep the government from falling into the hands of the Sandinistas," he said. The older Talavera has just opened a new office for his group of Contra dissidents behind Montealegre's campaign headquarters.

hector.tobar@latimes.com

Nicaragua Bans Abortion (NYT)

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

The rights and safety of Nicaragua's women took a giant step backward last week when the country's legislature passed a law criminalizing all abortions, with no exceptions. The previous law permitted an abortion if the mother's life was in danger.

Latin America has the world's strictest laws on abortion. But that does not discourage it. Latin America also has the world's highest abortion rates, averaging nearly one per woman over the course of her reproductive lifetime.

Nicaragua's ban, which passed 52 to 0, was a clear bid to curry support from the Catholic Church before next weekend's presidential elections. Conservative parties were expected to vote for the legislation. But Daniel Ortega's Sandinistas also backed it. Once the party of social revolution, the Sandinistas have become the party of political opportunism.

If Nicaraguans want to see the possible consequences of their new law, they can look next door to El Salvador, where all abortions have been banned since 1998. If doctors find evidence of an abortion, they are required to report their patients to the police. Women who sought medical help after a botched abortion have been handcuffed to their hospital beds. And some women with late-term abortions have been given 30-year prison terms.

The only good news out of Nicaragua is that legislators declined to take up a proposal that would drastically increase prison sentences for women who have abortions and people who perform them.

Bolivia Agrees New Energy Deals (BBC)

DOJ_NMG_0088286

BBC.com, October 29, 2006

Some deals were signed with only minutes to go before the deadline Bolivia has agreed energy deals with 10 foreign gas and oil firms, just before a deadline for foreign firms to agree new contracts or leave the country.

Brazil's Petrobras and Spain's Repsol were among eight to reach agreement on Saturday, after two deals on Friday.

The contracts come after President Evo Morales nationalised the oil and gas industry in May to give the state more control and a larger slice of profits.

He said that now Bolivia would no longer be "a beggar state".

"We will continue in this path of recovering our natural resources," said Mr Morales, " not only the hydrocarbons but... all non-renewable natural resources that belong to the Bolivian people."

Under the terms of the president's 1 May decree, foreign companies had six months to sign contracts giving up majority control of their Bolivian operations.

The companies will also have to work in partnership with the re-founded Bolivian state energy firm, Yacimientos Petroliferos Fiscales Bolivianos (YPBF).

The BBC's Damian Kahya in La Paz says a deal with Petrobras - the largest foreign investor in the industry - came as a significant boost for Mr Morales as the Brazilians have invested more than $1bn in Bolivian gas.

However, Petrobras and the Brazilian government had been angered by the way the Bolivians conducted negotiations, accusing them of bullying, our correspondent says.

Deals with seven more firms, including the second largest investor Spain's Repsol and the UK's BG Group, were announced a few hours' before the deadline expired.

Details of the contracts signed on Friday are not yet available, but the president of YPBF, said they would bring Bolivia $120m (£63m) in annual gas revenues.

'Rocky' negotiations

The negotiation process has not been simple. Talks were dealt a blow in September when Andres Soliz Rada, a main player in the nationalisation process, resigned as energy minister.

Mr Soliz had clashed with state-owned Petrobras, the biggest investor in Bolivia's energy industry.

However, Mr Rada was replaced by Carlos Villegas, and talks proved to be more fruitful.

There were other problems including a lack of money that hampered Bolivia's YPBF, in its plans to buy control of the assets like refineries and pipelines.

YPBF also missed a 1 July deadline to restructure itself so it would be better able to handle its more dominant position in the oil and gas industry.

Boomtown In Venezuela Confronts Mining Ban (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

LA PARAGUA, Venezuela — This dusty, remote river port in southeastern Venezuela feels a bit like a latter-day Deadwood. Dreams of striking it rich in gold or diamonds have drawn about 5,000 people to La Paragua and some 40,000 to nearby areas, from beyond this country to Brazil, Colombia and Guyana.

Shopkeepers from the Middle East cater to a clientele that communicates in a local patois of Spanish, Portuguese and Guyanese-accented English. Between forays into the bush, the miners support a cauldron of bars, prostitutes and storefronts dealing in precious metals.

But the town has become a focus of efforts by President Hugo Chávez to halt much of the mining, citing environmental concerns. In September, army soldiers sent here to enforce a mining ban killed six miners, setting off violent protests. Miners blocked access to the town, burning army vehicles, and destroyed the mayor's residence in the nearby town of Maripa.

A dark mood weighs heavily here. Residents speak with fear about army checkpoints and the presence of soldiers who threaten their livelihoods. Graffiti on the walls of dozens of buildings rail at Mr. Chávez, mourn the miners and even take shots at the government's recent military purchases from Russia.

Residents say they will stay and that the mining will go on. Longino Guerra, an immigrant from the Canary Islands who operates a warehousing and bush-pilot service in La Paragua, said, "As long as there are diamonds and gold in the ground, there will be miners here."

But the environmental toll can be high. Open-pit mines scar the fragile landscape of Bolívar State, home to the soaring sandstone mesas known as tepuis, and to Angel Falls, the world's highest waterfall. The mercury used to pry gold from riverbeds pollutes water systems, and dredging and mining operations erode riverbanks and silt up the river. That threatens the Guri hydroelectric complex, which provides Venezuela up to three-quarters of its electricity.

DOJ_NMG_0088287

"It's a complicated situation with no easy solution," said Argenis Palacio, an official with the National Statistics Institute who has been taking a census of the area. "We've encountered miners from as far away as the Czech Republic and Portugal who are drawn here by the idea that there is no oversight of their activities."

The government has promised to create jobs for miners in tourism or agriculture, and to teach them to plant crops like cassava or corn. But miners say the promises have not been fulfilled, and last year, hundreds near the town of Las Claritas blocked a highway to Brazil and threw Molotov cocktails at troops.

In early October, border tensions were added to the fury over the September killings, when Venezuelan soldiers killed a Guyanese citizen, claiming he was smuggling gasoline across the border for generators used in the area's mines. Maps in Venezuela still claim large swaths of Guyana, describing the region as a "reclamation zone."

When the national guard was responsible for the area, it was accused of human rights abuses and taking bribes. Last year, Mr. Chávez replaced it with an army-led force called TO-5, for Theater of Operations No. 5. Now, Gen. Raúl Baduel, the defense minister, said, prosecutors plan to investigate 18 military officials with the new force.

The general has described the September attack as an enforcement operation that went awry. Troops were sent to a camp detected in an area where mining was prohibited with orders to destroy machinery and tools, he told reporters.

But the soldiers shot at least seven miners with high-caliber weapons at close range, killing all but one.

The lone survivor, a Venezuelan who suffered multiple gunshot wounds, survived by pretending he was dead, his sister said. That man, Manuel Felipe Lizardi, 36, has been recovering at a hospital three hours away in Ciudad Bolívar.

"He had the angels by his side," said the sister, Berenice Lizardi, 28. "Now I'm afraid the army will come after him and us."

The justice minister, Jesse Chacón, said ballistic studies of the corpses "makes us suppose there was at least an excess use of force."

"Control over security in the area got out of the hands of the government," said Alexander Luzardo, a professor of anthropology and environmental rights at Central University of Venezuela and a former Chávez campaign official.

He said the incident was a blow both to the government's environmental policy and its approach to indigenous groups, since small-scale mining was essentially condoned during most of Mr. Chávez's government, which began in 1998. "Nothing justifies the killing," he said.

Manuel Rosales, the main opposition candidate in presidential elections set for December, came here recently to criticize the government's inability to carry out viable mining guidelines. Further political fallout may depend on the government's ability to counter claims that soldiers demand money from miners for allowing them to work.

Still, even as the town has crystallized into a place of frustration with the army and Mr. Chávez's government, the mining goes on. Residents gathered on a recent afternoon at a riverfront bar to watch miners emerge muddy and exhausted from days in the bush.

"If Chávez wants to empty the mines, we're finished," said Ana Victoria Mendoza Palma, 23, a cook. "The government says it wants miners to work in tourism, but why would anyone come here?"

President Holds A Big Lead As Brazil Prepares To Vote (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Oct. 28 — Rebuked at the polls four weeks ago because of voter irritation with a corruption scandal and his unwillingness to answer questions about it, Brazil's president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, heads into a runoff vote on Sunday with a lead that every poll suggests is insurmountable. A win would guarantee him another four years in office.

A final round of public opinion surveys published Friday shows Mr. da Silva, a former factory worker and labor leader, defeating his opponent, Geraldo Alckmin of the Brazilian Social Democratic Party, by at least 60 percent to 40 percent. More than 125 million Brazilians are registered for the runoff vote, which is required because Mr. da Silva fell just short of a majority in the first round of balloting on Oct. 1.

"Everything indicates that this is going to be a resounding, unquestionable victory for Lula, despite all the scandals," said Jairo Nicolau, a political science professor at Candido Mendes University, using Mr. da Silva's nickname. Mr. Nicolau said that if the polls were right, Mr. da Silva would duplicate the landslide victory that carried him into office in 2002.

Mr. Alckmin, a 53-year-old physician and former governor of São Paulo, Brazil's richest and most populous state, was able to force a second round largely because of a late-breaking political scandal. In mid-September, the police apprehended operatives of Mr. da Silva's left-wing Workers Party as they were about to pay $792,000 in cash for a dossier they apparently hoped would incriminate Mr. Alckmin's camp in a notorious corruption scheme.

Mr. da Silva, who turned 61 on Friday, has denied any involvement in the skulduggery, which forced the resignation of his campaign manager and was, according to the police, organized by his former bodyguard and several other aides and friends.

DOJ_NMG_0088288

Mr. da Silva has been able to pull away from Mr. Alckmin over the past several weeks, in part, by labeling him a one-note candidate who spoke more of corruption than of his own plans for Brazil.

The campaigning featured relatively little in the way of conventional rallies and marches. Instead, both Mr. da Silva and Mr. Alckmin focused their efforts on the news media and on forming alliances, some of them ideologically illogical, with the governors, mayors, legislators and other local political bosses who are traditionally the power brokers in Brazilian politics.

This week, for example, Mr. da Silva campaigned alongside the scion of one of the conservative family dynasties that he always blames for the poverty and backwardness of his native Northeast region. Mr. Alckmin, whose party is center-left, was pilloried for allying himself with the populist former governor of Rio de Janeiro state, nominally a leftist like Mr. da Silva but one of the president's main rivals.

Mr. da Silva has offered only one formal news conference since taking office in January 2003, and also chose to absent himself from a candidates' debate just before the first-round vote. Polls cited that decision, seen as arrogant, as one of the reasons for a sudden drop in his popularity, and during the second round of campaigning he was much more available, agreeing to four debates with Mr. Alckmin.

The last of those debates took place here on Friday night, with a panel of undecided voters supplying questions. "The scandals just don't stop," Mr. Alckmin said, at one point turning away from the panel to face Mr. da Silva directly. "They haven't learned. They haven't investigated. They hide everything."

Mr. da Silva responded that no government had done more than his to root out corruption, which he described as "a tumor embedded" in the Brazilian body politic.

Cash Aid Program Bolsters Lula's Reelection Prospects (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Incentives for Families To Help Themselves Spreads Beyond Brazil

ALTO DE SANTA HELENA, Brazil, Oct. 28 -- In this sparsely furnished cinder-block house with seven rooms, one tattered love seat and no chairs, the refrigerator doesn't work and the electric stove won't heat up. But the 13-inch television can conjure a picture through its rabbit-ear antenna, and that's what Edmundo Rodrigues da Silva points to when explaining how he'll vote in Brazil's presidential election Sunday.

"The reason I got the television was to keep my kids in the house, instead of watching them go to a neighbor's house to watch their television," said Rodrigues da Silva, a 54-year-old father of seven and a subsistence farmer. "And the reason I was able to get it was President Lula. After he got into office, we got Bolsa Familia."

Bolsa Familia is the cash assistance program that pays more than 11 million low-income families in Brazil about $40 per month in cash if they meet conditions such as ensuring their children regularly attend school and have regular health checkups and vaccinations. The assistance was enough for Rodrigues da Silva to afford his first television set, and it has been instrumental in helping President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva overcome corruption scandals and build a lead of more than 20 points in opinion polls heading into the runoff against former Sao Paulo state governor Geraldo Alckmin.

Such "conditional cash transfer" aid programs have spread throughout Latin America in recent years and have recently been exported to the United States, where New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg this month announced that his city would adopt a version. Like most of the other examples, Brazil's program is popular among voters, and Lula has promoted Bolsa Familia as the cornerstone of his first term. Even Alckmin has used the program as a campaign tool -- he has tried to remind voters that his party launched an early version of the program during the presidency of Fernando Henrique Cardoso in the 1990s.

But the poor strongly associate the program with Lula, who poured billions into it, and surveys indicate that support for Lula among the two-thirds of the population that lives on less than $500 per month is powering his reelection hopes. Even though Alckmin has a strong advantage among voters in high income brackets, Lula is expected to gain 63 percent of total valid votes versus 36.8 percent for Alckmin, according to a poll released this week by the firm CNT/Sensus.

Lula, 61, who achieved national prominence as a union leader, narrowly failed to win the election outright during a first-round vote Oct. 1, which came in the wake of allegations that his aides tried to buy incriminating information about his opponents with briefcases full of cash. The scandal has quieted, with Lula promising to investigate and punish those involved.

During the campaign's final televised debate Friday night, Lula painted Alckmin as the candidate who favors the rich and would sell off state companies, while continuing to tout Bolsa Familia as his signature program. Lula has been following the formula for weeks, and political analysts said it has helped him comfortably pad his lead.

"The Bolsa Familia program is probably the most successful social program in Brazil's history, and it's also very different from the programs of the past," said Rogerio Schmitt, a political analyst in Sao Paulo. "Instead of just giving money to the poor, this has strings attached. So the idea is that the requirements will help make sure that in the future, the children of the families won't need the program."

DOJ_NMG_0088289

Skeptics contend that the cash assistance programs divert focus in developing countries from making structural reforms in education and the economy -- changes that many analysts say Brazil's next president will be pressured to address. And because the proliferation of such programs is so recent -- Mexico launched its pioneering Opportunidades program in 1997 -- experts say it is too soon to make definitive judgments about long-term benefits.

In this village of about 190 families, local officials say that school attendance is up, child labor down and health care more consistent. Rodrigues da Silva's wife, Ana Lucia, keeps her children's vaccination cards stashed in the wooden box above the basin outside where she scrubs laundry. Their 8-year-old son, Edvan, walks with his mom each month to a health clinic to get weighed and briefly examined. The teacher at his school sends attendance cards to a government office every three months. If a student's attendance is below 85 percent and he or she doesn't have a valid excuse, the parents' benefits can be pulled.

But obvious problems persist here. If a chair in the school breaks, for example, the students have to wait until the next school year to get a replacement, Rodrigues da Silva said. Finding qualified teachers willing to come to a poverty-racked rural area is just as difficult as it always has been, he said.

"It's clear that more children are attending school, for example, but it's not clear that they are learning more," said Eduardo Lora, a principal adviser with the research department of the Inter-American Development Bank in Washington who has analyzed conditional cash transfer programs in Latin America. "The main constraint is the quality of the schools. But when people say that the money would be better spent to improve education, it's very difficult because we don't know of simple ways to improve education."

Even though Lula's government more than doubled social spending during his term, to about $8 billion last year, the Bolsa Familia program is a small part of the federal budget in a country of 185 million where most workers pay about 36 percent of their income in taxes, Lora said. The cost falls in line with most of the other similar conditional cash aid programs in Latin America -- about 0.3 percent of a country's gross domestic product, Lora said.

Ramon Marcelo da Silva coordinates the Bolsa Familia program for 16 towns in this pocket of Minas Gerais state, overseeing benefits for about 95,000 people -- about half of the region's total population. He said that since he began two years ago, he has repeatedly heard a familiar complaint of critics of welfare programs: You shouldn't give people fish, but instead, teach them to fish.

"The problem is that in some rivers there is nothing to fish," Marcelo da Silva said. "There's just nothing there."

Besides the TV, the Rodrigues da Silva family uses its aid money to buy school supplies and food. In one of the house's bare rooms, tubes of toothpaste and bars of soap sit on a windowsill, where one glass pane has been replaced by a piece of cardboard. Against one cracked wall is a small stack of rice, beans, sunflower seeds, paraffin and olive oil. All of it was bought with money from the Bolsa Familia program. Ana Lucia said it is enough to turn the vegetables, fruits and herbs the family grows outside the house into full meals.

She estimated that the vast majority of her neighbors -- "probably 99 percent" -- also received payments from Bolsa Familia, which is available to families with per capita incomes less than about $55 per month. And in the village, she and her husband said they knew of only three people who planned to vote for Alckmin instead of Lula. One reason, they said, is that they hope Lula will increase the payments distributed under the program.

"Now I want to buy furniture," Ana Lucia said.

Brazil's President Revives Rhetoric (AP)

By Michael Astor

AP, October 29, 2006

Facing a surprisingly rough campaign, President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva has revived the populist rhetoric he had largely shed since taking office.

Fiery speeches contrasting the lives of Brazil's poor with the wealthy elite have left many Brazilians wondering whether he would push the country to the left if he wins a second four-year term in Sunday's runoff election.

Silva, a former union firebrand and Brazil's first working-class president, faced similar fears four years ago, but calmed them by adhering to market-friendly, pro-business policies that won praise even from conservatives.

But with his administration engulfed in corruption scandals, Silva has returned to his traditional base — the poor — rallying them with claims that his opponent, Geraldo Alckmin, would sell off cherished state assets and eliminate popular programs such as Family Allowance, which gives needy families monthly subsidies.

DOJ_NMG_0088290

"The rich don't need the Brazilian state. The ones who need it are the poor people of this country," Silva said at rally on Sao Paulo's poor east side. "The poor are the ones who need public universities because the rich can pay — or even study in Paris."

While few believe Silva would adopt the radical populism of Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, they worry that he could entrench divisions in Brazil, which has one of the world's widest gaps between rich and poor.

"It's very easy to mobilize the poor. What's hard is to demobilize them after the election," said Bolivar Lamounier, director of the Augurium political consulting firm. "I'm afraid if he wins a second term, which looks likely, he will be tempted to take an authoritarian turn."

According to two polls released Saturday night, Silva led Alckmin by 22 percentage points. Both the Ibope and the Datafolha institutes said Silva would win 61 percent of the valid votes, while Alckmin would get 39 percent.

The Ibope survey interviewed about 8,680 people on Saturday, while Datafolha talked to 12,820 Brazilians between Friday and Saturday. Both polls, conducted for Globo TV, had a margin of error of 2 percentage points.

In the first round on Oct. 1, Silva fell just short of the 50 percent needed to avoid a runoff. Polls had predicted he would win outright but then news media ran photos of $770,000 in cash that members of his party allegedly planned to spend on purchasing an incriminating file about Alckmin and his allies.

Although Silva was never personally implicated, the expose reinforced suspicions of government corruption — suspicions driven home by Alckmin in his campaign speeches.

It was then that Silva stepped up the class-driven rhetoric.

He called Alckmin a tool of the rich and out of touch with the common man, while his allies painted a corruption scandal enveloping Silva's party as an elitist-driven conspiracy.

"The raw and naked truth is that, in the elite's political program ... the poor have not been included," Silva said at a Sao Paulo rally. "During elections the poor are worth more than bankers, but after the elections the poor are not even invited in for coffee."

The first-round vote split the nation along geographic lines, with Silva winning handily in Brazil's poor north while Alckmin took the industrialized south, including Sao Paulo, the state he served as governor.

In the second round, Silva counterattacked with an appeal to national pride, claiming that Alckmin would privatize government-run companies that are sacred cows to many Brazilians — oil giant Petrobras, Banco do Brasil, the national post office.

Alckmin called the president a "liar" to his face during their first debate — but Silva hammered away at the theme, and analysts say many of Brazil's 125 million voters believed him.

"It's not very difficult with the low level of education in Brazil to motivate this prejudice," Lamounier said. "It was very hard to carry out privatization in Brazil, and while it a made good business sense, when poor people got their phone bills or light bills they just saw that things cost a lot."

Alckmin has played on fears that Silva, like Chavez, could rewrite the constitution to give the poor more power. Silva has denied any attempt to split the country along class lines.

His socialist fire has already inflamed prejudices among upper-class Brazilians.

"If he's elected I hope he gets impeached during his first days in office," said Remo Dalla Zanna, a 67-year-old economist. "He's not the kind of person I want governing my country. I don't want a crude and ignorant union leader. No one I know is going to vote for him."

The poor majority, in large part, remains Silva's devout power base.

"With Lula, things have gotten much better for the poor," said Celsinha Coqueiro de Sousa, a 52-year-old maid, "and I hope they will get even better."

___

Associated Press writer Hellen Berger contributed to this report from Sao Paulo.

DR Congo Votes For New President (BBC)

BBC.com, October 28, 2006

Voting has opened for a new president of the Democratic Republic of Congo, in one of Africa's most significant elections for many years.

President Joseph Kabila, who came to power after his father Laurent was assassinated in 2001, is facing former rebel leader Jean-Pierre Bemba.

The UN-backed election is intended to crown a peace process that ended five bloody years of civil war in 2003.

Correspondents say the outcome could shape the future for much of Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0088291

Sunday's run-off will conclude the DRC's first fully democratic polls since independence in 1960 and is aimed at restoring peace to one of Africa's largest and most turbulent states.

The BBC's Mark Doyle in Kinshasa says it is impossible to exaggerate how the destiny of DR Congo could shape the future of Africa.

Joseph Kabila (left) is running off against Jean-Pierre Bemba (right) Nine African states border the country and all were affected by the wars caused by the long lack of real government in DR Congo, the power vacuum at the heart of Africa, he says.

UN officials say the polls are the most important on the continent since the 1994 election of Nelson Mandela that ended apartheid in South Africa.

However, our correspondent says the candidates are not Nelson Mandelas and neither of them has a good record of being a democrat.

Mr Kabila has strong support in the east of Congo; Mr Bemba is popular in the west.

This political split across the geography of a vast nation is the same split that in the past led to a war in which four million people are estimated to have died, our correspondent adds.

'Tense but manageable'

Mr Kabila won first round polls on 30 July, but fell just short of the 50% needed for outright victory.

At least 23 were killed in armed clashes between the two men's security forces in Kinshasa after the results were announced.

United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan has called on the two candidates to ensure that the election is peaceful. Both men have promised to urge their supporters against violence and to abide by election rules.

A UN official in Kinshasa has described the situation as "tense but manageable".

Extra UN peacekeeping troops are on standby in the east of the country. In the capital, Kinshasa, the UN is being backed up by a special European Union military force.

Final Stage Of Election In Congo Holds Hopes Of Many For Peace (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

GOMA, Congo, Oct. 28 -- By 8 a.m. Thursday, several dozen people had already lined up at the election commission office. Some had walked miles in leather loafers or flip-flops, ridden bicycles with skinny tires across lumpy dirt roads or traveled by car through the rolling green jungle.

Then they waited. They explained. They argued. They walked to a different election office across town, and back again. At last, lucky Augistin Busaka reached the plastic orange table inside the old stone building where stacks of handwritten lists spilled onto towers of cards and more lists. He handed an election worker a letter of introduction that began, "Dear Sirs," which he hoped would help him obtain the coveted prize: a voting card.

"I want peace," he said, explaining that his farm remains in the hands of one of several militia groups fighting in the palmy mountains around here. "Whatever it costs. If I have to walk 60 kilometers, I'm going to walk it, just to vote."

There is an exuberant, if fragile, sense in eastern Congo these days that the country is inching toward one of the most significant moments in its post-colonial history.

In the culmination of the first multiparty elections in 40 years, tens of millions of people are expected at the polls Sunday for the runoff vote for president and to elect, for the first time, provincial legislators tasked with bringing democracy closer to people who have seen decades of epic corruption and two ruthless wars.

The process has been largely peaceful, the result of a massive logistical effort by the United Nations, which has deployed 17,500 peacekeepers; international donors, who have given $450 million; and mainly, the Congolese themselves.

The Congolese Independent Election Commission has managed the mind-boggling, largely pen-and-paper task of registering 60 million voters across a mostly roadless country the size of the United States east of the Mississippi. Through posters, music and even theater, election workers have explained such basics as how to mark a ballot, a task that continued until nightfall Saturday in Goma, a dirt-street town of wooden kiosks and markets.

Although an estimated 70 percent of registered voters turned out for the first round of elections in July, in this eastern province alone nearly 37,000 ballots were voided. Some people, for instance, had seized a long-awaited chance to express themselves, writing, "You fool!" next to the picture of a despised candidate or, "You are my savior, I love you so much!" next to a favored one.

"People drew faces on the candidates and things like that," said Jason Luneno, who leads a group that promotes good governance and educates voters in Goma. "So all that was an expression of anger. . . . Our job is to sensitize people not to do that again. So with all that, we hope the election will be successful."

DOJ_NMG_0088292

In general, the Congolese seem to be sharply divided between the two presidential candidates. The western half of the country, including the capital, Kinshasa, voted heavily in the first round for Jean-Pierre Bemba, a businessman from that region.

Here in the war-ravaged east, people voted overwhelming for Joseph Kabila, whose father, Laurent Kabila, led a rebellion in 1997 that toppled Mobutu Sese Seko, who, with U.S. support, ruled the country by force for 37 years. By some estimates, he looted billions from the government of this nation abundant with diamonds and minerals.

The younger Kabila took power after his father was assassinated in 2001 and in the east is generally credited with helping to end major fighting among various militias. Some of the groups have demobilized, others have been integrated into the national army, and some still roam here, seeming to have settled into a routine of brutal violence. Human rights groups estimate that 4 million people have died as a result of the fighting since 1998. And even now more than 1,000 die daily because of hunger, disease and other consequences of being run into an unforgiving jungle.

And so, the elections have been greeted in eastern Congo as a chance at lasting peace.

On Thursday, the lines at the election commission office grew longer and sweatier as the day wore on.

Here was Angalia Kifene, an evangelical minister who was chased from his village three times by militiamen who came looting and killing, and Gilbert Banyawesize, who had to flee his village twice, and Mugenzi Isaac, at the moment a farmer without a farm. Isaac had walked through the dawn to get his voting card and was waiting now, more defiant than downtrodden.

"I have no farm now because it's been taken over by Nkunda's forces," Isaac said angrily, referring to Laurent Nkunda, perhaps the most notorious warlord here. Nkunda's militias forced Isaac to flee to Goma, where he makes what money he can these days carrying luggage for U.N. officials or wealthy businessmen passing through. "We hope if we have a responsible president, we will be able to go home."

As the last-minute scramble for voting cards went on, minivans plastered with Kabila's face and loaded with supporters -- often paid with lunch -- zoomed around the dusty streets. Many other vans advertising the provincial candidates -- in Goma, there are no fewer than 143 vying for three seats -- sped around blaring Congolese music as a voice from a loudspeaker urged people to vote for No. 53, or No. 61, or No. 72.

Nkunda's party, which once controlled a vast swath of the east, lost heavily in the first round of voting. Although some provincial candidates remain affiliated with his party, very few have openly advertised the fact in the last few days before the election, instead posting big smiling photos of Kabila on the vans, a sign of the warlord's waning power.

Indeed, whether the losers accept the results -- or whether the winner is able to fold them into the new government -- remains an open question in eastern Congo, as well as in Kinshasa, where forces loyal to Bemba and Kabila clashed after the first round of voting and elsewhere in recent days.

And beyond the announcement of results next month, a more complicated matter remains: governing a country where most institutions of democracy remain weak. Many Congolese have no access to courts. Some agencies and many of the soon-to-be-created provincial legislatures, which will manage 40 percent of the country's revenue, according to the new constitution, do not yet have physical buildings.

The bureau of information in Goma, for instance, consists of a room with three dangling light bulbs and four donated desks. Recently, three men, reading newspapers, seemed simply to have dropped by.

"Three years ago, no one would have believed we would have gotten this far," said Jason Stearns, an analyst with the International Crisis Group. "But the U.N., regional leaders, the Congolese, while they've been successful in organizing the election, they haven't been successful in creating other trappings of democracy. You can't just vote and go home."

At the moment, at least, residents of Goma say they are ready.

Throughout the day Friday, hundreds of Congolese poll watchers turned up at the election commission office to get their accreditation. Thousands more gathered at a plywood electoral commission stand set up at the center of town. They were there for their voting cards, and a commission official called their names from a megaphone: "Mongane! Muhindo! Mutubaze! Muindo! Mumbere!"

Among the handful of workers there was Mbalamiramwira Mukenge, born, he said, in 1978. Forced into one rebel group, he switched to another, then went back to the first, and in recent months decided he had had enough of it all.

He went to a government demobilization center, where he renounced the life of a soldier in return for a promised $300. When he arrived in Goma to get the money, however, he received only $25. With his home village still under the control of a militia, he roamed the city until he found a place to sleep.

One recent morning, officials found him curled up at the electoral commission stand and gave him a job as a guard.

"I'm hoping with the election coming that we'll have peace in the country," said Mukenge, adding that he wants to resume his studies and become a teacher. "Maybe I will be someone in the future government."

Fears Usurp Optimism In Congo Vote (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0088293

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Violence ahead of the presidential runoff sparks the question: Will the loser abide by the results peacefully?

Anxious Congolese returned to the polls this morning to complete the first democratic presidential election in more than 40 years. But fears of renewed violence in this Central African giant largely overshadowed the hope and optimism many had expressed during the first round of voting.

Millions were expected to line up at 50,000 polling stations nationwide, just as they did July 30 for the first round; however, officials worried that heavy thunderstorms this morning in Kinshasa, the capital, could affect turnout. The initial round had ended without any of 33 presidential contenders garnering the required 50% of ballots.

In today's runoff, voters faced two choices: transitional President Joseph Kabila, the son of assassinated President Laurent Kabila; and his archenemy, Jean-Pierre Bemba, a businessman-turned-militia leader who serves as a vice president.

In August, the men's private security forces fought for three days, killing at least two dozen people in Kinshasa. Ever since, the capital has remained on edge, worried the election's loser will resort to violence and plunge the country back into civil war.

"If they are really democrats, as they pretend to be, they should accept the results," said Heritier Lionga, an economics student at Protestant University of Congo. "But I'm not optimistic. Everyone is afraid. We hope whatever happens won't last for a long time."

As election day approached, United Nations tanks and armored personnel carriers took up position in front of the Independent Election Commission, media outlets and the candidates' campaign headquarters. About 2,500 U.N. troops, some working behind sandbag positions, are providing security along with 1,700 European Union soldiers. Military helicopters occasionally buzzed overhead.

Independent as of 1960, the Democratic Republic of Congo, formerly known as Zaire, endured decades of dictatorship and kleptocracy under strongman Mobutu Sese Seko, followed by four years of civil and regional war that killed about 4 million people, mostly from disease and hunger. A transitional government was installed in 2003.

International experts say the election could help stabilize one of Africa's most populous and resource-rich — but also most traumatized — nations.

"The transition represents the best possibility that has existed for many years, possibly ever, to get things going right in this very big and very important country," U.S. Ambassador Roger Meece said in an interview.

Meece said he remained optimistic despite the fact that he was among several diplomats briefly ensnared in the fighting in August. The clashes rocked an upscale riverfront neighborhood where Kabila, Bemba and many international diplomats live, leaving stray bullet holes in some of the elegant mansions and turning Bemba's personal helicopter into a pile of melted metal and ash. "That was an ugly period," Meece said.

Reissued assurances

Since then, a flurry of internationally supervised commissions and peace agreements have worked to ensure that the candidates will accept the will of the voters. So far, both have pledged to shun violence and keep their fighters off the streets, although the men made similar promises during the first round.

The media-shy Kabila, 35, who backed down last week from the only scheduled debate, is considered the front-runner. He won 45% of the vote in July, with strong support in the eastern part of the country. He recently forged coalitions with other top vote-getters, including a son of Mobutu and an ex-premier who ranked third in the first round.

Kabila declined to be interviewed last week, but he told the BBC that he would "without question" accept the poll's results. Some diplomats blame him for instigating the August standoff by dispatching some of his estimated 5,000 presidential guard soldiers to surround the election commission offices when the results were scheduled to be released.

Bemba, who received 20% of the vote in the first round and remains popular in Kinshasa and much of the west, has been working hard to replace his tough-guy image with a more "presidential" look, shunning traditional Congolese shirts in favor of dark suits and red power ties.

"I'm a democrat," he said last week. "In a democracy, winning and losing is a result of the will of the people."

But he insisted he would not shy away from confrontation, if provoked. "In a democracy, tanks and troops have no place in the streets," he said. But "I will defend myself."

Experts say the outcome could be close, despite Kabila's strong first-round lead. Bemba won endorsements from another strong first-round contender, Oscar Kashala, a Harvardeducated cancer doctor who returned to Congo last year and generated enthusiasm among students and intellectuals.

Although veteran opposition leader Etienne Tshisekedi has refused to endorse either candidate, many of his supporters are backing Bemba.

'Framework for the future'

DOJ_NMG_0088294

Election commission officials have until Nov. 19 to announce the provisional results, but they hope to make an announcement by Nov. 10 to avoid the climate of rumors and speculation that fueled August clashes, said Apollinaire Malu-Malu, president of the commission. But he warned against high expectations, noting that the new government will face challenges in reforming the army, providing social services and maintaining security.

"The elections are not the end," he said. "They just provide a framework for the future. It's a new point of departure."

Officials at the U.N., which is funding the $500-million election, said they had reevaluated security since the August standoff. "It's been beefed up," said Roberto Valent, deputy director for the U.N. Development Program in Kinshasa.

Analysts say Kabila and Bemba appear to be preparing for a fight, gathering weapons and soldiers.

Bemba's private militia in Kinshasa is estimated to consist of from 600 to 1,000 fighters, about twice the number he had during the first round. He also draws strong support from unemployed youths, who probably would rally to his cause in the event of another confrontation.

There are reports that Angolan troops are gathering along the border, presumably to come to the aid of Kabila. The reports stir memories of Angola's assistance to Kabila's father in the late 1990s, when Congo's civil war drew in its neighbors, snowballing into what many call Africa's "First World War."

"They are definitely arming," said Jason Stearns, senior analyst at the International Crisis Group, a conflict-resolution research organization. "But I don't expect a return to all-out war. The key will be for the winner to be able to consolidate his position, both politically and militarily. It cannot be a winner-take-all scenario."

edmund.sanders@latimes.com

Sudan Denies Report That It Bombed Towns In Chad (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

N'DJAMENA, Chad (AP) — Chad accused neighboring Sudan on Saturday of bombing four towns along its eastern border, close to Sudan's volatile western Darfur region where thousands have been displaced by three years of conflict.

The Sudanese army spokesman, Brig. Gen. Osman Mohammed al-Aghbash, denied the Chadian report and said Sudanese forces "have no interest in intervening there."

There has been no independent confirmation of the Chadian government's allegations that Sudan's air force attacked the villages of Bahai, Tine, Kayarin and Bamina on Friday.

"Sudan has to stop ... otherwise we are going to take measures," Chadian Foreign Minister Ahmat Allam-mi told journalists Saturday without elaborating. "We are not going to accept any other aggression. Our forces will take all necessary measures to respond."

On Wednesday, Chad accused Sudan of supporting rebels that have attacked three eastern towns in recent days. Officials said the rebels had been driven back across the border.

The United Nations announced Friday that it was sending a mission to Chad and the Central African Republic to look for ways to keep the escalating conflict in Darfur from spilling into other countries.

Rebel groups are using various nations as rear bases to stage destabilizing attacks in both Chad and Sudan's western Darfur region, and "the humanitarian fallout is extremely serious," U.N. Undersecretary-General for Peacekeeping Jean-Marie Guehenno said in New York.

Al-Aghbash, the Sudanese spokesman, said a senior military delegation visited Chad's capital of N'Djamena last week seeking to improve relations between the two countries' militaries. He denied Sudan allows Chadian rebels to operate from Sudanese territory.

After an April rebel attack on N'Djamena, Chadian President Idriss Deby accused Sudan of supporting the Chadian rebels, which Sudan denied. He closed the border and severed diplomatic ties, but the two countries resumed relations and reopened the border in August.

Human rights groups have long warned the violence in Darfur could destabilize the entire region. More than 200,000 people are believed to have been killed and 2.5 million people displaced in a three-year conflict between Darfurian rebels and the Sudanese government.

Chadian rebels, who include army deserters and some of Deby's relatives, have had sporadic clashes with Chad's army since October 2005. Deby, who first took power at the head of his own rebel army in 1990, won elections in May that the main opposition parties boycotted because they claimed they had been rigged.

The competition for power in Chad has become more intense since the country began exporting oil in 2004.

In Swaziland, 'Secret Lovers' Confronted In Fight Against AIDS (WP)

By Craig Timberg

DOJ_NMG_0088295

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

MBABANE, Swaziland -- This tiny kingdom's new anti-AIDS campaign arrived without warning one day in July, featuring a slogan both unusually explicit and dripping with implied accusations: Makhwapheni Uyabulala.

Your secret lover can kill you.

Despite living in a country that has the world's highest rate of HIV, Swazis had grown accustomed to bland billboards suggesting that more condoms or a positive attitude toward the disease would curb its spread. These new ads were different.

By the time they disappeared two weeks later in a frenzy of controversy, they had sparked a passionate national debate about how best to combat a disease that, Swazis say, has pushed their country to the brink of collapse. And the ads forced many here to confront how freewheeling sex was fueling an epidemic of early death.

In Swaziland's bustling capital, callers were jamming the lines of radio shows. Men at pubs began looking askance as their friends maneuvered their way into casual hookups. And Musa Ndlangamandla, the stocky 35-year-old editor of the Swazi Observer newspaper, began rethinking his attitude toward casual relationships.

"Sometimes you need shock therapy," said Ndlangamandla, a short man with a neatly trimmed goatee, broad shoulders and a bit of a beer belly. He was so impressed by the campaign that he began printing "Say No to Multiple Sex Partners!" in capital red letters on the front page, just below the newspaper's nameplate.

Swaziland, a southern African country about half the size of Maryland, at first glance appears deeply traditional, with cattle roaming freely among clusters of mud-and-thatch huts nestled in the green folds of steep mountainsides. But Swazis say it is modernizing at warp speed, with new highways, shopping malls and easy access to American soap operas and gossip about the exploits of Hollywood celebrities.

Although polygamy is common -- the king has 13 wives -- even more common, Swazis say, are relationships in which men have only one wife but girlfriends also. Women often maintain several partners as well. A study by a Christian aid group, World Vision, reported in May that in several southern villages, roughly three out of five residents, both men and women, reported having two or more sexual partners in the past three months.

The word makhwapheni (pronounced "ma-kwa-penny"), which means "your secret lover," became the centerpiece of radio and newspaper ads on the order of Derek von Wissell, 62, a courtly, gray-haired former cabinet minister who founded the national AIDS commission in 2002. He grew frustrated with his agency's inability to curb a virus that had infected an estimated 200,000 of Swaziland's 1 million residents. Among adults 15 to 49, the rate was even higher, with one out of three infected.

Von Wissell concluded that the vague, unfocused public education campaigns common here and throughout Africa had failed. In this, he was persuaded in part by the research of Daniel T. Halperin, an AIDS expert for the U.S. Agency for International Development based in Swaziland, who in speeches and private presentations pointed to dozens of studies showing that condom promotion campaigns were having little impact and that it would be more effective to target the multiple, concurrent sexual relationships that fuel high rates of HIV.

"We have been pussyfooting around sex," von Wissell said in an interview in his office in a small concrete building dominated by a convenience store and gas station. "The first thing you must recognize is that sex spreads HIV."

The issue of multiple sexual partners has rarely been the focus of anti-AIDS campaigns in Africa, both because of taboos against publicly discussing sex and because of a long-standing consensus among anti-AIDS groups that educational messages should inspire hope rather than fear, researchers say. Campaigns have been especially careful to avoid suggesting that people with the disease -- including millions of women who had sex only with their unfaithful husbands -- bear any blame for contracting it.

The makhwapheni campaign cast that conventional wisdom aside in what von Wissell said was a desperate bid to force Swazis to take responsibility for protecting themselves, and their loved ones, from AIDS.

The ads were designed to look like cellphone text messages. Perhaps the most brazen was written as a sexual invitation from a married woman to her secret lover. Beside the image of the cellphone screen, the words "why kill your family" were written in English. In smaller letters, in siSwati, the dominant language in Swaziland, was the slogan "makhwapheni uyabulala" -- your secret lover can kill you.

Another ad, also in siSwati, bore a similar cellphone message, but next to it were the words "watifaka elubishini," which mean "and more orphans were left behind."

But some Swazis, such as activist Gcebile Ndlovu, 44, who had spent years battling the stigma surrounding AIDS, said they felt insulted and undermined by the campaign.

Ndlovu, a mother of three who has a round face and graying hair that she wears in braids, had watched her husband shrivel up and die from AIDS eight years ago. The makhwapheni ads outraged her, she said. They blamed the victims. And, she said, they would increase the stigma that she and other activists carrying the virus had struggled to ease.

DOJ_NMG_0088296

"Who wants to be called a makhwapheni?" Ndlovu said as she wiped tears from her eyes. "Is this campaign going to encourage people to test, so that they know their status? Or is it going to drive people underground?"

For activists, the campaign painfully recalled an earlier era of the epidemic, before the arrival of antiretroviral drugs here made AIDS a chronic but survivable disease for many. AIDS activists also objected to the moralizing tone of the makhwapheni ads. They preferred messages urging wider use of condoms.

"Don't tell me how many people to have sex with," Ndlovu said. "You can't dictate that to me. I go to bed with someone. That's my choice. Rather, tell me how to be safer."

In just a few days, Ndlovu and another AIDS activist organized one of the largest demonstrations in Swaziland's limited history of democratic protests. Hundreds of men and women, many wearing T-shirts with the words "I am HIV positive," delivered a petition to the office of the prime minister. Then they marched on von Wissell's office, singing "Away with makhwapheni!"

Von Wissell refused to meet the throng, but a few days later, he gave in to the complaints and suspended the campaign.

The word makhwapheni, however, was not so easily erased from the minds of Swazis. All over the country, it continued to dominate conversations. When cellphones buzzed with the arrival of text messages, some would joke, "Is that your makhwapheni?"

Radio host Bongani Dlamini, 50, who used one of Swaziland's most popular shows to defend polygamy and other Swazi traditions, attempted to eliminate the word on his show, out of deference to von Wissell's decision. But his callers would not follow such edicts. They kept calling, and they kept demanding that Swazis abandon their makhwaphenis.

"Those are the people who are doing the damage!" callers raged, Dlamini recalled.

It was about this same time, AIDS activists say, that children of women with HIV began asking their mothers, "Do you have a makhwapheni?" In other families, the frenzy stirred up by the campaign, activists said, prompted at least a few families to banish relatives who were open about having HIV.

"It was saying, women are prostitutes, women are the ones bringing HIV into the home as if it was us who were bringing HIV here," said Siphiwe Hlophe, 47, a friend of Ndlovu's who helped organize the protests.

But von Wissell was convinced that the message, even if it upset some, was working. And in the face of attack, he had decided not on surrender but on a tactical retreat. In meetings with Ndlovu and other activists, he vowed to resume the campaign, with an important concession. The word at the center of the controversy, makhwapheni, would be used no more.

The new campaign, which includes television ads, began in late September, two months after the makhwapheni messages were suspended.

The changes are not nearly enough for Ndlovu, though she says that she has lost the will to continue the fight. "Even now," she said, her soft voice cracking with hurt, "the messages are the same. And because I'm quiet, Siphiwe is quiet, no one is saying anything about it."

Von Wissell was not entirely pleased with the outcome, either, fearing that the loss of his shocking slogan watered down the impact of the ads. Preliminary research on the makhwapheni campaign, conducted for the AIDS commission, showed tremendous reach throughout Swaziland.

Among Swazis surveyed, 86 percent had heard of the campaign, and despite the controversy, 91 percent agreed with its message warning against the dangers of multiple sexual partners, and 78 percent said it made them consider changing their own sexual behavior. The study was funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development.

It is far too soon to tell whether the makhwapheni campaign, or its toned-down successor, caused changes that will lower Swaziland's HIV rate.

The AIDS activists who opposed it remain doubtful.

"I wonder how many Swazis are now faithful to their partners?" Hlophe said with a skeptical smile. "It did not make any difference."

But one man it did affect was Ndlangamandla, the newspaper editor.

Years of watching Swazis die, including several friends, did not force him to accept that his fondness for girlfriends endangered him and his wife, and ran the risk of making their two children orphans. The makhwapheni campaign -- and especially the conversations it provoked -- did.

"I will be at the bar," Ndlangamandla said, "but you'll never find me with another woman. I'm scared."

Africa's World Of Forced Labor, In A 6-Year-Old's Eyes (NYT)

By Sharon Lafraniere

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

KETE KRACHI, Ghana — Just before 5 a.m., with the sky still dark over Lake Volta, Mark Kwadwo was rousted from his spot on the damp dirt floor. It was time for work.

DOJ_NMG_0088297

Shivering in the predawn chill, he helped paddle a canoe a mile out from shore. For five more hours, as his coworkers yanked up a fishing net, inch by inch, Mark bailed water to keep the canoe from swamping.

He last ate the day before. His broken wooden paddle was so heavy he could barely lift it. But he raptly followed each command from Kwadwo Takyi, the powerfully built 31-year-old in the back of the canoe who freely deals out beatings.

"I don't like it here," he whispered, out of Mr. Takyi's earshot.

Mark Kwadwo is 6 years old. About 30 pounds, dressed in a pair of blue and red underpants and a Little Mermaid T-shirt, he looks more like an oversized toddler than a boat hand. He is too little to understand why he has wound up in this fishing village, a two-day trek from his home.

But the three older boys who work with him know why. Like Mark, they are indentured servants, leased by their parents to Mr. Takyi for as little as $20 a year.

Until their servitude ends in three or four years, they are as trapped as the fish in their nets, forced to work up to 14 hours a day, seven days a week, in a trade that even adult fishermen here call punishing and, at times, dangerous.

Mr. Takyi's boys — conscripts in a miniature labor camp, deprived of schooling, basic necessities and freedom — are part of a vast traffic in children that supports West and Central African fisheries, quarries, cocoa and rice plantations and street markets. The girls are domestic servants, bread bakers, prostitutes. The boys are field workers, cart pushers, scavengers in abandoned gem and gold mines.

By no means is the child trafficking trade uniquely African. Children are forced to race camels in the Middle East, weave carpets in India and fill brothels all over the developing world.

The International Labor Organization, a United Nations agency, estimates that 1.2 million are sold into servitude every year in an illicit trade that generates as much as $10 billion annually.

Studies show they are most vulnerable in Asia, Latin America and Africa.

Africa's children, the world's poorest, account for roughly one-sixth of the trade, according to the labor organization. Data is notoriously scarce, but it suggests victimization of African children on a huge scale.

A 2002 study supervised by the labor organization estimated that nearly 12,000 trafficked children toiled in the cocoa fields of Ivory Coast alone. The children, who had no relatives in the area, cleared fields with machetes, applied pesticides and sliced open cocoa pods for beans.

In an analysis in February, Unicef says child trafficking is growing in West and Central Africa, driven by huge profits and partly controlled by organized networks that transport children both within and between countries.

"We know it is a huge problem in Africa," said Pamela Shifman, a child protection officer at the New York headquarters of Unicef. "A lot of it is visible. You see the kids being exploited. You watch it happen. Somebody brought the kids to the place where they are. Somebody exploited their vulnerability."

Otherwise, she asked, "How did they get there?"

John R. Miller, the director of the State Department Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the term trafficking failed to convey the brutality of what was occurring.

"A child does not consent," he said. "The loss of choice, the deception, the use of frauds, the keeping of someone at work with little or no pay, the threats if they leave — it is slavery."

Some West African families see it more as a survival strategy. In a region where nearly two-thirds of the population lives on less than $1 a day, the compensation for the temporary loss of a child keeps the rest of the family from going hungry. Some parents argue that their children are better off learning a trade than starving at home.

Indeed, the notion that children should be in the care of their parents is not a given in much of African society.

Parents frequently hand off children to even distant relatives if it appears they will have a chance at education and more opportunity.

Only in the past six years or so has it become clear how traffickers take advantage of this custom to buy and sell children, sometimes with no more ceremony than a goat deal.

In 2001, 35 children, half of them under age 15, were discovered aboard a vessel in a Benin port. They said they were being shipped to Gabon to work.

In 2003, Nigerian police rescued 194 malnourished children from stone quarries north of Lagos. At least 13 other children had died and been buried near the pits, the police said.

Last year, Nigerian police stumbled upon 64 girls aged 14 and younger, packed inside a refrigerated truck built to haul frozen fish. They had traveled hundreds of miles from central Nigeria, the police said, and were destined for work as housemaids in Lagos.

In response to such reports, African nations have passed a raft of legislation against trafficking, adopting or strengthening a dozen laws last year alone.

DOJ_NMG_0088298

There were nearly 200 prosecutions of traffickers on the continent last year, four times as many as in 2003, according to the State Department's trafficking office.

Some countries are encouraging villages to form their own surveillance committees. In Burkina Faso, the government reported, such committees, together with the police, freed 644 children from traffickers in 2003. Still, government officials in the region say, only a tiny fraction of victims are detected.

Ghana, an Oregon-size nation of 21 million people, has yet to prosecute anyone under the new antitrafficking law it adopted last December. But the government has taken other steps — including eliminating school fees that forced youngsters out of classrooms, increasing birth registrations so that children have legal identities and extending small loans to about 1,200 mothers to give them alternatives to leasing out their children.

The International Organization for Migration, an intergovernmental agency set up after World War II to help refugees, has also mounted a United States-financed program to rescue children from the fishing industry.

Since 2003, the organization says, 587 children have been freed from Ghana's Lake Volta region, taken to shelters for counseling and medical treatment, then reunited with parents or relatives.

"We sign a social contract with the fishermen," said Eric Peasah, the agency's Ghana field representative. "If they have 10 children, we say, 'Release four, and you can't get more, or you will be prosecuted.' Once they sign that, we come back and say we want to release more."

To reduce child trafficking significantly, said Marilyn Amponsah Annan, who is in charge of children's issues for the Ghanaian government, adults must be convinced that children have the right to be educated, to be protected, and to be spared adult burdens — in short, the right to a childhood.

"You see so many children with so many fishermen," she said. "Those little hands, those little bodies. It is always very sad, because this is the world of adults.

"We have to educate these communities because they do not know any other way of existence. They believe this is what they need to do to survive."

That is the fishermen's favorite defense in Kete Krachi, a day's drive through dense forests from Ghana's capital, Accra. For the area's roughly 9,000 residents, fishing is their lifeblood. Children keep it going.

Nearly every canoe here holds at least a few of them, some no older than 5 or 6, often supervised by a teenager. A dozen boys, interviewed in their canoes or as they sewed up ratty nets ashore, spoke of backbreaking toil, 100-hour workweeks and frequent beatings. They bore a pervasive fear of diving into the lake's murky waters to free a tangled net, and never resurfacing.

One 10-year-old said he was sometimes so exhausted that he fell asleep as he paddled. Asked when he rested, another boy paused from his net mending, seemingly confused. "This is what you see now," he said.

They never see the pittance they earn. The fishermen say they pay parents or relatives each December, typically on trips to the families' villages during the December holidays.

The children's sole comfort seems to be the shared nature of their misery, a camaraderie of lost boys who have not seen their families in years, have no say in their fate and, in some cases, were lured by false promises of schooling or a quick homecoming.

On Nkomi, a grassy island in the lake, Kwasi Tweranim, in his mid to late teens, and Kwadwo Seaako, perhaps 12 or 13, seemed united by fear and resentment of their boss. Both bear inchlong scars on their scalps where, they said, he struck them with a wooden paddle.

"I went down to disentangle the net, and when I came up, my master said that I had left part of it down there," Kwasi said. "Then I saw black, and woke up in another boat. Only the grace of God saved me."

Kwadwo, stammering badly, said he had been punished when the net rolled in the water.

Not every fisherman is so pitiless. Christian Lissah employs eight children under 13, mostly distant relatives. He said he knew many children who were treated no better than workhorses, and some who had drowned.

"In general, this is not a good practice because people mishandle the children," he said. Yet he said he could not imagine how he would fish profitably without child workers, and depends on friends and acquaintances to keep him supplied — for a commission.

"You must get people who are a very low background who need money," he said. "Some of them are eager to release their children."

Mark Kwadwo's parents, Joe Obrenu and his wife, Ama, were an easy sell. Mr. Obrenu fished the seas off Aboadzi, a hilly, sun-drenched town on the Gulf of Guinea, and his wife dried the catch for sale. But the two often ran short of food, said Mark's aunt, Adwoa Awotwe. Over the years, they sold five of their children into labor, she said, including Mark's 9-year-old sister Hagar, who performs domestic chores for Mr. Takyi.

DOJ_NMG_0088299

Mr. Obrenu drummed up other recruits from neighbors, sometimes to their lasting regret. “It was hunger, to get a little money; the whole today, I have not eaten,” said Efua Mansah, whose 7-year-old son, Kwabena, boarded a small blue bus with Mr. Takyi four years ago for the 250-mile trip to Kete Krachi.

She has seen him only twice since then. In all that time, Mr. Takyi has paid her $66, she said, a third of which she spent on buses and ferries to pick up the money.

In her one-room hut decorated with empty plastic bottles, she forced back tears. “I want to bring my son home,” she said.

Mark also cried when his turn to leave came this year, his aunt said, so his mother told him that Mr. Takyi would take him to his father. Instead, he was brought to Mr. Takyi’s compound of caked mud huts, to a dark six-foot-square cubicle with a single tiny window. He shares it with five other children, buzzing flies and a few buckets of fish bait.

In two days, a smile never creased Mark’s delicate features. He seldom offered more than a nod or a shake of the head, with a few telling exceptions: “I was beaten in the house. I can’t remember what I did, but he caned me,” he said of Mr. Takyi.

Mr. Takyi, who sleeps and works in the same gray T-shirt, is disarmingly frank about his household. He can afford to feed the children only twice a day, he said, and cannot clothe them adequately. He himself has been paddling the lake since age 8.

“I can understand how the children feel,” he said. “Because I didn’t go to school, this is work I must do. I also find it difficult.”

Yet he does not hesitate to break a branch from the nearest tree to wake the boys for the midnight shift.

“Almost all the boys are very troublesome,” he complained. “I want them to be humble children, but they don’t obey my orders.”

One recent morning, his young crew, wrapped in thin bedsheets for warmth, hiked in the darkness down to the shore.

They paddled out in two leaky but stable canoes, searching the water for a piece of foam that marked where their net was snagged on submerged tree stumps. Kwabena, 11, stripped off his cutoff shorts and dived in with an 18-year-old to free it, yanking it at one point with his teeth.

Mark has not mastered the rhythm of paddling. Mr. Takyi said the boy cries when the water is rough or he is cold. He cannot swim a stroke. If the canoe capsizes, Mr. Takyi said, he will save him.

“I can’t pay what is asked for older boys,” Mr. Takyi said, as Mark bailed out the canoe with the sawed-off bottom of a plastic cooking oil container. “That is why I go for this. When I get money, I go to get another one.”

In the other canoe, Kwame Akuban and Kofi Quarshie plucked fish from the net with the air of prisoners waiting for their terms to end.

Kofi, 10, said his mother had told him his earnings would feed their family. But he suspects another motive. “They didn’t like me,” he said softly.

Kwame, 12, said his parents had promised to retrieve him in a year’s time and send him to school.

“I have been here three years and I am not going home, and I am not happy,” he said quietly.

As if on cue, Mr. Takyi shouted: “Remove the fish faster, or I will cane you.”

Running away is a common fantasy among the boys. Kofi Nyankom, who came from Mark’s hometown three years ago, at age 9, was one of the few to actually try it.

Last December, he ran to town half-naked, his back a mass of bruises. He said Mr. Takyi had tied up him and whipped him.

George Achibra, a school district official, demanded that the police intervene, and Mr. Takyi was forced to let Kofi go.

But before many weeks passed, he had brought in a replacement — younger, more helpless, more submissive. It was Mark Kwadwo.

A Travesty In Libya (WP)

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

A new cure for AIDS: Shoot foreigners.

IN AN attempt to shed his rogue status, Libyan leader Moammar Gaddafi has foresworn weapons of mass destruction and agreed to compensate the families of those who died in the 1988 Lockerbie bombing. But on Tuesday a trial reopens that could again tarnish Libya's image. Five Bulgarian nurses and a Palestinian doctor are accused of intentionally injecting the AIDS virus into more than 400 Libyan children. The accusations are an attempt to deflect Libyans' attention from the shocking state of their own medical system. The evidence against the six foreigners is flimsy, but they could face a firing squad.

The infections occurred at a children's hospital eight years ago in Benghazi, a city in Libya's northeast. When the outbreak was discovered, a local magazine suggested that the infections reflected poor standards of hospital hygiene: Children were often treated with unscreened blood products, and equipment was not always cleaned before reuse. But Libyan authorities seized the foreign health workers at the hospital and tortured them until they confessed to malpractice. The foreigners were convicted and sentenced to be executed. But Libya's Supreme Court ordered a retrial following foreign protests.

DOJ_NMG_0088300

The prosecution's case in the new trial is built on a report by five Libyan physicians. The British science journal, Nature, obtained this report and showed it to Western medical experts, who determined that it contained no real evidence. Meanwhile, the Libyan court has refused to admit as evidence an investigation done by two prominent European AIDS experts. The Europeans concluded that the infections had begun before the foreign health workers had even arrived in Benghazi. They also noted that many of the children were infected with hepatitis B and C, evidence consistent with the theory that the HIV was spread by poor hospital hygiene.

The European Commission and the United States have called for the release of the health workers. If Libya nonetheless goes ahead with this travesty of justice, it will be saying that it prefers to scapegoat foreigners rather than admit to the weakness of its own medical system. The first victims will be the health workers. But they will be followed by the Libyans themselves, who need a government with the honesty to confront the true causes of HIV infections.

If Not Now, When? (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

Perhaps the most extraordinary aspect of Darfur isn't that gunmen on the Sudanese payroll heave babies into bonfires as they shout epithets against blacks. It's that the rest of us are responding only with averted eyes and polite tut-tutting.

This past week alone, Sudan expelled the U.N. envoy for Sudan and sent a proxy army to invade eastern Chad. Those moves underscored both the audacity of Sudan's leaders and the fecklessness of the rest of the world's.

In fact, there's plenty we can do. The international community has focused on getting U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur, but Sudan refuses to admit them. The stalemate drags on; the slaughter continues — but here's what we can do:

· Kofi Annan should appoint a new U.N. envoy of utmost prominence. Possibilities include Bill Clinton, Jimmy Carter, Richard Holbrooke and Bernard Kouchner (a founder of Doctors Without Borders). The envoy's job would be to lead an intensive negotiation aimed at achieving a political settlement.

The focus has been on getting U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur, and they are needed, but in the long run only a peace accord can calm Darfur. "This is distracting from the main need," Mudawi Ibrahim Adam, a Sudanese human rights campaigner, said of the focus on peacekeepers. In May a peace agreement was stillborn after only one Darfur rebel faction signed it, but the pact can be renegotiated, for the differences are small and bridgeable.

· President Bush and European leaders need to use their leverage on four nations in particular to make them part of the solution: China, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Libya. China is playing a disgraceful role underwriting the Darfur genocide, by giving Sudan the guns used to shoot children and by protecting Sudan in the U.N. Security Council. And the three Arab states need to be involved so that Sudan cannot claim that plans to protect Darfuris are American or Jewish plots to dismember the country.

"It is very clear there is a plan to redraw the region," the Sudanese president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, said last month, explaining the calls for U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur. "Any state in the region should be weakened, dismembered in order to protect the Israelis."

Sudanese journalists say that Mr. Bashir has cleverly used such arguments to portray himself as a nationalist, and as a result is in a stronger position now than when he started killing babies in Darfur. Arab leaders need to show that they care about Muslim children being shot even when Israel is not responsible.

· To get more coverage on Al Jazeera and other Arab networks, Mr. Annan could take a planeload of Arab journalists on a visit to Darfur refugee camps. Condi Rice could do the same. The U.S. could put video footage (I'd supply some) of Darfur atrocities on its Arabic-language satellite television station, Al Hurra.

· The U.S., France and U.N. should immediately send peacekeepers to Chad and the Central African Republic to prop up those countries (the U.S. can supply airlift, intelligence and communications support, but our ground troops would create a backlash). Sudan has sent proxy forces to invade both, and they are teetering.

· We need contingency plans for forcible military intervention. There is talk that in the coming months Sudan's janjaweed militias may start systematically massacring some of the two million people who have taken shelter in camps in Darfur. If that were to happen, U.N. and NATO forces would have to go in and rescue those people — and if Sudan knew of such contingency plans, that would make massacres less likely.

· The U.S. and French air forces should jointly impose a no-fly zone from the French air base in Abéché, Chad, as the Chadian president has invited us to do.

· Western countries should apply targeted sanctions that freeze international assets of Sudanese leaders whom the U.N. has already listed as involved in the genocide.

· Mr. Bush must use his bully pulpit. He could invite Arab and African leaders to the White House for a summit on Darfur. He could suggest to the Chinese president, Hu Jintao, that they jointly visit the area.

DOJ_NMG_0088301

After fewer than 10,000 white people had died in Kosovo, the U.S. intervened to prevent a genocide. So far, several hundred thousand black people have been slaughtered in Darfur, and our president hasn't even dedicated a speech to it.

If we don't try bold new approaches now, when? After 750,000 have died and Chad has collapsed? After all north central Africa is in chaos and 1.5 million are dead? When?

DOJ_NMG_0088302

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, October 30, 2006 10:17 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, October 28, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061028.pdf; agnb061028.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Judge Sets Schedule For Hearing Detainee Suits....4
Cheney Clarifies Comments Regarding "Dunking" Detainees.4
Albany Terror Case Informant Sentenced To Time Served For License Fraud....5
Hamid Hayat Lawyers Seek New Trial, Citing Juror Misconduct....5
US Counterterrorism Strategy In North Africa Questioned....5

Patriot Act:
ACLU Drops Legal Challenge To Patriot Act....6

Homeland Response:
Chertoff Discusses Border Security Activities....6
TSA Delays Deadline For Baggage Handlers' Background Checks....7
Suspicious Powder Found In Letter Addressed To Bill Clinton Office....7
FBI Agents Teach Oklahoma First Responders About Homemade Bombs....7
Grad Student's Fake Boarding Pass Web Site Prompts Visit From FBI....8
Bloomberg Expands Search For Human Remains Near WTC Site....8
Congress Urged To Curb Suits Against Third Parties Arising From Terrorist Incidents....8

War News:
Maliki, Khalilzad Publicly Pledge Continued Cooperation....8
US Continues Search For Abducted Soldier In Baghdad....9
US Citizen Will Not Yet Be Turned Over For Iraqi Death Sentence....9
Report Says Halliburton Subsidiary Abuses Federal Regulations....9
Kurdish President Says Iraq Must Decide Partition Issue....10
King Criticizes State Of Iraqi Leadership....10
Bush, NATO Secretary-General Discuss Taliban's Use Of Human Shields....10

Corporate Scandals:
Orbital Sciences Corp To Restate Earnings After Finding Misdated Options....11
SEC Queries JP Morgan Over Bisys-One Group Link....11
Former Computer Associates CEO Awaits Sentencing....12
Cooperating With US To Catch Big Fish Pays Off For Corporate Small Fry....12

Criminal Law:
Safavian Sentenced To Eighteen Months In Prison....12
House Ethics Committee Will Not Release Foley Report Before Elections....13
Longtime Illinois Political Fundraiser Pleads Guilty In Kickback Probe....13
Four Convicted In Honolulu Airport Contract Fraud Conspiracy....14
DOJ Cancels Faith-Based Prison Rehabilitation Program....14
SCOTUS To Rule On Police Officers' Responsibility During High-Speed Chases....14
Two New York Men Seek New Trial Over Courtroom Chaos 15
New York Officials Rule Homicide In Baby Girl's Death....15
Malvo Confesses To Killing Of Arizona Golfer....15
Judge Denies Bond For Florida Cuban Spying Suspect....15
FBI Puts Wyoming Agents In Charge Of Beauprez Ad Probe..16
Pataki Chooses Former Federal Prosecutor For Havesi Probe....16
Doolittle Faces Voters With Uncertain Legal Fate....16
New York Man Pleads Guilty To Managing Prostitution Ring 17
US Charges Florida Man In Online Hacking Plot....17
Puerto Rico Jury Spares Convicted Murderer From Death Penalty....17
FBI Mulls Probe Of Rep Porter Over Fundraising Calls....18

Man Admits Louisiana Murders Before Being Executed In Florida 18
New York Judge Sentences Mafia Figure To Life For Two Murders 18

Civil Law:

Lawsuit Over Promotion Of Christianity At USAF Academy Thrown Out 19

Civil Rights:

Drifter Sought In Probe Of DC Hate Graffiti 19
DA Charges 11 In Orange County Voter Registration Fraud Probe 19
DOJ Official Meets With Lake Charles, LA, Residents Over Police Shooting 19
Indianapolis Police Union Alleges Recruitment Bias 20
Mississippi Voters May Be Left Out Of Election 20
New Jersey Same-Sex Couples Consider Personal Economic Impact Of Ruling 20
Student Criticizes Conservative Activist's "Academic Bill Of Rights." 21

Antitrust:

Private Equity Funds Bid For Tribune Company 21
Google Takes Advertising Plans To Madison Avenue 22
Arcelor Mittal Takes Stake In Noble 22
FCC Sets November 3 Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal 22
Smithfield Gambles On Merger While Foes Fight Expansion 23
Becton, Dickinson Wins FTC Approval For TriPath Deal 23

Environment:

9th Circuit Halts Stryker Activity In Hawaii 23
Firefighters Continue To Combat California Fire That Has Already Killed Four 24
Religious Groups Oppose Controversial Appalachian Mining Practices 24
NYTimes Urges Administration To Expand Flu Vaccine Production 25

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Montana Man Sentenced To Probation For Firearms Violations 25
Federal Agents Were Planning Raid Of California DA's Home Before His Death 25
Maryland Man Pleads Guilty To Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot ... 26

Tax:

NYTimes Concerned About "Political Motivation" In IRS Collection Delay 26

Congress-Administration:

Rangel Says Democrats Will Not Roll Back Bush Tax Cuts ... 26
White House Reportedly Trimming 2008 Army Budget Request 27
Rice Said To Rely On Zelikow To Provide Policy Alternatives 27

Other News:

Slow GDP Growth Blamed On Weak Housing Market 27
Gasoline Prices Expected To Rise Over The Next Week 29
Campaigns Turn Increasingly Nasty As Parties Joust For Control 29
Allen Camp Hits Webb Over Explicit Passages In His Novels 31
Unlike 2004, Values Issues Not On Ohio's Radar This Year .. 32
Steele's Pediatrician Sister Defends Him On Stem Cells In TV Ad 32
Bloomberg Lends Campaign Operatives To Lieberman 33
Whitehouse Leads Chafee By 10 Points In Rasmussen Poll .. 33
Corker Leads Ford By One Point In Rasmussen Poll 33
Talent Leads McCaskill By Two Points In Rasmussen Poll ... 33
Santorum Says He Is "Running Full-Tilt." 33
In Indiana, Local Issues Hurting GOP House Candidates 33
Kuhl Facing Tough Contest In Usually GOP-Solid NY29 34
Ballot Measures Could Boost Democrats This Year 34
"Rising Star" Obama Swings Through Los Angeles 34
Schwarzenegger Seen As Having Made Big Comeback 34
Perry Leads Bell By 11 Points In Texas Gubernatorial Poll 35
Faso Ad Blasts Spitzer Over Ties To Hevesi 35
Hand Sanitizer Becomes A Must On The Campaign Trail 35
Court To Hear Appeal From Parents Of Autistic Child 35
Bill Clinton Plans Birthday-Weekend Fundraisers For His Causes 36
Dixie Chicks Documentary Garners Free Publicity From Networks 36
Los Angeles Clergy Sex Abuse Cases Settled For $10 Million 36
South Korean Media Cite "Activity" At North Korean Nuclear Site 36
Tehran Confirms Uranium Enrichment Underway In Second Cascade 37
Rice Says Hezbollah Must Disarm To Join Lebanese Politics 37
US Ambassador Said To Manage Difficult Portfolio In Caracas 37
Bogota Undergoing Renaissance After Years Of Chaos 37
Indigenous Supporters Turn Against Bolivia's Morales Over Coca Policy 38
Pilots' Lawyer Says Brazilian Controllers Approved Altitude Before Fatal Crash 38

DOJ_NMG_0088305

Paris Deploys Extra Police To Stem Rash Of Bus Burnings .. 38
Abe Veers Toward Center In First Month As Japan's Prime Minister 39
Sri Lankan Government To Meet With Tamil Tigers Today .. 39
Pronk Will Remain In Sudan Envoy Job Through December 39
UN Forces Free Mobutu's Son Ahead Of Congolese Vote 39
Ethiopian, Eritrean Forces Could Widen Somali Conflict 40
China-Africa Summit Highlights Growing Economic Interdependence 40
Lithuania Learns About Kremlin Oil Game The Hard Way 40
WPost Optimistic About Resolution Of Central Europe's Political Woes 40
Senegal President Urges World Attention To Africa's High Oil Prices 40
Suez Crisis Marked Start Of Intense US Intervention In Middle East 41

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 41

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 42

DOJ_NMG_0088306

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Sets Schedule For Hearing Detainee Suits. The AP (10/28) reports, "A federal judge Friday set the stage for the next push by the Bush administration to get all the lawsuits by detainees at Guantanamo Bay thrown out of U.S. courts." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge James Robertson laid out a five-week schedule for the Justice Department and lawyers for Salim Ahmed Hamdan to file written arguments in the detainee's challenge to his confinement. … Hundreds of other detainees also are challenging their detentions in lawsuits." The AP adds, "It was a challenge by lawyers for Hamdan, Osama bin-Laden's former driver, that led to the Supreme Court ruling in June striking down the Bush administration's plan for military commission trials. … The new Military Commissions Act, which President Bush signed on Oct. 17, strips U.S. courts of jurisdiction to hear the detainees' challenges to their indefinite detentions. Hamdan's lawyers say the new provision is 'of doubtful constitutionality.' … Ten days ago, the Justice Department filed a copy of the new law with the court in Hamdan's case. Robertson said in a one-page order the Justice Department filing 'is deemed to be a motion to dismiss' Hamdan's case."

Cheney Clarifies Comments Regarding "Dunking" Detainees. The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 4, 0:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There was additional controversy today about comments Vice President Dick Cheney made to a conservative talk radio host this week. The radio host made a reference to dunking terrorists in water which a lot of people took as a reference to the interrogation technique called 'water boarding' which is viewed around the world as a form of torture." Host: "Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" Cheney: "Well, it's a no-brainer for me, but for a while there I was criticized as being the Vice President for torture. We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in. We live up to our obligations." NBC: "White House spokesman Tony Snow said today the Vice President was not referring to water boarding."

The Washington Post (10/28, A2, Eggen, 748K), in an article titled, "Cheney Defends 'Dunk In The Water' Remark: Addressing Alarm Over the Comment, Vice President Says He Was Not Referring to Waterboarding," reports Vice President Cheney "said yesterday that he was not referring to an interrogation technique known as 'waterboarding' when he told an interviewer this week that dunking terrorism suspects in water was a 'no-brainer.' Cheney told reporters aboard Air Force Two last night that he did not talk about any specific interrogation technique during his interview Tuesday with a conservative radio host. 'I didn't say anything about waterboarding. … He didn't even use that phrase,' Cheney said on a flight to Washington from South Carolina." According to the Post, "The comments were aimed at calming a growing furor over Cheney's comments, which were taken by many human rights advocates and legal experts as an endorsement of waterboarding as a method of questioning. … 'Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?' Scott Hennen of WDAY in Fargo, N.D., asked Cheney on Tuesday. 'Well, it's a no-brainer for me,' Cheney responded. Cheney also said he agreed with Hennen that the debate over interrogation techniques was 'a little silly,' and he praised the information obtained from U.S. terrorism suspects during questioning."

Snow Fends Off "Waterboarding" Questions. The New York Times (10/28, Lewis, 1.21M) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "said Mr. Cheney was not endorsing water-boarding." Snow "said Mr. Cheney was not, in fact, referring to any technique, whether it was torture or not, because administration officials do not discuss interrogation methods. President Bush was also confronted by reporters about Mr. Cheney's comments as he made a joint appearance with Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, the secretary general of NATO. 'This country does not torture; we're not going to torture,' Mr. Bush said, without referring directly to Mr. Cheney or his comments." Snow, "who spent much of his day dealing with questions about the comments, told reporters that none of them related to interrogation techniques, which are classified. 'I'm telling you what the vice president's view is, which is it wasn't about waterboarding. Period,' he said." The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Gerstenzang, 918K) reports that when "asked what 'dunk in water' was referring to if not water-boarding…Snow said, 'I will let you draw your own conclusions, because you clearly have.'"

Human Rights Activists Blast Cheney. The AP (10/27) reports, "Human rights groups complained that

DOJ_NMG_0088307

Cheney's comments amounted to an endorsement of water boarding, in which the victim believes he is about to drown." Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, "said in a statement, 'What's really a no-brainer is that no U.S. official, much less a vice president, should champion torture. Vice President Cheney's advocacy of water boarding sets a new human rights low at a time when human rights is already scraping the bottom of the Bush administration barrel.'" BBC.co (10/28) reports president Bush "has reiterated his position that the US administration does not condone torture, following comments by Vice President Dick Cheney. … The BBC's Matt Wells in Washington says Mr Cheney's comment was made on Tuesday but only came to light on Friday, exacerbated by a stormy and confrontational White House press briefing."

Albany Terror Case Informant Sentenced To Time Served For License Fraud. The Albany Times-Union (10/28, Lyons) reported, "A Pakistani immigrant whose own crimes led him to serve as an FBI informant in an Albany-based counterterrorism sting walked out of federal court a free man Friday after a judge sentenced him to time served in consideration for his years of undercover work." Shahed Hussain "talked briefly outside court with his longtime FBI handler, Special Agent Timothy Coll, then quickly left the courthouse without commenting to reporters. Hussain's own legal problems began about five years ago when he was arrested in an FBI fraud investigation that was launched shortly after the 9/11 attacks." He "has since been credited with helping the FBI arrest more than a dozen people, including the people involved in the DMV scandal," in which he was arrested, "and a member of an Afghani-based heroin trafficking ring." The AP (10/28) noted that Hussain "had acknowledged cooperating with the FBI in hopes of reducing his sentence after his arrest for helping about 80 immigrants fraudulently obtain state drivers' licenses in Albany. … Hussain's credibility was an issue in the mosque case, where a jury found imam Yassin Aref and Albany pizzeria owner Mohammed Hossain guilty of money laundering in support of terrorism."

Hamid Hayat Lawyers Seek New Trial, Citing Juror Misconduct. The AP (10/28) reported, "Attorneys for a Lodi man convicted this spring by a federal jury of supporting terrorists have asked a judge to grant a new trail after reports of juror misconduct. In a 106-page motion filed Friday, Hamid Hayat's lawyers said reports of 'extensive misconduct' by jury foreman Joseph Cote demand court review." Defense attorneys Wazhma Mojaddidi and Dennis Riordan "cited reports by juror Alicia Lopez and Theresa Berkeley-Simmons that Cote used racial slurs during the trail, including saying that Pakistanis or Muslims all 'look alike' if dressed the same. They also pointed to an Atlantic magazine interview that Cote gave after the trial where he said he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for the London subway bombings." The AP added that Hayat's lawyers also "said U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr., should have allowed a retired FBI agent to testify about the bureau's interview procedures. They said James Wedick…would have revealed the inappropriateness of Hayat's confession."

US Counterterrorism Strategy In North Africa Questioned. The Washington Post (10/28, A1, Whitlock, 748K), in an front-page article titled, "Taking Terror Fight To N. Africa Leads U.S. To Unlikely Alliances," reports, "Locked in a prison here [Algiers], for now, is a desert bandit dubbed the 'Bin Laden of the Sahara,' whose capture was secretly orchestrated by U.S. forces." Amari Saifi, "a former Algerian army paratrooper, was caught in 2004 after he and a band of rebel fighters kidnapped 32 European tourists in the Algerian Sahara and ransomed them for about $6 million. Since then, the U.S. government has cited his case as a model for terrorist-hunting operations and a justification for expanding U.S. military, diplomatic and intelligence programs in North Africa." However, according to the Post, "A close examination of how Saifi was apprehended…highlights the quandaries facing the United States. … In its search for allies in an unstable region, the U.S. government reached out to Libya…and to other countries it has condemned for abusing human rights. Some security analysts and European counterterrorism officials question the U.S. strategy." The Post adds, "Regardless of Saifi's fate, U.S. officials say they consider North Africa an increasingly strategic front. … Together, the Defense and State departments are devoting $500 million to new counterterrorism programs in the region. Last year, the Pentagon sponsored Operation Flintlock. … About 700 U.S. Special Forces personnel trained troops from nine African nations, leading a war game that mirrored the effort to hunt down Saifi a year earlier."

DOJ_NMG_0088308

PATRIOT ACT:

ACLU Drops Legal Challenge To Patriot Act.

The AP (10/28, Irwin) reports, "The American Civil Liberties Union on Friday dropped a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act." The AP continues, "The ACLU said it was withdrawing the lawsuit filed more than three years ago because of 'improvements to the law.' The Justice Department argued last month that amendments approved by Congress in March 2006 had corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act. … 'While the reauthorized Patriot Act is far from perfect, we succeeded in stemming the damage from some of the Bush administration's most reckless policies,' Ann Beeson, associate legal director of the ACLU in New York, said in a written statement." The AP adds, "The lawsuit, filed in July 2003 on behalf of the Muslim Community Association of Ann Arbor and five other nonprofit groups, was the first legal challenge to Section 215, the part of the Patriot Act that lets federal agents obtain such things as library records and medical information. … The ACLU said the revisions allow people receiving demands for records to consult with a lawyer and challenge the demands in court." The AP notes, "The Justice Department, which first asked that the lawsuit be dismissed in December 2003, said it was pleased by the ACLU's action, which was contained in a one-paragraph notice filed with U.S. District Judge Denise Page Hood in Detroit. … 'We ... reiterate that the Patriot Act is a legitimate and important tool that has better helped law enforcement fight terrorism while simultaneously protecting our valued civil liberties,' Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said."

The Detroit News (10/28, Cardenas) reports, "The ACLU originally filed the suit against the government on behalf of a coalition of groups that argued that Section 215 of the Patriot Act passed in October 2001 was unconstitutional because it gave wide and secret investigative powers to federal agents to obtain books, records, papers, documents, e-mails and even a DNA sample without notifying the targeted person or group. … The suit was withdrawn on Friday after Congress revised the Patriot Act in March to allow those who receive a demand for records to consult with a lawyer and challenge the demand in court. … 'While the reauthorized Patriot Act is far from perfect, we succeeded in stemming the damage from some of the Bush administration's most reckless policies,' said Ann Beeson, ACLU's associate legal director, in a statement. … 'The ACLU will continue to monitor how the government applies the broad Section 215 power and we will challenge unconstitutional demands on a case-by-case basis,' Beeson said."

Local Television. Many local television networks reported that the ACLU dropped its lawsuit challenging the Patriot Act due to recent improvements to the law. Some examples: WJRT-TV Flint, (10/28, 7:01 a.m.) broadcasted, "The American Civil Liberties Union says it's dropping a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act. The ACLU says it's withdrawn the lawsuit because of improvements to the anti-terrorism law. Justice Department lawyers argued that amendments approved by congress in March had corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act."

WZZM-TV Grand Rapids, (10/28, 11:22 p.m.) broadcasted, "Civil Liberties Union has dropped a lawsuit challenging the 'Patriot Act.' The ACLU says it's withdrawing the lawsuit because of improvements to anti-terrorism laws. The lawsuit was filed back in 2003 on behalf of the Muslim Community Association of Ann Arbor and five other groups. It was the first legal challenge of the 'Patriot Act' that lets federal agents obtain things like library records and medical information." 'WJBK-TV Detroit, (10/28, 8:32 a.m.) broadcasted, "The American Civil Liberties union is dropping its challenge of the Patriot Act in the United States. They filed three years ago on behalf of Muslim and Arab American groups. It challenged the law that let people get personal information. They said they would drop lawsuit because the government made improvements to the act."

KPRC-TV Houston, (10/28, 9:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "The American Civil Liberties Union is dropping its lawsuit, challenging the Patriot Act. The ACLU says recent 'improvements' make the lawsuit unnecessary."

WSBT-TV South Bend, (10/28, 8:33 a.m.) broadcasted, "The Justice Department argued last month that amendments approved by Congress corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Discusses Border Security Activities. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff appeared on Fox News (10/27, MacCallum) to discuss border security. He said in part, "We've put more fencing up, we've deployed a lot more Border Patrol, and we've put the National Guard in place. We've seen a reversal in the momentum. The numbers of people coming across that we're seeing entering illegally is now beginning to decline. That doesn't mean we can declare victory, but it means we've finally turned the corner and we're moving in the right direction. What it is going to require is persistent application of resources. We're going to have to use these high-tech tools. We're going to have to put up the fencing, particularly in those areas where it's easier for people to get to a trafficked road or a bus station or something like that, because we need to slow them up."

DOJ_NMG_0088309

Government Computer News (10/28, Hostetler) reports, "As the United States faces threats from weapons of mass destruction—radiological, chemical, biological or nuclear—as well as high-consequence international and homegrown plots, the Homeland Security Department is working with state, local, federal and international law enforcement to defend the country from terrorism." GCN continues, "Homeland Security secretary Michael Chertoff said stopping domestic terrorism threats is best done through shared intelligence, starting at the local level. To ensure that this coordination and collaboration happens, DHS will establish fusion centers, stocked with experts, and will work to grant clearance of classified information more quickly. … Both initiatives are part of the department's effort to take its relationships with major city police chiefs and information sharing to the next level, Chertoff said at the annual International Association of Chiefs of Police conference in Boston last week." GCN adds, "DHS plans to have 20 fusion centers by the end of the fiscal year and up to 35 fusion centers by the end of the next fiscal year. They have already invested $380 million in state-run fusion centers. Some states that have fusion centers include Colorado, Illinois, Maryland and New York. … The Justice Department has issued regulations for the fusion centers. … The agency will also work toward speeding up and broadening the clearance process."

Dobbs Says Mexico Threatening US Security. At the start of CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (10/27), host Dobbs said, "Just one day after President Bush signed legislation here in Washington to build a border fence, the government of Mexico is threatening the sovereignty and national security of the United States. President Vicente Fox and President-Elect Felipe Calderon are both asserting that the United States has no right to build such a fence along our southern border. At the same time, the White House and its allies in corporate America appear determined to create a new North American union, incorporating Canada, Mexico, and the United States. Such a union would, in effect, create a giant nation, including those three countries."

TSA Delays Deadline For Baggage Handlers' Background Checks. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, 918K) reports the Transportation Security Administration "has rolled back the deadlines for criminal-background checks for tens of thousands of airline workers who handle cargo loaded onto passenger airplanes, saying the industry cannot meet the timetables. 'TSA has concluded that the regulated community will be unable to meet some deadlines in the air cargo final rule because of the large number of employees and agents subject to the requirements,' the agency said in a notice published this week. The rules were originally slated to go into effect from Oct . 23 to Dec. 1. They require background checks and security training for an estimated 50,000 workers employed by the airlines or by airline contractors handling cargo, said TSA spokesman Darrin Kayser. Under the new timetables, several deadlines have been pushed back as far as mid-2007."

Suspicious Powder Found In Letter Addressed To Bill Clinton Office. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) reports former President Clinton's Harlem office "was shut down yesterday afternoon after a woman in the office opened a letter and a suspicious white powder spilled out, the police said. The substance was later found to be nontoxic, but its discovery led the authorities to evacuate two floors of the building." The AP (10/28) reports Secret Service spokesman Eric Zahren "said a field test on the substance found it to be inert."

FBI Agents Teach Oklahoma First Responders About Homemade Bombs. The Oklahoman (10/28, Baldwin) reported, "Five dozen emergency first responders and bomb technicians throughout the state should be a little safer after learning about homemade bomb factories this week" at a "professional continuing education classes offered by the University of Central Oklahoma's newly created Institute for Forensic Science. Kirk Yeager, an FBI bomb expert, said, 'We want to give them an understanding about what they could run across so they can assess the situation and say that something isn't right.'" The Oklahoman noted that Yeager

DOJ_NMG_0088310

"has been involved in bombing investigations as far away as in Israel, Peru and Turkey," and he "said he shared his worldwide experiences because whatever trends are seen abroad could end up here in the United States." Another of the instructors, Oklahoma City FBI Special Agent Barry Black, said that "in the field, first responders in instances such as drug raids need to recognize the types of chemicals used to make the explosives."

Grad Student's Fake Boarding Pass Web Site Prompts Visit From FBI. WISH-TV Indianapolis (10/28, Perkins) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast Friday, "An IU student's research on airport security has landed him in hot water with federal investigators. He found a way to forge boarding passes, and then put the instructions online." Christopher Soghoian "says he wanted to show the Transportation Security Agency that anyone could find their way past a key line of defense. … Soghoian said anyone could make up a name. He insists airport workers will simply check for ID, scan the barcode at the gate, and let the ticket holder board the plane without any questions. Indiana Homeland Security chief Eric Dietz disagrees, 'Well, I think you can find a number of small loopholes, but you have to look at what it does to the overall system. It takes a piece approach as opposed to a system approach.'" Soghoian "says he's received at least one visit from the FBI and a congressman has called for his arrest."

In the Washington Post (10/28) "Security Fix" blog, Brian Krebs also wrote, "When I phoned Soghoian Friday evening, he abruptly ended our conversation shortly after it began by saying that two FBI agents were banging on his door asking to speak with him. A short time later, the tool he had posted on his site vanished. I later caught up with Soghoian in an online chat channel, but he was reluctant to say much before consulting an attorney. 'I had a conversion with the FBI tonight,' Soghoian told me. 'We agreed that the issue of boarding passes is important, but that my particular approach could be improved upon.' Wendy Osborne, a special agent with the FBI's Indianapolis field office, declined to discuss the matter, but said Soghoian was not arrested. 'We do take precautions when there are potential security problems in light of everything that's going on these days.'"

Bloomberg Expands Search For Human Remains Near WTC Site. The New York Times (10/28, Dunlap, 1.21M) reports, "The Bloomberg administration said yesterday that it would cast a net well beyond ground zero, from Broadway to the Hudson River, from the bottom of manholes to the top of nearby skyscrapers, in its search for human remains from Sept. 11, 2001."

Congress Urged To Curb Suits Against Third Parties Arising From Terrorist Incidents. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (10/28, A7, 2.03M) Ted Frank, resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes, "Plaintiffs' attorneys are weaving creative legal theories to hold legitimate third parties liable for the intentional acts of terrorists. This friendly fire could end up doing almost as much financial damage as the terrorists themselves, with the lawyers getting rich in the process." Frank notes, "After 9/11, lawsuits would have bankrupted several corporate victims of the attacks were it not for a $7 billion, taxpayer-funded bailout of potential plaintiffs. Even so, several dozen claimants opted for litigation. Naturally, their lawyers have sued everyone from the airlines to Boeing to Motorola to New York City. Many of these cases are still in pre-trial proceedings. … If courts are not going to apply the antiterrorism laws sensibly, Congress should amend them to make clear that civil liability is limited to those who commit criminal acts of international terrorism, and those who aid and abet with specific intent to commit terror. Otherwise, terrorists can damage the global economy simply by inducing fratricidal litigation."

WAR NEWS:

Maliki, Khalilzad Publicly Pledge Continued Cooperation. ABC World News (10/27, story 3, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Overseas, in Iraq, the American ambassador and Iraq's Prime Minister issued a rare, joint statement today, after a week of public tensions between the two governments. Iraq said it is committed to a good and strong relationship with the U.S. Iraq also said there should be time lines, laying out steps Iraq must take to improve conditions there."

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Daragahi, 918K) reports that in "the latest example of tension between the two governments," Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "sharply criticized U.S. policy Friday during a private meeting with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, "pointing to America's failure to either reduce violence or give his government authority over security matters." He "criticized what he called the patronizing U.S. tone toward the Iraqi government and warned U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad to respect Iraq's sovereignty." This "stood in stark contrast with a joint public statement issued after the meeting," when "al-Maliki and the U.S. Embassy said they had agreed to unspecified 'timelines' to make tough political and security decisions on the country's future." Coming after "days of back-and-forth recriminations, the contrast between private criticism and the public statement brought into sharper focus a dispute that may have already undermined the Shiite-led government and increased friction between America and the country's majority sect." The "squabbling and confusion" is due to "prickly truths" - Al-Maliki's government has lost public backers, even as the U.S. government "has little choice but to back al-Maliki's Iranian-influenced Shiite government."

DOJ_NMG_0088311

The New York Times (10/28, Burns, 1.21M) reports, "With recent events in Iraq causing growing strains between the Bush administration and the Iraqi government, the two governments issued a tautly worded statement through the American Embassy in Baghdad on Friday renewing their commitment to work together for peace and security in Iraq." The Times adds, "The dispute over benchmarks reflects a deeper divide between the religious Shiite parties and the Americans, who were once seen by the Shiites as a partner in wresting power from the Sunni minority through elections."

The Washington Post (10/28, A11, Anderson, 748K) mentions the announcement towards the end of a story focusing on the hunt for an abducted US soldier. The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Hurst) also covers this story.

Violence Sees Lull In Baghdad. In a front page article, the Washington Post (10/28, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports, "For the people of Baghdad, death took something of a holiday this week. By Thursday, U.S. and Iraqi military commanders were staring at murder rates that had fallen by half since Monday." Explanations could include the week long slamic holiday Eid al-Fitr, or the "massive American operation" that "shut down some of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods" as they search for a missing soldier. Howver, "U.S. military officers played down the notion that their troops' increased operations and the sealing off of Sadr City had contributed to the drop in violence, saying it was a normal calm for Eid." Still, no one is "counting on the decline in killing to continue."

US Continues Search For Abducted Soldier In Baghdad. The Washington Post (10/28, A11, Anderson, 748K) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi forces returned to Sadr City on Friday to search the Shiite Muslim slum for a missing U.S. soldier," who was abducted while visiting relatives, "occasionally engaging in gun battles with members of local militias during their hunt." The "U.S. and Iraqi forces have conducted an intense hunt across Baghdad, searching cars at checkpoints, going door to door and raiding areas where they think he might be held." According to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, "the soldier's brother was kidnapped with him but had been released.." Analysts say "that rogue units of the" Mahdi Army militia may no longer be under Moqtada al-Sadr's control, "and Maliki said in the interview that some Sunnis now operate in the name of the Mahdi Army." He added, "we don't know what the Mahdi Army means anymore."

US Citizen Will Not Yet Be Turned Over For Iraqi Death Sentence. The Washington Post/AP (10/28, A6) reports that .S. District Judge Royce Lamberth ruled that Mohammad Munaf, a U.S. citizen who was sentenced to death by an Iraqi court for "helping in the 2005 kidnapping of three Romanian journalists in Baghdad" is not to be "handed over by the U.S. military until the Supreme Court hears his case, a federal appeals court ruled yesterday. Munaf "said his trial was flawed and his confession coerced." However, Judge Lamberth also "ruled that he has no authority to intervene," and "the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit also declined to step in." Therefore the wait will be only the "10 days to appeal to the Supreme Court and wait for it to rule before" the military turns Munaf over Iraqi officials.

Report Says Halliburton Subsidiary Abuses Federal Regulations. The Washington Post (10/28, D2, Witte, 748K) reports that a report released yesterday by Auditors for the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction found that Halliburton subsidiary KBR Inc. "is abusing federal regulations by marking nearly all information it gives to the government about its operations in Iraq 'proprietary,' a practice that promotes unnecessary secrecy and could hurt competition." The auditors also "concluded that the company's actions represent 'an abuse' of the Federal Acquisition Regulation." While Halliburton spokeswoman Cathy Mann said in a written response "that using the proprietary stamp was 'not only encouraged, but required' by the Army," the report says "Army officials are working on ways to get KBR to cut down on the practice."

DOJ_NMG_0088312

The New York Times (10/28, Glanz, Norris, 1.21M) leads that KBR "systematically misused federal rules to withhold basic information on its practices from American officials." It "is the first time the federal government has weighed in and accused it of systematically engaging in a practice aimed at veiling its business practices in Iraq," and this report come "at a critical time for the company, as Halliburton is trying to spin off the subsidiary."

The Financial Times (10/28, Kirchgaessner) notes, "As a result of the investigation, army officials said they would prepare a modification to a multi-billion dollar Halliburton contract – known as Logcap – to 'provide guidance' to KBR on the marking of proprietary data."

Kurdish President Says Iraq Must Decide Partition Issue. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A6, Miller, 2.03M) reports on an interview with Massoud Barzani, the president of Kurdistan. He say "American forces are not 'occupiers' or the 'enemy,' but 'liberators.'" However, "having been both saved and betrayed by previous American governments, he knows the risks of tying Kurdish fortunes too closely to an administration facing public disenchantment with its Iraq policies." Still, "the secret of Kurdistan's relative success so far -- and of America's enduring popularity here -- is the officially unacknowledged fact that the three provinces of the Kurdish north are already quasi-independent," and "Washington's refusal to accept this self-evident political reality does not trouble Mr. Barzani." However, while "Having an independent state is the natural legitimate right of our people," Barazani adds that "the parliament of Kurdistan has decided to remain within a federal, democratic Iraq." On the fate of Iraq, he says "Only a voluntary union can work. Either you have federalism with Baghdad as a federal capital with a special status, or you have separation." Also, "he was clearly annoyed by a slight: The fact that the congressionally created Iraq Study Group…has not traveled to Kurdistan." On oil, "Barzani is willing to share revenues with Baghdad, the principle of control is vital to Kurdistan if it is to have an independent revenue stream."

King Criticizes State Of Iraqi Leadership. Colbert I. King writes in his column in the Washington Post (10/28, A15, 748K), "Frederick Jones, the NSC's communications director, said yesterday that no American official has ever met" Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, "Iraq's most powerful figure." This is because "Sistani has designated himself off-limits to Americans," who "he considers…infidels." This "reveals the extent to which the Bush administration is now, and always has been, out of its depth in Iraq." Today his "Shiites are the major political force in Iraq," and he, "according to Newsweek, forbids music for entertainment, dancing and playing chess, and forbids women from shaking the hands of any men other than their fathers, brothers or husbands. His whole purpose is to promote Shiite theology and keep Iraq as a democratic, but decidedly Islamic, state." Meanwhile, his "chief competition" is the "anti-American Shiite cleric, Moqtada al-Sadr," whose organization "infiltrated Iraqi military and police units" and to whose call the "Iraqi parliament, truth be told, responds." After "Billions spent, thousands of Americans dead or maimed, U.S. armed forces exhausted, stretched thin and working around the clock," was this "what George W. Bush had in mind?"

Bush, NATO Secretary-General Discuss Taliban's Use Of Human Shields. The Washington Times/AP (10/28) reports, "President Bush and NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer yesterday discussed how the Taliban has begun using Afghan civilians as human shields. In a meeting at the White House, Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said that he was saddened by recent deaths of Afghans and that the alliance is committed to defending democracy in the nation once ruled by the repressive Taliban regime." According to the White House, "the two leaders did not discuss NATO troop levels or the suspension of two German soldiers in connection with photographs of troops posing with human skulls."

Mine In Afghan Road Kills 14, Wounds Three Civilians. The New York Times (10/28, Wafa, 1.21M) reports, "An explosion from a mine in a road on Friday killed 14 civilians and wounded three others in a suburb of the capital city in the southern province of Uruzgan," as the "group of elderly people, youths and children…were riding in a pickup truck toward the provincial capital, Trinkot, for the celebration of Id al-Fitr." According to a spokesman for the provincial governor, "the government was investigating whether the mine had been laid recently by suspected Taliban fighters or was left over from the Soviet invasion."

Photos Of Soldiers With Skulls "Rattles" German Military. The Washington Post (10/28, A9, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "A scandal over soldiers caught playing with human skulls has rattled the German military and prompted a reexamination of the country's growing role in global peacekeeping missions. German military officials said Friday that they had suspended two soldiers and were investigating several others suspected of desecrating skulls while serving in Afghanistan as part of a NATO-led force in 2003 and 2004. Photos of troops mocking the freshly unearthed skulls…have shocked many Germans since they were first published" and "more have surfaced daily." The incident "has led officials here to question whether Germany has fully digested the political and security risks involved in such assignments," even as "the images of German soldiers playing with human remains has led to public revulsion and inevitable comparisons to the horrors perpetrated under Nazi rule." However, as yet "there have been few calls for Germany to curtail its participation in Afghanistan or in other missions."

DOJ_NMG_0088313

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Orbital Sciences Corp To Restate Earnings After Finding Misdated Options. The Washington Post (10/28, D1, Hart) reports, "Orbital Sciences Corp., a Dulles maker of booster rockets and space systems for the government and military, yesterday joined the parade of companies that have disclosed problems in their compensation practices, saying an internal review found some misdated stock options." The Post continues, "The company said the review found no fraud or intentional misconduct in connection with the errors and that it would revise past financial statements. Most of the options in question were granted more than five years ago, said David W. Thompson, Orbital's chairman and chief executive. … 'Financial impacts are not material to the results for this year or for any prior period over the past five years,' he told investors in a conference call yesterday." The Post adds, "Orbital expects to record pretax costs of about $300,000 in 2006, $2.5 million between 2001 and 2005 and $11.5 million between 1990, when the company went public, and 2001. … Orbital joins more than 100 companies nationwide that have been investigated for the practice of backdating stock options, in which options are dated to a time when the stock price is lower so the profit is higher after the options are exercised. … Last week, SafeNet Inc., a Maryland information security firm, said certain options over the past six years were accounted for using incorrect dates. Minnesota-based UnitedHealth Group Inc., one of the largest managed health-care companies, is under investigation for backdating stock options. In both cases, the inquiries prompted executives to step down."

Private Law Firms Play Key Role In Options Probes. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A1, Bandler, Scannell) reports, "With more than 130 companies under federal scrutiny, the investigation into stock-option backdating has rapidly become one of the broadest corporate scandals in decades. It is so broad, in fact, that federal authorities can't possibly do thorough examinations of every company. … Instead, they outsource a big chunk of the job." The Journal continues, "Regulators and prosecutors are relying on suspect companies to investigate themselves by hiring outside law firms. The firms are supposed to hand over their findings to the Securities and Exchange Commission or federal prosecutors, who then use them to help decide which cases to pursue further. The feds often ask for any especially incriminating documents to be delivered in a handy folder they call a 'hot binder.' … That has long been a common practice for companies in potential legal trouble, partly because it can lead to leniency as reward for a self-examination well done. But not since the overseas bribery scandal of the 1970s have so many public corporations been in trouble at the same time. The federal investigation has enveloped icons of success like Apple Computer Inc., Home Depot Inc., giant insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc., and dozens of Silicon Valley companies." The Journal adds, "The mass exercise in self-policing already has produced some dramatic results. More than 40 executives or directors have resigned or been pushed out in the wake of internal probes that found options backdating problems. The most prominent is William McGuire, chief executive of UnitedHealth, who is leaving his post by Dec. 1. Outside lawyers hired by the company found evidence of rampant backdating of options that enriched him and other insiders. Dr. McGuire, who has said he did nothing improper, stands to lose more than $100 million alone after agreeing to reprice his options."

SEC Queries JP Morgan Over Bisys-One Group Link. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A3, Lauricella) reports, "J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. says it received an inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission relating to the relationship between Bisys Fund Services Inc. and One Group Funds, which the bank acquired as part of its 2004 purchase of Bank One Corp." The Journal continues, "The SEC is investigating a total of 27 mutual funds1 that it says may have accepted kickbacks totaling hundreds of millions of dollars in recent years, according to people familiar with the matter. AmSouth Bancorp of Birmingham, Ala., was the first to acknowledge possible charges last summer. The other 25 firms aren't known. J.P. Morgan acknowledged the inquiry in an interview, but declined to comment further." The Journal adds, "The probe stems from a $21.4 million settlement the SEC reached last month with Bisys Fund Services Inc., a unit of Bisys Group Inc., which provides back-office support to financial companies. … In the wake of the settlement, the SEC sent letters to some of the funds in question, asking for details about their relationships with Bisys, as well as asking whether the funds have undertaken internal reviews of the relationship and what sorts of information had been provided to fund board of directors about the Bisys relationship, according to people with knowledge of the letters."

DOJ_NMG_0088314

Former Computer Associates CEO Awaits Sentencing. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A2, Bulkeley) reports, "As one of the last chief executives to face sentencing for crimes committed in the stock-market-bubble era, Sanjay Kumar, who orchestrated a $2.2 billion accounting fraud as CEO of Computer Associates International Inc., goes before a federal judge in Brooklyn on Thursday -- the same day his former company reports second-quarter earnings." The Journal continues, "Mr. Kumar, 44 years old, who resigned his job in 2004, pleaded guilty to eight counts of securities fraud and obstruction of justice in April. At the end of many quarterly financial periods in the 1990s and 2000, Mr. Kumar helped sign and backdate contracts for big sales of corporate software in order to book the revenue and meet quarterly earnings projections in what prosecutors called '35-day months.' Once the Securities and Exchange Commission started investigating, Mr. Kumar lied to government agents and sent the corporate general counsel to Hawaii to bribe a potentially hostile witness, according to evidence filed in the case." The Journal adds, "U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser has broad discretion in sentencing. Two lawyers who have followed the case, but declined to be identified, said they think the most likely term would be eight to 12 years. However, if Judge Glasser orders sequential sentencing on each charge the term could be 90 years. … The likely jail sentence puts a sad end to the meteoric career of Mr. Kumar, who grew up in poverty after his family emigrated from Sri Lanka, and worked his way up to the lofty position and a $300 million stock award in 1999. .. .But the sentencing hasn't been the end of CA's problems. Since Mr. Kumar resigned in 2004, a few months before he was indicted, the company has changed its name to CA Inc., paid the SEC $225 million in fines and replaced most of its top executives, while operating under the oversight of a government-appointed examiner."

Cooperating With US To Catch Big Fish Pays Off For Corporate Small Fry. The AP (10/28, Gordon) reports, "Helping the government land the biggest fish has been paying off for the slightly smaller fry in the prosecution of high-profile corporate fraud by way of a yawning gap in their prison sentences." The AP continues, "Jeffrey Skilling, Enron Corp.'s former chief executive who became an embodiment of corporate corruption, was handed a 24-year-plus sentence on Monday. That was the toughest penalty by far in the catastrophic collapse of the energy giant. Skilling's one-time protege at the company, finance chief Andrew Fastow -- architect of the complex web of off-the-books partnerships that hid some $1 billion in debt -- received a six-year jail term in September after cooperating with the prosecutors and helping them secure Skilling's conviction." The AP adds, "The judge said Fastow deserved leniency because of his 'exceptional' cooperation with the government. … 'The lesson that comes out of the Enron sentences is that if ultimately you're facing criminal charges, it's fine to be high up in the company. Just don't be at the very top,' said Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who heads the white-collar defense practice at McCarter & English in Newark, N.J." The AP notes, "Prosecutors like to work from the bottom up, so for CEOs caught up in scandals, he said, 'There's nowhere to turn in the event of an indictment.' … Washed ashore by the wave of corporate scandals in recent years have been executive flippers who have cut deals, turning against and talking about their bosses who have taken their chances at trial. Chief executives are far more likely to go to trial, partly because of ego, the conviction they did nothing wrong, or because prosecutors are far less willing to cut a deal."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Safavian Sentenced To Eighteen Months In Prison. The Washington Post (10/28, A3, Schmidt, 748K) reports U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman sentenced David H. Safavian, "a former top Bush administration official, to 18 months in prison for lying and concealing unethical dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. During an unusual hearing that lasted much of the day, Friedman wrestled with how to mete out justice to Safavian. He said Safavian was a man who had 'pulled himself up by his bootstraps' and had been 'a very good person to a lot of people.' But, the judge said, Safavian also committed 'an abuse of the public trust' in his relationship with the lobbyist." Safavian, "a former chief of staff for the General Services Administration, wept as he told Friedman that he knows now he never should have given Abramoff inside information about government-owned real estate that the lobbyist wanted to acquire. At the time, Safavian said, he thought what he was doing was innocuous. 'I didn't see anything wrong in helping Jack,' he said." The Washington Times/AP (10/28) reports, "During his sentencing, Safavian apologized for giving the appearance of impropriety but said it was not fraudulent. 'Yes, Jack Abramoff was a friend, but he wasn't my co-conspirator and I wasn't his,' Safavian said. 'There was no conspiracy to defraud anyone, least of all the taxpayers.'" The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/28) reports Safavian said Abramoff "used and manipulated him and he never meant to hurt anyone."

DOJ_NMG_0088315

Government Executive (10/28, Mandel) reports, "The 18-month sentence fell halfway between the defense's recommendation that he serve between zero and 12 months, and a Justice Department recommendation for 30 to 37 months. D.C. District Judge Paul Friedman also declined to impose a fine along with prison time, based on a pre-sentencing report that found Safavian's finances ruined by legal fees. … 'I think since Mr. Safavian is going to serve some time in prison, to impose a fine is punishing Mrs. Safavian and perhaps other relatives,' Friedman said." GE adds, "The sentencing was complicated by questions of what guidelines should apply to each of the counts and potential adjustments to the term. Peter Zeidenberg, the lead prosecuting attorney, argued that the sentence should be extended because Safavian perjured himself while testifying during his trial. Defense attorney Barbara Van Gelder argued that the sentence should be shortened because her client accepted responsibility for his actions. … Friedman rejected the government's argument for a longer sentence. He conceded that 'it was hard to believe some of what Mr. Safavian said' during the trial, such as his statement that he had not stopped to question the inordinately low costs that Abramoff quoted to him for a lavish trip to play golf in Scotland. But Friedman said there was gray area in the subjectivity of testimony centering on what Safavian believed, which separated the case from ones in which defendants had clearly lied about basic, objective facts of the case."

Judge Uses Sentencing To Rail Against Lobbyists. The New York Times (10/28, Shenon, 1.21M) reports Friedman "used the sentencing hearing to speak out against what he said was a growing culture of corruption in Washington encouraged by high-priced lobbyists. 'He came to work in an environment that has become, frankly, more and more corrupt,' Judge Friedman said in announcing Mr. Safavian's sentence, which was half of the three-year prison term sought by the Justice Department. 'It's become corrupted by money,' Judge Friedman added. 'You've literally got lobbyists sitting in Congressional offices writing legislation. That's what's going on.'"

House Ethics Committee Will Not Release Foley Report Before Elections. The Washington Post (10/28, A6, Weisman, 748K) reports, "The House ethics committee has all but wrapped up the investigative phase of its probe into the actions of former representative Mark Foley, informing key witnesses that they will not be summoned back for more questioning, lawyers in the case said yesterday. But those lawyers indicated that the committee is unlikely to release its report on the Florida Republican -- or even an interim memo -- before the Nov. 7 elections. … A committee report could have resurrected Democratic charges of a coverup, some Democrats hoped." The Post notes, "The most glaring hole in the testimony is the apparent decision not to call Rep. Jim Kolbe, who was aware of inappropriate e-mails from Foley to a page as far back as 2000 and whose conduct with former pages has also drawn scrutiny. Korenna Cline, a Kolbe spokeswoman, said the ethics committee has had no contact with the congressman or his staff."

Longtime Illinois Political Fundraiser Pleads Guilty In Kickback Probe. The Chicago Tribune (10/28, Coen, O'Connor, Long) reported, "Political insider Stuart Levine pleaded guilty Friday to scheming to squeeze millions of dollars from firms seeking state business, and authorities alleged in the clearest detail yet that he had the help of Gov. Rod Blagojevich's top campaign supporters. The new allegations in the plea agreement of Levine, a longtime Republican fundraiser reappointed to state boards by the Democratic governor, only increased the questions about corruption swirling around the race for governor with little more than a week until the Nov. 7 election. In the…plea agreement, federal authorities spell out allegations that Blagojevich's two top fundraisers schemed almost from the beginning of the governor's administration to use their newfound influence for corrupt purposes." However, Blagojevich on Friday "said Levine's plea shows he began his misdeeds before Blagojevich became governor."

DOJ_NMG_0088316

The AP (10/28, Robinson) reported, "Disappointing Republicans, though, Stuart Levine's 58-page plea agreement with federal prosecutors contained no allegations of wrongdoing on the part of the Democratic governor, who is waging a re-election campaign while coping with a federal corruption investigation. All the same, the massive document was crammed with details of corruption in state government and guaranteed to fuel campaign fireworks. Levine told how he worked closely with Blagojevich fundraiser Antoin 'Tony' Rezko, now also facing federal charges, and that Rezko and others close to the governor provided him with a high degree of political clout."

Four Convicted In Honolulu Airport Contract Fraud Conspiracy. The Honolulu Star Bulletin (10/28, Barayuga) reported, "A federal jury convicted two former airport officials and two contractors of conspiracy and mail fraud" Friday "in a bid-rigging scheme at Honolulu Airport. The jury deliberated for just more than six hours to unanimously find Dennis Hirokawa, 64, former superintendent of airport maintenance; Richard Okada, 65, former director of the Visitor Information Program; and contractors Michael Furukawa, 60, and Wes Uemura, 61, guilty of conspiracy." The Star Bulletin noted, "Charles Goodwin, special agent in charge of the FBI here, said he hopes the convictions serve as a deterrent. 'And as time goes by and we pursue more and more corruption, more and more people will step forward because they see the government serious about taking it on at the state and federal level,' he said."

DOJ Cancels Faith-Based Prison Rehabilitation Program. The New York Times (10/28, Banerjee, 1.21M) reports the Justice Department "has canceled its proposal for a religion-based prison rehabilitation program that critics and constitutional law experts contended would have violated the separation of church and state. On March 31, the department announced that it was seeking proposals for a 'single-faith, residential re-entry program' that would be adopted initially in as many as six federal prisons and run in each by an organization of a particular denomination. The proposed program, among others, was challenged in a lawsuit filed on May 4 in the Federal District Court in Madison, Wis., by the Freedom From Religion Foundation, a watchdog group. By May 26, the department had suspended its request for proposals for the program, and on Thursday it canceled the program 'in its entirety,' according to the Web site for the Office of Justice Programs of the federal Bureau of Prisons, a branch of the Justice Department."

Role Of Faith In Kuo's Book Explored. The New York Times' Samuel Freedman (10/28) writes, "In an election season, how could an 'inside story of political seduction,' to quote the subtitle of David Kuo's 'Tempting Faith,' not be mined for every politically explosive example it offers? … Naturally, those skeptical of the faith-based initiative are saying, 'I told you so,' and stalwart defenders of the Bush administration are issuing emphatic denials or even suggesting that Mr. Kuo is either Judas or a fresh candidate for the axis of evil. But though 'Tempting Faith' (Free Press) is a story about the Bush presidency, it is even more a story about Mr. Kuo. As much as it is a story about politics, it is also a story about faith."

SCOTUS To Rule On Police Officers' Responsibility During High-Speed Chases. The Washington Post (10/28, A5, Lane, 748K) reports the Supreme Court "stepped into the national debate on the risks of high-speed police car chases yesterday, announcing that it will decide whether the Constitution permits police to use deadly force against a fleeing motorist whose only suspected offense is speeding or reckless driving. The court's decision was a victory for a Georgia police officer appealing a ruling earlier this year by the Atlanta-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit. That court had concluded that the officer acted unreasonably by ramming a fleeing speeder, causing a crash that left the driver, Victor Harris, paralyzed." The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Savage, 918K) reports, "Eight years ago, the justices shielded police officers from being sued in federal court for deaths and injuries resulting from high-speed chases. The only exception, the court said, is when police act out of 'an improper or malicious motive,' such as 'to terrorize, cause harm or kill' a suspect."

DOJ_NMG_0088317

Two New York Men Seek New Trial Over Courtroom Chaos. The New York Times (10/28, Brick) reports, "The crime scene was the courthouse, and the witnesses were lawyers, court officers, a court reporter and a judge. The indictment described the momentary chaos of an afternoon last winter. … 'It happened right here,' said the prosecutor, Robert J. Walsh, addressing the jury and motioning toward the defendants. 'They tried to escape.' … But when testimony began this week, witnesses offered all the complexity of the world outside the courthouse." The Times adds, "Had one of the men signaled to start the attack? Had the other said his intent was suicide? Were the makeshift knives found in their clothing or on the floor? Where had the armed court sergeant and the unarmed judge been standing? … The men at the defense table in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn last January, Kayson Pearson, 24, and Troy Hendrix, 22, had been on trial for kidnapping, raping and killing Romona Moore, a third-year psychology student at Hunter College. She was savagely tortured. The maximum penalty was life. On Jan. 19, the trial ended abruptly." The Times adds, "Courthouse disturbances do not make for predictable cases. Some defendants who live to tell about them are acquitted, like Angela Davis in California in 1972 and Jose Dominguez in the Bronx in 1991. In Missouri, a man convicted in the courthouse where he had killed his wife in 1992 awaits a new trial on account of the venue. In Atlanta, defense lawyers have asked to move the trial of a man who escaped the courthouse in March 2005."

New York Officials Rule Homicide In Baby Girl's Death. The New York Times (10/28, Buckley, Khan) reports, "A 13-month-old girl died early yesterday after being found unconscious in her Brooklyn home, and her death has been declared a homicide by the medical examiner's office. The police have not identified any suspects." The Times continues, "A spokeswoman for the medical examiner's office said the baby had skull fractures and other injuries, and the police said her body was bruised. … The police said that the baby's mother, whom they identified as Antigua Lucas, 19, told them that she had found the baby, Teira Lewis, not breathing around 2:15 a.m. Ms. Lucas said that Teira had been sick at 11:30 p.m., but that she managed to soothe the baby to sleep, according to the police." The Times adds, "After finding the baby unresponsive, Ms. Lucas said, she rushed out of her second-floor apartment at 270 Glenmore Avenue in East New York, the police said, frantic and looking for help. She flagged down a private sanitation company worker, who called 911, the authorities said. … The baby was taken to Brookdale University Hospital and Medical Center and declared dead at 3 a.m., the police said. The Administration for Children's Services was investigating the death."

Malvo Confesses To Killing Of Arizona Golfer. USA Today/AP (10/28) reports, "Convicted Washington-area sniper Lee Boyd Malvo confessed to police that he and cohort John Allen Muhammad were responsible for the 2002 killing of a 60-year-old man on a Tucson golf course, Tucson authorities said Friday." The AP continues, "Malvo said he was sorry for the family of Jerry Taylor, said Detective Benjamin Jimenez of the Tucson Police Department. … 'He welled up a few times in tears during the interview,' Jimenez said." The AP adds, "Malvo spoke to police in Maryland for two hours Thursday after he received immunity from prosecution, Tucson Capt. Bill Richards said. Malvo said the shooting took place while he and Muhammad were in the area visiting Muhammad's older sister, Richards said. … Tucson police had long sought to speak with Malvo about the March 19, 2002, death of Taylor, 60, who died from a single gunshot fired from long range as he practiced chip shots at the golf course. The case had never been conclusively tied to Muhammad and Malvo." The AP notes, "Muhammad and Malvo were arrested for 10 killings and three woundings in the Washington, D.C., area during three weeks in October 2002. They were accused of roaming the area with a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle that they fired from the trunk of a Chevrolet Caprice at random victims."

Judge Denies Bond For Florida Cuban Spying Suspect. The Miami Herald (10/28, Weaver) reported, "A Florida International University professor charged with being an unregistered agent of Cuba's communist government won't be released before trial, a Miami federal judge ruled Friday." Carlos Alvarez "could flee to Cuba if he's freed before the January trial, U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said. He denied Alvarez's bid for bond." The Herald noted Alvarez "gave self-incriminating statements to FBI agents in the summer of 2005 because he believed they would not charge him if he cooperated with them. His lawyer has asked the judge to suppress that evidence, the core of the U.S. attorney's case against him."

DOJ_NMG_0088318

FBI Puts Wyoming Agents In Charge Of Beauprez Ad Probe. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/28, Paulson) reported Denver FBI spokeswoman Rene VonderHaar "said Friday that Wyoming officials would take over an investigation into a Colorado gubernatorial candidate's campaign ad to avoid potential conflicts of interest after authorities learned a Denver-area federal agent may have been involved. The investigation is examining whether GOP Rep. Bob Beauprez accessed a restricted federal database for information used in a television ad to attack his Democratic challenger, Bill Ritter." The AP noted, "Cory Voorhis, a federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent and registered Colorado Republican, provided the information, a person in government who was briefed on the investigation told The Associated Press last week."

Pataki Chooses Former Federal Prosecutor For Havesi Probe. The New York Times (10/28, Cooper) reports, "Gov. George E. Pataki appointed a former federal prosecutor on Friday to determine whether the ethics case against Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi for using a state worker to chauffeur his wife was strong enough to seek his removal from office." The Times continues, "Mr. Pataki, who cut short a trip to Hungary to deal with the Hevesi affair, had been expected to announce his decision on whether to invoke a little-known law to call the State Senate into special session to consider removing Mr. Hevesi. But Mr. Pataki, a Republican who leaves office at the end of the year, said he wanted to take the extra step of having an outside expert review the case before calling for the removal of Mr. Hevesi, a Democrat who is seeking re-election, less than two weeks before the election. … 'This is a provision of the law that, to the best of our knowledge, has never been used,' Mr. Pataki said. 'And it is an extraordinary act for officials to overturn an election of a statewide elected official after a vote by the people of New York, and obviously it's something that, if it's used at all, has to be used cautiously and with great, great care.' … So Mr. Pataki appointed David N. Kelley, a former United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, to review the case. Mr. Kelley — who has prosecuted terrorism cases and who won high-profile convictions against Martha Stewart and Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom — is a registered Democrat who won the praise of people within his party for his work as a prosecutor."

Bloomberg (10/28, Quint, Braun) reports, "Pataki said he hoped he could have a report from Kelley, who served as U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, within a week. … Pataki, who leaves office Dec. 31, acted after the state Ethics Commission this week said Hevesi improperly used staffers as his wife's chauffeur and didn't show any intention of repaying the state until his opponent in the Nov. 7 election exposed the practice. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat who is leading in the race for governor, yesterday withdrew his endorsement of Hevesi, also a Democrat, for re- election as the state's fiscal watchdog." Bloomberg adds, "Pataki said Kelley would get more than a week if needed it, and probably would present the case to the Senate if there is a decision to proceed with it. Kelley served in the U.S. attorney's office in New York from 1988 to 2005 before joining law firm Cahill, Gordon & Reindel in September 2005. … Prior to his appointment as U.S. attorney in 2003, he was named co-chair of the Justice Department's investigation into the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He personally prosecuted John Walker Lindh, dubbed the 'American Taliban.' As a U.S. attorney, he also served as a member of President George W. Bush's Corporate Fraud Task Force and the Attorney General's Advisory Committee for White Collar Crime."

Doolittle Faces Voters With Uncertain Legal Fate. The Sacramento Bee (10/28, Whitney) reports, "Voters in the 4th Congressional District will go to the polls Nov. 7 to decide whether Rep. John Doolittle deserves an eighth term without knowing whether he will face federal prosecution in connection with the ongoing investigation of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The Bee continues, "The Roseville Republican, who once called Abramoff a good friend, has not been called before a grand jury or otherwise been publicly identified by the Justice Department as being under investigation. … 'We are not going to confirm or deny investigations into any individuals,' said Brian Sierra, spokesman for the Justice Department's criminal section." The Bee adds, "The only congressman to have pleaded guilty in connection with Abramoff is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who pleaded Oct. 14 to conspiracy and making false statements and is awaiting sentencing. … Doolittle's long relationship with Abramoff, however, included elements of the kind that contributed to the legal troubles of many of the eight people, including congressional aides and lobbyists, who already have pleaded guilty. … Doolittle has insisted he's done no wrong and is paying a prominent criminal attorney in Virginia to clear his name. The legal tab so far is about $50,000." The Bee notes, "The attorney, David Barger, stressed that he had been told by the Justice Department last week that 'Congressman Doolittle is not a target of its investigation.' … But other criminal defense attorneys said the fact that the Justice Department has not identified Doolittle as a target means little because that typically doesn't happen until all the evidence is gathered and charges are imminent."

DOJ_NMG_0088319

New York Man Pleads Guilty To Managing Prostitution Ring. The AP (10/28) reports, "A Bronx man admitted yesterday that for six years he managed a multi-city prostitution ring that included underage girls." The AP continues, "In pleading guilty to two federal charges in Trenton, Matthew Thompkins, 38, said the ring ran from 1999 to December 2005 in Atlantic City, Boston, Las Vegas, Miami and New York. He is the seventh member to plead guilty in the case, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. … Thompkins pleaded guilty to conspiracy to transport minors to engage in prostitution, which carries a sentence of five to 30 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000, and conspiracy to engage in money laundering, punishable by up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 or twice the loss to victims. Sentencing is to be March 2."

The Newark Star-Ledger (NJ) (10/28, Martin) reports, "Thompkins acknowledged building and training a 'stable' of young prostitutes, housing them in apartments and homes in New York and New Jersey, and hiding millions of dollars in illegal sex proceeds in their names. … His arrest last December by the FBI followed an unusual foray by federal investigators into a crime typically left to local police. … But prosecutors said Thompkins, for years known only by his nickname, 'Knowledge,' wasn't the typical pimp. He ran his operation so proficiently that his counterparts in the sex-trade industry gave him the ultimate honor three years ago: a 4-foot-high trophy declaring him 'International Pimp of the Year.' … 'He was the master pimp,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Jason Richardson said." The Star-Ledger notes, "Thompkins, 37, pleaded guilty to conspiring to launder money and transport minors across state lines for prostitution. His plea agreement calls for between 10 and 24 years in prison. U.S. District Judge Freda Wolfson set sentencing for March 2. .. .The plea followed similar admissions from six other defendants. Some cooperated with the FBI; none has been sentenced."

US Charges Florida Man In Online Hacking Plot. The Tampa Tribune (10/28, Silvestrini) reports, "A Seminole man slowed a Massachusetts company's Web site by electronically hijacking other people's computers and directing them to launch an attack, a federal criminal complaint alleges." The Tribune continues, "Federal authorities in Massachusetts charged John Bombard, 32, with two counts of intentionally accessing a protected computer without authorization, charges that carry a maximum of two years in federal prison. … The complaint charges Bombard with hacking into two computer systems June 15, 2004, to establish a "bot" network of compromised computers from which he launched a denial of service attack on Akamai Technologies servers." The Tribune adds, "A bot, short for robot, is a computer program that seeks vulnerable computers and runs silently in the background until it receives directions from a controlling computer. … According to the Justice Department, some experts think networks of bots, also called "botnets," now send up to three-quarters of all spam. … A denial of service attack is one in which many compromised computers attack a single target, consuming the target's bandwidth or overloading its resources. Legitimate users of the targeted system are unable to use its services." The Tribune notes, "The federal charges say Bombard used a variant of the Gaobot worm to infect networks of computers at two major universities, which are not named. The complaint also doesn't say how many computers were used in the attack."

Puerto Rico Jury Spares Convicted Murderer From Death Penalty. The AP (10/28, Vargas) reports, "A jury sentenced a man to life in prison Friday for murder instead of giving him a death sentence sought by prosecutors in a case that sparked renewed opposition to capital punishment nearly 80 years after it was outlawed in this U.S. territory. Carlos Ayala Lopez wept and hugged his attorney after hearing the verdict. Ayala was found guilty three months ago of killing Jose Rodriguez Reyes, a guard at the Veteran's Medical Center in suburban Rio Piedras, in 2002." The AP continues, "Critics, including the governor and Catholic church leaders, spoke out against federal prosecutors' decision to seek the death penalty. Puerto Rico abolished capital punishment in 1929. The last execution was in 1927, when a man was hanged for murder." The AP adds, "Federal prosecutors can seek the death penalty in some cases because Puerto Rico is subject to U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0088320

federal law. Federal prosecutors claimed jurisdiction in Ayala's case because the killing took place at a federally run institution. … Prosecutors said Ayala shot Rodriguez while trying to steal his gun for a planned drug trafficking operation. … The jury of six men and six women, which convicted Ayala in July, reconvened for the penalty phase of the trial and deliberated for about six hours before delivering the sentence."

FBI Mulls Probe Of Rep Porter Over Fundraising Calls. The Las Vegas Sun (10/28, Cook) reports, "U.S. Rep. Jon Porter released phone records and copies of his daily schedule Friday that he claims disprove a former staffer's allegations that the congressman made illegal fundraising phone calls from his government offices in Henderson and Washington, D.C." The Sun continues, "While the records - which in some cases had names and phone numbers blacked out - do not prove that the allegations are false, they appear to conflict with some of the charges leveled by Porter's one-time executive assistant and scheduler, Jim Shepard. … The records show, for example, that Porter made fundraising and other phone calls from a campaign cell phone on April 18, a day when his schedule shows that he was at his district office. … But his chief of staff, Mike Hesse, said he and Porter were out to lunch when the calls were made, and offered a receipt from about 11:45 a.m. at Sweet Tomatoes to prove it." The Sun adds, "Similarly, on April 21, when Shepard claims he witnessed Porter make fundraising calls between 1:30 p.m. and 2:30 p.m. at his Henderson office, Porter's schedule shows that the congressman left for a meeting with Clark County School District officials at 1:15 p.m. and remained out of the office the rest of the day. … Shepard said he remembers the meeting with school officials being delayed and that the schedule - which he kept while he was on Porter's staff - does not match e-mails and call logs he retained. He said he could not share the call logs on the advice of his attorney. … The documents from Porter came on the same day that the U.S. attorney's office turned over a complaint about the calls to the FBI. … 'We did receive a referral,' said FBI spokesman Dave Staretz. 'I can't go into any particulars. We will evaluate the case and determine whether we will open a preliminary inquiry.' .. .In a statement, Las Vegas-based U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden emphasized that no decision has been made on whether to proceed on the request for an investigation from Nevada Democratic Party Chairman Tom Collins."

Man Admits Louisiana Murders Before Being Executed In Florida. The AP (10/28) reports, "Before being executed for five Florida murders, serial killer Danny Rolling gave his spiritual adviser a handwritten confession to a grisly murder triple slaying 17 years ago in his home town of Shreveport." The AP continues, "Police and the Rev. Mike Hudspeth released copies of that apology and confession on Friday, two days after Rolling's execution." The AP adds, "Police have long suspected that Rolling stabbed William T. Grissom, 55, his 24-year-old daughter, Julie, and his 8-year-old grandson, Sean, as they got ready for dinner on Nov. 4, 1989, in Grissom's Shreveport home. … They had been sure of it since 1997, when Rolling sent a detailed confession, including a description of the crime scene, to the woman he had married in prison, and she sent it to police, said retired police detectives Don Ashley and Danny Fogger, who had worked on the case." The AP notes, "Since Rolling had pleaded guilty in Florida to killing five college students and his execution was expected, Louisiana authorities saw little reason to try him. … Still, police said Friday, it is a relief to have a signed, public confession."

New York Judge Sentences Mafia Figure To Life For Two Murders. The New York Times (10/28, Rashbaum) reports, "Baldassare Amato, a powerful Bonanno crime family figure who represents the group's traditional Sicilian roots, stood silently with his arms crossed yesterday as a federal judge denounced him and meted out a life sentence for two 1992 Mafia murders." The Times continues, "As the judge, Nicholas G. Garaufis of United States District Court in Brooklyn, tore into him for 'using murder as a business tactic,' at several points Mr. Amato raised his right hand to his chin and then crossed his arms again in front of his chest. … 'Mr. Amato,' said the judge, making no effort to mask his disgust, 'you're just a plain, wanton murderer and a Mafia assassin. The sentence I'm going to give you, as far as I'm concerned, is a gift.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Amato, 54, dressed in a gray prison sweatshirt and khaki trousers, appeared unmoved when the judge handed down the life sentence, almost as though it were a cost of doing business. He and his lawyer had both declined to address the court. … After pronouncing the sentence, Judge Garaufis asked the lead prosecutor in the case, Assistant United States Attorney John Buretta, how much of a fine he could levy. … Mr. Buretta said the maximum was $250,000, and the judge levied it."

DOJ_NMG_0088321

The New York Post (10/28, Gallahue) reports, "Garaufis tore into…Amato, convicted of two murders, after his lawyer asked him to consider sending him to a prison close to New York City for the sake of the Bonnano-family soldier's relatives. … 'My compassion is overcome by my disgust and disdain for this defendant,' he said. … Amato was convicted of racketeering and murdering two men, restaurant owner Sabastiano DiFalco and New York Post delivery supervisor Robert Perrino."

CIVIL LAW:

Lawsuit Over Promotion Of Christianity At USAF Academy Thrown Out. The New York Times/AP (10/28) reports, "A federal judge on Friday threw out a lawsuit against the Air Force that contended that evangelical Christian values were being illegally pushed on academy cadets. An academy graduate said he would appeal the decision by the judge, James A. Parker of Federal District Court in Albuquerque. 'Our fight is far from over,' said the graduate, Mikey Weinstein of Albuquerque. The case was brought by Mr. Weinstein and other Air Force Academy graduates who contended that a military chaplain had violated their right to religious freedom by urging cadets to attend Christian services or face 'the fires of hell.'"

The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Jordan) reports, "The judge also rejected claims by Air Force Master Sgt. Phillip T. Burleigh, who asked to be included in the lawsuit, saying he was discriminated against in 1997 for not attending prayer meetings." Burleigh "said his supervisor used government resources to evangelize recruits, including hiring religious motivational speakers to lecture at mandatory-attendance conferences."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Drifter Sought In Probe Of DC Hate Graffiti. The Washington Times (10/28, Cella) reports, "Federal and Arlington County authorities are searching for a drifter they believe has been drawing swastikas and other graffiti in the area around Arlington National Cemetery." The Times continues, "Police say that Ronald Bost, 47, of no fixed address, is responsible for a rash of vandalism near Arlington Memorial Bridge and Memorial Drive. … One July incident on a construction site at the Memorial Avenue Rehabilitation Project cost $1,000 to clean." The Times adds, "U.S. Park Police Detective Kevin Fornshill said that Bost is the 'chief suspect' in the case, based largely on the fact that Bost has been arrested four times by park police on vandalism charges since the mid-1990s. … 'He's out again and he's doing it again,' Detective Fornshill said. … In 2004, Bost was arrested for painting swastikas and anti-Semitic obscenities over signs near the Netherlands Carillon at Arlington Cemetery. … His vandalism has been identified around the George Washington Parkway, as far south as Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport and as far north as the Francis Scott Key Bridge."

DA Charges 11 In Orange County Voter Registration Fraud Probe. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Berthelsen, Hanley) reports, "The Orange County district attorney's office has charged 11 people with fraudulent voter registration stemming from a Republican registration drive this year that resulted in dozens of Democrats unwittingly being signed up as Republicans. … Those charged had been paid as much as $10 for each voter they registered as part of a Republican Party effort to recruit more voters in central Orange County. The area includes the district represented by Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a regular target of Republicans, and a competitive state Senate race." The Times continues, "The cases were filed Tuesday, and three defendants were arrested Wednesday and Thursday. They are in custody and are scheduled to be arraigned today and Monday. The district attorney's office refused to release any information about them, including details usually available, such as the names and charges. … Sources said a press conference is scheduled for Monday, a week before the Nov. 7 election, with Republican Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, who is locked in a tight election battle with Democratic state Sen. Debra Bowen." The Times notes, "The prosecution highlights problems that can occur with signature-gathering and voter registration campaigns in which the workers are paid by the signature. Campaign watchdogs have derisively called it a 'bounty hunter' system that creates incentives for often transient, low-paid workers to pad their results to make more money."

DOJ Official Meets With Lake Charles, LA, Residents Over Police Shooting. The Lake Charles (LA) American Press (10/28, Cormier) reports, "Several Lake Charles residents met with an official representing the U.S. Justice Department to start a dialogue about the relationship between the community and police since the Oct. 12 fatal police shooting of 29-year-old Trent Buckins." The American Press continues, "The official with the Justice Department's Community Relations Service declined to speak to the American Press, citing governmental restrictions. .. .Since the November 2004 Chateau Du Lac fatal shooting by police, the Justice Department has had an official visit Lake Charles to help build more trust between the public and police." The American Press adds, "The residents who attended Friday's meeting at City Hall — two police officials also attended — are pleased with the Justice Department's involvement. … 'I think this is another positive step in the long process to gain clarity to what happened,' the Rev. Henry Mancuso said. He was representing the city's Leadership Team for Community and Race Relations. … 'This will be a long process to find out the truth of what happened. Until then, there will be tension in the community.' … The federal government's response will be helpful in healing whatever wounds have been created since the most recent fatal police shooting, Mancuso said."

DOJ_NMG_0088322

Indianapolis Police Union Alleges Recruitment Bias. The Indianapolis Star (10/28, O'Shaughnessy) reports, "The police union is accusing the city of racial discrimination by stacking the first recruit class of the merged Indianapolis Metropolitan Police Department with minorities." The Star continues, "Vince Huber, president of the Indianapolis Fraternal Order of Police, said the department added minority candidates to its new recruit class at the expense of white applicants. … Indianapolis Police Chief Michael Spears acknowledged that the department reached into the next recruit class for qualified minorities to increase the diversity in the class, which begins training Nov. 13. … But he said adding minorities to the list did not come at the expense of any white applicants. Instead, he said the move simply increased the number of names submitted for approval to the department's merit board." The Star notes, "The upcoming recruit class will be the largest in history, reflecting a need to keep up with planned retirements and provide enough officers for the larger, merged department. The IPD and Marion County Sheriff's Department will complete the consolidation of their operations Jan. 1. … 'We want to make sure we get the most qualified applicants possible,' Huber said. '(But) the process should be color-blind.' .. .The merit board, which must approve hiring, promotion and termination decisions, approved 55 candidates. The class includes 16 black, one Hispanic and 38 white candidates, for a minority representation of 31 percent. … The city's Police and Fire departments have operated under a U.S. Justice Department consent decree since 1978 that requires them to reflect the racial composition of the county workforce, which is about 21 percent black. That hasn't been met. … Currently, 15 percent of the IPD's 1,184 sworn officers are black, and 10 percent of the 397 sheriff's deputies are black."

Mississippi Voters May Be Left Out Of Election. The Biloxi Sun Herald (10/28, Lafontaine) reports, "Nearly 1,000 new residents (of Waveland, MS) likely will be left out of next month's city elections, according to Waveland attorneys." The Herald continues, "City leaders hired an independent consulting firm this year to figure a way to include hundreds of new voters living in a newly annexed section of town. … Waveland attorney Zach Butterworth said the Justice Department has not yet determined whether the new voters will be allowed to vote in the Nov. 7 election. .. . 'The new area could have a minimal impact on the elections and the federal government needs to decide if the new voters can be included,' he said." The Herald notes, "According to federal legislation adopted in the 1960s, the Justice Department must review changes in ballot procedures, voting districts and other electoral rules in several states - mostly in the South - to ensure that minorities maintain influence in elections. … The city settled an annexation dispute in July with neighboring Bay St. Louis in a deal that gave Waveland a stretch of land along the western right of way of Mississippi 603. … Butterworth said new voters in the annexed area will be able to vote in the congressional elections, but not the city. … Before the annexation dispute was settled, the federal government approved a request from the city to merge its voting precincts into one location at the City Hall complex on Coleman Avenue, since Katrina damaged or destroyed many polling places. … Butterworth said if the Justice Department approves the annexed voters, the most likely scenario would be to include them as part of Ward 4, rather than redrawing the ward lines."

New Jersey Same-Sex Couples Consider Personal Economic Impact Of Ruling. The New York Times (10/28, Kelley, 1.21M) reports that for same-sex couples in New Jersey, the state Supreme Court's ruling on partnership rights last week has financial impact. Cynthia and Lucy Vandenberg, "who have been partners for 12 years, have been forced to open their checkbooks repeatedly over the years to pay thousands of dollars in taxes on health benefits and for legal transactions that married couples rarely face. There was the $1,500 to change their surnames, for instance, the $1,400 or so in taxes they paid annually for additional health benefits, and the $1,000 they spent so one could adopt the biological child of the other. … Now they wonder how the court's decision will affect their next child, a son Lucy is carrying."

DOJ_NMG_0088323

New Jersey Legislative Action Could Take A While. Under the headline "Civil Union Or Marriage? A Long Wait In New Jersey," the New York Times (10/28, Mansnerus, 1.21M) also reports that while the court ordered state legislators to work out a way ensure full rights and benefits for same-sex couples, legislators said it "might take months to decide what to call the solution -- marriage or something else," since the "next few months are booked up."

NYTimes Accuses Bush Of Exploiting "Homophobia" During Campaign Speeches. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M)editorializes, "When future generations of Americans look back on the current era, they'll puzzle over what it was about George W. Bush that made people imagine there was anything compassionate to his conservatism. Having apparently lost all hope that he can use terrorism to scare voters into electing Republicans this November, the president has now begun raising the threat of gay marriage. The moment the New Jersey Supreme Court issued a ruling on the subject this week, Mr. Bush began using every possible excuse to bring up 'activist' judges and gay weddings on the campaign trail. 'I mentioned his love for his family,' Mr. Bush said at a rally for a Republican Senate candidate in Michigan. 'He understands what I know, that marriage is a fundamental institution of our civilization. Yesterday in New Jersey we had another activist court issue a ruling…' … If the last month has taught us anything about the Republican Party, it is that homophobia is campaign strategy, not conviction."

Student Criticizes Conservative Activist's "Academic Bill Of Rights." In an op-ed for the Washington Post (10/28, A15, 748K) Asheesh Kapur Siddique, a Princeton University student, writes that Universities "are under attack from people who want to inject partisan politics into our classrooms. Led by activist David Horowitz, some conservatives are pushing for the adoption of an 'Academic Bill of Rights' (ABOR) across America. The bill takes the form of student resolutions or legislative proposals claiming to protect the academic freedom of college students from ideological indoctrination by professors. … In truth, these efforts only hurt the students they purport to help. Horowitz and his backers aren't protecting our rights; they're impeding our educations. The Academic Bill of Rights would substitute political correctness for the free exchange of ideas on campus by preventing faculty and students from discussing fresh or controversial ideas in class."

ANTITRUST:

Private Equity Funds Bid For Tribune Company. The New York Times (10/28, Sorkin) reports, "The Tribune Company received several preliminary offers late yesterday from a series of private equity firms, according to people briefed on the auction." The Times continues, "The preliminary offers, which are nonbinding and known as 'indications of interest,' are the first step in an auction for Tribune, which said last month that it would consider selling its 11 newspapers and 25 television stations. … The company includes assets like The Los Angeles Times, The Chicago Tribune, The Baltimore Sun, Newsday and the Chicago Cubs." The Times adds, "Among Tribune's suitors, these people said, are a group including Providence Equity Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners and Apollo Management; another consortium including Thomas H. Lee Partners and the Texas Pacific Group; and the Carlyle Group and Bain Capital, which are each planning to bid separately. … Notably absent from the bidding was any major newspaper company, though it remained possible that Gannett or another rival company could emerge. … Tribune has a market value of $8.2 billion. Analysts have had scattered estimates about how much the company could be sold for, with some estimating a price as high as $10 billion and others estimating Tribune will not fetch any premium."

Maryland Man Begin Bid For Baltimore Sun. The Washington Times (10/28, Lengell) reports, "The man behind a local effort to buy the Baltimore Sun from the Tribune Co. said yesterday he is encouraged by the amount of community support he has received. … 'I have never witnessed this kind of response to a business transaction,' said Theodore G. Venetoulis, a former Baltimore County politician and current owner of a Maryland news and political magazine.

DOJ_NMG_0088324

'Newspapers still have a very substantial role in people's lives. It touches the core of people.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Venetoulis said he received several telephone calls from potential investors after reports were published yesterday revealing the group's intentions. … 'The group we've put together understand two things,' said Mr. Venetoulis, who lost a Democratic primary bid for governor in 1978. 'One, that this will not be an investment that will provide the usual yield and return that some investors will be used to. Secondly, they've agreed that they would not in any way attempt to jeopardize the paper's independence or attempt to give it a certain ideological bent.'" The Times notes, "The Baltimore group is the latest to seek to buy metropolitan daily newspapers from embattled corporations. … A group led by public relations and advertising executive Brian Tierney recently paid $515 million for the Philadelphia Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News. .. A group led by Jack Welch, the former head of General Electric Co., said this week that it was interested in buying the Boston Globe. And in Los Angeles, three billionaires, including music executive David Geffen, have said they want to buy the Los Angeles Times, which also is owned by the Tribune Co."

Google Takes Advertising Plans To Madison Avenue. The Washington Post (10/28, D1, Goo) reports, "Just a few years ago, Google was a bit player on Madison Avenue. It specialized in tiny text ads shown alongside search results and in the margins of thousands of Web sites that partner with Google. … But recently Google has moved beyond search, reaching out to big advertisers to sell them online graphical or display ads on its partner sites. The firm is developing new Web video ad formats that could give TV commercials a run for their money and has been staffing up new projects to sell ads offline in newspapers and magazines and on radio." The Post continues, "Earlier this month, Google's ambitions were on display when it opened its new office in the old Port Authority building, covering 1 1/2 floors on an entire Manhattan block in the funky Chelsea neighborhood. The company has recruited executives from some of the biggest media firms and is rapidly expanding its 500-member team here in an attempt to cultivate relationships with Madison Avenue and large advertisers. … Google's strategy is to bring the math and science that fueled its search-engine ad success to other forms of marketing. The company's existing text-ad system allows advertisers to see how many people click on each ad and pay only when someone clicks, helping advertisers calculate the return on their marketing dollars. Eventually Google hopes to offer similar metrics for online video ads and off-line campaigns, though it is still in the early stages of figuring out how those might work."

Arcelor Mittal Takes Stake In Noble. The AP (10/28) reports, "Arcelor Mittal SA said Friday it was merging a unit that makes steel for the auto industry with Michigan-based laser welder Noble International Ltd. in return for a 40 percent stake in the business and a $300 million payment." The AP continues, "The Luxembourg-based steelmaker - currently being formed from a tie-up between Arcelor SA and Mittal Steel Co. NV - said it would become Noble's largest stockholder when the deal was complete." The AP adds, "Arcelor Mittal said this would strengthen the company's position with the global car industry. The transaction will combine Arcelor's laser-welded tailored blank business TBA - the largest in Europe - with Noble, North America's largest producer of laser-welded steel products. … Mittal has significant U.S. operations through its earlier acquisition of International Steel Group. … Combining expected results for this year, the combined Arcelor-Noble business would have a revenue of $1.1 billion and earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization of $122 million." The AP notes, "The Arcelor unit employs 670 people at nine plants in Europe, one in the U.S. and a quarter stake in a joint venture in China. The company said its revenue would be around $500 million this year. … Noble, headquartered in Warren, has more than 2,000 workers at 12 plants in the U.S., Canada, Mexico and Australia. It expects 2006 revenue to hit $600 million. Earlier this month, it bought Pullman Industries Inc., which makes steel tubular parts for carmakers."

FCC Sets November 3 Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal. Bloomberg (10/28, Peterson) reports, "The U.S. Federal Communications Commission plans to vote Nov. 3 on AT&T Inc.'s $82 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp., three weeks after a deadlock on the terms of approval derailed a previously scheduled vote." Bloomberg continues, "The commission, which released its agenda for the meeting today, hasn't indicated what types of conditions it may place on the deal, the biggest telephone-company combination ever." Bloomberg adds, "Facing pressure from the panel's two Democrats, AT&T earlier this month offered concessions including a price freeze on certain business data services and $10-a-month high-speed Internet access for some BellSouth customers. Rival companies want tougher conditions, such as price controls. … 'We still continue to believe there's a good chance the FCC will conditionally approve the necessary AT&T-BellSouth license transfers at some point in November,' Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Blair Levin said today in an investor note." Bloomberg notes, "FCC approval is the last regulatory hurdle for San Antonio-based AT&T, the biggest U.S. phone company, to complete the transaction, which the companies announced almost eight months ago. The Justice Department and 18 states cleared the deal without conditions. FCC deliberations have been complicated by the likely recusal of one member, which leaves the panel evenly split between Democrats and Republicans. … FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, a Republican who initially proposed approving the deal without conditions, postponed an Oct. 13 vote after Democrats Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, who are seeking conditions, asked for public comment on AT&T's proposals."

DOJ_NMG_0088325

Smithfield Gambles On Merger While Foes Fight Expansion. The Newport News (VA) Daily Press (10/28) reports, "Smithfield Foods adversaries are trying to ensure that the world's largest pork company loses a $100 million bet. … If the Department of Justice allows Smithfield to purchase Premium Standard Farms, the $674 million deal will help Smithfield further bolster its position as the company that raises and slaughters the most hogs in the country." The Press continues, "A line of opponents has formed to protest, saying Smithfield will dominate the price of hogs. Smithfield and Premium knew the fight was coming, so the deal stipulates that Smithfield will pay $100 million to Premium if anti-trust regulators deny the deal. … But Smithfield was willing to take the risk. Smithfield gained confidence by surviving federal regulatory scrutiny when it bought Farmland Foods in 2003. Many of the same groups that opposed that deal also oppose this new one. The National Farmers Union, along with a coalition of rural and farm groups, made a case to the Justice Department this week, arguing the deal should be denied. … 'The packing industry is already pretty drastically consolidated,' said Fred Stokes, spokesman for the Organization for Competitive Markets, an agricultural think tank funded by independent farmers. 'And here's the No. 1 hog producer buying the No. 2 guy.'" The Press adds. "The opponents of the deal include a growing list of Midwestern politicians, who say the deal will give Smithfield the ability to determine hog prices. They formally asked the Justice Department to scrutinize the merger and have called for congressional hearings. … Smithfield is already the largest processor of hogs, with 26 percent of the market. By adding Premium, the company will have 31 percent. Farmers worry that with less competition for buying hogs, Smithfield can drive down prices. … Smithfield opponents say Premium had the only other slaughter facility in the Southeast. Without that competitor, Smithfield can set the prices it pays all farmers in the region to raise hogs, said Michael Stumo, general counsel for the competitive markets group."

Becton, Dickinson Wins FTC Approval For TriPath Deal. The Bergen County Record (10/28, Prial) reports, "Becton, Dickinson and Co. said Friday that federal antitrust approval has moved it a step closer to its planned $350 million acquisition of TriPath Imaging Inc., a manufacturer of cancer-screening products." The Record continues, "BD has said adding TriPath's technology will help it expand its presence in the field of cancer diagnostics. … The deal, which the Franklin Lakes-based maker of medical devices announced in August, still needs to be approved by TriPath's shareholders, said BD spokeswoman Colleen White." The Record adds, "The Federal Trade Commission, which oversees antitrust matters in the United States, said in a statement that it had completed its investigation of the deal and did not plan to take action. … As advances in research have created new opportunities for treating various forms of cancer, the potentially broad -- and lucrative -- market for cancer treatments has prompted health care companies large and small to target oncology. … TriPath, based in Burlington, N.C., uses sophisticated computer imaging to detect cell abnormalities that might indicate the onset of cancer. … BD already owns a 6.5 percent stake in TriPath."

ENVIRONMENT:

9th Circuit Halts Stryker Activity In Hawaii. The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (10/28, Kakesako) reports, "The Army lost a major court battle to local environmentalists and anti-war activists yesterday and might not be ready to deploy a Stryker brigade to Iraq late next year." The Star-Bulletin continues, "A 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals panel in San Francisco, in a 2-1 decision, issued a temporary injunction halting construction, training and any other activities dealing with the $1.5 billion Stryker Combat Brigade planned for the 25th Infantry Division. … David Henkin, Earthjustice attorney, said the case now reverts to U.S. District Judge Dave Ezra to determine if any Stryker-related construction or training can occur while the Army works on a new environmental impact statement. … Henkin said he will not only ask Ezra to prevent the Army from causing 'irreparable harm' to environment, but he also does not want the Stryker conversion to be so far along that it cannot be stopped." The Star-Bulletin adds, "The Army has said the 2nd Brigade Combat Team has completed 60 percent of its training and received 70 percent of its equipment. The 2nd Brigade is slated to grow into a 3,500-member combat unit built around 328 of the 19-ton, eight-wheeled vehicles. … Before the injunction was put into effect, the Army had said the 2nd Brigade would be ready to deploy to Iraq by November 2007 as the fifth of seven planned Stryker units. … In court papers, Ron Borne, director of transformation for the 25th Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade Combat Team, listed Stryker-related construction projects that must be completed for the Army to meet its deadline. … The Army issued a terse statement yesterday: 'We are in receipt of the court order, and we are complying.' … A federal appeals panel ruled Oct. 5 that the Army had violated the National Environmental Policy Act by failing to consider other locations outside of Schofield Barracks for its fifth Stryker brigade."

DOJ_NMG_0088326

Firefighters Continue To Combat California Fire That Has Already Killed Four. All three networks led with the California fires. ABC World News (10/27, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported "thousands of acres in southern California are now a wasteland and a crime scene. Tonight, authorities are offering $400,000 in their search for the person or persons who started a blaze that killed four fire fighters. President Bush has offered his condolences for the greatest loss of life among fire fighting personnel since 2001. As for the fire itself, thousands of acres are still burning and winds are still blowing."

The CBS Evening News (10/27, lead story, 2:12, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The flames have now burned almost 38 square miles in the mountains of Southern California. And hundreds of firefighters are trying to stop it. That killer wildfire in southern California is only getting bigger. Officials say it was started yesterday by arsonists. And now it's being aided and abetted by the weather. Strong winds are driving the flames and the fear is that a huge wall of fire will head toward more populated areas."

The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 1, 5:50, Alexander, 9.87M) added, "Wind gusts today topped 60 miles per hour making what's already a heartbreaking firefight, that much more difficult. Roaring flames and black smoke again painted these dry desert mountains near Palm Springs. For firefighters and investigators, it's a bitter two-front battle, hunting both the fast-moving fire and an arsonist wanted for what is the nation's deadliest wildfire in more than five years."

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Kelly, Abrams, Reston, Gold, 918K) reports, "Battling gusting Santa Ana winds, fire crews today fought to try to contain the fast-moving Esperanza arson fire that has killed four firefighters. … The rough terrain in the San Jacinto Mountains of Riverside County just west of Palm Springs posed difficult problems for firefighters trying to keep the blaze from the more populated areas, Janet M. Upton, of the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, said today. Winds are expected to gust up to 45 mph and firefighters are facing a long day. … In Washington, the White House joined the list of public officials to express their condolences over the firefighters' deaths. 'A little bit ago, the president placed a phone call to Tom Tidwell, who's the deputy regional forester of the U.S. Forest Service, to express condolences over what is now being called the Esperanza incident, a fire near Palm Springs, California, that has claimed the lives of four firefighters,' said spokesman Tony Snow. The president also 'said he hopes that whoever is the perpetrator will be caught quickly and brought to justice.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Pugmire, 918K) reports, "More than 100 tips have been received by the Riverside County Sheriff's Department as the intense hunt for the person or group that started the fatal Esperanza fire near Cabazon continued today. The pool of reward money also grew from $100,000 to $400,000 when the state added $100,000, as did San Bernardino County and the Morongo band of Mission Indians." The Washington Post (10/28, A3, Geis, Pomfret, 748K) reports, "Fire officials said the blaze was only 25 percent contained, and in the areas already burned a sloping, blackened moonscape was still smoldering." The New York Times (10/28, Archibold, 1.21M) reports, "The wind and towering columns of smoke have made it difficult for the authorities to assess their progress, but with additional firefighters and equipment, they say they are making headway."

Religious Groups Oppose Controversial Appalachian Mining Practices. The New York

DOJ_NMG_0088327

Times (10/28, Banerjee, 1.21M) reports, "The windswept ridge that Sharman Chapman-Crane hiked to on a recent fall afternoon is the kind of place, she said, that she normally would avoid. From there, she could see what she loved about Appalachia and what it had lost, and she wanted her visitors to see it, too. … In the middle of the peaks, several stood stripped bare and chopped up, a result of an increasingly common and controversial coal mining practice called mountaintop removal." Chapman-Crane and the Mennonite Central Committee Appalachia "are trying to halt mountaintop removal, and at the heart of their work, they say, is their faith. They are part of an awakening among religious people to environmental issues, said Paul Gorman, executive director of the National Religious Partnership for the Environment, an interreligious alliance. Increasingly, religious people across denominations are organizing around local issues, like preventing a landfill, preserving wetlands and changing mining."

NYTimes Urges Administration To Expand Flu Vaccine Production. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "The World Health Organization's new plan for ramping up the production of flu vaccine is a measure of how unprepared the world is to cope with an onslaught of pandemic influenza. The plan, conceived by a group of more than 120 experts, lays out a sensible path toward vaccine sufficiency— but it will take years to complete and cost up to $10 billion. … The Bush administration's pledge of $10 million to W.H.O. to help other countries develop vaccines and manufacturing capacity is prompt but woefully short. The administration has also invested substantially in vaccine research, including $1 billion to develop new cell-based technologies that would allow rapid expansion of production in an emergency. Although those investments are primarily for our own benefit, the knowledge generated is likely to help others around the world. Still, both the American and global efforts ought to be intensified. The administration's goal of being able to make enough vaccine quickly to protect all Americans is also probably four to five years away.'

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Montana Man Sentenced To Probation For Firearms Violations. The Helena (MT) Independent Record (10/28, Byron) reports, "A Jefferson County (MT) man was sentenced to three years of probation and a $2,500 fine for being a convicted felon in possession of firearms. … Edward Betka, 61, received the sentence Friday in U.S. District Court in Missoula." The IR continues, According to information from the office of Bill Mercer, United States Attorney for the District of Montana, Betka's possession of firearms came to the attention of federal officials after a fire raced through his Basin home in July 2005. … The fire was being investigated as a possible arson case, and a deputy fire marshal accompanied Betka into the home while he retrieved various firearms." The IR adds, "The fire marshal watched Betka pull an undamaged gun case from under his bed, which contained two expensive-looking, high-powered scope-mounted rifles. A friend offered to store the firearms at his home, and took possession of three rifles, one shotgun and a .44-revolver from Betka. … However, Betka wasn't supposed to have any guns, since he was convicted of making false income tax returns, mail fraud, and false representation of a Social Security number in U.S. District Court in Wisconsin in 1990. Convicted felons are not allowed to own or be around firearms."

Federal Agents Were Planning Raid Of California DA's Home Before His Death. The Santa Rosa (CA) Press-Democrat (10/28, Geniella) reports, "Federal agents were preparing to raid the secluded Hopland home of Mendocino County District Attorney Norman Vroman at the time of his death to search for maturing marijuana plants and a possible stash of illegal weapons." The Press-Democrat continues, "Agents said overflights had detected at least 25 marijuana plants growing on Vroman's property at the end of Sanel Valley Road. … Investigators also suspected Vroman, a self-described 'gun nut,' may have added to his personal gun collection by taking home weapons seized during drug and other raids or bought with drug-related asset forfeiture money, according to federal Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents." The Press-Democrat adds, "Three days before Vroman died Sept. 21 after a massive heart attack, the FBI's Public Corruption Unit began reviewing results of an investigation involving agents from the ATF and the Drug Enforcement Agency, according to internal documents obtained by The Press Democrat and statements from agents who asked not to be identified. … Documents show federal investigators were completing affidavits in support of warrants to search Vroman's home when he suffered the heart attack Sept. 19 as he prepared to drive to work. Vroman was found by a family member slumped over the wheel of his county-owned car. Vroman died two days later at a Santa Rosa hospital. … The federal government doesn't recognize California's medical marijuana laws. Vroman was the first district attorney in the state to implement identity cards for patients who have a doctor's permission to use marijuana. Whether Vroman obtained one himself is unknown because confidentiality laws prevent that disclosure. … Documents show tensions rose within federal agencies as investigators pressed to raid the home of a high-profile district attorney who at the time of his death was engaged in a tough re-election fight with Fort Bragg attorney Meredith Lintott."

DOJ_NMG_0088328

Maryland Man Pleads Guilty To Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot. The Washington Post (10/28, B4, Castaneda) reports, "A Prince George's County man admitted in federal court yesterday that he intended to attack a Berwyn Heights abortion clinic with a pipe bomb this past summer." The Post continues, "During a hearing in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, Robert Weiler Jr., 25, pleaded guilty to possessing a pipe bomb, being a felon in possession of a firearm and attempting to destroy or damage an abortion clinic. … A plea agreement worked out between Weiler's attorney and Assistant U.S. Attorney Bryan E. Foreman calls for Weiler to be sentenced to five years in federal prison. … U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow scheduled sentencing for Dec. 18." The Post adds, "Weiler said little during the hearing. He gave brief answers to Chasanow's questions about his background and mental health and about whether he understood the terms of his plea. … When asked whether he had been treated for alcoholism or mental illness, Weiler replied that he had met with a mental health expert at the Charles County Detention Center. He did not elaborate. … The defendant's parents had tipped off Prince George's police to his plans, calling to report their suspicions June 4, more than a week after he disappeared from their home and stopped returning their calls. … On June 7, Robert Weiler Jr. called agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to turn himself in. When he was arrested the next morning at a rest stop in Western Maryland, he told agents that he had a handgun stolen from a friend and that he had made a pipe bomb and left it in the closet of a house in Riverdale Heights. Hours later, the bomb was partially detonated by bomb squad technicians."

TAX:

NYTimes Concerned About "Political Motivation" In IRS Collection Delay. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "To avoid looking like Scrooge, the Internal Revenue Service typically lets up around the holidays in its hounding of tax delinquents. But this month, the indulgence began even before Macy's was decorated. The Times's David Cay Johnston reported yesterday that on Oct. 10, the I.R.S. commissioner Mark Everson told his troops to delay tax enforcement in areas affected by Hurricane Katrina -- until after the midterm elections and the holiday season. … In delaying the enforcement actions, there's no avoiding the appearance of a political motivation."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Rangel Says Democrats Will Not Roll Back Bush Tax Cuts. The Washington Post (10/28, D1, Montgomery, 748K) reports Rep. Charles Rangel, who "stands to take over the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee," said he "had no intention of rolling back" President Bush's first-term tax cuts if the Democrats take the House. Rangel said, "I think it would be ridiculous for us in 2007 to be talking about 2010 tax cuts. I don't want to go retroactive in terms of any of the tax cuts. I think retroactive tax increases are bad tax policy." The Post says that as the "prognosis for Republicans to maintain control has grown increasingly gloomy, Rangel has become a favorite rhetorical punching bag for President Bush and Republican leaders."

Waxman Plans Aggressive Expansion Of Corporate Oversight. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, Dreazen, 2.03M) reports on its front page that Rep. Henry Waxman, who stands to take over the House Government Reform Committee, said he would "aggressively expand oversight of many large industries -- with a focus on drug prices, oil-company profits and Halliburton Co.'s contracting work in Iraq." Waxman said he "also would boost oversight of the Bush administration, along with 'waste, fraud and abuse' across the federal government -- especially rebuilding efforts in Iraq and the Hurricane Katrina-ravaged Gulf Coast. The committee has extensive -- and vaguely defined -- oversight responsibilities covering broad swaths of corporate America and the government, and the chairman has the power to issue subpoenas, compel testimony and call hearings."

DOJ_NMG_0088329

Michaud Plans To Challenge Filner For Veterans Affairs Committee Chairmanship. CQ Daily (10/27, Yoest) reports that Rep. Bob Filner "may be in line to become the next chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee if the Democrats win control of the House, but his behavior as ranking member has raised questions about whether he's the right Democrat for the job.," and Me2 Rep. Michael Michaud (D) plans to challenge Filner's chairmanship. CQ Daily writes, "Filner's hot temperament, visible in his fights with current chairman Steve Buyer, R-Ind., and a profanity-laced tirade outside VA headquarters in June, have raised some eyebrows."

WSJournal Chides Democrats Over Silence On Agenda Specifics. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A6, 2.03M) editorializes, "A joke in Washington these days is that the only thing that can save the Republicans on Election Day is the Democrats. House Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi seems to get this joke, because with few exceptions she's kept her Members tight-lipped and unspecific: As New York Senator Chuck Schumer has put it, why take the focus off the GOP? This is in notable contrast to 1994, when the Gingrich Republicans ended a 40-year Democratic House majority by laying out a 10-item agenda known as the Contract with America. What Democrats are campaigning on this year is a Non-Contract with America -- mostly generalities about 'helping the middle class' and 'ending the corruption in Washington.' As a campaign strategy, this may well pay off. But if they do win, Democrats will have to fill their campaign vacuum with something, and the best clue to what that would be is what they've already proposed."

White House Reportedly Trimming 2008 Army Budget Request. The New York Times (10/28, Cloud, 1.21M) reports White House budget officials "are planning on asking for a $121 billion budget for the Army next year, not the $138 billion that senior Army officials have been seeking, two senior Pentagon officials said. Army officials were told of the decision in an Oct. 19 memorandum from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England, which noted that changes in the Army allotment were still possible, as deliberations continued over the Bush administration's budget for the 2008 fiscal year, said officials who had seen the memorandum. The Army budget figure was first reported by Bloomberg News." The Times adds, "it appears that the preliminary decision to scale back the annual budget request for the Army could be offset later in the year, in a so-called supplemental appropriation like those Congress has passed every year since 2001. The extra money in those bills has financed the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as unanticipated costs elsewhere."

Rice Said To Rely On Zelikow To Provide Policy Alternatives. A profile in today's New York Times (10/28, Cooper, Sanger, 1.21M) reports, "For the last 18 months, Philip D. Zelikow has churned out confidential memorandums and proposals for his boss and close friend, Condoleezza Rice, that often depart sharply from the Bush administration's current line." Zelikow's "ideas would have found a more natural home under President George H. W. Bush, for whom [he and] Rice worked on the staff of the National Security Council. They reflect a sense that American influence is perishable, and can be damaged by overreaching, as allies and other partners react against decisions made in Washington. They form a kind of foreign policy realism that was eclipsed in Mr. Bush's first term, in favor of a more ideological, unilateral ethos, but that has made something of a comeback in his second term."

OTHER NEWS:

Slow GDP Growth Blamed On Weak Housing Market. ABC World News (10/27, story 2, 3:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Economists expressed some surprise when analysts released figures showing that the gross domestic product of the country rose 1.6%. That's the weakest showi in the economy in four years. The reason, the slumping housing market. If housing was factored out, the GDP would have been more than 1% higher. ABC's Barbara Pinto on how wide-spread is the housing slump."

The CBS Evening News (10/27, story 4, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The Bush administration today put out one of the last vague economic numbers before the election. It shows the economy slowed sharply in the third quarter of this year growing at an annual rate of just 1.6%. The slowest in more than three years."

The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 6, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The news on the economy tonight is not good. Gross domestic product, GDP., the broadest measure of the nation's economic growth slowed to a crawl in the third quarter clocking in at an annual rate of 1.6%. That's the worst showing in more than three years. The weak housing market is cited as the main culprit here."

DOJ_NMG_0088330

The Washington Post (10/28, A1, Henderson, 748K) reports, "The cooling housing market sent a chill through the economy in the third quarter, helping to slow growth to its weakest pace in more than three years, the government said yesterday. The nation's gross domestic product…expanded at a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate in the quarter, down from a moderate 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter, the Commerce Department reported. In the first three months of the year, the economy grew at a sizzling 5.6 percent annual rate. With less than two weeks to go before the midterm congressional elections, the report instantly became campaign ammunition. Democrats emphasized the slowdown while Republicans highlighted signs of economic strength." The Post adds, "Home building plunged at a 17.4 percent annual rate in the third quarter, the steepest fall in four consecutive quarters of declines, the report showed. … Heading into the final campaign stretch, President Bush and other Republicans have emphasized the good economic news, such as the low 4.6 percent unemployment rate, rising incomes and falling oil prices."

The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A3, 2.03M) reports, "Economists chalked up the weak GDP reading to the housing slump and growing trade deficit. Some focused on the positive: Consumers were spending and there's potential for growth. But not everyone is sold that a rebound is in the works. … With midterm elections less than two weeks away, the report also sparked debate. Some economists said a long period of tepid growth is in store, citing an expected decrease in production in the housing and auto sectors. Others said recession is a possibility. Yet, many economists predicted the economy will bounce back during the current quarter, particularly if gasoline prices don't soar again." The Financial Times (10/28, Guha) reports, "Inflation pressures eased a little, with the core personal consumption expenditure deflator rising at an annualised rate of 2.3 per cent, down from 2.7 per cent."

Gutierrez Contends US Economy Is Strong Despite "Housing Correction." The New York Times (10/28, Porter, 1.21M) reports, "evidence of a decline in inflation coupled with vigorous consumer spending left most economists saying that the overall economy is unlikely to be dragged into a recession even as the housing market continues to falter. … With the midterm elections little more than a week away, the Bush administration sought to persuade voters that the economy, while beating at a slower pace, remains healthy. 'We have a very strong, large resilient economy that can absorb a housing correction,' said Carlos M. Gutierrez, the commerce secretary. 'If you isolate the impact of the housing correction and look at all the rest, those are solid numbers.' But Democrats seized on the report to criticize the administration's economic management."

Consumer Sentiment Improves. The Washington Times (10/28, Hill, 88K) reports, " The steep downturn in the housing market took its toll on the economy in the summer quarter. … Consumers have been bolstered by a record fast drop in oil and gasoline prices since Labor Day, and a move by the Dow Jones Industrial Average to surpass its previous record high set in 2000. A measure of consumer sentiment published by the University of Michigan yesterday showed an uptick in response to both developments, which may stimulate stronger consumer spending in the final quarter of the year."

Blunt Frustrated By Public Perception Of Economy. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt said on Fox News (10/27, Scott), "It's been one of the frustrations for me for the last couple of years, that the true story of the economy I think hasn't gotten across to the American people. So many people for so long responded to polls, a significant number of people saying they thought that the economy was great for them, but based on everything they were hearing and reading, they knew it had to be bad. And I think there is a settling in here over the last several weeks of how strong this economy is."

GDP Report Causes Stocks To Move Lower. The New York Times/AP (10/28) reports, "Stocks pulled back yesterday after a government report stirred concerns that the economy may be slowing too much. … While investors expected that yesterday's advance reading on gross domestic product from the Commerce Department would show slowing growth, the report underscored concern that a cooling housing market could spill over into other parts of the economy." The Dow Jones industrial average "was down 73.40 points, or 0.60 percent, at 12,090.26. The average had achieved a new high close in each of the previous four sessions and in 13 of the previous 18 sessions. Broader stock indicators also moved lower yesterday. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 11.74 points, or 0.85 percent, to 1,377.34, and the Nasdaq composite index fell 28.48 points, or 1.20 percent, to 2,350.62." The Wall Street Journal (10/28, B1, Anand, 2.03M) reports October "is shaping up as the blue-chip average's strongest month in more than a year. The Dow industrials are up 3.52% in October. If that holds up it would be the best month since July 2005. … The last few weeks' gains have been driven largely by strong corporate earnings, coupled with falling gasoline prices and the perception of a benign economy."

DOJ_NMG_0088331

Dollar Loses Value Due To Concerns Arising From GDP Report. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, B2, Molinski, 2.03M) reports, "The dollar dropped to a one-month low against the yen Friday as worries of a slowing U.S. economy boosted the chances of interest-rate cuts next year by the Federal Reserve. The dollar's downward spiral was triggered by a weaker-than-expected third-quarter gross-domestic-product report, which sent the dollar to the one-month low of 117.13 yen, while the euro hit a three-week high at $1.2751. The dollar recovered slightly against its rivals later in the session, but remained overall in negative territory. Speaking on CNBC television shortly after the data were released, U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson sought to reassure markets, saying the U.S. economy was 'healthy,' but many currency analysts weren't convinced."

Gasoline Prices Expected To Rise Over The Next Week. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A5, Levine, 2.03M) reports, "Wholesale gasoline prices have shot up over the past week, and prices at the pump may soon follow. U.S. prices have dropped an average of 27% to $2.20 a gallon of regular gas Friday from a peak of $3.03 a gallon in August, according to the AAA, the motorist organization. … But the retail price slide may be coming to a halt. Wholesale gasoline prices have risen 8.9% over the past 10 days, to $1.56 a gallon in New York Mercantile Exchange trading Friday. Spot crude-oil prices, meanwhile, have gone up 5.4% over the past nine days period, to $60.75 a barrel Friday, stemming a plunge that had taken the price from $77.03 a barrel in July to $57.22 a barrel Oct. 12. There's often a 10-day or two-week time lag before changes in the wholesale gasoline market show up at the pump. And more than a week of data is needed to mark a trend in the volatile energy market." The Journal notes, "the average U.S. price of regular gasoline rose a little over a penny Thursday and Friday, to $2.20 a gallon, the first consecutive-day increases since the first week of August, according to the AAA."

OPEC Likely To Reduce Production. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, B5, Chambers, 2.03M) reports, "After losing a quarter of its value from record highs, crude oil has very likely bottomed for the year as the northern hemisphere winter ushers in the prospect of a modest resurgence in prices. Growing belief in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' ability to cut oil production and the advent of cold temperatures whittling away high U.S. oil stockpiles pushed prices above $60 a barrel again this week. Oil was given additional support Friday by reports that Saudi Arabia and Bahrain are leading a deployment of naval forces in the Persian Gulf after receiving information suggesting 'a strong possibility' that insurgents may attack a major oil-loading facility in Saudi Arabia. The warning served as a reminder of oil's vulnerability to terror threats."

Campaigns Turn Increasingly Nasty As Parties Joust For Control. All three networks led their Friday broadcasts with California's fires, but coverage of the upcoming midterm elections made up a major part of subsequent reporting. Much of the focus was on the Virginia US Senate race, though the increasing negativity of close races across the country is receiving a lot of attention.

The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 3, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We turn now to politics, to this increasingly bitter campaign season with just 11 days to go now, and it's getting even uglier out there. The close Virginia Senate race is just one case in point. The Republican George Allen attacking sexually graphic passages from two novels that Democrat Jim Webb wrote about his Vietnam War experiences." NBC (Reid) continued, "Jim Webb, a highly decorated Marine in Vietnam, wrote a series of war novels, but now that he's in a close race for the U.S. Senate in Virginia, sexually graphic passages from his books have become campaign fodder. … In Tennessee, Republicans are no longer running this ad." Campaign ad: "Harold, call me." NBC (Reid) continued, "Supporters of Harold Ford called it racist, but Republicans switched it with this." Campaign ad: "He campaigns in a church. But took cash from Hollywood's top x-rated porn moguls." NBC (Reid) continued, "Some Democrats are doing it, too. This from Chris Carney of Pennsylvania." Campaign ad: "She made a 911 call alleging that he had choked her. Sherwood campaigned on family values. He has no family values." NBC (Reid) continued, "Republican Don Sherwood admits he had a mistress but denies he choked her. Negative campaigning can backfire especially when it looks like a desperation tactic but political analysts say the reason there's so many negative ads out there is because most of the time, they work."

DOJ_NMG_0088332

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Simon, Alonso-Zaldivar, 918K) writes that in the "waning days of this year's closely contested midterm election, attacks aimed at impugning a candidate's character and morals are increasingly dominating campaigns, raising questions about the appropriate boundaries and tenor of the debate." University of Pennsylvania political scientist Don Kettl said, "We've reached the point where negative ads have become more important than positive campaigns, and there's almost no line left to cross. If it's there to be found, the highly paid opposition researchers will find it. And if they find it, they'll use it." But NRCC spokesman Carl Forti was more direct. "Negative ads work, which is why you see so many of them," Forti said.

Analysts Still Give Democrats Overall Edge. As the midterm campaign season nears its close, political observers continue to update their projections. On Friday, the Cook Political Report moved the Maryland Senate race between Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin and Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele from "leans Democratic" to "toss-up," saying the race "is closer than most observers expected it to be." Cook also moved FL13, NY24, and OH18 from "toss-up" to "lean Democratic," and moved FL16 from "leans Democratic" to "toss-up." Meanwhile the Rothenberg Political Report updated its overall projections Friday, saying Democrats will gain 18-28 House seats, "with the caveat that larger gains surely are possible," four to seven Senate seats, and six to 10 governorships.

Earlier Friday, the White House Bulletin updated its list of how Cook, Rothenberg, Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia, and CQ Politics handicappers are rating the House races, and formed a composite rating based on their picks. Almost all the movement was toward the Democrats, and there are now nine GOP-held seats either likely or leaning Democratic, and another 19 in the toss-up category. There are no Democratic seats currently favoring the Republicans or in the toss-up category. In addition, three new races previously considered safe for the Republicans, CA50, IN3, and NY25, were added to the toss-up list.

Meanwhile, the Democratic Democracy Corps said Friday that a "wealth of new public poll releases confirm that Democrats hold a commanding and stable lead in the race for Congress." Democrats "have slipped slightly in the generic congressional contest this week but still lead by 15 points and attract a clear majority of 53 percent across the most recent seven surveys."

Reliability Of Polls Examined. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A5, 2.03M) examines the reliability of polls in past years, noting that in 1994, "few pundits predicted the landslide. In July 1994, the Pew Research Center said that 47% of voters would likely vote Democratic, while 45% would vote Republican. By November, the poll showed Republicans ahead by just two percentage points."

Democrats Outraised Republicans In Early October, But Still Lag In Cash On Hand. The Washington Post (10/28, A8, Birnbaum, 748K) reports that while Democrats "continued to raise large amounts of campaign cash this month," it was "not enough to erase the Republicans' multimillion-dollar lead." Democratic committees outraised Republican committees during the first 18 days of October, gathering $25.9 million while Republicans collected $18.6 million. But the "last-minute fundraising surge was not enough to overcome the GOP's earlier fundraising advantage. The three national Republican Party committees had $17 million more cash on hand than their Democratic counterparts as of Oct. 18."

The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A2, Cummings, 2.03M) says the "rush of final campaign spending next week will provide important clues to where the Republican firewall against a Democratic takeover of the Senate is shifting -- and whether Republicans are even trying to build one to protect their House majority." The Journal raises a few "big Senate questions: Now that the Republican Party has decided to stop investing in Ohio, where incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine is trailing in polls, where does the money go? Will the party divert big money from the Buckeye State to make a last stand in Tennessee, where Republican Bob Corker is fighting to hold the seat of departing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, or double-down its bet on Virginia Sen. George Allen?"

Corporate Donors Shift Giving To Democrats. The New York Times (10/28, Zeleny, Pilhofer, 1.21M) reports, "Corporate America is already thinking beyond Election Day, increasing its share of last-minute donations to Democratic candidates and quietly devising strategies for how to work with Democrats if they win control of Congress." The "shift in political giving, for the first 18 days of October, has not been this pronounced in the final stages of a campaign" since the 1994 Republican sweep.

Capitol Hill's GOP Centrists Fear Their Small Ranks Will Dwindle Even More. The New York Times

DOJ_NMG_0088333

(10/28, Hulse, 1.21M) reports Republican Senate and House centrists, "facing the loss of fellow moderates" in November, are "faulting Congressional and party leaders for pursuing a strategy dominated by conservative themes. Leading moderates say Republicans concentrated on social wedge issues like same-sex marriage while pressing national security almost to the exclusion of popular wage and health policies that could have helped endangered Republicans in the Northeast and the Midwest." Two GOP senators seen as moderates, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Mike DeWine of Ohio, "are in serious jeopardy. Two leading House moderates are retiring, another lost a primary, and at least six others are in difficult re-election fights in Connecticut, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and elsewhere." Sen. Olympia Snowe said, "There wasn't an impetus to help develop a political and legislative plan that incorporated the broad umbrella of philosophy in our party. I think they always operated under the wrong assumption that you just appeal to the base and no more than that."

DNC Ramps Up Outreach To Black Voters. The Washington Times (10/28, Debose, 88K) reports the DNC "is hiring more black advertisers, pollsters and grass-roots operatives in a revamped effort to increase turnout by black voters." Spokeswoman Amaya Smith said, "There are a lot of races that will be impacted by African-American and Hispanic voters in crucial states, and we had a lot of candidates stress that they need these votes to win. … We are reaching out to people who we know are our voters but may not have come out in the last election."

Director Zucker Making Internet Spots For RNC. The Washington Times (10/28, Ballon, 88K) reports David Zucker, director of comedies like "Airplane!" and "The Naked Gun," is "now focusing his camera to mock Democrats in political ads." The "one-time liberal activist" and former campaign adviser to President Clinton is now making Internet ads for the RNC. Zucker "defected to the Republican Party after the September 11 attacks, supported President Bush in 2004 and has become more vocal in his beliefs -- disregarding the possible impact on his career in Hollywood, a liberal haven."

Allen Camp Hits Webb Over Explicit Passages In His Novels. The CBS Evening News (10/27, story 3, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "It's 11 days and counting until the midterm elections. And Virginia's wild Senate race could help determine the balance of power in Congress. In this one as in so many others as we come down to the wire, everything seems to be fair game." CBS (Borger) continued, "Consider it one more race stuck in the muck. Today it was Virginia's turn. Republican Senator George Allen's campaign sent out a press release detailing steamy sex scenes in novels written over the last 30 years by opponent Jim Webb. … But wait a minute, this race was supposed to be about issues. Mostly Iraq."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (10/27, King) reported, "With control of Congress at stake, many races are not only close; they're downright ugly. That, of course, is nothing new. What is new, though, is how a work of fiction is becoming fact in one vicious campaign. It's in Virginia, where the Republican incumbent, under fire for his own remarks, wants voters to know what his Democratic challenger wrote years ago. The writing is explicit and shocking. It's also purely made up, fiction."

The Washington Post (10/28, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports on its front page that Sen. George Allen, facing a tight race in Virginia, has accused Democratic rival James Web of "writing inappropriate sex scenes and demeaning descriptions of women in his fictional books." The Post says the "allegations about sex-laced passages" in five of Webb's historical novels "inject a new question into a campaign that has centered almost exclusively on character issues: Should the author of a fictional work who runs for office be personally held to account for the scenes in his books?" Webb said in response, "To take these things out and pull excerpts out and force them on people…is just a classic example of the way this campaign is run. Literature is literature. I've made my career as a novelist. George Allen doesn't have a record to run on."

The New York Times (10/28, Hernandez, 1.21M) says the Allen campaign "issued a news release that quoted the passages and called them 'very disturbing for a candidate hoping to represent families of Virginians.'" The release "also asserted that Mr. Webb's writings were filled with 'chauvinistic attitudes and sexually exploitive references.'" As part of their response, Democrats circulated comments by Sen.John McCain "praising one of the novels, 'Lost Soldiers,' that the Allen campaign had singled out because it described a provocative scene involving a boy." Webb also "attacked Mr. Allen personally. 'You ought to read what George Allen's sister wrote about him if you want to read about attitudes toward females,' he said, alluding to an autobiography by Jennifer Allen in which she describes her brother as a bully who once dragged her upstairs by her hair because she had defied her father at bedtime."

DOJ_NMG_0088334

The Washington Times (10/28, McLaughlin, 88K) adds that Webb "said he was warned by friends before entering the race that the 2 million words he has published made him an opposition researcher's dream and that they would be taken out of context to be used against him."

Allen Leads Webb By One Point In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 24, shows Sen. George (R) at 49% and James Webb (D) at 48%.

Lynne Cheney Spars With Blitzer Over Her Own Novel. Second Lady Lynne Cheney, appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (10/27, Blitzer), said, "Jim Webb is full of baloney. I have never written anything sexually explicit. His novels are full of sexual, explicit references to incest, sexually explicit references -- well, you know, I just don't want my grandchildren to turn on the television set. This morning, Imus was reading from the novels, and it's triple-X rated." Blitzer: "Here's what the Democratic Party put out today, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee: 'Lynne Cheney's book featured brothels and attempted rape. In 1981, Vice President Dick Cheney's wife, Lynne, wrote a book called 'Sisters,' which featured a lesbian love affair, brothels and attempted rapes.'" Cheney: "No." Blitzer: "'In 1988, Lynn Cheney wrote about a Republican vice president who dies of a heart attack while having sex with his mistress.' Is that true?" Cheney: "Nothing explicit. And actually, that was full of lies." Blitzer: "But you did write a book entitled 'Sisters'? .. And it did have lesbian characters?" Cheney: "This description -- no, not necessarily. This description is a lie. I'll stand on that."

Dowd Mocks Allen's Charges Against Webb. In her New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "Candidates around the country have been race-baiting, gay-baiting, Michael J. Fox-baiting and Hispanic-baiting. But now it has come to this: Republicans are novel-baiting. Still trying to recover his balance, after slipping on a macaca and admitting he was a Jewish bubba, one criticized for using racist language, displaying a Confederate flag at home and keeping a hangman's noose at his old law office, Senator George Allen of Virginia unleashed a vicious attack on Jim Webb Thursday night. He called him a fiction writer."

Unlike 2004, Values Issues Not On Ohio's Radar This Year. The Washington Post (10/28, B9, Koff, Sloat, 748K) reports that in Ohio, where in 2004 "Republicans fused love of God and love of country into such a potent political message" that Democrats "were discombobulated," this year voters seem more concerned with the economy and the war in Iraq. Not much is "being said on the campaign trail about the 'three G's' -- gays, guns and God -- in any part of Ohio," and in the state's conservative southwest, "barely a peep is heard about abortion or other social issues." However, on its front page, the Wall Street Journal (10/28, Calmes, 2.03M) says evangelicals are trying to excite their base in the state. The "turnout machine that has pulled evangelical conservatives to the polls in massive numbers is churning away, and for a reason little appreciated outside their circles: the sense that voting is their Christian duty."

"Daily Show" To Broadcast From Ohio Next Week. The AP (10/28) reports Comedy Central's "Daily Show" will spend the last week before the election broadcasting from Ohio. Host Jon Stewart said, "We wanted to go there because Ohio was so crucial last time. They were sort of the focal point, the swing state, if you will." Stewart said "many of the big-name politicians the show approached -- including U.S. Sens. George Voinovich and Mike DeWine, Gov. Bob Taft and gubernatorial candidates Ted Strickland and Ken Blackwell -- declined."

Judge Rules Ohio Exit Polling Rules Are Legal. The New York Times/AP (10/28) reports Federal District Court Judge Michael Watson, who had struck down Ohio rules on exit polling, "ruled Friday that revised guidelines for the practice were legal, rejecting a call for clarification by the national news media."

Steele's Pediatrician Sister Defends Him On Stem Cells In TV Ad. The New York Times (10/28, Rutenberg, 1.21M) examines an ad for Maryland Republican Senate candidate Michael Steele, which responds to an ad for Democrat Ben Cardin that featured Michael J. Fox accusing Steele "of wanting to 'put limits on the most promising stem cell research.'" In the ad, pediatrician Monica Turner, Steele's sister, says Steele "does support stem cell research, and he cares deeply for those who suffer from disease," then says she herself has multiple sclerosis. The Times says the "Cardin advertisement with Mr. Fox was a powerful repudiation of Mr. Steele, given by one of the nation's leading advocates for stem cell research. But Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0088335

Steele's sister would seem no less effective in this ad defending her brother, in calm but firm terms."

Third-Party Maryland Candidate Does Not Want To Be A "Spoiler." The Washington Times (10/28, Miller, 88K) reports Kevin Zeese, running for the US Senate in Maryland as the coalition candidate of three minor parties, said his campaign "is gaining momentum because of gaffes" by Cardin. Zeese, who is at about six percent in recent polls, "bristled at the suggestion that he could cost Mr. Cardin the election by fracturing the congressman's liberal voter base." Zeese said, "I'm certainly not going to be a spoiler. It is a question of people hearing me. If they hear me, I'll win."

Bloomberg Lends Campaign Operatives To Lieberman. The New York Times (10/28, Cardwell, 1.21M) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman "is deploying a secret weapon" in the final days of his run for reelection as an independent: a "sophisticated operation to identify and turn out voters, courtesy of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg." The "Bloomberg group includes several top-level operatives who played key roles in the mayor's decisive re-election last year or who are in the administration, and have taken leaves from their jobs to work on Mr. Lieberman's campaign." The team has helped to "open campaign offices, devised a strategy to reach voters and are corralling enough volunteers to cover 2,800 shifts at more than 700 polling sites on Election Day." The Times says that since Lieberman "does not have a party apparatus to help build his field operation, the efforts of the Bloomberg team could prove critical in one of the most closely watched races in the nation." The Times links Bloomberg's support for Lieberman with talk of a 2008 Bloomberg presidential run, saying that the "workers on loan are the most vivid example yet" of how Bloomberg "could build a permanent political apparatus to support like-minded independent candidates across the country -- if not a national bid for himself."

Whitehouse Leads Chafee By 10 Points In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 25, shows Sheldon Whitehouse (D) at 43% and Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R) at 33%. Two weeks ago, Whitehouse led by just three points.

Party Label Dragging Chafee Down In Rhode Island. The Washington Times (10/28, Fagan, 88K) reports on the Rhode Island Senate race. While Chafee "often bucks Republicans on issues from taxes to abortion and voted against the Iraq war," Whitehouse "has tried to paint him as a boon to the Republican majority and Mr. Bush's agenda -- a theme that seems to have resonated."

Corker Leads Ford By One Point In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 25, shows Bob Corker (R) at 47% and Rep. Harold Ford, Jr., at 46%.

Wal-Mart Cuts Ties With GOP Strategist Involved With Anti-Ford Ad. The New York Times (10/28, Barbaro, 1.21M) reports Wal-Mart said Friday night "that it had cut ties with a prominent Republican strategist," Terry Nelson, who helped make the now-pulled RNC ad mocking Ford. The Times says Wal-Mart was "under pressure from black leaders and union groups" to dissociate itself from Nelson.

Wamp Says Corker "Has The Momentum." Rep. Zach Wamp said on Fox News (10/27, Colby), "I know both these guys better than anybody. I've known Bob Corker for 20 years and I've known Harold Ford for 10 years. They're both sharp, smart. I like them both a whole lot. But I think the decision's going to be: Who is going to represent Tennessee values in the way they carry themselves and they vote? And that's why Bob Corker has the momentum right now."

Talent Leads McCaskill By Two Points In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 25, shows Missouri Sen. Jim Talent (R) at 48% and State Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) at 46%.

Santorum Says He Is "Running Full-Tilt." Sen. Rick Santorum said on MSNBC (10/27, Cosby), "My opponent's doing two campaign events a week. I repeat that -- two a week. I'm just running full-tilt. I know I have to earn this job every six years -- and not just every six years, every day during the six years. And my opponent has a very famous name. His father was the governor. And he's won elections because of the last name. And he thinks that's going to win him this one, and I think the people of Pennsylvania are going to give him a little surprise on Election Day."

In Indiana, Local Issues Hurting GOP House Candidates. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A4, Schatz, 2.03M) runs a feature on House races in usually Republican Indiana, where three GOP incumbents -- Chris Chocola, John Hostettler, and Mike Sodrel – are in tight contests. Voters are dissatisfied with how the GOP-led state government "has handled local issues," and "Democratic challengers are successfully tapping into that sentiment to sway voters, and turning local issues into a decisive factor here at a time when global issues such as terrorism and the Iraq war continue to dominate in races across the country."

DOJ_NMG_0088336

Kuhl Facing Tough Contest In Usually GOP-Solid NY29. The New York Times (10/28, Santos, 1.21M) reports that in NY29, where President Bush won 56% of the vote in 2004, his highest share in any district in the state, Republican Rep. Randy Kuhl "faces a spirited challenge from a Democratic newcomer, Eric Massa." The national GOP "has stepped up efforts to safeguard Mr. Kuhl's seat, which has long seemed comfortably secure. Last month, Vice President Dick Cheney flew to Rochester for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kuhl," and First Lady Laura Bush "is scheduled to campaign for him" today. Massa has "stepped up fund-raising efforts, with noteworthy success. He raised $171,000 from Sept. 30 to Oct. 18, or nearly three times as much as Mr. Kuhl, who collected $65,000."

Ballot Measures Could Boost Democrats This Year. The Washington Post (10/28, Goldfarb, Broder, 748K) reports on its front page that ballot initiatives, which in 2004 tended to bring Republican voters to the polls, could benefit Democrats this year. Measures to increase the minimum wage "are before voters in six states," and "four of those, Arizona, Ohio, Missouri and Montana, feature close Senate races with a GOP incumbent. In Missouri, moreover, a measure backing stem cell research is ahead in the polls -- which Democrats say could lift their candidate." While eight states have ballot measures to ban same-sex marriage, "their impact may be less than in previous years. Few of these states have competitive Senate or House races. And in those that do, such as Virginia and Tennessee, the issue is not as prominent as it was around the country in 2004." The Washington Post (10/28, B1, Jenkins, 748K) runs a report on the campaigns over the Virginia gay marriage ballot question, while BBC.com (10/27) runs down ballot measures before voters across the US.

NYTimes Backs Rhode Island Ballot Measure On Felons' Voting Rights. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "Rhode Island voters will have a chance on Nov. 7 to do the right thing and amend their state Constitution to restore voting rights to felons who have completed their prison sentences. Allowing former convicts to vote strengthens democracy, and helps them to integrate into society and move beyond a life of crime."

Small Colorado Newspaper Reverses Stance On Gay Marriage Amendment. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Simon, 918K) reports Colorado's Grand Junction Daily Sentinel "last week urged voters to reject a proposed state constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage," saying the "traditional concept of marriage is not endangered in this state." But on Friday, the "editorial page editor, Bob Silbernagel, said he had changed his mind." Silbernagel said he "was jolted" by the New Jersey Supreme Court decision on same-sex partnership rights. So he "dashed off a six-paragraph retraction of his earlier editorial. The new piece informed the Daily Sentinel's 30,000 readers that Amendment 43 was 'a virtual necessity.'"

"Rising Star" Obama Swings Through Los Angeles. Under the headline "A Rising Star From Illinois Makes Some Noise In L.A." the Los Angeles Times (10/28, Hall, 918K) reports Sen. Barack Obama "swung through Los Angeles on Friday," addressing a "rapt crowd" at the California African American Museum, speaking at a news conference at USC, and then delivering "a 14-minute speech in shirt sleeves at a campus rally with Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and just about every other California Democratic office holder who could find their way to USC."

Schwarzenegger Seen As Having Made Big Comeback. The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 5, 3:50, Brokaw, 9.87M) interviewed Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, asking, "As a Republican governor of nation's largest state do you feel very close to the Republican Administration of George W. Bush?" Schwarzenegger: "We try to work together with the Bush Administration on many, many different issues and there's many issues that we're doing really well with and there's many issues that we're fighting over." Brokaw: "A very big issue, the environment and especially global warming. You're a long way from the Bush Administration policies in those areas." Schwarzenegger: "There's no one in the federal government that is criticizing us. We have to make sure we're less reliant on fossil fuel, on foreign oil and domestic oil as far as that goes." Brokaw: "Campaigning is very expensive and Schwarzenegger has raised more than $100 million, much of it from the insurance industry, developers and others with business with the state. You said you wouldn't take any money from special interest." Schwarzenegger: "I said there would be a different story when I get in there because I'm financially independent so I cannot be bought. No such thing as money in and favors out."

DOJ_NMG_0088337

ABC World News (10/27, story 4, 16:00, Gibson, 8.78M) said that "for a while, one of the GOP's marquee names, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, was on the endangered list. But he has now opened a 17-point lead in the polls. The turnaround began once he started displaying a quality you don't associate with the former Terminator: humility.

California Gubernatorial Hopefuls Fight Over "Green" Credentials. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Reiterman, 918K) reports on how both Schwarzenegger and Angelides are trying to claim the "green" mantle in California. Schwarzenegger, the "pro-business Hummer aficionado and former movie star," has "used his office to undertake high-profile initiatives for air quality and the protection of ocean and forestland," but critics say his "less visible actions sometimes have belied his lofty words." Meanwhile, Angelides, "a hybrid-driving former developer who has bumped heads with conservationists, has employed the financial clout of two of the nation's largest pension funds -- with far less fanfare -- to establish himself as a 'green' investor."

Perry Leads Bell By 11 Points In Texas Gubernatorial Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 23, finds Gov. Rick Perry (R) leading the Texas gubernatorial field with 36%, followed by ex-Rep. Chris Bell (D) at 25%, Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn (I) at 22%, and author Kinky Friedman (I) at 12%.

Faso Ad Blasts Spitzer Over Ties To Hevesi. The New York Times (10/28, Healy, 1.21M) examines an ad for New York Republican gubernatorial candidate John Faso that ties Democrat Eliot Spitzer, the heavy favorite, to Democratic State Comptroller Alan Hevesi, who faces ethics questions. The ad says Spitzer "has one set of standards for his friends and another for everyone else. … Hevesi knowingly and intentionally broke the law, stealing tens of thousands of dollars from taxpayers. But when Sheriff of Wall Street had a chance to investigate and call for Hevesi's resignation, Spitzer said no.'" The Times says "hammering Mr. Spitzer with the Hevesi scandal could score points, and the ad does so effectively. Still, making hay over the comptroller may not lead many voters to support a candidate they do not know well (Mr. Faso) over one who has high favorability ratings (Mr. Spitzer)."

WSJournal Notes Hevesi's Record As "Corporate Scold." The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A6, 2.03M) in an editorial, notes that Hevesi "was recently found to have used a public employee at taxpayer expense to chauffeur his wife around for three years. Mr. Hevesi somehow failed to disclose this personal use of public assets, and he has since claimed he merely 'forgot' to reimburse the state. … We'd normally ignore this kind of state government corruption. But Mr. Hevesi's spectacle is instructive because in recent years he has been one of America's loudest corporate scolds. As Comptroller, he supervises the state's pension money and he has used that post to slam corporate officials who played even tangential roles in corporate scandals."

Hand Sanitizer Becomes A Must On The Campaign Trail. The New York Times (10/28, Leibovich, 1.21M) runs a light feature on the "germs, parasites and all the bacterial unpleasantness" that get spread around through campaign-trail "glad-handing and flesh-pressing." Anne Ryun, wife of Rep. Jim Ryun, "has become obsessive about using hand sanitizer," like "so many other people involved in politics these days." She squirted "antiseptic goop" on people lined up to meet Vice President Cheney at a Topeka fundraiser this month, and when Cheney "was done meeting and greeting, he, too, rubbed his hands vigorously with the stuff, dispensed in dollops by an aide when the vice president was out of public view. That has become routine in this peak season of handshaking, practiced by everyone from the most powerful leaders to the lowliest hopefuls. Politics is personal at all levels, and germs do not discriminate."

Court To Hear Appeal From Parents Of Autistic Child. The New York Times/AP (10/28, Press) reports the Supreme Court "agreed Friday to consider an appeal by an autistic child and his parents, who want to sue over his school accommodations without hiring a lawyer. The parents, Jeff and Sandee Winkelman, say they cannot afford a lawyer to argue their court case against the school district of Parma, Ohio, near Cleveland, over the education of their son, Jacob. The federal appeals court in Cincinnati ruled that the Winkelmans, suing under the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act, had to find a lawyer to represent Jacob, although other federal courts have ruled differently in cases involving that law. The Bush administration then urged the justices to take the case, saying that in adopting the measure, Congress clearly intended that parents be able to represent their children in such court proceedings."

DOJ_NMG_0088338

Bill Clinton Plans Birthday-Weekend Fundraisers For His Causes. The New York Times (10/28, Healy, Konigsberg, 1.21M) reports ex-President Clinton "is making another king-of-the-world swing through Manhattan this weekend, doing two of the things he does best: reveling in adulation and raising money. Over three days of festivities to mark his 60th birthday -- which include a golf tournament and a concert by the Rolling Stones at the Beacon Theater -- Mr. Clinton expects to bring in more than $20 million for his foundation's array of philanthropic projects."

Dixie Chicks Documentary Garners Free Publicity From Networks. The Washington Post's Lisa de Moraes (10/28, C1) writes, "NBC and CW networks became unwitting stealth-marketing partners with the Weinstein Co. when they refused to air ads for the film company's upcoming docu-flick about the storm that erupted when the Dixie Chicks' lead singer said in a 2003 concert she was ashamed President Bush was from her home state of Texas. … It all started earlier this week when Weinstein submitted ads for its new Barbara Kopple documentary 'Shut Up & Sing' to the broadcast networks for review by their standards and practices departments. NBC said it 'cannot accept these spots as they are disparaging to President Bush.'"

Los Angeles Clergy Sex Abuse Cases Settled For $10 Million. The New York Times (10/28, Banerjee) reports, "The Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Los Angeles and a Catholic religious order have agreed to pay $10 million to settle claims made by seven victims of sexual abuse by clergy members, lawyers for the parties involved said Friday." The Times continues, "While the amount per victim is large relative to payments made to settle sexual abuse cases in other parts of the country, it is typical of the sums paid in California, which has a taken a strong stance toward the Catholic Church in abuse cases. In 2003, for example, the state extended its statute of limitations for child sexual abuse cases, and the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office has been conducting a criminal investigation into the archdiocese since 2002." The Times adds, "More than 95 percent of the $10 million settlement will be paid by the religious order, the Carmelites, Province of the Most Pure Heart of Mary, which is based in Darien, Ill. The archdiocese will pay less than 5 percent, lawyers for the plaintiffs and the order said. … The settlement for the most part is not covered by the Carmelites' insurance, said Jim Geoly, the order's lawyer, adding that the order might have to borrow money to pay the sum. … The seven plaintiffs accused four Carmelite priests and one Carmelite brother of sexual abuse in a period from the early 1950s to the late 1970s."

South Korean Media Cite "Activity" At North Korean Nuclear Site. The AP (10/28, Lim) carries South Korean media reports that officials in Seoul "have observed activities at the North's suspected nuclear test site that may be preparations for a second test." Anonymous sources "said Seoul is keeping a close watch on the movements of trucks and soldiers at the Punggye-ri site in the country's remote northeast." One "official confirmed activities at the site, but said another test 'is not believed to be imminent.'" The AP adds, "It was not immediately clear how the military officials first spotted the activity at the site. However, the United States and South Korea generally share intelligence information from satellite images."

Seoul Begins To Implement Sanctions. The New York Times (10/28, Fackler, 1.21M) continues reporting on South Korean efforts to "gingerly" implement the sanctions specified in United Nations Security Council Resolution 1718. "South Korea has taken a first step" by "banning visits by officials involved in the North's nuclear weapons program. And in a sign of how Seoul has struggled to carry out [the sanctions] without antagonizing the heavily armed North, a third top government official involved in North Korea offered to resign Friday over the test." The Times call the travel ban "largely symbolic in a country that gets few North Korean visitors at all, much less officials engaged in the North's covert nuclear weapons efforts. It falls short of American requests that South Korea join a United States-led effort to inspect North Korean ships for nuclear and missile-related technology." The Times adds, "In addition to not becoming involved in searching North Korean ships, Seoul also has so far balked at taking more punishing steps, like closing a South Korean-run industrial park and a tourist resort in North Korea, which are the North's largest economic contacts with the outside world."

DOJ_NMG_0088339

Tehran Confirms Uranium Enrichment Underway In Second Cascade. The New York Times (10/28, Fathi, 1.21M) notes a statement from a semi-official Iranian news agency that Tehran "has begun to enrich uranium in a second network of centrifuges, …in defiance of a United Nations Security Council demand that it halt its nuclear program." The ISNA Student News Agency said "Iran installed a second cascade of 164 centrifuges two weeks ago and successfully injected gas into it last week, theoretically doubling its enrichment capacity." President Bush "said he was aware of 'speculation' that Iran has started enriching uranium in a second network. 'Whether they doubled it or not, the idea of Iran having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable,' Mr. Bush said." Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov "said it was too early to speak about Iran being able to produce weapons-grade uranium." Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani "said Tehran was still willing to resolve its nuclear issue through negotiations," but "also rejected comments made by the foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, who said last week that Iran might consider suspending its program during negotiations." The Washington Post (10/28, A10, Lynch, 748K) includes a short piece focused on President Bush's statement.

The AP (10/28, Karimi) says Tehran issued "a defiant new message to the U.N. Security Council." The "State Department said it was up to the International Atomic Energy Agency to assess the reports. 'I cannot confirm those reports. We are not on the ground,' State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said." Also, French President Jacques Chirac "expressed support for sanctions against Iran but insisted that they be temporary and reversible." The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Karimi) runs the AP story.

Under the headline, "Iranian Nuclear Effort Defies U.N. Council Again," the Washington Post (10/28, A10, Lynch, 748K) adds Tehran "has once again defied the [UNSC's] repeated demands to halt its nuclear activities." The statement "came as U.N. negotiations became bogged down in the face of Russia's and China's reluctance to slap tough sanctions on Tehran. U.S. and European officials say they anticipate a long, hard diplomatic struggle over the coming weeks to fashion a formal reaction to Iran's enrichment activities."

Rice Says Hezbollah Must Disarm To Join Lebanese Politics. The AP (10/28) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "stepped up international pressure on Hezbollah to disarm, saying in a television interview aired Friday that the guerrilla group must surrender its weapons if it wants to remain part of Lebanon's political process." She "urged Hezbollah to lay down its arms according to the cease-fire that ended" the Israel-Hezbollah war, "and choose between being a militant group and a legitimate political organization." The AP says the group "is under heavy international pressure to surrender its weapons, but…has refused to disarm." Rice "also urged the Lebanese government to end what it called Hezbollah's 'state within a state' and prevent weapons from reaching the militant group." She later "warned that as Lebanon tries to rebuild, some people might try to destabilize its Western-backed government."

US Ambassador Said To Manage Difficult Portfolio In Caracas. The New York Times (10/28, Romero, 1.21M) profiles US Ambassador to Venezuela William Brownfield. "With relations between Washington and Caracas at a low ebb, Mr. Brownfield, a loquacious Texan and career diplomat, has one of the most challenging jobs of any American ambassador. Though at a career stage when some would prefer a plush embassy in a friendly country, Mr. Brownfield seems to relish the opportunity to engage Venezuelans on a street level." He finds "himself fighting an uphill battle almost wherever he goes." Venezuela, "paradoxically, maintains resilient commercial ties with the United States. Anti-American sentiment is often directed personally at" Brownfield, and "newspapers have dubbed him el Tejano, the Texan, a nod to his straightforward if ironic style in pressing ahead with his street diplomacy."

Bogota Undergoing Renaissance After Years Of Chaos. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Kraul, 918K) runs a feature on Bogota, saying the Colombian city was "once a world capital of mayhem" but is "now held up as a model." Ten years ago, Bogota's Bosa slum was home to "open sewage and gun-toting gangs bent on muggings and murder." But today, Bosa "has paved streets, new schools, health clinics and cafeterias, and links to a new mass transit system. … Like much of this re-energized capital of more than 7 million inhabitants, the war zone that was Bosa has been transformed." The Times credits "visionary leadership" from three recent mayors for "helping turn the city around."

DOJ_NMG_0088340

Indigenous Supporters Turn Against Bolivia's Morales Over Coca Policy. The Washington Times (10/28, Arostegui, 88K) reports, "Indigenous coca farmers who helped put President Evo Morales in power are violently resisting even the token eradication efforts demanded by the United States to avoid Bolivia's decertification as a country cooperating against drug trafficking." Morales has overseen the implementation of "laws permitting peasant farmers to grow up to half an acre of coca for traditional use," but angry "farmers are backing demands for increased acreage with road blocks and gunfights that so far have killed two growers and wounded two police officers." Morales' "government…is divided on how to proceed," with some "elements" of the administration "concerned that as much as half the current coca production is being diverted into the production of cocaine for the illicit international market. The State Department publicly warned Mr. Morales during his visit to the United Nations in New York last month that Bolivia must eliminate 12,000 acres of coca cultivation or face decertification as a country cooperating against drug trafficking, which would mean a cutoff of aid.

Pilots' Lawyer Says Brazilian Controllers Approved Altitude Before Fatal Crash. The New York Times (10/28, Prada, Wald, 1.21M) reports, "The lawyer representing the pilots of an American corporate jet that apparently collided with a Brazilian airliner on Sept. 29 said Friday that his clients were at their assigned altitude at the time of the crash, despite a flight plan that specified a different altitude." The Embraer "apparently clipped a Boeing 737" at 37,000 feet, causing the 737 to crash, "killing all 154 people on board." While Brazilian prosecutors claim the pilots deviated from their flight plan, the pilots told their American lawyer "that when they took off from the southeastern city of São José dos Campos, where their new plane had been made, they were given a clearance by Brazilian air traffic control that superseded the flight plan."

Paris Deploys Extra Police To Stem Rash Of Bus Burnings. The Washington Post (10/28, A9, Moore, 748K) notes French media reporting that "officials deployed 4,000 extra police officers in the country's poorest suburban areas Friday as the anniversary of last year's wave of arson attacks arrived with only scattered incidents of violence." The Post reports "several weeks of increasing tension in the suburban areas of Paris where residents -- most of whom are Arab and African immigrants and their French-born children -- have complained that the government had not lived up to promises it made, after last year's nationwide rampage, to improve living conditions and employment opportunities." Two public buses were attacked "in the northern suburbs of Paris early in the evening." The Post adds, "Allegations that the government has failed to respond adequately to demands for improvements in the poor suburbs, along with parallel concerns over security and an increasing Muslim population, are among the most contentious issues in the French presidential campaign."

Under the headline, "Speeches And Arson Recall Last Year's Unrest In France," the New York Times (10/28, Bernard, 1.21M) reports, "Hooded attackers burned two buses on Friday night in a city near this Paris suburb on the anniversary of the start of last year's suburban unrest." Before the bus attacks yesterday, "several hundred people in [a] poor suburb of Paris participated in a silent march in memory of two teenagers whose accidental deaths last year triggered three weeks of unrest that shook the country. In speeches after the march, local officials and family members of the teenagers called for calm." The Times says many mourners "expressed not only sadness over the deaths, but also disappointment with how little things had changed in France's tough suburbs." The violence last year "shed light on the plight of the country's underprivileged populations, mainly Arabs and black Africans and their French-born children, who feel disenfranchised."

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Rubin, Sicakyuz, 918K) adds, "One word summed up the mood at the commemoration Friday of the deaths of two French youths whose electrocution set off a series of fiery riots a year ago. 'Triste,' said one person after another in French. Sad." The youth's deaths one year ago "brought to the surface fury at France's failure to integrate minorities, primarily of African and Middle Eastern origins." The Times adds, "Although there are 5 million Muslims in France, the majority from immigrant backgrounds, few have made their way into the country's elite. … Most live in desolate concrete housing projects or dilapidated homes in suburbs an hour or more by bus or train from the large French cities where most jobs are. Unemployment is well above 20% and in some cases as high as 40%, according to French newspapers."

The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Ganley) focuses its reporting on yesterday's bus attacks, noting, "Flaming cars became a symbol of three weeks of rampages last year, which jolted the nation into recognizing discontent among many minorities -- especially those of Arab and black African origin, and France's 5 million-strong Muslim population."

DOJ_NMG_0088341

Abe Veers Toward Center In First Month As Japan's Prime Minister. The New York Times (10/28, Onishi, 1.21M) reports that while Shinzo Abe "rose to become postwar Japan's youngest prime minister by hewing to a conservative, nationalist agenda," in his first month in power he has "made a beeline toward the center, reaching out to China and South Korea as this region confronted North Korea's recent nuclear test. He has made surprising, if grudging, admissions about Japan's militarist past, assuaging the regional tensions that emerged" under predecessor Junichiro Koizumi. The Times says it is "too early to tell whether Mr. Abe's month in power is evidence of an innate pragmatism, or whether he is consolidating his power before pushing a more conservative agenda. But he has reassured voters in Japan and officials in Washington, won tentative praise from skeptics in China and South Korea and unsettled the Japanese right."

Sri Lankan Government To Meet With Tamil Tigers Today. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Chu, 918K) reports Sri Lankan government representatives and Tamil Tiger rebels are "due to sit down today for their first face-to-face talks in months" in what "could be the last, best hope for averting all-out war." Both sides "have been stung by heavy losses and international criticism in recent weeks, following a surge in combat that has left hundreds dead and thousands more refugees in their own country, forced to flee homes and livelihoods to avoid the crossfire." The New York Times (10/28, Senanayake, 1.21M) and BBC.com (10/28) also report on the meeting.

Pronk Will Remain In Sudan Envoy Job Through December. The New York Times (10/28, Schneider, 1.21M) notes an announcement by the office of UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan that his special representative for Sudan, Jan Pronk, "will continue to hold his office until his contract expires at the end of the year, but his role is expected to be mainly symbolic." Annan will send him to Khartoum soon, "but only to organize a transfer to Taye Zerihoun, the officer in charge of the United Nations mission in Sudan. He will then return to New York to finish out his term." Annan's office "said the United Nations did not expect the Sudanese government to reject the compromise," however, Sudanese Ambassador Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem Mohamad "said his government would not sanction Mr. Pronk's return."

"Forgotten" Eastern Sudan Begins Post-Conflict Recovery. The New York Times (10/28, Gettleman, 1.21M) details the "desolation and despair" present in eastern Sudan. "What is different about the crisis … is that few outside organizations are paying attention. While there are an estimated 25,000 aid workers in Darfur, the war-ravaged region on the other side of the country that has become the focus of a ceaseless flurry of diplomatic activity, here in Togley there are not even plastic tarps for the huts." The Times calls eastern Sudan the "forgotten Sudan, an intriguing, isolated, sun-blasted corner of the country where a conservative culture and a slow-burning war have conspired to keep the people mired in neglect despite the area's port and oil riches." Despite an October 14 ceasefire, "the neglect will take years to reverse. Eastern Sudan, which encompasses roughly 180,000 square miles and nearly four million people, is the poorest part of the country, with the highest infant mortality rate and a per capita income in some areas of 25 cents a day, a small fraction of the national average." The Times adds, "One of the reasons that the east has largely gone unnoticed is that the scale of fighting could never compete with the conflicts in Darfur or southern Sudan." However, "the east is increasingly vital to the nation, home to gold mines and the country's major oil pipeline and port."

UN Forces Free Mobutu's Son Ahead Of Congolese Vote. The New York Times (10/28, Gettleman, 1.21M) reports, "United Nations forces plunged into Congo's election-related violence again on Friday, this time rescuing a politician who had been kidnapped by rivals. … All across Kinshasa, United Nations troops are hunkered down behind sandbags or prowling the garbage-strewn streets in armored personnel carriers bristling with machine guns and water cannons." The Times notes an "increasingly edgy atmosphere in the prelude to the runoff presidential election scheduled for" tomorrow. Yesterday, UN forces negotiated the release of Nzanga Mobutu, son of former dictator Mobutu Sese Seko, who had been detained by soldiers loyal to challenger Jean-Pierre Bemba because he had been campaigning for President Joseph Kabila's reelection. "Both camps accuse each other of intimidating voters," and, the Times says, "the country has had a dismal political history." Kabila is favored to win reelection after garnering 45 percent in the first round.

DOJ_NMG_0088342

The AP (10/27) adds Mobutu was "evacuated from a town where he was held captive overnight by forces loyal to the opposition." His detention "increased tensions ahead of Sunday's runoff."

Ethiopian, Eritrean Forces Could Widen Somali Conflict. The Washington Post/AP (10/28, A10) cites a recent United Nations report claiming that "thousands of Ethiopian and Eritrean troops are in Somalia, backing opposing sides in the struggle for control of the country… The involvement of the two rivals could set the stage for a regional war." The report is quoted saying, "Both sides in the Somali conflict are reported to have major outside backers -- the government supported by Ethiopia, Uganda and Yemen; the Islamic courts receiving aid from Iran, Libya, Saudi Arabia and Gulf States." The Post says the two sides "have been girding for battle for weeks," and the document "was written to help U.N. officials map a strategy on aid to" Somalia. The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Tomlinson) runs a version of the AP story, noting, "Ethiopia and Eritrea fought a two-year border war that remains unresolved. The top U.S. diplomat to Africa, Jendayi Frazer, last week accused Eritrea of using Somalia to open a second front against Ethiopia. In Washington on Thursday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack called on Ethiopia and Eritrea not to further aggravate the situation."

China-Africa Summit Highlights Growing Economic Interdependence. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A2, Oster, 2.03M) reports, "Anyone wanting to find an African leader this coming week will need to book a ticket to Beijing." Forty-eight of Africa's 53 heads of state "will descend on the Chinese capital for the biggest gathering of foreign leaders Beijing has ever hosted. The three-day summit will highlight a mushrooming trade relationship between the world's most populous country and its second-biggest continent that is stirring angst among some in Washington." While China had a "modern presence in Africa" for strategic reasons during the Cold War, more recently its "focus has changed to acquiring natural resources to fuel China's galloping economy."

Lithuania Learns About Kremlin Oil Game The Hard Way. The New York Times (10/28, Kramer, 1.21M) writes, "The Russian government has never been straightforward about its plans to take control of the oil and gas business. So, Lithuanians were suspicious when Russia said it shut its pipeline -- the only one supplying Russian crude oil -- in late July because of a leak." But it was "not so much the pipeline the Russians were concerned about" as what the "pipeline was connected to: Lithuania's sole refinery. And because Russia often gets what it wants, it may not matter that the Lithuanian government had signed an agreement in June to sell the refinery to a Polish company, PKN Orlen, for much more than Russia had offered." An analyst said, "The goal was to force Lithuania to reconsider the sale. They wanted a Russian company to buy the refinery, but for cheaper than a market price." The Times says Lithuania's "brush with Kremlin oil politics, critics of Russian business practices say, is a case study of what Vice President Dick Cheney called Moscow's use of energy exports as 'tools for intimidation and blackmail' in relations with its neighbors."

WPost Optimistic About Resolution Of Central Europe's Political Woes. The Washington Post (10/28, A14, 748K) examines the "dismal political picture" in four formerly Communist EU states --the Czech Republic, Hungary, Poland, and Slovakia – but says the "gloom seems overstated. Despite the political malaise, Central European countries are flourishingly economically, and their abundant workers and hungry entrepreneurs promise to revive Europe as a whole. The rise of populist and nationalist parties is in part a reaction to years of enforced consensus under previous governments" that were trying to meet EU entry criteria. But as Russia "grows ever more aggressive toward its neighbors, the former Soviet satellites will probably respond by burrowing more deeply into the European Union and NATO."

Senegal President Urges World Attention To Africa's High Oil Prices. In a Washington Post (10/28, A15, 748K) op-ed, Senegal President Abdoulaye Wade writes, :Although gasoline prices have dropped recently in the United States, many Americans continue to worry about the toll of oil dependence at the gas pump and on the U.S. economy. As an African, I feel their pain -- and then some. While the price of a barrel of crude has recently dipped below $60, oil still costs twice as much as it did three years ago -- and experts fully expect the price to climb higher. President Bush, a one-time oilman, has warned Americans about the danger of a country's being 'addicted to oil.' Yet the toll of oil dependence in the United States pales beside the pain that soaring oil prices cause in Africa. … If the price of crude oil reaches $100 a barrel within the next year -- as some analysts predict -- a pan-African disaster will be upon us." President Wade says it is "in the interest not only of America but also the petroleum industry not to have an Africa in ruins."

DOJ_NMG_0088343

Suez Crisis Marked Start Of Intense US Intervention In Middle East. In a New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) op-ed, Boston University Professor of History and International Relations David Fromkin reflects on the 50th anniversary of the Suez Crisis, calling it "a divide in the history of the Middle East. It was the moment when America pushed out the Europeans and then tried to take their place -- and the reverberations are still felt today."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"'Devil Winds' Stoke Fatal Fire."
"Flames Ambush Man 'Who Could Do Anything.'"
"No Easy Answer To 'Kurdish Question.'"
"Getty Toughens Up Its Rules For Acquisition."
"A County Of Bad Ol' Boys."

New York Times:
"Democrats Get Late Donations From Business."
"Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want To Hear."
"Bloomberg, Seeing A Soul Mate, Sends Troops To Help Lieberman."
"New York Bets On High-Tech To Aid Upstate."
"Burst Of Wind-Driven Flames Engulfed Firefighters."
"In Clean Politics, Flesh Is Pressed, Then Sanitized."

Washington Post:
"In Baghdad, A Sudden Chance To Play."
"Housing Slump Slows Economy."
"Ballot Issues Could Rally Liberal Base."
"Taking Terror Fight To N. Africa Leads U.S. To Unlikely Alliances."
"Allen Blasts Webb Novels."
"Marathoner Is Taking A Journey Of The Sole."

Washington Times:
"U.S., Iraq Affirm 'Good, Strong' Ties."
"DNC Wooing Black Voters."
"Coca Growers Resist Bolivia Crackdown."
"Housing Slows Economic Growth."
"Suit Against Air Force Academy Dismissed."
"Ethiopian's Trial Focuses On Female Circumcision."
"Webb Hit For Novels' Sex-Laced Language."

Detroit Free Press:
"Dream Over."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Death And Redemption."
"End Of Line For Ford In Hapeville."
"Dash For Bargains Starts At Midnight After Thanksgiving."
"Perdue Failed To Disclose Land Buy Near Prized Tract."

Dallas Morning News:
"Black Radio Turns Up The Volume."
"Activists Putting Heat On Barton."
"In Smoke And Flames, They Disappeared."
"Audit: KBR Too Secretive."
"Family: Nanny's Note Exonerates Widow."

Houston Chronicle:
"Audit: KBR Hid Data On Its Work In Iraq."
"Write-Ins May Make For A Long Election Night."
"U.S. Journalist Slain In Mexico."
"Threatened Frogs Are VIPs For Hotel — And Houston Zoo."
"Green Tea Shows Promise In HIV Fight."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Wildfire Still Raging; Economy And The Housing Market; Marine Corps Marathon Honors Loss of Soldiers; Scharzenegger As The Comeback Kid; Captain Rye Barcott, Person Of The Week.
CBS: Palm Springs Wildfires; Firefighter Deaths; Mudslinging Virginia Senate Campaign; Voters Views On The Economy; A Look At Stem Cell Research; Gallaudet Protests; Prison Fashion Statement.
NBC: North Korea; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Hawaii Earthquake; Houston Flooded; Legislators Under Fire; Stock Market; Population Growth-Nevada; Gas Prices; Lawyer In The Family; School Bands Of New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0088344

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — 1 p.m. Attends Sodrel for Congress and Indiana Victory 2006 rally, Silver Creek High School, Sellersburg, Ind. 5:55 p.m. Attends RNC dinner, The Sanctuary at Kiawah Island, South Carolina.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY -- No public schedule.

US Senate: No scheduled events.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: POLITICAL MANAGEMENT-OAS _ 9 a.m. - 6 p.m. Josi Miquel Insulza, Secretary General of the Organization of American States, delivers keynote address at GWU's "International Seminar of Political Communication and Marketing for Governments." Location: Morton Auditorium, 805 21st St. NW. Contacts: Wendy Carey, 202-994-3087

PECK AWARDS-SCHLESINGER-PANETTA _ 10 a.m. Smithsonian holds two town hall sessions with 2006 Paul Peck Presidential Award winners: former White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta and author Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. Location: Nan Tucker McEvoy Auditorium, National Portrait Gallery, 8th and F streets N.W. Contacts: Lauren Hassel, 202-275-1768.

KASHMIR'S FUTURE _ 6:30 p.m. - 9 p.m. Georgetown University and the Kashmiri American Council hold forum on "Kashmir: Future Approaches." With speakers from Christians and Muslims for Peace; University of San Francisco; Embassy of Pakistan, others. Location: GWU, Marvin Center, 800 21st St. NW. Contacts: Farhat Ali Zaidi, 202-243-6500 ext 2005

BRIAN LAMB-HELEN THOMAS _ 7 p.m. C-SPANs Brian Lamb receives the Helen Thomas Award for Excellence in Journalism from the American News Womens Club. Award will be presented by Thomas and CBS' Bob Schieffer. Location: Fairmont Hotel, 2401 M St. NW. Contacts: Karen James Cody, 202-452-4169

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0088345

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Judge Sets Schedule For Hearing Detainee Suits 3
Cheney Clarifies Comments Regarding "Dunking" Detainees 3
Albany Terror Case Informant Sentenced To Time Served For License Fraud 4
Hamid Hayat Lawyers Seek New Trial, Citing Juror Misconduct .. 4
US Counterterrorism Strategy In North Africa Questioned 4

Patriot Act:
ACLU Drops Legal Challenge To Patriot Act 4

Homeland Response:
Chertoff Discusses Border Security Activities 5
TSA Delays Deadline For Baggage Handlers' Background Checks 6
Suspicious Powder Found In Letter Addressed To Bill Clinton Office 6
FBI Agents Teach Oklahoma First Responders About Homemade Bombs 6
Grad Student's Fake Boarding Pass Web Site Prompts Visit From FBI 6
Bloomberg Expands Search For Human Remains Near WTC Site 6
Congress Urged To Curb Suits Against Third Parties Arising From Terrorist Incidents 7

War News:
Maliki, Khalilzad Publicly Pledge Continued Cooperation 7
US Continues Search For Abducted Soldier In Baghdad 7
US Citizen Will Not Yet Be Turned Over For Iraqi Death Sentence 8
Report Says Halliburton Subsidiary Abuses Federal Regulations. 8
Kurdish President Says Iraq Must Decide Partition Issue 8
King Criticizes State Of Iraqi Leadership 8
Bush, NATO Secretary-General Discuss Taliban's Use Of Human Shields 8

Corporate Scandals:
Orbital Sciences Corp To Restate Earnings After Finding Misdated Options 9
SEC Queries JP Morgan Over Bisys-One Group Link 9
Former Computer Associates CEO Awaits Sentencing 10
Cooperating With US To Catch Big Fish Pays Off For Corporate Small Fry 10

Criminal Law:
Safavian Sentenced To Eighteen Months In Prison 10
House Ethics Committee Will Not Release Foley Report Before Elections 11
Longtime Illinois Political Fundraiser Pleads Guilty In Kickback Probe 11
Four Convicted In Honolulu Airport Contract Fraud Conspiracy . 11
DOJ Cancels Faith-Based Prison Rehabilitation Program 12
SCOTUS To Rule On Police Officers' Responsibility During High-Speed Chases 12
Two New York Men Seek New Trial Over Courtroom Chaos 12
New York Officials Rule Homicide In Baby Girl's Death 12
Malvo Confesses To Killing Of Arizona Golfer 13
Judge Denies Bond For Florida Cuban Spying Suspect 13
FBI Puts Wyoming Agents In Charge Of Beauprez Ad Probe 13
Pataki Chooses Former Federal Prosecutor For Havesi Probe .. 13
Doolittle Faces Voters With Uncertain Legal Fate 14
New York Man Pleads Guilty To Managing Prostitution Ring 14
US Charges Florida Man In Online Hacking Plot 14
Puerto Rico Jury Spares Convicted Murderer From Death Penalty 15
FBI Mulls Probe Of Rep Porter Over Fundraising Calls 15
Man Admits Louisiana Murders Before Being Executed In Florida 15
New York Judge Sentences Mafia Figure To Life For Two Murders 15

Civil Law:
Lawsuit Over Promotion Of Christianity At USAF Academy Thrown Out 16

Civil Rights:
Drifter Sought In Probe Of DC Hate Graffiti 16
DA Charges 11 In Orange County Voter Registration Fraud Probe 16
DOJ Official Meets With Lake Charles, LA, Residents Over Police Shooting 17
Indianapolis Police Union Alleges Recruitment Bias 17
Mississippi Voters May Be Left Out Of Election 17
New Jersey Same-Sex Couples Consider Personal Economic Impact Of Ruling 17

Student Criticizes Conservative Activist's "Academic Bill Of Rights." ... 18

Antitrust:

Private Equity Funds Bid For Tribune Company ... 18
Google Takes Advertising Plans To Madison Avenue ... 19
Arcelor Mittal Takes Stake In Noble ... 19
FCC Sets November 3 Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal ... 19
Smithfield Gambles On Merger While Foes Fight Expansion ... 19
Becton, Dickinson Wins FTC Approval For TriPath Deal ... 20

Environment:

9th Circuit Halts Stryker Activity In Hawaii ... 20
Firefighters Continue To Combat California Fire That Has Already Killed Four ... 20
Religious Groups Oppose Controversial Appalachian Mining Practices ... 21
NYTimes Urges Administration To Expand Flu Vaccine Production ... 21

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Montana Man Sentenced To Probation For Firearms Violations 21
Federal Agents Were Planning Raid Of California DA's Home Before His Death ... 22
Maryland Man Pleads Guilty To Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot ... 22

Tax:

NYTimes Concerned About "Political Motivation" In IRS Collection Delay ... 22

Congress-Administration:

Rangel Says Democrats Will Not Roll Back Bush Tax Cuts ... 23
White House Reportedly Trimming 2008 Army Budget Request 23
Rice Said To Rely On Zelikow To Provide Policy Alternatives ... 23

Other News:

Slow GDP Growth Blamed On Weak Housing Market ... 23
Gasoline Prices Expected To Rise Over The Next Week ... 25
Campaigns Turn Increasingly Nasty As Parties Joust For Control ... 25
Allen Camp Hits Webb Over Explicit Passages In His Novels ... 27
Unlike 2004, Values Issues Not On Ohio's Radar This Year ... 28
Steele's Pediatrician Sister Defends Him On Stem Cells In TV Ad ... 28
Bloomberg Lends Campaign Operatives To Lieberman ... 28
Whitehouse Leads Chafee By 10 Points In Rasmussen Poll ... 28
Corker Leads Ford By One Point In Rasmussen Poll ... 29
Talent Leads McCaskill By Two Points In Rasmussen Poll ... 29
Santorum Says He Is "Running Full-Tilt." ... 29
In Indiana, Local Issues Hurting GOP House Candidates ... 29
Kuhl Facing Tough Contest In Usually GOP-Solid NY29 ... 29
Ballot Measures Could Boost Democrats This Year ... 29
"Rising Star" Obama Swings Through Los Angeles ... 30
Schwarzenegger Seen As Having Made Big Comeback ... 30
Perry Leads Bell By 11 Points In Texas Gubernatorial Poll ... 30
Faso Ad Blasts Spitzer Over Ties To Hevesi ... 30
Hand Sanitizer Becomes A Must On The Campaign Trail ... 30
Court To Hear Appeal From Parents Of Autistic Child ... 31
Bill Clinton Plans Birthday-Weekend Fundraisers For His Causes ... 31
Dixie Chicks Documentary Garners Free Publicity From Networks ... 31
Los Angeles Clergy Sex Abuse Cases Settled For $10 Million ... 31
South Korean Media Cite "Activity" At North Korean Nuclear Site31
Tehran Confirms Uranium Enrichment Underway In Second Cascade ... 32
Rice Says Hezbollah Must Disarm To Join Lebanese Politics ... 32
US Ambassador Said To Manage Difficult Portfolio In Caracas . 32
Bogota Undergoing Renaissance After Years Of Chaos ... 32
Indigenous Supporters Turn Against Bolivia's Morales Over Coca Policy ... 32
Pilots' Lawyer Says Brazilian Controllers Approved Altitude Before Fatal Crash ... 33
Paris Deploys Extra Police To Stem Rash Of Bus Burnings ... 33
Abe Veers Toward Center In First Month As Japan's Prime Minister ... 33
Sri Lankan Government To Meet With Tamil Tigers Today ... 34
Pronk Will Remain In Sudan Envoy Job Through December ... 34
UN Forces Free Mobutu's Son Ahead Of Congolese Vote ... 34
Ethiopian, Eritrean Forces Could Widen Somali Conflict ... 34
China-Africa Summit Highlights Growing Economic Interdependence ... 35
Lithuania Learns About Kremlin Oil Game The Hard Way ... 35
WPost Optimistic About Resolution Of Central Europe's Political Woes ... 35
Senegal President Urges World Attention To Africa's High Oil Prices ... 35
Suez Crisis Marked Start Of Intense US Intervention In Middle East ... 35

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 35

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington ... 36

DOJ_NMG_0088347

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Sets Schedule For Hearing Detainee Suits. The AP (10/28) reports, "A federal judge Friday set the stage for the next push by the Bush administration to get all the lawsuits by detainees at Guantanamo Bay thrown out of U.S. courts." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge James Robertson laid out a five-week schedule for the Justice Department and lawyers for Salim Ahmed Hamdan to file written arguments in the detainee's challenge to his confinement. … Hundreds of other detainees also are challenging their detentions in lawsuits." The AP adds, "It was a challenge by lawyers for Hamdan, Osama bin-Laden's former driver, that led to the Supreme Court ruling in June striking down the Bush administration's plan for military commission trials. … The new Military Commissions Act, which President Bush signed on Oct. 17, strips U.S. courts of jurisdiction to hear the detainees' challenges to their indefinite detentions. Hamdan's lawyers say the new provision is 'of doubtful constitutionality.' … Ten days ago, the Justice Department filed a copy of the new law with the court in Hamdan's case. Robertson said in a one-page order the Justice Department filing 'is deemed to be a motion to dismiss' Hamdan's case."

Cheney Clarifies Comments Regarding "Dunking" Detainees. The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 4, 0:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There was additional controversy today about comments Vice President Dick Cheney made to a conservative talk radio host this week. The radio host made a reference to dunking terrorists in water which a lot of people took as a reference to the interrogation technique called 'water boarding' which is viewed around the world as a form of torture." Host: "Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" Cheney: "Well, it's a no-brainer for me, but for a while there I was criticized as being the Vice President for torture. We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in. We live up to our obligations." NBC: "White House spokesman Tony Snow said today the Vice President was not referring to water boarding."

The Washington Post (10/28, A2, Eggen, 748K), in an article titled, "Cheney Defends 'Dunk In The Water' Remark: Addressing Alarm Over the Comment, Vice President Says He Was Not Referring to Waterboarding," reports Vice President Cheney "said yesterday that he was not referring to an interrogation technique known as 'waterboarding' when he told an interviewer this week that dunking terrorism suspects in water was a 'no-brainer.' Cheney told reporters aboard Air Force Two last night that he did not talk about any specific interrogation technique during his interview Tuesday with a conservative radio host. 'I didn't say anything about waterboarding. … He didn't even use that phrase,' Cheney said on a flight to Washington from South Carolina." According to the Post, "The comments were aimed at calming a growing furor over Cheney's comments, which were taken by many human rights advocates and legal experts as an endorsement of waterboarding as a method of questioning. … 'Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?' Scott Hennen of WDAY in Fargo, N.D., asked Cheney on Tuesday. 'Well, it's a no-brainer for me,' Cheney responded. Cheney also said he agreed with Hennen that the debate over interrogation techniques was 'a little silly,' and he praised the information obtained from U.S. terrorism suspects during questioning."

Snow Fends Off "Waterboarding" Questions. The New York Times (10/28, Lewis, 1.21M) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "said Mr. Cheney was not endorsing water-boarding." Snow "said Mr. Cheney was not, in fact, referring to any technique, whether it was torture or not, because administration officials do not discuss interrogation methods. President Bush was also confronted by reporters about Mr. Cheney's comments as he made a joint appearance with Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, the secretary general of NATO. 'This country does not torture; we're not going to torture,' Mr. Bush said, without referring directly to Mr. Cheney or his comments." Snow, "who spent much of his day dealing with questions about the comments, told reporters that none of them related to interrogation techniques, which are classified. 'I'm telling you what the vice president's view is, which is it wasn't about waterboarding. Period,' he said." The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Gerstenzang, 918K) reports that when "asked what 'dunk in water' was referring to if not water-boarding…Snow said, 'I will let you draw your own conclusions, because you clearly have.'"

Human Rights Activists Blast Cheney. The AP (10/27) reports, "Human rights groups complained that Cheney's comments amounted to an endorsement of water boarding, in which the victim believes he is about to drown." Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, "said in a statement, 'What's really a no-brainer is that no U.S. official, much less a vice president, should champion torture. Vice President Cheney's advocacy of water boarding sets a new human rights low at a time when human rights is already scraping the bottom of the Bush administration barrel.'" BBC.co (10/28) reports president Bush "has reiterated his position that the US administration does not condone torture, following comments by Vice President Dick Cheney. … The BBC's Matt Wells in Washington says Mr Cheney's comment was made on Tuesday but only came to light on Friday, exacerbated by a stormy and confrontational White House press briefing."

DOJ_NMG_0088348

Albany Terror Case Informant Sentenced To Time Served For License Fraud. The Albany Times-Union (10/28, Lyons) reported, "A Pakistani immigrant whose own crimes led him to serve as an FBI informant in an Albany-based counterterrorism sting walked out of federal court a free man Friday after a judge sentenced him to time served in consideration for his years of undercover work." Shahed Hussain "talked briefly outside court with his longtime FBI handler, Special Agent Timothy Coll, then quickly left the courthouse without commenting to reporters. Hussain's own legal problems began about five years ago when he was arrested in an FBI fraud investigation that was launched shortly after the 9/11 attacks." He "has since been credited with helping the FBI arrest more than a dozen people, including the people involved in the DMV scandal," in which he was arrested, "and a member of an Afghani-based heroin trafficking ring." The AP (10/28) noted that Hussain "had acknowledged cooperating with the FBI in hopes of reducing his sentence after his arrest for helping about 80 immigrants fraudulently obtain state drivers' licenses in Albany. … Hussain's credibility was an issue in the mosque case, where a jury found imam Yassin Aref and Albany pizzeria owner Mohammed Hossain guilty of money laundering in support of terrorism."

Hamid Hayat Lawyers Seek New Trial, Citing Juror Misconduct. The AP (10/28) reported, "Attorneys for a Lodi man convicted this spring by a federal jury of supporting terrorists have asked a judge to grant a new trail after reports of juror misconduct. In a 106-page motion filed Friday, Hamid Hayat's lawyers said reports of 'extensive misconduct' by jury foreman Joseph Cote demand court review." Defense attorneys Wazhma Mojaddidi and Dennis Riordan "cited reports by juror Alicia Lopez and Theresa Berkeley-Simmons that Cote used racial slurs during the trail, including saying that Pakistanis or Muslims all 'look alike' if dressed the same. They also pointed to an Atlantic magazine interview that Cote gave after the trial where he said he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for the London subway bombings." The AP added that Hayat's lawyers also "said U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr., should have allowed a retired FBI agent to testify about the bureau's interview procedures. They said James Wedick…would have revealed the inappropriateness of Hayat's confession."

US Counterterrorism Strategy In North Africa Questioned. The Washington Post (10/28, A1, Whitlock, 748K), in an front-page article titled, "Taking Terror Fight To N. Africa Leads U.S. To Unlikely Alliances," reports, "Locked in a prison here [Algiers], for now, is a desert bandit dubbed the 'Bin Laden of the Sahara,' whose capture was secretly orchestrated by U.S. forces." Amari Saifi, "a former Algerian army paratrooper, was caught in 2004 after he and a band of rebel fighters kidnapped 32 European tourists in the Algerian Sahara and ransomed them for about $6 million. Since then, the U.S. government has cited his case as a model for terrorist-hunting operations and a justification for expanding U.S. military, diplomatic and intelligence programs in North Africa." However, according to the Post, "A close examination of how Saifi was apprehended…highlights the quandaries facing the United States. … In its search for allies in an unstable region, the U.S. government reached out to Libya…and to other countries it has condemned for abusing human rights. Some security analysts and European counterterrorism officials question the U.S. strategy." The Post adds, "Regardless of Saifi's fate, U.S. officials say they consider North Africa an increasingly strategic front. … Together, the Defense and State departments are devoting $500 million to new counterterrorism programs in the region. Last year, the Pentagon sponsored Operation Flintlock. … About 700 U.S. Special Forces personnel trained troops from nine African nations, leading a war game that mirrored the effort to hunt down Saifi a year earlier."

PATRIOT ACT:

ACLU Drops Legal Challenge To Patriot Act. The AP (10/28, Irwin) reports, "The American Civil Liberties Union on Friday dropped a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act." The AP continues, "The ACLU said it was withdrawing the lawsuit filed more than three years ago because of 'improvements to the law.' The Justice Department argued last month that amendments approved by Congress in March 2006 had corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act. … 'While the reauthorized Patriot Act is far from perfect, we succeeded in stemming the damage from some of the Bush administration's most reckless policies,' Ann Beeson, associate legal director of the ACLU in New York, said in a written statement." The AP adds, "The lawsuit, filed in July 2003 on behalf of the Muslim Community Association of Ann Arbor and five other nonprofit groups, was the first legal challenge to Section 215, the part of the Patriot Act that lets federal agents obtain such things as library records and medical information. … The ACLU said the revisions allow people receiving demands for records to consult with a lawyer and challenge the demands in court." The AP notes, "The Justice Department, which first asked that the lawsuit be dismissed in December 2003, said it was pleased by the ACLU's action, which was contained in a one-paragraph notice filed with U.S. District Judge Denise Page Hood in Detroit. … 'We ... reiterate that the Patriot Act is a legitimate and important tool that has better helped law enforcement fight terrorism while simultaneously protecting our valued civil liberties,' Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said."

DOJ_NMG_0088349

The Detroit News (10/28, Cardenas) reports, "The ACLU originally filed the suit against the government on behalf of a coalition of groups that argued that Section 215 of the Patriot Act passed in October 2001 was unconstitutional because it gave wide and secret investigative powers to federal agents to obtain books, records, papers, documents, e-mails and even a DNA sample without notifying the targeted person or group. … The suit was withdrawn on Friday after Congress revised the Patriot Act in March to allow those who receive a demand for records to consult with a lawyer and challenge the demand in court. … 'While the reauthorized Patriot Act is far from perfect, we succeeded in stemming the damage from some of the Bush administration's most reckless policies,' said Ann Beeson, ACLU's associate legal director, in a statement. … 'The ACLU will continue to monitor how the government applies the broad Section 215 power and we will challenge unconstitutional demands on a case-by-case basis,' Beeson said."

Local Television. Many local television networks reported that the ACLU dropped its lawsuit challenging the Patriot Act due to recent improvements to the law. Some examples: WJRT-TV Flint, (10/28, 7:01 a.m.) broadcasted, "The American Civil Liberties Union says it's dropping a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act. The ACLU says it's withdrawn the lawsuit because of improvements to the anti-terrorism law. Justice Department lawyers argued that amendments approved by congress in March had corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act."

WZZM-TV Grand Rapids, (10/28, 11:22 p.m.) broadcasted, "Civil Liberties Union has dropped a lawsuit challenging the 'Patriot Act.' The ACLU says it's withdrawing the lawsuit because of improvements to anti-terrorism laws. The lawsuit was filed back in 2003 on behalf of the Muslim Community Association of Ann Arbor and five other groups. It was the first legal challenge of the 'Patriot Act' that lets federal agents obtain things like library records and medical information." 'WJBK-TV Detroit, (10/28, 8:32 a.m.) broadcasted, "The American Civil Liberties union is dropping its challenge of the Patriot Act in the United States. They filed three years ago on behalf of Muslim and Arab American groups. It challenged the law that let people get personal information. They said they would drop lawsuit because the government made improvements to the act."

KPRC-TV Houston, (10/28, 9:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "The American Civil Liberties Union is dropping its lawsuit, challenging the Patriot Act. The ACLU says recent 'improvements' make the lawsuit unnecessary."

WSBT-TV South Bend, (10/28, 8:33 a.m.) broadcasted, "The Justice Department argued last month that amendments approved by Congress corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Discusses Border Security Activities.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff appeared on Fox News (10/27, MacCallum) to discuss border security. He said in part, "We've put more fencing up, we've deployed a lot more Border Patrol, and we've put the National Guard in place. We've seen a reversal in the momentum. The numbers of people coming across that we're seeing entering illegally is now beginning to decline. That doesn't mean we can declare victory, but it means we've finally turned the corner and we're moving in the right direction. What it is going to require is persistent application of resources. We're going to have to use these high-tech tools. We're going to have to put up the fencing, particularly in those areas where it's easier for people to get to a trafficked road or a bus station or something like that, because we need to slow them up."

Government Computer News (10/28, Hostetler) reports, "As the United States faces threats from weapons of mass destruction—radiological, chemical, biological or nuclear—as well as high-consequence international and homegrown plots, the Homeland Security Department is working with state, local, federal and international law enforcement to defend the country from terrorism." GCN continues, "Homeland Security secretary Michael Chertoff said stopping domestic terrorism threats is best done through shared intelligence, starting at the local level. To ensure that this coordination and collaboration happens, DHS will establish fusion centers, stocked with experts, and will work to grant clearance of classified information more quickly. … Both initiatives are part of the department's effort to take its relationships with major city police chiefs and information sharing to the next level, Chertoff said at the annual International Association of Chiefs of Police conference in Boston last week." GCN adds, "DHS plans to have 20 fusion centers by the end of the fiscal year and up to 35 fusion centers by the end of the next fiscal year. They have already invested $380 million in state-run fusion centers. Some states that have fusion centers include Colorado, Illinois, Maryland and New York. … The Justice Department has issued regulations for the fusion centers. … The agency will also work toward speeding up and broadening the clearance process."

Dobbs Says Mexico Threatening US Security. At the start of CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (10/27), host Dobbs said,

DOJ_NMG_0088350

"Just one day after President Bush signed legislation here in Washington to build a border fence, the government of Mexico is threatening the sovereignty and national security of the United States. President Vicente Fox and President-Elect Felipe Calderon are both asserting that the United States has no right to build such a fence along our southern border. At the same time, the White House and its allies in corporate America appear determined to create a new North American union, incorporating Canada, Mexico, and the United States. Such a union would, in effect, create a giant nation, including those three countries."

TSA Delays Deadline For Baggage Handlers' Background Checks. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, 918K) reports the Transportation Security Administration "has rolled back the deadlines for criminal-background checks for tens of thousands of airline workers who handle cargo loaded onto passenger airplanes, saying the industry cannot meet the timetables. 'TSA has concluded that the regulated community will be unable to meet some deadlines in the air cargo final rule because of the large number of employees and agents subject to the requirements,' the agency said in a notice published this week. The rules were originally slated to go into effect from Oct . 23 to Dec. 1. They require background checks and security training for an estimated 50,000 workers employed by the airlines or by airline contractors handling cargo, said TSA spokesman Darrin Kayser. Under the new timetables, several deadlines have been pushed back as far as mid-2007."

Suspicious Powder Found In Letter Addressed To Bill Clinton Office. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) reports former President Clinton's Harlem office "was shut down yesterday afternoon after a woman in the office opened a letter and a suspicious white powder spilled out, the police said. The substance was later found to be nontoxic, but its discovery led the authorities to evacuate two floors of the building." The AP (10/28) reports Secret Service spokesman Eric Zahren "said a field test on the substance found it to be inert."

FBI Agents Teach Oklahoma First Responders About Homemade Bombs. The Oklahoman (10/28, Baldwin) reported, "Five dozen emergency first responders and bomb technicians throughout the state should be a little safer after learning about homemade bomb factories this week" at a "professional continuing education classes offered by the University of Central Oklahoma's newly created Institute for Forensic Science. Kirk Yeager, an FBI bomb expert, said, 'We want to give them an understanding about what they could run across so they can assess the situation and say that something isn't right.'" The Oklahoman noted that Yeager "has been involved in bombing investigations as far away as in Israel, Peru and Turkey," and he "said he shared his worldwide experiences because whatever trends are seen abroad could end up here in the United States." Another of the instructors, Oklahoma City FBI Special Agent Barry Black, said that "in the field, first responders in instances such as drug raids need to recognize the types of chemicals used to make the explosives."

Grad Student's Fake Boarding Pass Web Site Prompts Visit From FBI. WISH-TV Indianapolis (10/28, Perkins) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast Friday, "An IU student's research on airport security has landed him in hot water with federal investigators. He found a way to forge boarding passes, and then put the instructions online." Christopher Soghoian "says he wanted to show the Transportation Security Agency that anyone could find their way past a key line of defense. … Soghoian said anyone could make up a name. He insists airport workers will simply check for ID, scan the barcode at the gate, and let the ticket holder board the plane without any questions. Indiana Homeland Security chief Eric Dietz disagrees, 'Well, I think you can find a number of small loopholes, but you have to look at what it does to the overall system. It takes a piece approach as opposed to a system approach.'" Soghoian "says he's received at least one visit from the FBI and a congressman has called for his arrest."

In the Washington Post (10/28) "Security Fix" blog, Brian Krebs also wrote, "When I phoned Soghoian Friday evening, he abruptly ended our conversation shortly after it began by saying that two FBI agents were banging on his door asking to speak with him. A short time later, the tool he had posted on his site vanished. I later caught up with Soghoian in an online chat channel, but he was reluctant to say much before consulting an attorney. 'I had a conversion with the FBI tonight,' Soghoian told me. 'We agreed that the issue of boarding passes is important, but that my particular approach could be improved upon.' Wendy Osborne, a special agent with the FBI's Indianapolis field office, declined to discuss the matter, but said Soghoian was not arrested. 'We do take precautions when there are potential security problems in light of everything that's going on these days.'"

Bloomberg Expands Search For Human Remains Near WTC Site. The New York Times (10/28, Dunlap, 1.21M) reports, "The Bloomberg administration said yesterday that it would cast a net well beyond ground zero, from Broadway to the Hudson River, from the bottom of manholes to the top of nearby skyscrapers, in its search for human remains from Sept. 11, 2001."

DOJ_NMG_0088351

Congress Urged To Curb Suits Against Third Parties Arising From Terrorist Incidents. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (10/28, A7, 2.03M) Ted Frank, resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes, "Plaintiffs' attorneys are weaving creative legal theories to hold legitimate third parties liable for the intentional acts of terrorists. This friendly fire could end up doing almost as much financial damage as the terrorists themselves, with the lawyers getting rich in the process." Frank notes, "After 9/11, lawsuits would have bankrupted several corporate victims of the attacks were it not for a $7 billion, taxpayer-funded bailout of potential plaintiffs. Even so, several dozen claimants opted for litigation. Naturally, their lawyers have sued everyone from the airlines to Boeing to Motorola to New York City. Many of these cases are still in pre-trial proceedings. … If courts are not going to apply the antiterrorism laws sensibly, Congress should amend them to make clear that civil liability is limited to those who commit criminal acts of international terrorism, and those who aid and abet with specific intent to commit terror. Otherwise, terrorists can damage the global economy simply by inducing fratricidal litigation."

WAR NEWS:

Maliki, Khalilzad Publicly Pledge Continued Cooperation. ABC World News (10/27, story 3, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Overseas, in Iraq, the American ambassador and Iraq's Prime Minister issued a rare, joint statement today, after a week of public tensions between the two governments. Iraq said it is committed to a good and strong relationship with the U.S. Iraq also said there should be time lines, laying out steps Iraq must take to improve conditions there."

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Daragahi, 918K) reports that in "the latest example of tension between the two governments," Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "sharply criticized U.S. policy Friday during a private meeting with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, "pointing to America's failure to either reduce violence or give his government authority over security matters." He "criticized what he called the patronizing U.S. tone toward the Iraqi government and warned U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad to respect Iraq's sovereignty." This "stood in stark contrast with a joint public statement issued after the meeting," when "al-Maliki and the U.S. Embassy said they had agreed to unspecified 'timelines' to make tough political and security decisions on the country's future." Coming after "days of back-and-forth recriminations, the contrast between private criticism and the public statement brought into sharper focus a dispute that may have already undermined the Shiite-led government and increased friction between America and the country's majority sect." The "squabbling and confusion" is due to "prickly truths" - Al-Maliki's government has lost public backers, even as the U.S. government "has little choice but to back al-Maliki's Iranian-influenced Shiite government."

The New York Times (10/28, Burns, 1.21M) reports, "With recent events in Iraq causing growing strains between the Bush administration and the Iraqi government, the two governments issued a tautly worded statement through the American Embassy in Baghdad on Friday renewing their commitment to work together for peace and security in Iraq." The Times adds, "The dispute over benchmarks reflects a deeper divide between the religious Shiite parties and the Americans, who were once seen by the Shiites as a partner in wresting power from the Sunni minority through elections."

The Washington Post (10/28, A11, Anderson, 748K) mentions the announcement towards the end of a story focusing on the hunt for an abducted US soldier. The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Hurst) also covers this story.

Violence Sees Lull In Baghdad. In a front page article, the Washington Post (10/28, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports, "For the people of Baghdad, death took something of a holiday this week. By Thursday, U.S. and Iraqi military commanders were staring at murder rates that had fallen by half since Monday." Explanations could include the week long slamic holiday Eid al-Fitr, or the "massive American operation" that "shut down some of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods" as they search for a missing soldier. Howver, "U.S. military officers played down the notion that their troops' increased operations and the sealing off of Sadr City had contributed to the drop in violence, saying it was a normal calm for Eid." Still, no one is "counting on the decline in killing to continue."

US Continues Search For Abducted Soldier In Baghdad. The Washington Post (10/28, A11, Anderson, 748K) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi forces returned to Sadr City on Friday to search the Shiite Muslim slum for a missing U.S. soldier," who was abducted while visiting relatives, "occasionally engaging in gun battles with members of local militias during their hunt." The "U.S. and Iraqi forces have conducted an intense hunt across Baghdad, searching cars at checkpoints, going door to door and raiding areas where they think he might be held." According to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, "the soldier's brother was kidnapped with him but had been released.." Analysts say "that rogue units of the" Mahdi Army militia may no longer be under Moqtada al-Sadr's control, "and Maliki said in the interview that some Sunnis now operate in the name of the Mahdi Army." He added, "we don't know what the Mahdi Army means anymore."

DOJ_NMG_0088352

US Citizen Will Not Yet Be Turned Over For Iraqi Death Sentence. The Washington Post/AP (10/28, A6) reports that .S. District Judge Royce Lamberth ruled that Mohammad Munaf, a U.S. citizen who was sentenced to death by an Iraqi court for "helping in the 2005 kidnapping of three Romanian journalists in Baghdad" is not to be "handed over by the U.S. military until the Supreme Court hears his case, a federal appeals court ruled yesterday. Munaf "said his trial was flawed and his confession coerced." However, Judge Lamberth also "ruled that he has no authority to intervene," and "the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit also declined to step in." Therefore the wait will be only the "10 days to appeal to the Supreme Court and wait for it to rule before" the military turns Munaf over Iraqi officials.

Report Says Halliburton Subsidiary Abuses Federal Regulations. The Washington Post (10/28, D2, Witte, 748K) reports that a report released yesterday by Auditors for the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction found that Halliburton subsidiary KBR Inc. "is abusing federal regulations by marking nearly all information it gives to the government about its operations in Iraq 'proprietary,' a practice that promotes unnecessary secrecy and could hurt competition." The auditors also "concluded that the company's actions represent 'an abuse' of the Federal Acquisition Regulation." While Halliburton spokeswoman Cathy Mann said in a written response "that using the proprietary stamp was 'not only encouraged, but required' by the Army," the report says "Army officials are working on ways to get KBR to cut down on the practice."

The New York Times (10/28, Glanz, Norris, 1.21M) leads that KBR "systematically misused federal rules to withhold basic information on its practices from American officials." It "is the first time the federal government has weighed in and accused it of systematically engaging in a practice aimed at veiling its business practices in Iraq," and this report come "at a critical time for the company, as Halliburton is trying to spin off the subsidiary."

The Financial Times (10/28, Kirchgaessner) notes, "As a result of the investigation, army officials said they would prepare a modification to a multi-billion dollar Halliburton contract – known as Logcap – to 'provide guidance' to KBR on the marking of proprietary data."

Kurdish President Says Iraq Must Decide Partition Issue. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A6, Miller, 2.03M) reports on an interview with Massoud Barzani, the president of Kurdistan. He say "American forces are not 'occupiers' or the 'enemy,' but 'liberators.'" However, "having been both saved and betrayed by previous American governments, he knows the risks of tying Kurdish fortunes too closely to an administration facing public disenchantment with its Iraq policies." Still, "the secret of Kurdistan's relative success so far -- and of America's enduring popularity here -- is the officially unacknowledged fact that the three provinces of the Kurdish north are already quasi-independent," and "Washington's refusal to accept this self-evident political reality does not trouble Mr. Barzani." However, while "Having an independent state is the natural legitimate right of our people," Barazani adds that "the parliament of Kurdistan has decided to remain within a federal, democratic Iraq." On the fate of Iraq, he says "Only a voluntary union can work. Either you have federalism with Baghdad as a federal capital with a special status, or you have separation." Also, "he was clearly annoyed by a slight: The fact that the congressionally created Iraq Study Group…has not traveled to Kurdistan." On oil, "Barzani is willing to share revenues with Baghdad, the principle of control is vital to Kurdistan if it is to have an independent revenue stream."

King Criticizes State Of Iraqi Leadership. Colbert I. King writes in his column in the Washington Post (10/28, A15, 748K), "Frederick Jones, the NSC's communications director, said yesterday that no American official has ever met" Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, "Iraq's most powerful figure." This is because "Sistani has designated himself off-limits to Americans," who "he considers…infidels." This "reveals the extent to which the Bush administration is now, and always has been, out of its depth in Iraq." Today his "Shiites are the major political force in Iraq," and he, "according to Newsweek, forbids music for entertainment, dancing and playing chess, and forbids women from shaking the hands of any men other than their fathers, brothers or husbands. His whole purpose is to promote Shiite theology and keep Iraq as a democratic, but decidedly Islamic, state." Meanwhile, his "chief competition" is the "anti-American Shiite cleric, Moqtada al-Sadr," whose organization "infiltrated Iraqi military and police units" and to whose call the "Iraqi parliament, truth be told, responds." After "Billions spent, thousands of Americans dead or maimed, U.S. armed forces exhausted, stretched thin and working around the clock," was this "what George W. Bush had in mind?"

Bush, NATO Secretary-General Discuss Taliban's Use Of Human Shields. The Washington Times/AP (10/28) reports, "President Bush and NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer yesterday discussed how the Taliban has begun using Afghan civilians as human shields. In a meeting at the White House, Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said that he was saddened by recent deaths of Afghans and that the alliance is committed to defending democracy in the nation once ruled by the repressive Taliban regime." According to the White House, "the two leaders did not discuss NATO troop levels or the suspension of two German soldiers in connection with photographs of troops posing with human skulls."

DOJ_NMG_0088353

Mine In Afghan Road Kills 14, Wounds Three Civilians. The New York Times (10/28, Wafa, 1.21M) reports, "An explosion from a mine in a road on Friday killed 14 civilians and wounded three others in a suburb of the capital city in the southern province of Uruzgan," as the "group of elderly people, youths and children…were riding in a pickup truck toward the provincial capital, Trinkot, for the celebration of Id al-Fitr." According to a spokesman for the provincial governor, "the government was investigating whether the mine had been laid recently by suspected Taliban fighters or was left over from the Soviet invasion."

Photos Of Soldiers With Skulls "Rattles" German Military. The Washington Post (10/28, A9, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "A scandal over soldiers caught playing with human skulls has rattled the German military and prompted a reexamination of the country's growing role in global peacekeeping missions. German military officials said Friday that they had suspended two soldiers and were investigating several others suspected of desecrating skulls while serving in Afghanistan as part of a NATO-led force in 2003 and 2004. Photos of troops mocking the freshly unearthed skulls…have shocked many Germans since they were first published" and "more have surfaced daily." The incident "has led officials here to question whether Germany has fully digested the political and security risks involved in such assignments," even as "the images of German soldiers playing with human remains has led to public revulsion and inevitable comparisons to the horrors perpetrated under Nazi rule." However, as yet "there have been few calls for Germany to curtail its participation in Afghanistan or in other missions."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Orbital Sciences Corp To Restate Earnings After Finding Misdated Options. The Washington Post (10/28, D1, Hart) reports, "Orbital Sciences Corp., a Dulles maker of booster rockets and space systems for the government and military, yesterday joined the parade of companies that have disclosed problems in their compensation practices, saying an internal review found some misdated stock options." The Post continues, "The company said the review found no fraud or intentional misconduct in connection with the errors and that it would revise past financial statements. Most of the options in question were granted more than five years ago, said David W. Thompson, Orbital's chairman and chief executive. … 'Financial impacts are not material to the results for this year or for any prior period over the past five years,' he told investors in a conference call yesterday." The Post adds, "Orbital expects to record pretax costs of about $300,000 in 2006, $2.5 million between 2001 and 2005 and $11.5 million between 1990, when the company went public, and 2001. … Orbital joins more than 100 companies nationwide that have been investigated for the practice of backdating stock options, in which options are dated to a time when the stock price is lower so the profit is higher after the options are exercised. … Last week, SafeNet Inc., a Maryland information security firm, said certain options over the past six years were accounted for using incorrect dates. Minnesota-based UnitedHealth Group Inc., one of the largest managed health-care companies, is under investigation for backdating stock options. In both cases, the inquiries prompted executives to step down."

Private Law Firms Play Key Role In Options Probes. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A1, Bandler, Scannell) reports, "With more than 130 companies under federal scrutiny, the investigation into stock-option backdating has rapidly become one of the broadest corporate scandals in decades. It is so broad, in fact, that federal authorities can't possibly do thorough examinations of every company. … Instead, they outsource a big chunk of the job." The Journal continues, "Regulators and prosecutors are relying on suspect companies to investigate themselves by hiring outside law firms. The firms are supposed to hand over their findings to the Securities and Exchange Commission or federal prosecutors, who then use them to help decide which cases to pursue further. The feds often ask for any especially incriminating documents to be delivered in a handy folder they call a 'hot binder.' … That has long been a common practice for companies in potential legal trouble, partly because it can lead to leniency as reward for a self-examination well done. But not since the overseas bribery scandal of the 1970s have so many public corporations been in trouble at the same time. The federal investigation has enveloped icons of success like Apple Computer Inc., Home Depot Inc., giant insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc., and dozens of Silicon Valley companies." The Journal adds, "The mass exercise in self-policing already has produced some dramatic results. More than 40 executives or directors have resigned or been pushed out in the wake of internal probes that found options backdating problems. The most prominent is William McGuire, chief executive of UnitedHealth, who is leaving his post by Dec. 1. Outside lawyers hired by the company found evidence of rampant backdating of options that enriched him and other insiders. Dr. McGuire, who has said he did nothing improper, stands to lose more than $100 million alone after agreeing to reprice his options."

SEC Queries JP Morgan Over Bisys-One Group Link. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A3, Lauricella) reports, "J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. says it received an inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission relating to the relationship between Bisys Fund Services Inc. and One Group Funds, which the bank acquired as part of its 2004 purchase of Bank One Corp." The Journal continues, "The SEC is investigating a total of 27 mutual funds1 that it says may have accepted kickbacks totaling hundreds of millions of dollars in recent years, according to people familiar with the matter. AmSouth Bancorp of Birmingham, Ala., was the first to acknowledge possible charges last summer. The other 25 firms aren't known. J.P. Morgan acknowledged the inquiry in an interview, but declined to comment further." The Journal adds, "The probe stems from a $21.4 million settlement the SEC reached last month with Bisys Fund Services Inc., a unit of Bisys Group Inc., which provides back-office support to financial companies. … In the wake of the settlement, the SEC sent letters to some of the funds in question, asking for details about their relationships with Bisys, as well as asking whether the funds have undertaken internal reviews of the relationship and what sorts of information had been provided to fund board of directors about the Bisys relationship, according to people with knowledge of the letters."

DOJ_NMG_0088354

Former Computer Associates CEO Awaits Sentencing. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A2, Bulkeley) reports, "As one of the last chief executives to face sentencing for crimes committed in the stock-market-bubble era, Sanjay Kumar, who orchestrated a $2.2 billion accounting fraud as CEO of Computer Associates International Inc., goes before a federal judge in Brooklyn on Thursday -- the same day his former company reports second-quarter earnings." The Journal continues, "Mr. Kumar, 44 years old, who resigned his job in 2004, pleaded guilty to eight counts of securities fraud and obstruction of justice in April. At the end of many quarterly financial periods in the 1990s and 2000, Mr. Kumar helped sign and backdate contracts for big sales of corporate software in order to book the revenue and meet quarterly earnings projections in what prosecutors called '35-day months.' Once the Securities and Exchange Commission started investigating, Mr. Kumar lied to government agents and sent the corporate general counsel to Hawaii to bribe a potentially hostile witness, according to evidence filed in the case." The Journal adds, "U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser has broad discretion in sentencing. Two lawyers who have followed the case, but declined to be identified, said they think the most likely term would be eight to 12 years. However, if Judge Glasser orders sequential sentencing on each charge the term could be 90 years. … The likely jail sentence puts a sad end to the meteoric career of Mr. Kumar, who grew up in poverty after his family emigrated from Sri Lanka, and worked his way up to the lofty position and a $300 million stock award in 1999. .. .But the sentencing hasn't been the end of CA's problems. Since Mr. Kumar resigned in 2004, a few months before he was indicted, the company has changed its name to CA Inc., paid the SEC $225 million in fines and replaced most of its top executives, while operating under the oversight of a government-appointed examiner."

Cooperating With US To Catch Big Fish Pays Off For Corporate Small Fry. The AP (10/28, Gordon) reports, "Helping the government land the biggest fish has been paying off for the slightly smaller fry in the prosecution of high-profile corporate fraud by way of a yawning gap in their prison sentences." The AP continues, "Jeffrey Skilling, Enron Corp.'s former chief executive who became an embodiment of corporate corruption, was handed a 24-year-plus sentence on Monday. That was the toughest penalty by far in the catastrophic collapse of the energy giant. Skilling's one-time protege at the company, finance chief Andrew Fastow -- architect of the complex web of off-the-books partnerships that hid some $1 billion in debt -- received a six-year jail term in September after cooperating with the prosecutors and helping them secure Skilling's conviction." The AP adds, "The judge said Fastow deserved leniency because of his 'exceptional' cooperation with the government. … 'The lesson that comes out of the Enron sentences is that if ultimately you're facing criminal charges, it's fine to be high up in the company. Just don't be at the very top,' said Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who heads the white-collar defense practice at McCarter & English in Newark, N.J." The AP notes, "Prosecutors like to work from the bottom up, so for CEOs caught up in scandals, he said, 'There's nowhere to turn in the event of an indictment.' … Washed ashore by the wave of corporate scandals in recent years have been executive flippers who have cut deals, turning against and talking about their bosses who have taken their chances at trial. Chief executives are far more likely to go to trial, partly because of ego, the conviction they did nothing wrong, or because prosecutors are far less willing to cut a deal."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Safavian Sentenced To Eighteen Months In Prison. The Washington Post (10/28, A3, Schmidt, 748K) reports U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman sentenced David H. Safavian, "a former top Bush administration official, to 18 months in prison for lying and concealing unethical dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. During an unusual hearing that lasted much of the day, Friedman wrestled with how to mete out justice to Safavian. He said Safavian was a man who had 'pulled himself up by his bootstraps' and had been 'a very good person to a lot of people.' But, the judge said, Safavian also committed 'an abuse of the public trust' in his relationship with the lobbyist." Safavian, "a former chief of staff for the General Services Administration, wept as he told Friedman that he knows now he never should have given Abramoff inside information about government-owned real estate that the lobbyist wanted to acquire. At the time, Safavian said, he thought what he was doing was innocuous. 'I didn't see anything wrong in helping Jack,' he said." The Washington Times/AP (10/28) reports, "During his sentencing, Safavian apologized for giving the appearance of impropriety but said it was not fraudulent. 'Yes, Jack Abramoff was a friend, but he wasn't my co-conspirator and I wasn't his,' Safavian said. 'There was no conspiracy to defraud anyone, least of all the taxpayers.'" The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/28) reports Safavian said Abramoff "used and manipulated him and he never meant to hurt anyone."

DOJ_NMG_0088355

Government Executive (10/28, Mandel) reports, "The 18-month sentence fell halfway between the defense's recommendation that he serve between zero and 12 months, and a Justice Department recommendation for 30 to 37 months. D.C. District Judge Paul Friedman also declined to impose a fine along with prison time, based on a pre-sentencing report that found Safavian's finances ruined by legal fees. … 'I think since Mr. Safavian is going to serve some time in prison, to impose a fine is punishing Mrs. Safavian and perhaps other relatives,' Friedman said." GE adds, "The sentencing was complicated by questions of what guidelines should apply to each of the counts and potential adjustments to the term. Peter Zeidenberg, the lead prosecuting attorney, argued that the sentence should be extended because Safavian perjured himself while testifying during his trial. Defense attorney Barbara Van Gelder argued that the sentence should be shortened because her client accepted responsibility for his actions. … Friedman rejected the government's argument for a longer sentence. He conceded that 'it was hard to believe some of what Mr. Safavian said' during the trial, such as his statement that he had not stopped to question the inordinately low costs that Abramoff quoted to him for a lavish trip to play golf in Scotland. But Friedman said there was gray area in the subjectivity of testimony centering on what Safavian believed, which separated the case from ones in which defendants had clearly lied about basic, objective facts of the case."

Judge Uses Sentencing To Rail Against Lobbyists. The New York Times (10/28, Shenon, 1.21M) reports Friedman "used the sentencing hearing to speak out against what he said was a growing culture of corruption in Washington encouraged by high-priced lobbyists. 'He came to work in an environment that has become, frankly, more and more corrupt,' Judge Friedman said in announcing Mr. Safavian's sentence, which was half of the three-year prison term sought by the Justice Department. 'It's become corrupted by money,' Judge Friedman added. 'You've literally got lobbyists sitting in Congressional offices writing legislation. That's what's going on.'"

House Ethics Committee Will Not Release Foley Report Before Elections. The Washington Post (10/28, A6, Weisman, 748K) reports, "The House ethics committee has all but wrapped up the investigative phase of its probe into the actions of former representative Mark Foley, informing key witnesses that they will not be summoned back for more questioning, lawyers in the case said yesterday. But those lawyers indicated that the committee is unlikely to release its report on the Florida Republican -- or even an interim memo -- before the Nov. 7 elections. … A committee report could have resurrected Democratic charges of a coverup, some Democrats hoped." The Post notes, "The most glaring hole in the testimony is the apparent decision not to call Rep. Jim Kolbe, who was aware of inappropriate e-mails from Foley to a page as far back as 2000 and whose conduct with former pages has also drawn scrutiny. Korenna Cline, a Kolbe spokeswoman, said the ethics committee has had no contact with the congressman or his staff."

Longtime Illinois Political Fundraiser Pleads Guilty In Kickback Probe. The Chicago Tribune (10/28, Coen, O'Connor, Long) reported, "Political insider Stuart Levine pleaded guilty Friday to scheming to squeeze millions of dollars from firms seeking state business, and authorities alleged in the clearest detail yet that he had the help of Gov. Rod Blagojevich's top campaign supporters. The new allegations in the plea agreement of Levine, a longtime Republican fundraiser reappointed to state boards by the Democratic governor, only increased the questions about corruption swirling around the race for governor with little more than a week until the Nov. 7 election. In the…plea agreement, federal authorities spell out allegations that Blagojevich's two top fundraisers schemed almost from the beginning of the governor's administration to use their newfound influence for corrupt purposes." However, Blagojevich on Friday "said Levine's plea shows he began his misdeeds before Blagojevich became governor."

The AP (10/28, Robinson) reported, "Disappointing Republicans, though, Stuart Levine's 58-page plea agreement with federal prosecutors contained no allegations of wrongdoing on the part of the Democratic governor, who is waging a re-election campaign while coping with a federal corruption investigation. All the same, the massive document was crammed with details of corruption in state government and guaranteed to fuel campaign fireworks. Levine told how he worked closely with Blagojevich fundraiser Antoin 'Tony' Rezko, now also facing federal charges, and that Rezko and others close to the governor provided him with a high degree of political clout."

Four Convicted In Honolulu Airport Contract Fraud Conspiracy. The Honolulu Star Bulletin (10/28, Barayuga) reported, "A federal jury convicted two former airport officials and two contractors of conspiracy and mail fraud" Friday "in a bid-rigging scheme at Honolulu Airport. The jury deliberated for just more than six hours to unanimously find Dennis Hirokawa, 64, former superintendent of airport maintenance; Richard Okada, 65, former director of the Visitor Information Program; and contractors Michael Furukawa, 60, and Wes Uemura, 61, guilty of conspiracy." The Star Bulletin noted, "Charles Goodwin, special agent in charge of the FBI here, said he hopes the convictions serve as a deterrent. 'And as time goes by and we pursue more and more corruption, more and more people will step forward because they see the government serious about taking it on at the state and federal level,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0088356

DOJ Cancels Faith-Based Prison Rehabilitation Program. The New York Times (10/28, Banerjee, 1.21M) reports the Justice Department "has canceled its proposal for a religion-based prison rehabilitation program that critics and constitutional law experts contended would have violated the separation of church and state. On March 31, the department announced that it was seeking proposals for a 'single-faith, residential re-entry program' that would be adopted initially in as many as six federal prisons and run in each by an organization of a particular denomination. The proposed program, among others, was challenged in a lawsuit filed on May 4 in the Federal District Court in Madison, Wis., by the Freedom From Religion Foundation, a watchdog group. By May 26, the department had suspended its request for proposals for the program, and on Thursday it canceled the program 'in its entirety,' according to the Web site for the Office of Justice Programs of the federal Bureau of Prisons, a branch of the Justice Department."

Role Of Faith In Kuo's Book Explored. The New York Times' Samuel Freedman (10/28) writes, "In an election season, how could an 'inside story of political seduction,' to quote the subtitle of David Kuo's 'Tempting Faith,' not be mined for every politically explosive example it offers? … Naturally, those skeptical of the faith-based initiative are saying, 'I told you so,' and stalwart defenders of the Bush administration are issuing emphatic denials or even suggesting that Mr. Kuo is either Judas or a fresh candidate for the axis of evil. But though 'Tempting Faith' (Free Press) is a story about the Bush presidency, it is even more a story about Mr. Kuo. As much as it is a story about politics, it is also a story about faith."

SCOTUS To Rule On Police Officers' Responsibility During High-Speed Chases. The Washington Post (10/28, A5, Lane, 748K) reports the Supreme Court "stepped into the national debate on the risks of high-speed police car chases yesterday, announcing that it will decide whether the Constitution permits police to use deadly force against a fleeing motorist whose only suspected offense is speeding or reckless driving. The court's decision was a victory for a Georgia police officer appealing a ruling earlier this year by the Atlanta-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit. That court had concluded that the officer acted unreasonably by ramming a fleeing speeder, causing a crash that left the driver, Victor Harris, paralyzed." The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Savage, 918K) reports, "Eight years ago, the justices shielded police officers from being sued in federal court for deaths and injuries resulting from high-speed chases. The only exception, the court said, is when police act out of 'an improper or malicious motive,' such as 'to terrorize, cause harm or kill' a suspect."

Two New York Men Seek New Trial Over Courtroom Chaos. The New York Times (10/28, Brick) reports, "The crime scene was the courthouse, and the witnesses were lawyers, court officers, a court reporter and a judge. The indictment described the momentary chaos of an afternoon last winter. … 'It happened right here,' said the prosecutor, Robert J. Walsh, addressing the jury and motioning toward the defendants. 'They tried to escape.' … But when testimony began this week, witnesses offered all the complexity of the world outside the courthouse." The Times adds, "Had one of the men signaled to start the attack? Had the other said his intent was suicide? Were the makeshift knives found in their clothing or on the floor? Where had the armed court sergeant and the unarmed judge been standing? … The men at the defense table in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn last January, Kayson Pearson, 24, and Troy Hendrix, 22, had been on trial for kidnapping, raping and killing Romona Moore, a third-year psychology student at Hunter College. She was savagely tortured. The maximum penalty was life. On Jan. 19, the trial ended abruptly." The Times adds, "Courthouse disturbances do not make for predictable cases. Some defendants who live to tell about them are acquitted, like Angela Davis in California in 1972 and Jose Dominguez in the Bronx in 1991. In Missouri, a man convicted in the courthouse where he had killed his wife in 1992 awaits a new trial on account of the venue. In Atlanta, defense lawyers have asked to move the trial of a man who escaped the courthouse in March 2005."

New York Officials Rule Homicide In Baby Girl's Death. The New York Times (10/28, Buckley, Khan) reports, "A 13-month-old girl died early yesterday after being found unconscious in her Brooklyn home, and her death has been declared a homicide by the medical examiner's office. The police have not identified any suspects." The Times continues, "A spokeswoman for the medical examiner's office said the baby had skull fractures and other injuries, and the police said her body was bruised. … The police said that the baby's mother, whom they identified as Antigua Lucas, 19, told them that she had found the baby, Teira Lewis, not breathing around 2:15 a.m. Ms. Lucas said that Teira had been sick at 11:30 p.m., but that she managed to soothe the baby to sleep, according to the police." The Times adds, "After finding the baby unresponsive, Ms. Lucas said, she rushed out of her second-floor apartment at 270 Glenmore Avenue in East New York, the police said, frantic and looking for help. She flagged down a private sanitation company worker, who called 911, the authorities said. … The baby was taken to Brookdale University Hospital and Medical Center and declared dead at 3 a.m., the police said. The Administration for Children's Services was investigating the death."

DOJ_NMG_0088357

Malvo Confesses To Killing Of Arizona Golfer. USA Today/AP (10/28) reports, "Convicted Washington-area sniper Lee Boyd Malvo confessed to police that he and cohort John Allen Muhammad were responsible for the 2002 killing of a 60-year-old man on a Tucson golf course, Tucson authorities said Friday." The AP continues, "Malvo said he was sorry for the family of Jerry Taylor, said Detective Benjamin Jimenez of the Tucson Police Department. … 'He welled up a few times in tears during the interview,' Jimenez said." The AP adds, "Malvo spoke to police in Maryland for two hours Thursday after he received immunity from prosecution, Tucson Capt. Bill Richards said. Malvo said the shooting took place while he and Muhammad were in the area visiting Muhammad's older sister, Richards said. … Tucson police had long sought to speak with Malvo about the March 19, 2002, death of Taylor, 60, who died from a single gunshot fired from long range as he practiced chip shots at the golf course. The case had never been conclusively tied to Muhammad and Malvo." The AP notes, "Muhammad and Malvo were arrested for 10 killings and three woundings in the Washington, D.C., area during three weeks in October 2002. They were accused of roaming the area with a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle that they fired from the trunk of a Chevrolet Caprice at random victims."

Judge Denies Bond For Florida Cuban Spying Suspect. The Miami Herald (10/28, Weaver) reported, "A Florida International University professor charged with being an unregistered agent of Cuba's communist government won't be released before trial, a Miami federal judge ruled Friday." Carlos Alvarez "could flee to Cuba if he's freed before the January trial, U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said. He denied Alvarez's bid for bond." The Herald noted Alvarez "gave self-incriminating statements to FBI agents in the summer of 2005 because he believed they would not charge him if he cooperated with them. His lawyer has asked the judge to suppress that evidence, the core of the U.S. attorney's case against him."

FBI Puts Wyoming Agents In Charge Of Beauprez Ad Probe. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/28, Paulson) reported Denver FBI spokeswoman Rene VonderHaar "said Friday that Wyoming officials would take over an investigation into a Colorado gubernatorial candidate's campaign ad to avoid potential conflicts of interest after authorities learned a Denver-area federal agent may have been involved. The investigation is examining whether GOP Rep. Bob Beauprez accessed a restricted federal database for information used in a television ad to attack his Democratic challenger, Bill Ritter." The AP noted, "Cory Voorhis, a federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent and registered Colorado Republican, provided the information, a person in government who was briefed on the investigation told The Associated Press last week."

Pataki Chooses Former Federal Prosecutor For Havesi Probe. The New York Times (10/28, Cooper) reports, "Gov. George E. Pataki appointed a former federal prosecutor on Friday to determine whether the ethics case against Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi for using a state worker to chauffeur his wife was strong enough to seek his removal from office." The Times continues, "Mr. Pataki, who cut short a trip to Hungary to deal with the Hevesi affair, had been expected to announce his decision on whether to invoke a little-known law to call the State Senate into special session to consider removing Mr. Hevesi. But Mr. Pataki, a Republican who leaves office at the end of the year, said he wanted to take the extra step of having an outside expert review the case before calling for the removal of Mr. Hevesi, a Democrat who is seeking re-election, less than two weeks before the election. … 'This is a provision of the law that, to the best of our knowledge, has never been used,' Mr. Pataki said. 'And it is an extraordinary act for officials to overturn an election of a statewide elected official after a vote by the people of New York, and obviously it's something that, if it's used at all, has to be used cautiously and with great, great care.' … So Mr. Pataki appointed David N. Kelley, a former United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, to review the case. Mr. Kelley — who has prosecuted terrorism cases and who won high-profile convictions against Martha Stewart and Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom — is a registered Democrat who won the praise of people within his party for his work as a prosecutor."

Bloomberg (10/28, Quint, Braun) reports, "Pataki said he hoped he could have a report from Kelley, who served as U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, within a week. … Pataki, who leaves office Dec. 31, acted after the state Ethics Commission this week said Hevesi improperly used staffers as his wife's chauffeur and didn't show any intention of repaying the state until his opponent in the Nov. 7 election exposed the practice. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat who is leading in the race for governor, yesterday withdrew his endorsement of Hevesi, also a Democrat, for re- election as the state's fiscal watchdog." Bloomberg adds, "Pataki said Kelley would get more than a week if needed it, and probably would present the case to the Senate if there is a decision to proceed with it. Kelley served in the U.S. attorney's office in New York from 1988 to 2005 before joining law firm Cahill, Gordon & Reindel in September 2005. … Prior to his appointment as U.S. attorney in 2003, he was named co-chair of the Justice Department's investigation into the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He personally prosecuted John Walker Lindh, dubbed the 'American Taliban.' As a U.S. attorney, he also served as a member of President George W. Bush's Corporate Fraud Task Force and the Attorney General's Advisory Committee for White Collar Crime."

DOJ_NMG_0088358

Doolittle Faces Voters With Uncertain Legal Fate. The Sacramento Bee (10/28, Whitney) reports, "Voters in the 4th Congressional District will go to the polls Nov. 7 to decide whether Rep. John Doolittle deserves an eighth term without knowing whether he will face federal prosecution in connection with the ongoing investigation of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The Bee continues, "The Roseville Republican, who once called Abramoff a good friend, has not been called before a grand jury or otherwise been publicly identified by the Justice Department as being under investigation. … 'We are not going to confirm or deny investigations into any individuals,' said Brian Sierra, spokesman for the Justice Department's criminal section." The Bee adds, "The only congressman to have pleaded guilty in connection with Abramoff is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who pleaded Oct. 14 to conspiracy and making false statements and is awaiting sentencing. … Doolittle's long relationship with Abramoff, however, included elements of the kind that contributed to the legal troubles of many of the eight people, including congressional aides and lobbyists, who already have pleaded guilty. … Doolittle has insisted he's done no wrong and is paying a prominent criminal attorney in Virginia to clear his name. The legal tab so far is about $50,000." The Bee notes, "The attorney, David Barger, stressed that he had been told by the Justice Department last week that 'Congressman Doolittle is not a target of its investigation.' … But other criminal defense attorneys said the fact that the Justice Department has not identified Doolittle as a target means little because that typically doesn't happen until all the evidence is gathered and charges are imminent."

New York Man Pleads Guilty To Managing Prostitution Ring. The AP (10/28) reports, "A Bronx man admitted yesterday that for six years he managed a multi-city prostitution ring that included underage girls." The AP continues, "In pleading guilty to two federal charges in Trenton, Matthew Thompkins, 38, said the ring ran from 1999 to December 2005 in Atlantic City, Boston, Las Vegas, Miami and New York. He is the seventh member to plead guilty in the case, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. … Thompkins pleaded guilty to conspiracy to transport minors to engage in prostitution, which carries a sentence of five to 30 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000, and conspiracy to engage in money laundering, punishable by up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 or twice the loss to victims. Sentencing is to be March 2."

The Newark Star-Ledger (NJ) (10/28, Martin) reports, "Thompkins acknowledged building and training a 'stable' of young prostitutes, housing them in apartments and homes in New York and New Jersey, and hiding millions of dollars in illegal sex proceeds in their names. … His arrest last December by the FBI followed an unusual foray by federal investigators into a crime typically left to local police. … But prosecutors said Thompkins, for years known only by his nickname, 'Knowledge,' wasn't the typical pimp. He ran his operation so proficiently that his counterparts in the sex-trade industry gave him the ultimate honor three years ago: a 4-foot-high trophy declaring him 'International Pimp of the Year.' … 'He was the master pimp,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Jason Richardson said." The Star-Ledger notes, "Thompkins, 37, pleaded guilty to conspiring to launder money and transport minors across state lines for prostitution. His plea agreement calls for between 10 and 24 years in prison. U.S. District Judge Freda Wolfson set sentencing for March 2. .. .The plea followed similar admissions from six other defendants. Some cooperated with the FBI; none has been sentenced."

US Charges Florida Man In Online Hacking Plot. The Tampa Tribune (10/28, Silvestrini) reports, "A Seminole man slowed a Massachusetts company's Web site by electronically hijacking other people's computers and directing them to launch an attack, a federal criminal complaint alleges." The Tribune continues, "Federal authorities in Massachusetts charged John Bombard, 32, with two counts of intentionally accessing a protected computer without authorization, charges that carry a maximum of two years in federal prison. … The complaint charges Bombard with hacking into two computer systems June 15, 2004, to establish a "bot" network of compromised computers from which he launched a denial of service attack on Akamai Technologies servers." The Tribune adds, "A bot, short for robot, is a computer program that seeks vulnerable computers and runs silently in the background until it receives directions from a controlling computer. … According to the Justice Department, some experts think networks of bots, also called "botnets," now send up to three-quarters of all spam. … A denial of service attack is one in which many compromised computers attack a single target, consuming the target's bandwidth or overloading its resources. Legitimate users of the targeted system are unable to use its services." The Tribune notes, "The federal charges say Bombard used a variant of the Gaobot worm to infect networks of computers at two major universities, which are not named. The complaint also doesn't say how many computers were used in the attack."

DOJ_NMG_0088359

Puerto Rico Jury Spares Convicted Murderer From Death Penalty. The AP (10/28, Vargas) reports, "A jury sentenced a man to life in prison Friday for murder instead of giving him a death sentence sought by prosecutors in a case that sparked renewed opposition to capital punishment nearly 80 years after it was outlawed in this U.S. territory. Carlos Ayala Lopez wept and hugged his attorney after hearing the verdict. Ayala was found guilty three months ago of killing Jose Rodriguez Reyes, a guard at the Veteran's Medical Center in suburban Rio Piedras, in 2002." The AP continues, "Critics, including the governor and Catholic church leaders, spoke out against federal prosecutors' decision to seek the death penalty. Puerto Rico abolished capital punishment in 1929. The last execution was in 1927, when a man was hanged for murder." The AP adds, "Federal prosecutors can seek the death penalty in some cases because Puerto Rico is subject to U.S. federal law. Federal prosecutors claimed jurisdiction in Ayala's case because the killing took place at a federally run institution. … Prosecutors said Ayala shot Rodriguez while trying to steal his gun for a planned drug trafficking operation. … The jury of six men and six women, which convicted Ayala in July, reconvened for the penalty phase of the trial and deliberated for about six hours before delivering the sentence."

FBI Mulls Probe Of Rep Porter Over Fundraising Calls. The Las Vegas Sun (10/28, Cook) reports, "U.S. Rep. Jon Porter released phone records and copies of his daily schedule Friday that he claims disprove a former staffer's allegations that the congressman made illegal fundraising phone calls from his government offices in Henderson and Washington, D.C." The Sun continues, "While the records - which in some cases had names and phone numbers blacked out - do not prove that the allegations are false, they appear to conflict with some of the charges leveled by Porter's one-time executive assistant and scheduler, Jim Shepard. … The records show, for example, that Porter made fundraising and other phone calls from a campaign cell phone on April 18, a day when his schedule shows that he was at his district office. … But his chief of staff, Mike Hesse, said he and Porter were out to lunch when the calls were made, and offered a receipt from about 11:45 a.m. at Sweet Tomatoes to prove it." The Sun adds, "Similarly, on April 21, when Shepard claims he witnessed Porter make fundraising calls between 1:30 p.m. and 2:30 p.m. at his Henderson office, Porter's schedule shows that the congressman left for a meeting with Clark County School District officials at 1:15 p.m. and remained out of the office the rest of the day. … Shepard said he remembers the meeting with school officials being delayed and that the schedule - which he kept while he was on Porter's staff - does not match e-mails and call logs he retained. He said he could not share the call logs on the advice of his attorney. … The documents from Porter came on the same day that the U.S. attorney's office turned over a complaint about the calls to the FBI. … 'We did receive a referral,' said FBI spokesman Dave Staretz. 'I can't go into any particulars. We will evaluate the case and determine whether we will open a preliminary inquiry.' .. .In a statement, Las Vegas-based U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden emphasized that no decision has been made on whether to proceed on the request for an investigation from Nevada Democratic Party Chairman Tom Collins."

Man Admits Louisiana Murders Before Being Executed In Florida. The AP (10/28) reports, "Before being executed for five Florida murders, serial killer Danny Rolling gave his spiritual adviser a handwritten confession to a grisly murder triple slaying 17 years ago in his home town of Shreveport." The AP continues, "Police and the Rev. Mike Hudspeth released copies of that apology and confession on Friday, two days after Rolling's execution." The AP adds, "Police have long suspected that Rolling stabbed William T. Grissom, 55, his 24-year-old daughter, Julie, and his 8-year-old grandson, Sean, as they got ready for dinner on Nov. 4, 1989, in Grissom's Shreveport home. … They had been sure of it since 1997, when Rolling sent a detailed confession, including a description of the crime scene, to the woman he had married in prison, and she sent it to police, said retired police detectives Don Ashley and Danny Fogger, who had worked on the case." The AP notes, "Since Rolling had pleaded guilty in Florida to killing five college students and his execution was expected, Louisiana authorities saw little reason to try him. … Still, police said Friday, it is a relief to have a signed, public confession."

New York Judge Sentences Mafia Figure To Life For Two Murders. The New York Times (10/28, Rashbaum) reports, "Baldassare Amato, a powerful Bonanno crime family figure who represents the group's traditional Sicilian roots, stood silently with his arms crossed yesterday

DOJ_NMG_0088360

as a federal judge denounced him and meted out a life sentence for two 1992 Mafia murders." The Times continues, "As the judge, Nicholas G. Garaufis of United States District Court in Brooklyn, tore into him for 'using murder as a business tactic,' at several points Mr. Amato raised his right hand to his chin and then crossed his arms again in front of his chest. … 'Mr. Amato,' said the judge, making no effort to mask his disgust, 'you're just a plain, wanton murderer and a Mafia assassin. The sentence I'm going to give you, as far as I'm concerned, is a gift.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Amato, 54, dressed in a gray prison sweatshirt and khaki trousers, appeared unmoved when the judge handed down the life sentence, almost as though it were a cost of doing business. He and his lawyer had both declined to address the court. … After pronouncing the sentence, Judge Garaufis asked the lead prosecutor in the case, Assistant United States Attorney John Buretta, how much of a fine he could levy. … Mr. Buretta said the maximum was $250,000, and the judge levied it."

The New York Post (10/28, Gallahue) reports, "Garaufis tore into…Amato, convicted of two murders, after his lawyer asked him to consider sending him to a prison close to New York City for the sake of the Bonnano-family soldier's relatives. … 'My compassion is overcome by my disgust and disdain for this defendant,' he said. … Amato was convicted of racketeering and murdering two men, restaurant owner Sabastiano DiFalco and New York Post delivery supervisor Robert Perrino."

CIVIL LAW:

Lawsuit Over Promotion Of Christianity At USAF Academy Thrown Out. The New York Times/AP (10/28) reports, "A federal judge on Friday threw out a lawsuit against the Air Force that contended that evangelical Christian values were being illegally pushed on academy cadets. An academy graduate said he would appeal the decision by the judge, James A. Parker of Federal District Court in Albuquerque. 'Our fight is far from over,' said the graduate, Mikey Weinstein of Albuquerque. The case was brought by Mr. Weinstein and other Air Force Academy graduates who contended that a military chaplain had violated their right to religious freedom by urging cadets to attend Christian services or face 'the fires of hell.'"

The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Jordan) reports, "The judge also rejected claims by Air Force Master Sgt. Phillip T. Burleigh, who asked to be included in the lawsuit, saying he was discriminated against in 1997 for not attending prayer meetings." Burleigh "said his supervisor used government resources to evangelize recruits, including hiring religious motivational speakers to lecture at mandatory-attendance conferences."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Drifter Sought In Probe Of DC Hate Graffiti. The Washington Times (10/28, Cella) reports, "Federal and Arlington County authorities are searching for a drifter they believe has been drawing swastikas and other graffiti in the area around Arlington National Cemetery." The Times continues, "Police say that Ronald Bost, 47, of no fixed address, is responsible for a rash of vandalism near Arlington Memorial Bridge and Memorial Drive. … One July incident on a construction site at the Memorial Avenue Rehabilitation Project cost $1,000 to clean." The Times adds, "U.S. Park Police Detective Kevin Fornshill said that Bost is the 'chief suspect' in the case, based largely on the fact that Bost has been arrested four times by park police on vandalism charges since the mid-1990s. … 'He's out again and he's doing it again,' Detective Fornshill said. … In 2004, Bost was arrested for painting swastikas and anti-Semitic obscenities over signs near the Netherlands Carillon at Arlington Cemetery. … His vandalism has been identified around the George Washington Parkway, as far south as Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport and as far north as the Francis Scott Key Bridge."

DA Charges 11 In Orange County Voter Registration Fraud Probe. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Berthelsen, Hanley) reports, "The Orange County district attorney's office has charged 11 people with fraudulent voter registration stemming from a Republican registration drive this year that resulted in dozens of Democrats unwittingly being signed up as Republicans. … Those charged had been paid as much as $10 for each voter they registered as part of a Republican Party effort to recruit more voters in central Orange County. The area includes the district represented by Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a regular target of Republicans, and a competitive state Senate race." The Times continues, "The cases were filed Tuesday, and three defendants were arrested Wednesday and Thursday. They are in custody and are scheduled to be arraigned today and Monday. The district attorney's office refused to release any information about them, including details usually available, such as the names and charges. … Sources said a press conference is scheduled for Monday, a week before the Nov. 7 election, with Republican Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, who is locked in a tight election battle with Democratic state Sen. Debra Bowen." The Times notes, "The prosecution highlights problems that can occur with signature-gathering and voter registration campaigns in which the workers are paid by the signature. Campaign watchdogs have derisively called it a 'bounty hunter' system that creates incentives for often transient, low-paid workers to pad their results to make more money."

DOJ_NMG_0088361

DOJ Official Meets With Lake Charles, LA, Residents Over Police Shooting. The Lake Charles (LA) American Press (10/28, Cormier) reports, "Several Lake Charles residents met with an official representing the U.S. Justice Department to start a dialogue about the relationship between the community and police since the Oct. 12 fatal police shooting of 29-year-old Trent Buckins." The American Press continues, "The official with the Justice Department's Community Relations Service declined to speak to the American Press, citing governmental restrictions. .. .Since the November 2004 Chateau Du Lac fatal shooting by police, the Justice Department has had an official visit Lake Charles to help build more trust between the public and police." The American Press adds, "The residents who attended Friday's meeting at City Hall — two police officials also attended — are pleased with the Justice Department's involvement. … 'I think this is another positive step in the long process to gain clarity to what happened,' the Rev. Henry Mancuso said. He was representing the city's Leadership Team for Community and Race Relations. … 'This will be a long process to find out the truth of what happened. Until then, there will be tension in the community.' … The federal government's response will be helpful in healing whatever wounds have been created since the most recent fatal police shooting, Mancuso said."

Indianapolis Police Union Alleges Recruitment Bias. The Indianapolis Star (10/28, O'Shaughnessy) reports, "The police union is accusing the city of racial discrimination by stacking the first recruit class of the merged Indianapolis Metropolitan Police Department with minorities." The Star continues, "Vince Huber, president of the Indianapolis Fraternal Order of Police, said the department added minority candidates to its new recruit class at the expense of white applicants. … Indianapolis Police Chief Michael Spears acknowledged that the department reached into the next recruit class for qualified minorities to increase the diversity in the class, which begins training Nov. 13. … But he said adding minorities to the list did not come at the expense of any white applicants. Instead, he said the move simply increased the number of names submitted for approval to the department's merit board." The Star notes, "The upcoming recruit class will be the largest in history, reflecting a need to keep up with planned retirements and provide enough officers for the larger, merged department. The IPD and Marion County Sheriff's Department will complete the consolidation of their operations Jan. 1. … 'We want to make sure we get the most qualified applicants possible,' Huber said. '(But) the process should be color-blind.' .. .The merit board, which must approve hiring, promotion and termination decisions, approved 55 candidates. The class includes 16 black, one Hispanic and 38 white candidates, for a minority representation of 31 percent. … The city's Police and Fire departments have operated under a U.S. Justice Department consent decree since 1978 that requires them to reflect the racial composition of the county workforce, which is about 21 percent black. That hasn't been met. … Currently, 15 percent of the IPD's 1,184 sworn officers are black, and 10 percent of the 397 sheriff's deputies are black."

Mississippi Voters May Be Left Out Of Election. The Biloxi Sun Herald (10/28, Lafontaine) reports, "Nearly 1,000 new residents (of Waveland, MS) likely will be left out of next month's city elections, according to Waveland attorneys." The Herald continues, "City leaders hired an independent consulting firm this year to figure a way to include hundreds of new voters living in a newly annexed section of town. … Waveland attorney Zach Butterworth said the Justice Department has not yet determined whether the new voters will be allowed to vote in the Nov. 7 election. .. . 'The new area could have a minimal impact on the elections and the federal government needs to decide if the new voters can be included,' he said." The Herald notes, "According to federal legislation adopted in the 1960s, the Justice Department must review changes in ballot procedures, voting districts and other electoral rules in several states - mostly in the South - to ensure that minorities maintain influence in elections. … The city settled an annexation dispute in July with neighboring Bay St. Louis in a deal that gave Waveland a stretch of land along the western right of way of Mississippi 603. … Butterworth said new voters in the annexed area will be able to vote in the congressional elections, but not the city. … Before the annexation dispute was settled, the federal government approved a request from the city to merge its voting precincts into one location at the City Hall complex on Coleman Avenue, since Katrina damaged or destroyed many polling places. … Butterworth said if the Justice Department approves the annexed voters, the most likely scenario would be to include them as part of Ward 4, rather than redrawing the ward lines."

New Jersey Same-Sex Couples Consider Personal Economic Impact Of Ruling. The New York Times (10/28, Kelley, 1.21M) reports that for same-sex couples in New Jersey, the state Supreme Court's ruling on partnership rights last week has financial impact. Cynthia and Lucy Vandenberg, "who have been partners for 12 years, have been forced to open their checkbooks repeatedly over the years to pay thousands of dollars in taxes on health benefits and for legal transactions that married couples rarely face. There was the $1,500 to change their surnames, for instance, the $1,400 or so in taxes they paid annually for additional health benefits, and the $1,000 they spent so one could adopt the biological child of the other. … Now they wonder how the court's decision will affect their next child, a son Lucy is carrying."

DOJ_NMG_0088362

New Jersey Legislative Action Could Take A While. Under the headline "Civil Union Or Marriage? A Long Wait In New Jersey," the New York Times (10/28, Mansnerus, 1.21M) also reports that while the court ordered state legislators to work out a way ensure full rights and benefits for same-sex couples, legislators said it "might take months to decide what to call the solution -- marriage or something else," since the "next few months are booked up."

NYTimes Accuses Bush Of Exploiting "Homophobia" During Campaign Speeches. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M)editorializes, "When future generations of Americans look back on the current era, they'll puzzle over what it was about George W. Bush that made people imagine there was anything compassionate to his conservatism. Having apparently lost all hope that he can use terrorism to scare voters into electing Republicans this November, the president has now begun raising the threat of gay marriage. The moment the New Jersey Supreme Court issued a ruling on the subject this week, Mr. Bush began using every possible excuse to bring up 'activist' judges and gay weddings on the campaign trail. 'I mentioned his love for his family,' Mr. Bush said at a rally for a Republican Senate candidate in Michigan. 'He understands what I know, that marriage is a fundamental institution of our civilization. Yesterday in New Jersey we had another activist court issue a ruling…' … If the last month has taught us anything about the Republican Party, it is that homophobia is campaign strategy, not conviction."

Student Criticizes Conservative Activist's "Academic Bill Of Rights." In an op-ed for the Washington Post (10/28, A15, 748K) Asheesh Kapur Siddique, a Princeton University student, writes that Universities "are under attack from people who want to inject partisan politics into our classrooms. Led by activist David Horowitz, some conservatives are pushing for the adoption of an 'Academic Bill of Rights' (ABOR) across America. The bill takes the form of student resolutions or legislative proposals claiming to protect the academic freedom of college students from ideological indoctrination by professors. … In truth, these efforts only hurt the students they purport to help. Horowitz and his backers aren't protecting our rights; they're impeding our educations. The Academic Bill of Rights would substitute political correctness for the free exchange of ideas on campus by preventing faculty and students from discussing fresh or controversial ideas in class."

ANTITRUST:

Private Equity Funds Bid For Tribune Company. The New York Times (10/28, Sorkin) reports, "The Tribune Company received several preliminary offers late yesterday from a series of private equity firms, according to people briefed on the auction." The Times continues, "The preliminary offers, which are nonbinding and known as 'indications of interest,' are the first step in an auction for Tribune, which said last month that it would consider selling its 11 newspapers and 25 television stations. … The company includes assets like The Los Angeles Times, The Chicago Tribune, The Baltimore Sun, Newsday and the Chicago Cubs." The Times adds, "Among Tribune's suitors, these people said, are a group including Providence Equity Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners and Apollo Management; another consortium including Thomas H. Lee Partners and the Texas Pacific Group; and the Carlyle Group and Bain Capital, which are each planning to bid separately. … Notably absent from the bidding was any major newspaper company, though it remained possible that Gannett or another rival company could emerge. … Tribune has a market value of $8.2 billion. Analysts have had scattered estimates about how much the company could be sold for, with some estimating a price as high as $10 billion and others estimating Tribune will not fetch any premium."

Maryland Man Begin Bid For Baltimore Sun. The Washington Times (10/28, Lengell) reports, "The man behind a local effort to buy the Baltimore Sun from the Tribune Co. said yesterday he is encouraged by the amount of community support he has received. … 'I have never witnessed this kind of response to a business transaction,' said Theodore G. Venetoulis, a former Baltimore County politician and current owner of a Maryland news and political magazine. 'Newspapers still have a very substantial role in people's lives. It touches the core of people.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Venetoulis said he received several telephone calls from potential investors after reports were published yesterday revealing the group's intentions. … 'The group we've put together understand two things,' said Mr. Venetoulis, who lost a Democratic primary bid for governor in 1978. 'One, that this will not be an investment that will provide the usual yield and return that some investors will be used to. Secondly, they've agreed that they would not in any way attempt to jeopardize the paper's independence or attempt to give it a certain ideological bent.'" The Times notes, "The Baltimore group is the latest to seek to buy metropolitan daily newspapers from embattled corporations. … A group led by public relations and advertising executive Brian Tierney recently paid $515 million for the Philadelphia Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News. .. A group led by Jack Welch, the former head of General Electric Co., said this week that it was interested in buying the Boston Globe. And in Los Angeles, three billionaires, including music executive David Geffen, have said they want to buy the Los Angeles Times, which also is owned by the Tribune Co."

DOJ_NMG_0088363

Google Takes Advertising Plans To Madison Avenue. The Washington Post (10/28, D1, Goo) reports, "Just a few years ago, Google was a bit player on Madison Avenue. It specialized in tiny text ads shown alongside search results and in the margins of thousands of Web sites that partner with Google. … But recently Google has moved beyond search, reaching out to big advertisers to sell them online graphical or display ads on its partner sites. The firm is developing new Web video ad formats that could give TV commercials a run for their money and has been staffing up new projects to sell ads offline in newspapers and magazines and on radio." The Post continues, "Earlier this month, Google's ambitions were on display when it opened its new office in the old Port Authority building, covering 1 1/2 floors on an entire Manhattan block in the funky Chelsea neighborhood. The company has recruited executives from some of the biggest media firms and is rapidly expanding its 500-member team here in an attempt to cultivate relationships with Madison Avenue and large advertisers. … Google's strategy is to bring the math and science that fueled its search-engine ad success to other forms of marketing. The company's existing text-ad system allows advertisers to see how many people click on each ad and pay only when someone clicks, helping advertisers calculate the return on their marketing dollars. Eventually Google hopes to offer similar metrics for online video ads and off-line campaigns, though it is still in the early stages of figuring out how those might work."

Arcelor Mittal Takes Stake In Noble. The AP (10/28) reports, "Arcelor Mittal SA said Friday it was merging a unit that makes steel for the auto industry with Michigan-based laser welder Noble International Ltd. in return for a 40 percent stake in the business and a $300 million payment." The AP continues, "The Luxembourg-based steelmaker - currently being formed from a tie-up between Arcelor SA and Mittal Steel Co. NV - said it would become Noble's largest stockholder when the deal was complete." The AP adds, "Arcelor Mittal said this would strengthen the company's position with the global car industry. The transaction will combine Arcelor's laser-welded tailored blank business TBA - the largest in Europe - with Noble, North America's largest producer of laser-welded steel products. … Mittal has significant U.S. operations through its earlier acquisition of International Steel Group. … Combining expected results for this year, the combined Arcelor-Noble business would have a revenue of $1.1 billion and earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization of $122 million." The AP notes, "The Arcelor unit employs 670 people at nine plants in Europe, one in the U.S. and a quarter stake in a joint venture in China. The company said its revenue would be around $500 million this year. … Noble, headquartered in Warren, has more than 2,000 workers at 12 plants in the U.S., Canada, Mexico and Australia. It expects 2006 revenue to hit $600 million. Earlier this month, it bought Pullman Industries Inc., which makes steel tubular parts for carmakers."

FCC Sets November 3 Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal. Bloomberg (10/28, Peterson) reports, "The U.S. Federal Communications Commission plans to vote Nov. 3 on AT&T Inc.'s $82 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp., three weeks after a deadlock on the terms of approval derailed a previously scheduled vote." Bloomberg continues, "The commission, which released its agenda for the meeting today, hasn't indicated what types of conditions it may place on the deal, the biggest telephone-company combination ever." Bloomberg adds, "Facing pressure from the panel's two Democrats, AT&T earlier this month offered concessions including a price freeze on certain business data services and $10-a-month high-speed Internet access for some BellSouth customers. Rival companies want tougher conditions, such as price controls. … 'We still continue to believe there's a good chance the FCC will conditionally approve the necessary AT&T-BellSouth license transfers at some point in November,' Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Blair Levin said today in an investor note." Bloomberg notes, "FCC approval is the last regulatory hurdle for San Antonio-based AT&T, the biggest U.S. phone company, to complete the transaction, which the companies announced almost eight months ago. The Justice Department and 18 states cleared the deal without conditions. FCC deliberations have been complicated by the likely recusal of one member, which leaves the panel evenly split between Democrats and Republicans. … FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, a Republican who initially proposed approving the deal without conditions, postponed an Oct. 13 vote after Democrats Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, who are seeking conditions, asked for public comment on AT&T's proposals."

Smithfield Gambles On Merger While Foes Fight Expansion. The Newport News (VA) Daily Press (10/28) reports, "Smithfield Foods adversaries are trying to ensure that the world's largest pork company loses a $100 million bet. … If the Department of Justice allows Smithfield to purchase Premium Standard Farms, the $674 million deal will help Smithfield further bolster its position as the company that raises and slaughters the most hogs in the country." The Press continues, "A line of opponents has formed to protest, saying Smithfield will dominate the price of hogs. Smithfield and Premium knew the fight was coming, so the deal stipulates that Smithfield will pay $100 million to Premium if anti-trust regulators deny the deal. … But Smithfield was willing to take the risk. Smithfield gained confidence by surviving federal regulatory scrutiny when it bought Farmland Foods in 2003. Many of the same groups that opposed that deal also oppose this new one. The National Farmers Union, along with a coalition of rural and farm groups, made a case to the Justice Department this week, arguing the deal should be denied. … 'The packing industry is already pretty drastically consolidated,' said Fred Stokes, spokesman for the Organization for Competitive Markets, an agricultural think tank funded by independent farmers. 'And here's the No. 1 hog producer buying the No. 2 guy.'" The Press adds. "The opponents of the deal include a growing list of Midwestern politicians, who say the deal will give Smithfield the ability to determine hog prices. They formally asked the Justice Department to scrutinize the merger and have called for congressional hearings. … Smithfield is already the largest processor of hogs, with 26 percent of the market. By adding Premium, the company will have 31 percent. Farmers worry that with less competition for buying hogs, Smithfield can drive down prices. … Smithfield opponents say Premium had the only other slaughter facility in the Southeast. Without that competitor, Smithfield can set the prices it pays all farmers in the region to raise hogs, said Michael Stumo, general counsel for the competitive markets group."

DOJ_NMG_0088364

Becton, Dickinson Wins FTC Approval For TriPath Deal. The Bergen County Record (10/28, Prial) reports, "Becton, Dickinson and Co. said Friday that federal antitrust approval has moved it a step closer to its planned $350 million acquisition of TriPath Imaging Inc., a manufacturer of cancer-screening products." The Record continues, "BD has said adding TriPath's technology will help it expand its presence in the field of cancer diagnostics. … The deal, which the Franklin Lakes-based maker of medical devices announced in August, still needs to be approved by TriPath's shareholders, said BD spokeswoman Colleen White." The Record adds, "The Federal Trade Commission, which oversees antitrust matters in the United States, said in a statement that it had completed its investigation of the deal and did not plan to take action. … As advances in research have created new opportunities for treating various forms of cancer, the potentially broad -- and lucrative -- market for cancer treatments has prompted health care companies large and small to target oncology. … TriPath, based in Burlington, N.C., uses sophisticated computer imaging to detect cell abnormalities that might indicate the onset of cancer. … BD already owns a 6.5 percent stake in TriPath."

ENVIRONMENT:

9th Circuit Halts Stryker Activity In Hawaii. The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (10/28, Kakesako) reports, "The Army lost a major court battle to local environmentalists and anti-war activists yesterday and might not be ready to deploy a Stryker brigade to Iraq late next year." The Star-Bulletin continues, "A 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals panel in San Francisco, in a 2-1 decision, issued a temporary injunction halting construction, training and any other activities dealing with the $1.5 billion Stryker Combat Brigade planned for the 25th Infantry Division. … David Henkin, Earthjustice attorney, said the case now reverts to U.S. District Judge Dave Ezra to determine if any Stryker-related construction or training can occur while the Army works on a new environmental impact statement. … Henkin said he will not only ask Ezra to prevent the Army from causing 'irreparable harm' to environment, but he also does not want the Stryker conversion to be so far along that it cannot be stopped." The Star-Bulletin adds, "The Army has said the 2nd Brigade Combat Team has completed 60 percent of its training and received 70 percent of its equipment. The 2nd Brigade is slated to grow into a 3,500-member combat unit built around 328 of the 19-ton, eight-wheeled vehicles. … Before the injunction was put into effect, the Army had said the 2nd Brigade would be ready to deploy to Iraq by November 2007 as the fifth of seven planned Stryker units. … In court papers, Ron Borne, director of transformation for the 25th Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade Combat Team, listed Stryker-related construction projects that must be completed for the Army to meet its deadline. … The Army issued a terse statement yesterday: 'We are in receipt of the court order, and we are complying.' … A federal appeals panel ruled Oct. 5 that the Army had violated the National Environmental Policy Act by failing to consider other locations outside of Schofield Barracks for its fifth Stryker brigade."

Firefighters Continue To Combat California Fire That Has Already Killed Four. All three networks led with the California fires. ABC World News (10/27, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported "thousands of acres in southern California are now a wasteland and a crime scene. Tonight, authorities are offering $400,000 in their search for the person or persons who started a blaze that killed four fire fighters. President Bush has offered his condolences for the greatest loss of life among fire fighting personnel since 2001. As for the fire itself, thousands of acres are still burning and winds are still blowing."

The CBS Evening News (10/27, lead story, 2:12, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The flames have now burned almost 38 square miles in the mountains of Southern California. And hundreds of firefighters are trying to stop it. That killer wildfire in southern California is only getting bigger. Officials say it was started yesterday by arsonists. And now it's being aided and abetted by the weather. Strong winds are driving the flames and the fear is that a huge wall of fire will head toward more populated areas."

DOJ_NMG_0088365

The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 1, 5:50, Alexander, 9.87M) added, "Wind gusts today topped 60 miles per hour making what's already a heartbreaking firefight, that much more difficult. Roaring flames and black smoke again painted these dry desert mountains near Palm Springs. For firefighters and investigators, it's a bitter two-front battle, hunting both the fast-moving fire and an arsonist wanted for what is the nation's deadliest wildfire in more than five years."

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Kelly, Abrams, Reston, Gold, 918K) reports, "Battling gusting Santa Ana winds, fire crews today fought to try to contain the fast-moving Esperanza arson fire that has killed four firefighters. … The rough terrain in the San Jacinto Mountains of Riverside County just west of Palm Springs posed difficult problems for firefighters trying to keep the blaze from the more populated areas, Janet M. Upton, of the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, said today. Winds are expected to gust up to 45 mph and firefighters are facing a long day. … In Washington, the White House joined the list of public officials to express their condolences over the firefighters' deaths. 'A little bit ago, the president placed a phone call to Tom Tidwell, who's the deputy regional forester of the U.S. Forest Service, to express condolences over what is now being called the Esperanza incident, a fire near Palm Springs, California, that has claimed the lives of four firefighters,' said spokesman Tony Snow. The president also 'said he hopes that whoever is the perpetrator will be caught quickly and brought to justice.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Pugmire, 918K) reports, "More than 100 tips have been received by the Riverside County Sheriff's Department as the intense hunt for the person or group that started the fatal Esperanza fire near Cabazon continued today. The pool of reward money also grew from $100,000 to $400,000 when the state added $100,000, as did San Bernardino County and the Morongo band of Mission Indians." The Washington Post (10/28, A3, Geis, Pomfret, 748K) reports, "Fire officials said the blaze was only 25 percent contained, and in the areas already burned a sloping, blackened moonscape was still smoldering." The New York Times (10/28, Archibold, 1.21M) reports, "The wind and towering columns of smoke have made it difficult for the authorities to assess their progress, but with additional firefighters and equipment, they say they are making headway."

Religious Groups Oppose Controversial Appalachian Mining Practices. The New York Times (10/28, Banerjee, 1.21M) reports, "The windswept ridge that Sharman Chapman-Crane hiked to on a recent fall afternoon is the kind of place, she said, that she normally would avoid. From there, she could see what she loved about Appalachia and what it had lost, and she wanted her visitors to see it, too. … In the middle of the peaks, several stood stripped bare and chopped up, a result of an increasingly common and controversial coal mining practice called mountaintop removal." Chapman-Crane and the Mennonite Central Committee Appalachia "are trying to halt mountaintop removal, and at the heart of their work, they say, is their faith. They are part of an awakening among religious people to environmental issues, said Paul Gorman, executive director of the National Religious Partnership for the Environment, an interreligious alliance. Increasingly, religious people across denominations are organizing around local issues, like preventing a landfill, preserving wetlands and changing mining."

NYTimes Urges Administration To Expand Flu Vaccine Production. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "The World Health Organization's new plan for ramping up the production of flu vaccine is a measure of how unprepared the world is to cope with an onslaught of pandemic influenza. The plan, conceived by a group of more than 120 experts, lays out a sensible path toward vaccine sufficiency— but it will take years to complete and cost up to $10 billion. … The Bush administration's pledge of $10 million to W.H.O. to help other countries develop vaccines and manufacturing capacity is prompt but woefully short. The administration has also invested substantially in vaccine research, including $1 billion to develop new cell-based technologies that would allow rapid expansion of production in an emergency. Although those investments are primarily for our own benefit, the knowledge generated is likely to help others around the world. Still, both the American and global efforts ought to be intensified. The administration's goal of being able to make enough vaccine quickly to protect all Americans is also probably four to five years away.'

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Montana Man Sentenced To Probation For Firearms Violations. The Helena (MT) Independent Record (10/28, Byron) reports, "A Jefferson County (MT) man was sentenced to three years of probation and a $2,500 fine for being a convicted felon in possession of firearms. … Edward Betka, 61, received the sentence Friday in U.S. District Court in Missoula." The IR continues, According to information from the office of Bill Mercer, United States Attorney for the District of Montana, Betka's possession of firearms came to the attention of federal officials after a fire raced through his Basin home in July 2005. … The fire was being investigated as a possible arson case, and a deputy fire marshal accompanied Betka into the home while he retrieved various firearms." The IR adds, "The fire marshal watched Betka pull an undamaged gun case from under his bed, which contained two expensive-looking, high-powered scope-mounted rifles. A friend offered to store the firearms at his home, and took possession of three rifles, one shotgun and a .44-revolver from Betka. … However, Betka wasn't supposed to have any guns, since he was convicted of making false income tax returns, mail fraud, and false representation of a Social Security number in U.S. District Court in Wisconsin in 1990. Convicted felons are not allowed to own or be around firearms."

DOJ_NMG_0088366

Federal Agents Were Planning Raid Of California DA's Home Before His Death. The Santa Rosa (CA) Press-Democrat (10/28, Geniella) reports, "Federal agents were preparing to raid the secluded Hopland home of Mendocino County District Attorney Norman Vroman at the time of his death to search for maturing marijuana plants and a possible stash of illegal weapons." The Press-Democrat continues, "Agents said overflights had detected at least 25 marijuana plants growing on Vroman's property at the end of Sanel Valley Road. … Investigators also suspected Vroman, a self-described 'gun nut,' may have added to his personal gun collection by taking home weapons seized during drug and other raids or bought with drug-related asset forfeiture money, according to federal Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents." The Press-Democrat adds, "Three days before Vroman died Sept. 21 after a massive heart attack, the FBI's Public Corruption Unit began reviewing results of an investigation involving agents from the ATF and the Drug Enforcement Agency, according to internal documents obtained by The Press Democrat and statements from agents who asked not to be identified. … Documents show federal investigators were completing affidavits in support of warrants to search Vroman's home when he suffered the heart attack Sept. 19 as he prepared to drive to work. Vroman was found by a family member slumped over the wheel of his county-owned car. Vroman died two days later at a Santa Rosa hospital. … The federal government doesn't recognize California's medical marijuana laws. Vroman was the first district attorney in the state to implement identity cards for patients who have a doctor's permission to use marijuana. Whether Vroman obtained one himself is unknown because confidentiality laws prevent that disclosure. … Documents show tensions rose within federal agencies as investigators pressed to raid the home of a high-profile district attorney who at the time of his death was engaged in a tough re-election fight with Fort Bragg attorney Meredith Lintott."

Maryland Man Pleads Guilty To Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot. The Washington Post (10/28, B4, Castaneda) reports, "A Prince George's County man admitted in federal court yesterday that he intended to attack a Berwyn Heights abortion clinic with a pipe bomb this past summer." The Post continues, "During a hearing in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, Robert Weiler Jr., 25, pleaded guilty to possessing a pipe bomb, being a felon in possession of a firearm and attempting to destroy or damage an abortion clinic. … A plea agreement worked out between Weiler's attorney and Assistant U.S. Attorney Bryan E. Foreman calls for Weiler to be sentenced to five years in federal prison. … U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow scheduled sentencing for Dec. 18." The Post adds, "Weiler said little during the hearing. He gave brief answers to Chasanow's questions about his background and mental health and about whether he understood the terms of his plea. … When asked whether he had been treated for alcoholism or mental illness, Weiler replied that he had met with a mental health expert at the Charles County Detention Center. He did not elaborate. … The defendant's parents had tipped off Prince George's police to his plans, calling to report their suspicions June 4, more than a week after he disappeared from their home and stopped returning their calls. … On June 7, Robert Weiler Jr. called agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to turn himself in. When he was arrested the next morning at a rest stop in Western Maryland, he told agents that he had a handgun stolen from a friend and that he had made a pipe bomb and left it in the closet of a house in Riverdale Heights. Hours later, the bomb was partially detonated by bomb squad technicians."

TAX:

NYTimes Concerned About "Political Motivation" In IRS Collection Delay. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "To avoid looking like Scrooge, the Internal Revenue Service typically lets up around the holidays in its hounding of tax delinquents. But this month, the indulgence began even before Macy's was decorated. The Times's David Cay Johnston reported yesterday that on Oct. 10, the I.R.S. commissioner Mark Everson told his troops to delay tax enforcement in areas affected by Hurricane Katrina -- until after the midterm elections and the holiday season. … In delaying the enforcement actions, there's no avoiding the appearance of a political motivation."

DOJ_NMG_0088367

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Rangel Says Democrats Will Not Roll Back Bush Tax Cuts. The Washington Post (10/28, D1, Montgomery, 748K) reports Rep. Charles Rangel, who "stands to take over the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee," said he "had no intention of rolling back" President Bush's first-term tax cuts if the Democrats take the House. Rangel said, "I think it would be ridiculous for us in 2007 to be talking about 2010 tax cuts. I don't want to go retroactive in terms of any of the tax cuts. I think retroactive tax increases are bad tax policy." The Post says that as the "prognosis for Republicans to maintain control has grown increasingly gloomy, Rangel has become a favorite rhetorical punching bag for President Bush and Republican leaders."

Waxman Plans Aggressive Expansion Of Corporate Oversight. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, Dreazen, 2.03M) reports on its front page that Rep. Henry Waxman, who stands to take over the House Government Reform Committee, said he would "aggressively expand oversight of many large industries -- with a focus on drug prices, oil-company profits and Halliburton Co.'s contracting work in Iraq." Waxman said he "also would boost oversight of the Bush administration, along with 'waste, fraud and abuse' across the federal government -- especially rebuilding efforts in Iraq and the Hurricane Katrina-ravaged Gulf Coast. The committee has extensive -- and vaguely defined -- oversight responsibilities covering broad swaths of corporate America and the government, and the chairman has the power to issue subpoenas, compel testimony and call hearings."

Michaud Plans To Challenge Filner For Veterans Affairs Committee Chairmanship. CQ Daily (10/27, Yoest) reports that Rep. Bob Filner "may be in line to become the next chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee if the Democrats win control of the House, but his behavior as ranking member has raised questions about whether he's the right Democrat for the job.," and Me2 Rep. Michael Michaud (D) plans to challenge Filner's chairmanship. CQ Daily writes, "Filner's hot temperament, visible in his fights with current chairman Steve Buyer, R-Ind., and a profanity-laced tirade outside VA headquarters in June, have raised some eyebrows."

WSJournal Chides Democrats Over Silence On Agenda Specifics. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A6, 2.03M) editorializes, "A joke in Washington these days is that the only thing that can save the Republicans on Election Day is the Democrats. House Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi seems to get this joke, because with few exceptions she's kept her Members tight-lipped and unspecific: As New York Senator Chuck Schumer has put it, why take the focus off the GOP? This is in notable contrast to 1994, when the Gingrich Republicans ended a 40-year Democratic House majority by laying out a 10-item agenda known as the Contract with America. What Democrats are campaigning on this year is a Non-Contract with America -- mostly generalities about 'helping the middle class' and 'ending the corruption in Washington.' As a campaign strategy, this may well pay off. But if they do win, Democrats will have to fill their campaign vacuum with something, and the best clue to what that would be is what they've already proposed."

White House Reportedly Trimming 2008 Army Budget Request. The New York Times (10/28, Cloud, 1.21M) reports White House budget officials "are planning on asking for a $121 billion budget for the Army next year, not the $138 billion that senior Army officials have been seeking, two senior Pentagon officials said. Army officials were told of the decision in an Oct. 19 memorandum from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England, which noted that changes in the Army allotment were still possible, as deliberations continued over the Bush administration's budget for the 2008 fiscal year, said officials who had seen the memorandum. The Army budget figure was first reported by Bloomberg News." The Times adds, "it appears that the preliminary decision to scale back the annual budget request for the Army could be offset later in the year, in a so-called supplemental appropriation like those Congress has passed every year since 2001. The extra money in those bills has financed the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as unanticipated costs elsewhere."

Rice Said To Rely On Zelikow To Provide Policy Alternatives. A profile in today's New York Times (10/28, Cooper, Sanger, 1.21M) reports, "For the last 18 months, Philip D. Zelikow has churned out confidential memorandums and proposals for his boss and close friend, Condoleezza Rice, that often depart sharply from the Bush administration's current line." Zelikow's "ideas would have found a more natural home under President George H. W. Bush, for whom [he and] Rice worked on the staff of the National Security Council. They reflect a sense that American influence is perishable, and can be damaged by overreaching, as allies and other partners react against decisions made in Washington. They form a kind of foreign policy realism that was eclipsed in Mr. Bush's first term, in favor of a more ideological, unilateral ethos, but that has made something of a comeback in his second term."

OTHER NEWS:

Slow GDP Growth Blamed On Weak Housing Market. ABC World News (10/27, story 2, 3:30, Gibson,

DOJ_NMG_0088368

8.78M) reported, "Economists expressed some surprise when analysts released figures showing that the gross domestic product of the country rose 1.6%. That's the weakest showi in the economy in four years. The reason, the slumping housing market. If housing was factored out, the GDP would have been more than 1% higher. ABC's Barbara Pinto on how wide-spread is the housing slump."

The CBS Evening News (10/27, story 4, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The Bush administration today put out one of the last vague economic numbers before the election. It shows the economy slowed sharply in the third quarter of this year growing at an annual rate of just 1.6%. The slowest in more than three years."

The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 6, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The news on the economy tonight is not good. Gross domestic product, GDP., the broadest measure of the nation's economic growth slowed to a crawl in the third quarter clocking in at an annual rate of 1.6%. That's the worst showing in more than three years. The weak housing market is cited as the main culprit here."

The Washington Post (10/28, A1, Henderson, 748K) reports, "The cooling housing market sent a chill through the economy in the third quarter, helping to slow growth to its weakest pace in more than three years, the government said yesterday. The nation's gross domestic product…expanded at a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate in the quarter, down from a moderate 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter, the Commerce Department reported. In the first three months of the year, the economy grew at a sizzling 5.6 percent annual rate. With less than two weeks to go before the midterm congressional elections, the report instantly became campaign ammunition. Democrats emphasized the slowdown while Republicans highlighted signs of economic strength." The Post adds, "Home building plunged at a 17.4 percent annual rate in the third quarter, the steepest fall in four consecutive quarters of declines, the report showed. … Heading into the final campaign stretch, President Bush and other Republicans have emphasized the good economic news, such as the low 4.6 percent unemployment rate, rising incomes and falling oil prices."

The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A3, 2.03M) reports, "Economists chalked up the weak GDP reading to the housing slump and growing trade deficit. Some focused on the positive: Consumers were spending and there's potential for growth. But not everyone is sold that a rebound is in the works. … With midterm elections less than two weeks away, the report also sparked debate. Some economists said a long period of tepid growth is in store, citing an expected decrease in production in the housing and auto sectors. Others said recession is a possibility. Yet, many economists predicted the economy will bounce back during the current quarter, particularly if gasoline prices don't soar again." The Financial Times (10/28, Guha) reports, "Inflation pressures eased a little, with the core personal consumption expenditure deflator rising at an annualised rate of 2.3 per cent, down from 2.7 per cent."

Gutierrez Contends US Economy Is Strong Despite "Housing Correction." The New York Times (10/28, Porter, 1.21M) reports, "evidence of a decline in inflation coupled with vigorous consumer spending left most economists saying that the overall economy is unlikely to be dragged into a recession even as the housing market continues to falter. … With the midterm elections little more than a week away, the Bush administration sought to persuade voters that the economy, while beating at a slower pace, remains healthy. 'We have a very strong, large resilient economy that can absorb a housing correction,' said Carlos M. Gutierrez, the commerce secretary. 'If you isolate the impact of the housing correction and look at all the rest, those are solid numbers.' But Democrats seized on the report to criticize the administration's economic management."

Consumer Sentiment Improves. The Washington Times (10/28, Hill, 88K) reports, " The steep downturn in the housing market took its toll on the economy in the summer quarter. … Consumers have been bolstered by a record fast drop in oil and gasoline prices since Labor Day, and a move by the Dow Jones Industrial Average to surpass its previous record high set in 2000. A measure of consumer sentiment published by the University of Michigan yesterday showed an uptick in response to both developments, which may stimulate stronger consumer spending in the final quarter of the year."

Blunt Frustrated By Public Perception Of Economy. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt said on Fox News (10/27, Scott), "It's been one of the frustrations for me for the last couple of years, that the true story of the economy I think hasn't gotten across to the American people. So many people for so long responded to polls, a significant number of people saying they thought that the economy was great for them, but based on everything they were hearing and reading, they knew it had to be bad. And I think there is a settling in here over the last several weeks of how strong this economy is."

GDP Report Causes Stocks To Move Lower. The New York Times/AP (10/28) reports, "Stocks pulled back yesterday after a government report stirred concerns that the economy may be slowing too much. … While investors expected that yesterday's advance reading on gross domestic product from the Commerce Department would show slowing growth, the report underscored concern that a cooling housing market could spill over into other parts of the economy." The Dow Jones industrial average "was down 73.40 points, or 0.60 percent, at 12,090.26. The average had achieved a new high close in each of the previous four sessions and in 13 of the previous 18 sessions. Broader stock indicators also moved lower yesterday. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 11.74 points, or 0.85 percent, to 1,377.34, and the Nasdaq composite index fell 28.48 points, or 1.20 percent, to 2,350.62." The Wall Street Journal (10/28, B1, Anand, 2.03M) reports October "is shaping up as the blue-chip average's strongest month in more than a year. The Dow industrials are up 3.52% in October. If that holds up it would be the best month since July 2005. … The last few weeks' gains have been driven largely by strong corporate earnings, coupled with falling gasoline prices and the perception of a benign economy."

DOJ_NMG_0088369

Dollar Loses Value Due To Concerns Arising From GDP Report. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, B2, Molinski, 2.03M) reports, "The dollar dropped to a one-month low against the yen Friday as worries of a slowing U.S. economy boosted the chances of interest-rate cuts next year by the Federal Reserve. The dollar's downward spiral was triggered by a weaker-than-expected third-quarter gross-domestic-product report, which sent the dollar to the one-month low of 117.13 yen, while the euro hit a three-week high at $1.2751. The dollar recovered slightly against its rivals later in the session, but remained overall in negative territory. Speaking on CNBC television shortly after the data were released, U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson sought to reassure markets, saying the U.S. economy was 'healthy,' but many currency analysts weren't convinced."

Gasoline Prices Expected To Rise Over The Next Week. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A5, Levine, 2.03M) reports, "Wholesale gasoline prices have shot up over the past week, and prices at the pump may soon follow. U.S. prices have dropped an average of 27% to $2.20 a gallon of regular gas Friday from a peak of $3.03 a gallon in August, according to the AAA, the motorist organization. … But the retail price slide may be coming to a halt. Wholesale gasoline prices have risen 8.9% over the past 10 days, to $1.56 a gallon in New York Mercantile Exchange trading Friday. Spot crude-oil prices, meanwhile, have gone up 5.4% over the past nine days period, to $60.75 a barrel Friday, stemming a plunge that had taken the price from $77.03 a barrel in July to $57.22 a barrel Oct. 12. There's often a 10-day or two-week time lag before changes in the wholesale gasoline market show up at the pump. And more than a week of data is needed to mark a trend in the volatile energy market." The Journal notes, "the average U.S. price of regular gasoline rose a little over a penny Thursday and Friday, to $2.20 a gallon, the first consecutive-day increases since the first week of August, according to the AAA."

OPEC Likely To Reduce Production. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, B5, Chambers, 2.03M) reports, "After losing a quarter of its value from record highs, crude oil has very likely bottomed for the year as the northern hemisphere winter ushers in the prospect of a modest resurgence in prices. Growing belief in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' ability to cut oil production and the advent of cold temperatures whittling away high U.S. oil stockpiles pushed prices above $60 a barrel again this week. Oil was given additional support Friday by reports that Saudi Arabia and Bahrain are leading a deployment of naval forces in the Persian Gulf after receiving information suggesting 'a strong possibility' that insurgents may attack a major oil-loading facility in Saudi Arabia. The warning served as a reminder of oil's vulnerability to terror threats."

Campaigns Turn Increasingly Nasty As Parties Joust For Control. All three networks led their Friday broadcasts with California's fires, but coverage of the upcoming midterm elections made up a major part of subsequent reporting. Much of the focus was on the Virginia US Senate race, though the increasing negativity of close races across the country is receiving a lot of attention.

The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 3, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We turn now to politics, to this increasingly bitter campaign season with just 11 days to go now, and it's getting even uglier out there. The close Virginia Senate race is just one case in point. The Republican George Allen attacking sexually graphic passages from two novels that Democrat Jim Webb wrote about his Vietnam War experiences." NBC (Reid) continued, "Jim Webb, a highly decorated Marine in Vietnam, wrote a series of war novels, but now that he's in a close race for the U.S. Senate in Virginia, sexually graphic passages from his books have become campaign fodder. … In Tennessee, Republicans are no longer running this ad." Campaign ad: "Harold, call me." NBC (Reid) continued, "Supporters of Harold Ford called it racist, but Republicans switched it with this." Campaign ad: "He campaigns in a church. But took cash from Hollywood's top x-rated porn moguls." NBC (Reid) continued, "Some Democrats are doing it, too. This from Chris Carney of Pennsylvania." Campaign ad: "She made a 911 call alleging that he had choked her. Sherwood campaigned on family values. He has no family values." NBC (Reid) continued, "Republican Don Sherwood admits he had a mistress but denies he choked her. Negative campaigning can backfire especially when it looks like a desperation tactic but political analysts say the reason there's so many negative ads out there is because most of the time, they work."

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Simon, Alonso-Zaldivar, 918K) writes that in the "waning days of this year's closely contested midterm election, attacks aimed at impugning a candidate's character and morals are increasingly dominating campaigns, raising questions about the appropriate boundaries and tenor of the debate." University of Pennsylvania political scientist Don Kettl said, "We've reached the point where negative ads have become more important than positive campaigns, and there's almost no line left to cross. If it's there to be found, the highly paid opposition researchers will find it. And if they find it, they'll use it." But NRCC spokesman Carl Forti was more direct. "Negative ads work, which is why you see so many of them," Forti said.

DOJ_NMG_0088370

Analysts Still Give Democrats Overall Edge. As the midterm campaign season nears its close, political observers continue to update their projections. On Friday, the Cook Political Report moved the Maryland Senate race between Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin and Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele from "leans Democratic" to "toss-up," saying the race "is closer than most observers expected it to be." Cook also moved FL13, NY24, and OH18 from "toss-up" to "lean Democratic," and moved FL16 from "leans Democratic" to "toss-up." Meanwhile the Rothenberg Political Report updated its overall projections Friday, saying Democrats will gain 18-28 House seats, "with the caveat that larger gains surely are possible," four to seven Senate seats, and six to 10 governorships.

Earlier Friday, the White House Bulletin updated its list of how Cook, Rothenberg, Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia, and CQ Politics handicappers are rating the House races, and formed a composite rating based on their picks. Almost all the movement was toward the Democrats, and there are now nine GOP-held seats either likely or leaning Democratic, and another 19 in the toss-up category. There are no Democratic seats currently favoring the Republicans or in the toss-up category. In addition, three new races previously considered safe for the Republicans, CA50, IN3, and NY25, were added to the toss-up list.

Meanwhile, the Democratic Democracy Corps said Friday that a "wealth of new public poll releases confirm that Democrats hold a commanding and stable lead in the race for Congress." Democrats "have slipped slightly in the generic congressional contest this week but still lead by 15 points and attract a clear majority of 53 percent across the most recent seven surveys."

Reliability Of Polls Examined. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A5, 2.03M) examines the reliability of polls in past years, noting that in 1994, "few pundits predicted the landslide. In July 1994, the Pew Research Center said that 47% of voters would likely vote Democratic, while 45% would vote Republican. By November, the poll showed Republicans ahead by just two percentage points."

Democrats Outraised Republicans In Early October, But Still Lag In Cash On Hand. The Washington Post (10/28, A8, Birnbaum, 748K) reports that while Democrats "continued to raise large amounts of campaign cash this month," it was "not enough to erase the Republicans' multimillion-dollar lead." Democratic committees outraised Republican committees during the first 18 days of October, gathering $25.9 million while Republicans collected $18.6 million. But the "last-minute fundraising surge was not enough to overcome the GOP's earlier fundraising advantage. The three national Republican Party committees had $17 million more cash on hand than their Democratic counterparts as of Oct. 18."

The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A2, Cummings, 2.03M) says the "rush of final campaign spending next week will provide important clues to where the Republican firewall against a Democratic takeover of the Senate is shifting -- and whether Republicans are even trying to build one to protect their House majority." The Journal raises a few "big Senate questions: Now that the Republican Party has decided to stop investing in Ohio, where incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine is trailing in polls, where does the money go? Will the party divert big money from the Buckeye State to make a last stand in Tennessee, where Republican Bob Corker is fighting to hold the seat of departing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, or double-down its bet on Virginia Sen. George Allen?"

Corporate Donors Shift Giving To Democrats. The New York Times (10/28, Zeleny, Pilhofer, 1.21M) reports, "Corporate America is already thinking beyond Election Day, increasing its share of last-minute donations to Democratic candidates and quietly devising strategies for how to work with Democrats if they win control of Congress." The "shift in political giving, for the first 18 days of October, has not been this pronounced in the final stages of a campaign" since the 1994 Republican sweep.

Capitol Hill's GOP Centrists Fear Their Small Ranks Will Dwindle Even More. The New York Times (10/28, Hulse, 1.21M) reports Republican Senate and House centrists, "facing the loss of fellow moderates" in November, are "faulting Congressional and party leaders for pursuing a strategy dominated by conservative themes. Leading moderates say Republicans concentrated on social wedge issues like same-sex marriage while pressing national security almost to the exclusion of popular wage and health policies that could have helped endangered Republicans in the Northeast and the Midwest." Two GOP senators seen as moderates, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Mike DeWine of Ohio, "are in serious jeopardy. Two leading House moderates are retiring, another lost a primary, and at least six others are in difficult re-election fights in Connecticut, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and elsewhere." Sen. Olympia Snowe said, "There wasn't an impetus to help develop a political and legislative plan that incorporated the broad umbrella of philosophy in our party. I think they always operated under the wrong assumption that you just appeal to the base and no more than that."

DNC Ramps Up Outreach To Black Voters. The Washington Times (10/28, Debose, 88K) reports the DNC "is hiring more black advertisers, pollsters and grass-roots operatives in a revamped effort to increase turnout by black voters." Spokeswoman Amaya Smith said, "There are a lot of races that will be impacted by African-American and Hispanic voters in crucial states, and we had a lot of candidates stress that they need these votes to win. … We are reaching out to people who we know are our voters but may not have come out in the last election."

DOJ_NMG_0088371

Director Zucker Making Internet Spots For RNC. The Washington Times (10/28, Ballon, 88K) reports David Zucker, director of comedies like "Airplane!" and "The Naked Gun," is "now focusing his camera to mock Democrats in political ads." The "one-time liberal activist" and former campaign adviser to President Clinton is now making Internet ads for the RNC. Zucker "defected to the Republican Party after the September 11 attacks, supported President Bush in 2004 and has become more vocal in his beliefs -- disregarding the possible impact on his career in Hollywood, a liberal haven."

Allen Camp Hits Webb Over Explicit Passages In His Novels. The CBS Evening News (10/27, story 3, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "It's 11 days and counting until the midterm elections. And Virginia's wild Senate race could help determine the balance of power in Congress. In this one as in so many others as we come down to the wire, everything seems to be fair game." CBS (Borger) continued, "Consider it one more race stuck in the muck. Today it was Virginia's turn. Republican Senator George Allen's campaign sent out a press release detailing steamy sex scenes in novels written over the last 30 years by opponent Jim Webb. … But wait a minute, this race was supposed to be about issues. Mostly Iraq."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (10/27, King) reported, "With control of Congress at stake, many races are not only close; they're downright ugly. That, of course, is nothing new. What is new, though, is how a work of fiction is becoming fact in one vicious campaign. It's in Virginia, where the Republican incumbent, under fire for his own remarks, wants voters to know what his Democratic challenger wrote years ago. The writing is explicit and shocking. It's also purely made up, fiction."

The Washington Post (10/28, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports on its front page that Sen. George Allen, facing a tight race in Virginia, has accused Democratic rival James Web of "writing inappropriate sex scenes and demeaning descriptions of women in his fictional books." The Post says the "allegations about sex-laced passages" in five of Webb's historical novels "inject a new question into a campaign that has centered almost exclusively on character issues: Should the author of a fictional work who runs for office be personally held to account for the scenes in his books?" Webb said in response, "To take these things out and pull excerpts out and force them on people…is just a classic example of the way this campaign is run. Literature is literature. I've made my career as a novelist. George Allen doesn't have a record to run on."

The New York Times (10/28, Hernandez, 1.21M) says the Allen campaign "issued a news release that quoted the passages and called them 'very disturbing for a candidate hoping to represent families of Virginians.'" The release "also asserted that Mr. Webb's writings were filled with 'chauvinistic attitudes and sexually exploitive references.'" As part of their response, Democrats circulated comments by Sen.John McCain "praising one of the novels, 'Lost Soldiers,' that the Allen campaign had singled out because it described a provocative scene involving a boy." Webb also "attacked Mr. Allen personally. 'You ought to read what George Allen's sister wrote about him if you want to read about attitudes toward females,' he said, alluding to an autobiography by Jennifer Allen in which she describes her brother as a bully who once dragged her upstairs by her hair because she had defied her father at bedtime."

The Washington Times (10/28, McLaughlin, 88K) adds that Webb "said he was warned by friends before entering the race that the 2 million words he has published made him an opposition researcher's dream and that they would be taken out of context to be used against him."

Allen Leads Webb By One Point In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 24, shows Sen. George (R) at 49% and James Webb (D) at 48%.

Lynne Cheney Spars With Blitzer Over Her Own Novel. Second Lady Lynne Cheney, appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (10/27, Blitzer), said, "Jim Webb is full of baloney. I have never written anything sexually explicit. His novels are full of sexual, explicit references to incest, sexually explicit references -- well, you know, I just don't want my grandchildren to turn on the television set. This morning, Imus was reading from the novels, and it's triple-X rated." Blitzer: "Here's what the Democratic Party put out today, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee: 'Lynne Cheney's book featured brothels and attempted rape. In 1981, Vice President Dick Cheney's wife, Lynne, wrote a book called 'Sisters,' which featured a lesbian love affair, brothels and attempted rapes.'" Cheney: "No." Blitzer: "'In 1988, Lynn Cheney wrote about a Republican vice president who dies of a heart attack while having sex with his mistress.' Is that true?" Cheney: "Nothing explicit. And actually, that was full of lies." Blitzer: "But you did write a book entitled 'Sisters'? .. And it did have lesbian characters?" Cheney: "This description -- no, not necessarily. This description is a lie. I'll stand on that."

Dowd Mocks Allen's Charges Against Webb. In her New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "Candidates around the country have been race-baiting, gay-baiting, Michael J. Fox-baiting and Hispanic-baiting. But now it has come to this: Republicans are novel-baiting. Still trying to recover his balance, after slipping on a macaca and admitting he was a Jewish bubba, one criticized for using racist language, displaying a Confederate flag at home and keeping a hangman's noose at his old law office, Senator George Allen of Virginia unleashed a vicious attack on Jim Webb Thursday night. He called him a fiction writer."

DOJ_NMG_0088372

Unlike 2004, Values Issues Not On Ohio's Radar This Year. The Washington Post (10/28, B9, Koff, Sloat, 748K) reports that in Ohio, where in 2004 "Republicans fused love of God and love of country into such a potent political message" that Democrats "were discombobulated," this year voters seem more concerned with the economy and the war in Iraq. Not much is "being said on the campaign trail about the 'three G's' -- gays, guns and God -- in any part of Ohio," and in the state's conservative southwest, "barely a peep is heard about abortion or other social issues." However, on its front page, the Wall Street Journal (10/28, Calmes, 2.03M) says evangelicals are trying to excite their base in the state. The "turnout machine that has pulled evangelical conservatives to the polls in massive numbers is churning away, and for a reason little appreciated outside their circles: the sense that voting is their Christian duty."

"Daily Show" To Broadcast From Ohio Next Week. The AP (10/28) reports Comedy Central's "Daily Show" will spend the last week before the election broadcasting from Ohio. Host Jon Stewart said, "We wanted to go there because Ohio was so crucial last time. They were sort of the focal point, the swing state, if you will." Stewart said "many of the big-name politicians the show approached -- including U.S. Sens. George Voinovich and Mike DeWine, Gov. Bob Taft and gubernatorial candidates Ted Strickland and Ken Blackwell -- declined."

Judge Rules Ohio Exit Polling Rules Are Legal. The New York Times/AP (10/28) reports Federal District Court Judge Michael Watson, who had struck down Ohio rules on exit polling, "ruled Friday that revised guidelines for the practice were legal, rejecting a call for clarification by the national news media."

Steele's Pediatrician Sister Defends Him On Stem Cells In TV Ad. The New York Times (10/28, Rutenberg, 1.21M) examines an ad for Maryland Republican Senate candidate Michael Steele, which responds to an ad for Democrat Ben Cardin that featured Michael J. Fox accusing Steele "of wanting to 'put limits on the most promising stem cell research.'" In the ad, pediatrician Monica Turner, Steele's sister, says Steele "does support stem cell research, and he cares deeply for those who suffer from disease," then says she herself has multiple sclerosis. The Times says the "Cardin advertisement with Mr. Fox was a powerful repudiation of Mr. Steele, given by one of the nation's leading advocates for stem cell research. But Mr. Steele's sister would seem no less effective in this ad defending her brother, in calm but firm terms."

Third-Party Maryland Candidate Does Not Want To Be A "Spoiler." The Washington Times (10/28, Miller, 88K) reports Kevin Zeese, running for the US Senate in Maryland as the coalition candidate of three minor parties, said his campaign "is gaining momentum because of gaffes" by Cardin. Zeese, who is at about six percent in recent polls, "bristled at the suggestion that he could cost Mr. Cardin the election by fracturing the congressman's liberal voter base." Zeese said, "I'm certainly not going to be a spoiler. It is a question of people hearing me. If they hear me, I'll win."

Bloomberg Lends Campaign Operatives To Lieberman. The New York Times (10/28, Cardwell, 1.21M) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman "is deploying a secret weapon" in the final days of his run for reelection as an independent: a "sophisticated operation to identify and turn out voters, courtesy of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg." The "Bloomberg group includes several top-level operatives who played key roles in the mayor's decisive re-election last year or who are in the administration, and have taken leaves from their jobs to work on Mr. Lieberman's campaign." The team has helped to "open campaign offices, devised a strategy to reach voters and are corralling enough volunteers to cover 2,800 shifts at more than 700 polling sites on Election Day." The Times says that since Lieberman "does not have a party apparatus to help build his field operation, the efforts of the Bloomberg team could prove critical in one of the most closely watched races in the nation." The Times links Bloomberg's support for Lieberman with talk of a 2008 Bloomberg presidential run, saying that the "workers on loan are the most vivid example yet" of how Bloomberg "could build a permanent political apparatus to support like-minded independent candidates across the country -- if not a national bid for himself."

Whitehouse Leads Chafee By 10 Points In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 25, shows Sheldon Whitehouse (D) at 43% and Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R) at 33%. Two weeks ago, Whitehouse led by just three points.

Party Label Dragging Chafee Down In Rhode Island. The Washington Times (10/28, Fagan, 88K) reports on the Rhode Island Senate race. While Chafee "often bucks Republicans on issues from taxes to abortion and voted against the Iraq war," Whitehouse "has tried to paint him as a boon to the Republican majority and Mr. Bush's agenda -- a theme that seems to have resonated."

DOJ_NMG_0088373

Corker Leads Ford By One Point In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 25, shows Bob Corker (R) at 47% and Rep. Harold Ford, Jr., at 46%.

Wal-Mart Cuts Ties With GOP Strategist Involved With Anti-Ford Ad. The New York Times (10/28, Barbaro, 1.21M) reports Wal-Mart said Friday night "that it had cut ties with a prominent Republican strategist," Terry Nelson, who helped make the now-pulled RNC ad mocking Ford. The Times says Wal-Mart was "under pressure from black leaders and union groups" to dissociate itself from Nelson.

Wamp Says Corker "Has The Momentum." Rep. Zach Wamp said on Fox News (10/27, Colby), "I know both these guys better than anybody. I've known Bob Corker for 20 years and I've known Harold Ford for 10 years. They're both sharp, smart. I like them both a whole lot. But I think the decision's going to be: Who is going to represent Tennessee values in the way they carry themselves and they vote? And that's why Bob Corker has the momentum right now."

Talent Leads McCaskill By Two Points In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 25, shows Missouri Sen. Jim Talent (R) at 48% and State Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) at 46%.

Santorum Says He Is "Running Full-Tilt." Sen. Rick Santorum said on MSNBC (10/27, Cosby), "My opponent's doing two campaign events a week. I repeat that -- two a week. I'm just running full-tilt. I know I have to earn this job every six years -- and not just every six years, every day during the six years. And my opponent has a very famous name. His father was the governor. And he's won elections because of the last name. And he thinks that's going to win him this one, and I think the people of Pennsylvania are going to give him a little surprise on Election Day."

In Indiana, Local Issues Hurting GOP House Candidates. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A4, Schatz, 2.03M) runs a feature on House races in usually Republican Indiana, where three GOP incumbents -- Chris Chocola, John Hostettler, and Mike Sodrel – are in tight contests. Voters are dissatisfied with how the GOP-led state government "has handled local issues," and "Democratic challengers are successfully tapping into that sentiment to sway voters, and turning local issues into a decisive factor here at a time when global issues such as terrorism and the Iraq war continue to dominate in races across the country."

Kuhl Facing Tough Contest In Usually GOP-Solid NY29. The New York Times (10/28, Santos, 1.21M) reports that in NY29, where President Bush won 56% of the vote in 2004, his highest share in any district in the state, Republican Rep. Randy Kuhl "faces a spirited challenge from a Democratic newcomer, Eric Massa." The national GOP "has stepped up efforts to safeguard Mr. Kuhl's seat, which has long seemed comfortably secure. Last month, Vice President Dick Cheney flew to Rochester for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kuhl," and First Lady Laura Bush "is scheduled to campaign for him" today. Massa has "stepped up fund-raising efforts, with noteworthy success. He raised $171,000 from Sept. 30 to Oct. 18, or nearly three times as much as Mr. Kuhl, who collected $65,000."

Ballot Measures Could Boost Democrats This Year. The Washington Post (10/28, Goldfarb, Broder, 748K) reports on its front page that ballot initiatives, which in 2004 tended to bring Republican voters to the polls, could benefit Democrats this year. Measures to increase the minimum wage "are before voters in six states," and "four of those, Arizona, Ohio, Missouri and Montana, feature close Senate races with a GOP incumbent. In Missouri, moreover, a measure backing stem cell research is ahead in the polls -- which Democrats say could lift their candidate." While eight states have ballot measures to ban same-sex marriage, "their impact may be less than in previous years. Few of these states have competitive Senate or House races. And in those that do, such as Virginia and Tennessee, the issue is not as prominent as it was around the country in 2004." The Washington Post (10/28, B1, Jenkins, 748K) runs a report on the campaigns over the Virginia gay marriage ballot question, while BBC.com (10/27) runs down ballot measures before voters across the US.

NYTimes Backs Rhode Island Ballot Measure On Felons' Voting Rights. The New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "Rhode Island voters will have a chance on Nov. 7 to do the right thing and amend their state Constitution to restore voting rights to felons who have completed their prison sentences. Allowing former convicts to vote strengthens democracy, and helps them to integrate into society and move beyond a life of crime."

Small Colorado Newspaper Reverses Stance On Gay Marriage Amendment. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Simon, 918K) reports Colorado's Grand Junction Daily Sentinel "last week urged voters to reject a proposed state constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage," saying the "traditional concept of marriage is not endangered in this state." But on Friday, the "editorial page editor, Bob Silbernagel, said he had changed his mind." Silbernagel said he "was jolted" by the New Jersey Supreme Court decision on same-sex partnership rights. So he "dashed off a six-paragraph retraction of his earlier editorial. The new piece informed the Daily Sentinel's 30,000 readers that Amendment 43 was 'a virtual necessity.'"

DOJ_NMG_0088374

"Rising Star" Obama Swings Through Los Angeles. Under the headline "A Rising Star From Illinois Makes Some Noise In L.A." the Los Angeles Times (10/28, Hall, 918K) reports Sen. Barack Obama "swung through Los Angeles on Friday," addressing a "rapt crowd" at the California African American Museum, speaking at a news conference at USC, and then delivering "a 14-minute speech in shirt sleeves at a campus rally with Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and just about every other California Democratic office holder who could find their way to USC."

Schwarzenegger Seen As Having Made Big Comeback. The NBC Nightly News (10/27, story 5, 3:50, Brokaw, 9.87M) interviewed Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, asking, "As a Republican governor of nation's largest state do you feel very close to the Republican Administration of George W. Bush?" Schwarzenegger: "We try to work together with the Bush Administration on many, many different issues and there's many issues that we're doing really well with and there's many issues that we're fighting over." Brokaw: "A very big issue, the environment and especially global warming. You're a long way from the Bush Administration policies in those areas." Schwarzenegger: "There's no one in the federal government that is criticizing us. We have to make sure we're less reliant on fossil fuel, on foreign oil and domestic oil as far as that goes." Brokaw: "Campaigning is very expensive and Schwarzenegger has raised more than $100 million, much of it from the insurance industry, developers and others with business with the state. You said you wouldn't take any money from special interest." Schwarzenegger: "I said there would be a different story when I get in there because I'm financially independent so I cannot be bought. No such thing as money in and favors out."

ABC World News (10/27, story 4, 16:00, Gibson, 8.78M) said that "for a while, one of the GOP's marquee names, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, was on the endangered list. But he has now opened a 17-point lead in the polls. The turnaround began once he started displaying a quality you don't associate with the former Terminator: humility.

California Gubernatorial Hopefuls Fight Over "Green" Credentials. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Reiterman, 918K) reports on how both Schwarzenegger and Angelides are trying to claim the "green" mantle in California. Schwarzenegger, the "pro-business Hummer aficionado and former movie star," has "used his office to undertake high-profile initiatives for air quality and the protection of ocean and forestland," but critics say his "less visible actions sometimes have belied his lofty words." Meanwhile, Angelides, "a hybrid-driving former developer who has bumped heads with conservationists, has employed the financial clout of two of the nation's largest pension funds -- with far less fanfare -- to establish himself as a 'green' investor."

Perry Leads Bell By 11 Points In Texas Gubernatorial Poll. A Rasmussen Reports roll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 23, finds Gov. Rick Perry (R) leading the Texas gubernatorial field with 36%, followed by ex-Rep. Chris Bell (D) at 25%, Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn (I) at 22%, and author Kinky Friedman (I) at 12%.

Faso Ad Blasts Spitzer Over Ties To Hevesi. The New York Times (10/28, Healy, 1.21M) examines an ad for New York Republican gubernatorial candidate John Faso that ties Democrat Eliot Spitzer, the heavy favorite, to Democratic State Comptroller Alan Hevesi, who faces ethics questions. The ad says Spitzer "has one set of standards for his friends and another for everyone else. … Hevesi knowingly and intentionally broke the law, stealing tens of thousands of dollars from taxpayers. But when Sheriff of Wall Street had a chance to investigate and call for Hevesi's resignation, Spitzer said no.'" The Times says "hammering Mr. Spitzer with the Hevesi scandal could score points, and the ad does so effectively. Still, making hay over the comptroller may not lead many voters to support a candidate they do not know well (Mr. Faso) over one who has high favorability ratings (Mr. Spitzer)."

WSJournal Notes Hevesi's Record As "Corporate Scold." The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A6, 2.03M) in an editorial, notes that Hevesi "was recently found to have used a public employee at taxpayer expense to chauffeur his wife around for three years. Mr. Hevesi somehow failed to disclose this personal use of public assets, and he has since claimed he merely 'forgot' to reimburse the state. … We'd normally ignore this kind of state government corruption. But Mr. Hevesi's spectacle is instructive because in recent years he has been one of America's loudest corporate scolds. As Comptroller, he supervises the state's pension money and he has used that post to slam corporate officials who played even tangential roles in corporate scandals."

Hand Sanitizer Becomes A Must On The Campaign Trail. The New York Times (10/28, Leibovich, 1.21M) runs a light feature on the "germs, parasites and all the bacterial unpleasantness" that get spread around through campaign-trail "glad-handing and flesh-pressing." Anne Ryun, wife of Rep. Jim Ryun, "has become obsessive about using hand sanitizer," like "so many other people involved in politics these days." She squirted "antiseptic goop" on people lined up to meet Vice President Cheney at a Topeka fundraiser this month, and when Cheney "was done meeting and greeting, he, too, rubbed his hands vigorously with the stuff, dispensed in dollops by an aide when the vice president was out of public view. That has become routine in this peak season of handshaking, practiced by everyone from the most powerful leaders to the lowliest hopefuls. Politics is personal at all levels, and germs do not discriminate."

DOJ_NMG_0088375

Court To Hear Appeal From Parents Of Autistic Child. The New York Times/AP (10/28, Press) reports the Supreme Court "agreed Friday to consider an appeal by an autistic child and his parents, who want to sue over his school accommodations without hiring a lawyer. The parents, Jeff and Sandee Winkelman, say they cannot afford a lawyer to argue their court case against the school district of Parma, Ohio, near Cleveland, over the education of their son, Jacob. The federal appeals court in Cincinnati ruled that the Winkelmans, suing under the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act, had to find a lawyer to represent Jacob, although other federal courts have ruled differently in cases involving that law. The Bush administration then urged the justices to take the case, saying that in adopting the measure, Congress clearly intended that parents be able to represent their children in such court proceedings."

Bill Clinton Plans Birthday-Weekend Fundraisers For His Causes. The New York Times (10/28, Healy, Konigsberg, 1.21M) reports ex-President Clinton "is making another king-of-the-world swing through Manhattan this weekend, doing two of the things he does best: reveling in adulation and raising money. Over three days of festivities to mark his 60th birthday -- which include a golf tournament and a concert by the Rolling Stones at the Beacon Theater -- Mr. Clinton expects to bring in more than $20 million for his foundation's array of philanthropic projects."

Dixie Chicks Documentary Garners Free Publicity From Networks. The Washington Post's Lisa de Moraes (10/28, C1) writes, "NBC and CW networks became unwitting stealth-marketing partners with the Weinstein Co. when they refused to air ads for the film company's upcoming docu-flick about the storm that erupted when the Dixie Chicks' lead singer said in a 2003 concert she was ashamed President Bush was from her home state of Texas. … It all started earlier this week when Weinstein submitted ads for its new Barbara Kopple documentary 'Shut Up & Sing' to the broadcast networks for review by their standards and practices departments. NBC said it 'cannot accept these spots as they are disparaging to President Bush.'"

Los Angeles Clergy Sex Abuse Cases Settled For $10 Million. The New York Times (10/28, Banerjee) reports, "The Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Los Angeles and a Catholic religious order have agreed to pay $10 million to settle claims made by seven victims of sexual abuse by clergy members, lawyers for the parties involved said Friday." The Times continues, "While the amount per victim is large relative to payments made to settle sexual abuse cases in other parts of the country, it is typical of the sums paid in California, which has a taken a strong stance toward the Catholic Church in abuse cases. In 2003, for example, the state extended its statute of limitations for child sexual abuse cases, and the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office has been conducting a criminal investigation into the archdiocese since 2002." The Times adds, "More than 95 percent of the $10 million settlement will be paid by the religious order, the Carmelites, Province of the Most Pure Heart of Mary, which is based in Darien, Ill. The archdiocese will pay less than 5 percent, lawyers for the plaintiffs and the order said. … The settlement for the most part is not covered by the Carmelites' insurance, said Jim Geoly, the order's lawyer, adding that the order might have to borrow money to pay the sum. … The seven plaintiffs accused four Carmelite priests and one Carmelite brother of sexual abuse in a period from the early 1950s to the late 1970s."

South Korean Media Cite "Activity" At North Korean Nuclear Site. The AP (10/28, Lim) carries South Korean media reports that officials in Seoul "have observed activities at the North's suspected nuclear test site that may be preparations for a second test." Anonymous sources "said Seoul is keeping a close watch on the movements of trucks and soldiers at the Punggye-ri site in the country's remote northeast." One "official confirmed activities at the site, but said another test 'is not believed to be imminent.'" The AP adds, "It was not immediately clear how the military officials first spotted the activity at the site. However, the United States and South Korea generally share intelligence information from satellite images."

Seoul Begins To Implement Sanctions. The New York Times (10/28, Fackler, 1.21M) continues reporting on South Korean efforts to "gingerly" implement the sanctions specified in United Nations Security Council Resolution 1718. "South Korea has taken a first step" by "banning visits by officials involved in the North's nuclear weapons program. And in a sign of how Seoul has struggled to carry out [the sanctions] without antagonizing the heavily armed North, a third top government official involved in North Korea offered to resign Friday over the test." The Times call the travel ban "largely symbolic in a country that gets few North Korean visitors at all, much less officials engaged in the North's covert nuclear weapons efforts. It falls short of American requests that South Korea join a United States-led effort to inspect North Korean ships for nuclear and missile-related technology." The Times adds, "In addition to not becoming involved in searching North Korean ships, Seoul also has so far balked at taking more punishing steps, like closing a South Korean-run industrial park and a tourist resort in North Korea, which are the North's largest economic contacts with the outside world."

DOJ_NMG_0088376

Tehran Confirms Uranium Enrichment Underway In Second Cascade. The New York Times (10/28, Fathi, 1.21M) notes a statement from a semi-official Iranian news agency that Tehran "has begun to enrich uranium in a second network of centrifuges, …in defiance of a United Nations Security Council demand that it halt its nuclear program." The ISNA Student News Agency said "Iran installed a second cascade of 164 centrifuges two weeks ago and successfully injected gas into it last week, theoretically doubling its enrichment capacity." President Bush "said he was aware of 'speculation' that Iran has started enriching uranium in a second network. 'Whether they doubled it or not, the idea of Iran having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable,' Mr. Bush said." Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov "said it was too early to speak about Iran being able to produce weapons-grade uranium." Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani "said Tehran was still willing to resolve its nuclear issue through negotiations," but "also rejected comments made by the foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, who said last week that Iran might consider suspending its program during negotiations." The Washington Post (10/28, A10, Lynch, 748K) includes a short piece focused on President Bush's statement.

The AP (10/28, Karimi) says Tehran issued "a defiant new message to the U.N. Security Council." The "State Department said it was up to the International Atomic Energy Agency to assess the reports. 'I cannot confirm those reports. We are not on the ground,' State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said." Also, French President Jacques Chirac "expressed support for sanctions against Iran but insisted that they be temporary and reversible." The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Karimi) runs the AP story.

Under the headline, "Iranian Nuclear Effort Defies U.N. Council Again," the Washington Post (10/28, A10, Lynch, 748K) adds Tehran "has once again defied the [UNSC's] repeated demands to halt its nuclear activities." The statement "came as U.N. negotiations became bogged down in the face of Russia's and China's reluctance to slap tough sanctions on Tehran. U.S. and European officials say they anticipate a long, hard diplomatic struggle over the coming weeks to fashion a formal reaction to Iran's enrichment activities."

Rice Says Hezbollah Must Disarm To Join Lebanese Politics. The AP (10/28) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "stepped up international pressure on Hezbollah to disarm, saying in a television interview aired Friday that the guerrilla group must surrender its weapons if it wants to remain part of Lebanon's political process." She "urged Hezbollah to lay down its arms according to the cease-fire that ended" the Israel-Hezbollah war, "and choose between being a militant group and a legitimate political organization." The AP says the group "is under heavy international pressure to surrender its weapons, but…has refused to disarm." Rice "also urged the Lebanese government to end what it called Hezbollah's 'state within a state' and prevent weapons from reaching the militant group." She later "warned that as Lebanon tries to rebuild, some people might try to destabilize its Western-backed government."

US Ambassador Said To Manage Difficult Portfolio In Caracas. The New York Times (10/28, Romero, 1.21M) profiles US Ambassador to Venezuela William Brownfield. "With relations between Washington and Caracas at a low ebb, Mr. Brownfield, a loquacious Texan and career diplomat, has one of the most challenging jobs of any American ambassador. Though at a career stage when some would prefer a plush embassy in a friendly country, Mr. Brownfield seems to relish the opportunity to engage Venezuelans on a street level." He finds "himself fighting an uphill battle almost wherever he goes." Venezuela, "paradoxically, maintains resilient commercial ties with the United States. Anti-American sentiment is often directed personally at" Brownfield, and "newspapers have dubbed him el Tejano, the Texan, a nod to his straightforward if ironic style in pressing ahead with his street diplomacy."

Bogota Undergoing Renaissance After Years Of Chaos. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Kraul, 918K) runs a feature on Bogota, saying the Colombian city was "once a world capital of mayhem" but is "now held up as a model." Ten years ago, Bogota's Bosa slum was home to "open sewage and gun-toting gangs bent on muggings and murder." But today, Bosa "has paved streets, new schools, health clinics and cafeterias, and links to a new mass transit system. … Like much of this re-energized capital of more than 7 million inhabitants, the war zone that was Bosa has been transformed." The Times credits "visionary leadership" from three recent mayors for "helping turn the city around."

Indigenous Supporters Turn Against Bolivia's Morales Over Coca Policy. The Washington Times (10/28, Arostegui, 88K) reports, "Indigenous coca farmers who helped put President Evo Morales in power are violently resisting even the token eradication efforts demanded by the United States to avoid Bolivia's decertification as a country cooperating against drug trafficking." Morales has overseen the implementation of "laws permitting peasant farmers to grow up to half an acre of coca for traditional use," but angry "farmers are backing demands for increased acreage with road blocks and gunfights that so far have killed two growers and wounded two police officers." Morales' "government…is divided on how to proceed," with some "elements" of the administration "concerned that as much as half the current coca production is being diverted into the production of cocaine for the illicit international market. The State Department publicly warned Mr. Morales during his visit to the United Nations in New York last month that Bolivia must eliminate 12,000 acres of coca cultivation or face decertification as a country cooperating against drug trafficking, which would mean a cutoff of aid.

DOJ_NMG_0088377

Pilots' Lawyer Says Brazilian Controllers Approved Altitude Before Fatal Crash. The New York Times (10/28, Prada, Wald, 1.21M) reports, "The lawyer representing the pilots of an American corporate jet that apparently collided with a Brazilian airliner on Sept. 29 said Friday that his clients were at their assigned altitude at the time of the crash, despite a flight plan that specified a different altitude." The Embraer "apparently clipped a Boeing 737" at 37,000 feet, causing the 737 to crash, "killing all 154 people on board." While Brazilian prosecutors claim the pilots deviated from their flight plan, the pilots told their American lawyer "that when they took off from the southeastern city of São José dos Campos, where their new plane had been made, they were given a clearance by Brazilian air traffic control that superseded the flight plan."

Paris Deploys Extra Police To Stem Rash Of Bus Burnings. The Washington Post (10/28, A9, Moore, 748K) notes French media reporting that "officials deployed 4,000 extra police officers in the country's poorest suburban areas Friday as the anniversary of last year's wave of arson attacks arrived with only scattered incidents of violence." The Post reports "several weeks of increasing tension in the suburban areas of Paris where residents -- most of whom are Arab and African immigrants and their French-born children -- have complained that the government had not lived up to promises it made, after last year's nationwide rampage, to improve living conditions and employment opportunities." Two public buses were attacked "in the northern suburbs of Paris early in the evening." The Post adds, "Allegations that the government has failed to respond adequately to demands for improvements in the poor suburbs, along with parallel concerns over security and an increasing Muslim population, are among the most contentious issues in the French presidential campaign."

Under the headline, "Speeches And Arson Recall Last Year's Unrest In France," the New York Times (10/28, Bernard, 1.21M) reports, "Hooded attackers burned two buses on Friday night in a city near this Paris suburb on the anniversary of the start of last year's suburban unrest." Before the bus attacks yesterday, "several hundred people in [a] poor suburb of Paris participated in a silent march in memory of two teenagers whose accidental deaths last year triggered three weeks of unrest that shook the country. In speeches after the march, local officials and family members of the teenagers called for calm." The Times says many mourners "expressed not only sadness over the deaths, but also disappointment with how little things had changed in France's tough suburbs." The violence last year "shed light on the plight of the country's underprivileged populations, mainly Arabs and black Africans and their French-born children, who feel disenfranchised."

The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Rubin, Sicakyuz, 918K) adds, "One word summed up the mood at the commemoration Friday of the deaths of two French youths whose electrocution set off a series of fiery riots a year ago. 'Triste,' said one person after another in French. Sad." The youth's deaths one year ago "brought to the surface fury at France's failure to integrate minorities, primarily of African and Middle Eastern origins." The Times adds, "Although there are 5 million Muslims in France, the majority from immigrant backgrounds, few have made their way into the country's elite. … Most live in desolate concrete housing projects or dilapidated homes in suburbs an hour or more by bus or train from the large French cities where most jobs are. Unemployment is well above 20% and in some cases as high as 40%, according to French newspapers."

The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Ganley) focuses its reporting on yesterday's bus attacks, noting, "Flaming cars became a symbol of three weeks of rampages last year, which jolted the nation into recognizing discontent among many minorities -- especially those of Arab and black African origin, and France's 5 million-strong Muslim population."

Abe Veers Toward Center In First Month As Japan's Prime Minister. The New York Times (10/28, Onishi, 1.21M) reports that while Shinzo Abe "rose to become postwar Japan's youngest prime minister by hewing to a conservative, nationalist agenda," in his first month in power he has "made a beeline toward the center, reaching out to China and South Korea as this region confronted North Korea's recent nuclear test. He has made surprising, if grudging, admissions about Japan's militarist past, assuaging the regional tensions that emerged" under predecessor Junichiro Koizumi. The Times says it is "too early to tell whether Mr. Abe's month in power is evidence of an innate pragmatism, or whether he is consolidating his power before pushing a more conservative agenda. But he has reassured voters in Japan and officials in Washington, won tentative praise from skeptics in China and South Korea and unsettled the Japanese right."

DOJ_NMG_0088378

Sri Lankan Government To Meet With Tamil Tigers Today. The Los Angeles Times (10/28, Chu, 918K) reports Sri Lankan government representatives and Tamil Tiger rebels are "due to sit down today for their first face-to-face talks in months" in what "could be the last, best hope for averting all-out war." Both sides "have been stung by heavy losses and international criticism in recent weeks, following a surge in combat that has left hundreds dead and thousands more refugees in their own country, forced to flee homes and livelihoods to avoid the crossfire." The New York Times (10/28, Senanayake, 1.21M) and BBC.com (10/28) also report on the meeting.

Pronk Will Remain In Sudan Envoy Job Through December. The New York Times (10/28, Schneider, 1.21M) notes an announcement by the office of UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan that his special representative for Sudan, Jan Pronk, "will continue to hold his office until his contract expires at the end of the year, but his role is expected to be mainly symbolic." Annan will send him to Khartoum soon, "but only to organize a transfer to Taye Zerihoun, the officer in charge of the United Nations mission in Sudan. He will then return to New York to finish out his term." Annan's office "said the United Nations did not expect the Sudanese government to reject the compromise," however, Sudanese Ambassador Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem Mohamad "said his government would not sanction Mr. Pronk's return."

"Forgotten" Eastern Sudan Begins Post-Conflict Recovery. The New York Times (10/28, Gettleman, 1.21M) details the "desolation and despair" present in eastern Sudan. "What is different about the crisis … is that few outside organizations are paying attention. While there are an estimated 25,000 aid workers in Darfur, the war-ravaged region on the other side of the country that has become the focus of a ceaseless flurry of diplomatic activity, here in Togley there are not even plastic tarps for the huts." The Times calls eastern Sudan the "forgotten Sudan, an intriguing, isolated, sun-blasted corner of the country where a conservative culture and a slow-burning war have conspired to keep the people mired in neglect despite the area's port and oil riches." Despite an October 14 ceasefire, "the neglect will take years to reverse. Eastern Sudan, which encompasses roughly 180,000 square miles and nearly four million people, is the poorest part of the country, with the highest infant mortality rate and a per capita income in some areas of 25 cents a day, a small fraction of the national average." The Times adds, "One of the reasons that the east has largely gone unnoticed is that the scale of fighting could never compete with the conflicts in Darfur or southern Sudan." However, "the east is increasingly vital to the nation, home to gold mines and the country's major oil pipeline and port."

UN Forces Free Mobutu's Son Ahead Of Congolese Vote. The New York Times (10/28, Gettleman, 1.21M) reports, "United Nations forces plunged into Congo's election-related violence again on Friday, this time rescuing a politician who had been kidnapped by rivals. … All across Kinshasa, United Nations troops are hunkered down behind sandbags or prowling the garbage-strewn streets in armored personnel carriers bristling with machine guns and water cannons." The Times notes an "increasingly edgy atmosphere in the prelude to the runoff presidential election scheduled for" tomorrow. Yesterday, UN forces negotiated the release of Nzanga Mobutu, son of former dictator Mobutu Sese Seko, who had been detained by soldiers loyal to challenger Jean-Pierre Bemba because he had been campaigning for President Joseph Kabila's reelection. "Both camps accuse each other of intimidating voters," and, the Times says, "the country has had a dismal political history." Kabila is favored to win reelection after garnering 45 percent in the first round.

The AP (10/27) adds Mobutu was "evacuated from a town where he was held captive overnight by forces loyal to the opposition." His detention "increased tensions ahead of Sunday's runoff."

Ethiopian, Eritrean Forces Could Widen Somali Conflict. The Washington Post/AP (10/28, A10) cites a recent United Nations report claiming that "thousands of Ethiopian and Eritrean troops are in Somalia, backing opposing sides in the struggle for control of the country… The involvement of the two rivals could set the stage for a regional war." The report is quoted saying, "Both sides in the Somali conflict are reported to have major outside backers -- the government supported by Ethiopia, Uganda and Yemen; the Islamic courts receiving aid from Iran, Libya, Saudi Arabia and Gulf States." The Post says the two sides "have been girding for battle for weeks," and the document "was written to help U.N. officials map a strategy on aid to" Somalia. The Washington Times/AP (10/28, Tomlinson) runs a version of the AP story, noting, "Ethiopia and Eritrea fought a two-year border war that remains unresolved. The top U.S. diplomat to Africa, Jendayi Frazer, last week accused Eritrea of using Somalia to open a second front against Ethiopia. In Washington on Thursday, State Department spokesman

DOJ_NMG_0088379

Sean McCormack called on Ethiopia and Eritrea not to further aggravate the situation."

China-Africa Summit Highlights Growing Economic Interdependence. The Wall Street Journal (10/28, A2, Oster, 2.03M) reports, "Anyone wanting to find an African leader this coming week will need to book a ticket to Beijing." Forty-eight of Africa's 53 heads of state "will descend on the Chinese capital for the biggest gathering of foreign leaders Beijing has ever hosted. The three-day summit will highlight a mushrooming trade relationship between the world's most populous country and its second-biggest continent that is stirring angst among some in Washington." While China had a "modern presence in Africa" for strategic reasons during the Cold War, more recently its "focus has changed to acquiring natural resources to fuel China's galloping economy."

Lithuania Learns About Kremlin Oil Game The Hard Way. The New York Times (10/28, Kramer, 1.21M) writes, "The Russian government has never been straightforward about its plans to take control of the oil and gas business. So, Lithuanians were suspicious when Russia said it shut its pipeline -- the only one supplying Russian crude oil -- in late July because of a leak." But it was "not so much the pipeline the Russians were concerned about" as what the "pipeline was connected to: Lithuania's sole refinery. And because Russia often gets what it wants, it may not matter that the Lithuanian government had signed an agreement in June to sell the refinery to a Polish company, PKN Orlen, for much more than Russia had offered." An analyst said, "The goal was to force Lithuania to reconsider the sale. They wanted a Russian company to buy the refinery, but for cheaper than a market price." The Times says Lithuania's "brush with Kremlin oil politics, critics of Russian business practices say, is a case study of what Vice President Dick Cheney called Moscow's use of energy exports as 'tools for intimidation and blackmail' in relations with its neighbors."

WPost Optimistic About Resolution Of Central Europe's Political Woes. The Washington Post (10/28, A14, 748K) examines the "dismal political picture" in four formerly Communist EU states --the Czech Republic, Hungary, Poland, and Slovakia – but says the "gloom seems overstated. Despite the political malaise, Central European countries are flourishingly economically, and their abundant workers and hungry entrepreneurs promise to revive Europe as a whole. The rise of populist and nationalist parties is in part a reaction to years of enforced consensus under previous governments" that were trying to meet EU entry criteria. But as Russia "grows ever more aggressive toward its neighbors, the former Soviet satellites will probably respond by burrowing more deeply into the European Union and NATO."

Senegal President Urges World Attention To Africa's High Oil Prices. In a Washington Post (10/28, A15, 748K) op-ed, Senegal President Abdoulaye Wade writes, :Although gasoline prices have dropped recently in the United States, many Americans continue to worry about the toll of oil dependence at the gas pump and on the U.S. economy. As an African, I feel their pain -- and then some. While the price of a barrel of crude has recently dipped below $60, oil still costs twice as much as it did three years ago -- and experts fully expect the price to climb higher. President Bush, a one-time oilman, has warned Americans about the danger of a country's being 'addicted to oil.' Yet the toll of oil dependence in the United States pales beside the pain that soaring oil prices cause in Africa. … If the price of crude oil reaches $100 a barrel within the next year -- as some analysts predict -- a pan-African disaster will be upon us." President Wade says it is "in the interest not only of America but also the petroleum industry not to have an Africa in ruins."

Suez Crisis Marked Start Of Intense US Intervention In Middle East. In a New York Times (10/28, 1.21M) op-ed, Boston University Professor of History and International Relations David Fromkin reflects on the 50th anniversary of the Suez Crisis, calling it "a divide in the history of the Middle East. It was the moment when America pushed out the Europeans and then tried to take their place -- and the reverberations are still felt today."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"'Devil Winds' Stoke Fatal Fire."
"Flames Ambush Man 'Who Could Do Anything.'"
"No Easy Answer To 'Kurdish Question.'"
"Getty Toughens Up Its Rules For Acquisition."
"A County Of Bad Ol' Boys."

New York Times:

"Democrats Get Late Donations From Business."
"Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want To Hear."
"Bloomberg, Seeing A Soul Mate, Sends Troops To Help Lieberman."
"New York Bets On High-Tech To Aid Upstate."
"Burst Of Wind-Driven Flames Engulfed Firefighters."
"In Clean Politics, Flesh Is Pressed, Then Sanitized."

DOJ_NMG_0088380

Washington Post:
"In Baghdad, A Sudden Chance To Play."
"Housing Slump Slows Economy."
"Ballot Issues Could Rally Liberal Base."
"Taking Terror Fight To N. Africa Leads U.S. To Unlikely Alliances."
"Allen Blasts Webb Novels."
"Marathoner Is Taking A Journey Of The Sole."

Washington Times:
"U.S., Iraq Affirm 'Good, Strong' Ties."
"DNC Wooing Black Voters."
"Coca Growers Resist Bolivia Crackdown."
"Housing Slows Economic Growth."
"Suit Against Air Force Academy Dismissed."
"Ethiopian's Trial Focuses On Female Circumcision."
"Webb Hit For Novels' Sex-Laced Language."

Detroit Free Press:
"Dream Over."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Death And Redemption."
"End Of Line For Ford In Hapeville."
"Dash For Bargains Starts At Midnight After Thanksgiving."
"Perdue Failed To Disclose Land Buy Near Prized Tract."

Dallas Morning News:
"Black Radio Turns Up The Volume."
"Activists Putting Heat On Barton."
"In Smoke And Flames, They Disappeared."
"Audit: KBR Too Secretive."
"Family: Nanny's Note Exonerates Widow."

Houston Chronicle:
"Audit: KBR Hid Data On Its Work In Iraq."
"Write-Ins May Make For A Long Election Night."
"U.S. Journalist Slain In Mexico."
"Threatened Frogs Are VIPs For Hotel — And Houston Zoo."
"Green Tea Shows Promise In HIV Fight."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Wildfire Still Raging; Economy And The Housing Market; Marine Corps Marathon Honors Loss of Soldiers; Scharzenegger As The Comeback Kid; Captain Rye Barcott, Person Of The Week.
CBS: Palm Springs Wildfires; Firefighter Deaths; Mudslinging Virginia Senate Campaign; Voters Views On The Economy; A Look At Stem Cell Research; Gallaudet Protests; Prison Fashion Statement.
NBC: North Korea; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Hawaii Earthquake; Houston Flooded; Legislators Under Fire; Stock Market; Population Growth-Nevada; Gas Prices; Lawyer In The Family; School Bands Of New Orleans.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — 1 p.m. Attends Sodrel for Congress and Indiana Victory 2006 rally, Silver Creek High School, Sellersburg, Ind. 5:55 p.m. Attends RNC dinner, The Sanctuary at Kiawah Island, South Carolina.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY -- No public schedule.

US Senate: No scheduled events.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: POLITICAL MANAGEMENT-OAS _ 9 a.m. - 6 p.m. Josi Miquel Insulza, Secretary General of the Organization of American States, delivers keynote address at GWU's "International Seminar of Political Communication and Marketing for Governments." Location: Morton Auditorium, 805 21st St. NW. Contacts: Wendy Carey, 202-994-3087

PECK AWARDS-SCHLESINGER-PANETTA _ 10 a.m. Smithsonian holds two town hall sessions with 2006 Paul Peck Presidential Award winners: former White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta and author Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. Location: Nan Tucker McEvoy Auditorium, National Portrait Gallery, 8th and F streets N.W. Contacts: Lauren Hassel, 202-275-1768.

KASHMIR'S FUTURE _ 6:30 p.m. - 9 p.m. Georgetown University and the Kashmiri American Council hold forum on "Kashmir: Future Approaches." With speakers from Christians and Muslims for Peace; University of San Francisco; Embassy of Pakistan, others. Location: GWU, Marvin Center, 800 21st St. NW. Contacts: Farhat Ali Zaidi, 202-243-6500 ext 2005

BRIAN LAMB-HELEN THOMAS _ 7 p.m. C-SPANs Brian Lamb receives the Helen Thomas Award for Excellence in Journalism from the American News Womens Club. Award will be presented by Thomas and CBS' Bob Schieffer. Location: Fairmont Hotel, 2401 M St. NW. Contacts: Karen James Cody, 202-452-4169

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0088381

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, October 30, 2006 10:18 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, October 28, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061028.pdf; dojclips061028.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judge Sets Schedule On Detainee Lawsuits (AP) 4
Cheney Defends 'Dunk In The Water' Remark (WP)....4
Furor Over Cheney Remark On Tactics For Terror Suspects (NYT) 6
Cheney Calls Dunking Of Terror Suspects A 'No-brainer' (LAT) 6
White House Denies Cheney Hailed "Water Boarding" (AP) 7
Bush Enters Cheney "Torture Row" (BBC)....8
Informant For FBI Is Freed (ALBANYTU)....8
Lodi Man Seeks New Trial In Terrorism Case (MERCN) 9
Taking Terror Fight To N. Africa Leads U.S. To Unlikely Alliances (WP)....10

Patriot Act:

ACLU Drops Patriot Act Challenge (AP)....13
ACLU Drops Patriot Act Suit (DEN)....14

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Lays Out Plan To Police Chiefs (GCN)....14
Airlines Delay In Checking Workers (LAT) 15
Suspicious Letter Shuts Clinton's Harlem Office (NYT)....16
Substance At Clinton's Office Not Toxic (USAT/AP)....16
Training Gets Under Way At UCO Forensics Center (OKLA) 17
IU Student Set Up Website For Fake Boarding Passes (WISH) 18
Mayor Expands Search For 9/11 Remains (NYT)....18
Follow The Money (WSJ)....19

War News:

Iraqi Prime Minister Criticizes U.S. Policy (LAT)....20
Fighting Split, U.S. And Iraq Renew Vow To Work For Peace (NYT) 22
Search For U.S. Soldier Spurs Sadr City Battles (WP)....23
U.S., Iraq Affirm 'Good, Strong' Ties (WT/AP)....24
In Baghdad, A Sudden Chance To Play (WP)....25
U.S. Citizen Won't Be Handed To Iraq, Federal Court Says (WP/AP)....27
U.S. Finds Too Many KBR Reports 'Proprietary' (WP) 27
Report Says Iraq Contractor Is Hiding Data From U.S. (NYT) 28
Halliburton Arm Accused Of 'abuse' In Iraq (FT)....30
Massoud Barzani Kurdistan (WSJ)....31
The Grand Ayatollah Behind The Curtain (WP)....33
NATO Boss, Bush Condemn Taliban Atrocities (WT/AP)....34
Blast In South Afghan Suburb Kills 14 And Wounds 3 (NYT)..35
Photo Scandal Raises Doubts In Germany About Deployments (WP)....36

Corporate Scandals:

Orbital Finds Misdated Options (WP)....37
Legal Aid In Options Probes, Private Law Firms Play Crucial Role (WSJ)....38
J.P. Morgan Receives SEC Inquiry Related To Bisys (WSJ) ..41
Corporate Crime Sanjay Kumar Awaits His Sentence (WSJ) .41
Sinking Big Fish In Fraud Aids Small Fry (AP-YBIZ)....42

Criminal Law:

Official In Abramoff Case Sentenced To 18 Months (WP)....43
Safavian Given 18 Months (WT/AP)....45
Jail Time For Ex-official In Influence-peddling Case (LAT/AP) 45
Ex-procurement Chief Gets 18 Months In Prison (GOVEXEC) 46
Man Linked To Abramoff Is Sentenced To 18 Months (NYT) 47
Ethics Report On Foley Not Expected Before Elections (WP) 47
Levine Enters Guilty Plea (CHIT)....49
Governor's Campaign Donor Pleads Guilty In Kickback Case (CHIT/AP)....51
4 Men Found Guilty In Airport Fraud (HSB)....52
Proposed Religion-Based Program For Federal Inmates Is Canceled (NYT)....53

The Disillusionment Of A Young White House Evangelical (NYT) 53
High Court To Rule On Deadly Force In Police Chases (WP) 55
Justices To Rule On Police Ramming Car To End Chase (LAT) 55
Convicted Killers See New Trial Over Court Chaos (NYT) 57
Baby Girl's Death In Brooklyn Is Ruled A Homicide By Officials (NYT) 58
Police Say Malvo Confessed To Killing Arizona Golfer (USAT/AP) 59
Professor Accused Of Spying For Cuba Won't Be Released Before Trial (MH) 60
Feds In Wyo. Take Over Colorado Ad Probe (WP/AP) 60
Pataki Picks Ex-Prosecutor To Weigh In On Hevesi Case (NYT) 61
New York's Pataki Calls For Review Of Hevesi Findings (Update2) (BLOOM) 62
Doolittle Legal Fate Uncertain (SACBEE) 63
BX. PIMP COPS A PLEA (AP) 65
Mailman Pimp Awaits Delivery To Jail (NSL) 66
Seminole Man Charged In Online Hacking Plot (TAMPTRIB) 67
Jury Spares Convicted Murderer From Death Penalty In Puerto Rico (FINDLAW/AP) 67
Porter Releases Phone Records, Schedules (LVS) 68
Rolling Admitted Shreveport Murders Before Execution (AP) 69
Mafia Figure Is Sentenced To Life Term In 2 Murders (NYT) 69
MAFIA MURDERER GETS LIFE (NYPOST) 70

Civil Law:

Ruling Upholds Air Force On Religious Issue (NYT/AP) 71
Suit Against Air Force Academy Dismissed (WT/AP) 71

Civil Rights:

Drifter Sought Over Hate Graffiti (WT) 72
11 In O.C. Charged With Voter Registration Fraud (LAT) 73
Justice Department Official Meets With Residents Regarding Shooting (LCAP) 74
Union Claims Police-recruit Bias (INDYSTAR) 75
New Voters Likely Out Of City Elections (BSH) 76
For Gay Couples, Ruling Has A Cash Value (NYT) 77
Civil Union Or Marriage? A Long Wait In New Jersey (NYT) .. 78
Conserving That Compassion (NYT) 79
Thought Police In The Lecture Hall (WP) 80

Antitrust:

Tribune Is Said To Get Bids From Private Equity Firms (NYT) 81
Local Support Boosts Baltimore Sun Bidder (WT) 81
A New Advertising Engine (WP) 82
Arcelor Mittal Takes Stake In Mich. Auto Supplier Noble (AP) 84
FCC Sets Vote On AT&T Purchase Of BellSouth To Nov. 3 (Update1) (BLOOM) 84
Smithfield Foods Gambling On Merger; Foes Fighting Expansion (DPHR) 85
BD Wins Federal Antitrust Approval For TriPath Deal (BERGCR) 86

Environment:

Appeals Court Halts Stryker Activity Here (HSB) 86
Fireman Fights To Live, Comrades Fight Blaze (LAT) 88
Sheriff's Office 'Taking Lots Of Calls' With Arson Tips (LAT) .. 90
Calif. Blaze Spreads After Firefighters' Deaths (WP) 91
Burst Of Wind-Driven Flames Engulfed Firefighters (NYT) 92
Taking On A Coal Mining Practice As A Matter Of Faith (NYT) 93
Preparations For A Flu Pandemic (NYT) 95

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Man Gets Probation For Owning Firearms (HIR) 96
Feds Were Planning Raid On Vroman's Home (SRPD) 96
Guilty Plea In Plot To Bomb Abortion Clinic (WP) 98

Tax:

No Taxes Until After The Election (NYT) 98

Congress-Administration:

Tax-Cut Rollback Not On Table, Rangel Says (WP) 99
Waxman Plans Tougher Oversight Of Companies (WSJ) 100
This Chairmanship Fight May Not Have Been Anticipated By Democrats (CQ) 102
The Non-Contract With America (WSJ) 102
White House Is Trimming Army Budget For Next Year, Officials Say (NYT) 104
Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want To Hear (NYT) 104

Other News:

Housing Slump Slows Economy (WP) 106
U.S. Economic Growth Cools Down (WSJ) 107
Oil And Housing Put Brake On US Growth (FT) 108
Growth Slackened In Summer (NYT) 109
Housing Slows Economic Growth (WT) 110
After A Strong Week, A Whimper (NYT/AP) 111
Dow Steps Back On Concerns About Economy (WSJ) 112
Dollar Declines Against Rivals After A Sign Of Slowing Growth (WSJ) 113

DOJ_NMG_0088384

Wholesale Gasoline Prices Rise, Cost At Pump Could Follow Suit (WSJ) 114
Oil Prices, Now Likely At Bottom, Are Poised To Rise, But Moderately By MATT CHAMBERS (WSJ)....115
Campaigns Go Negative For A Reason (LAT)....115
Swinging Along (NAT JOUR)....117
Polls And Pundits: How Reliable Are Forecasts? (WSJ) 119
GOP Retains Cash Edge Over Resurgent Democrats (WP) 119
Politics Campaign Cash Clues (WSJ) 120
Democrats Get Late Donations From Business (NYT)....121
Moderate Republicans Feeling Like Endangered Species (NYT) 123
DNC Wooing Black Voters (WT) 124
Hollywood Director Targets Democrats In Ads (WT)....125
Allen Blasts Webb Novels For Sex Scenes (WP)....126
Virginia Senate Candidate Attacked Over His Novels (NYT) 128
Webb Hit For Novels' Sex-laced Language (WT)....129
'Brothels, Sex Kittens, Pedophilia?' (NYT)....130
Hot-Button Social Issues Dim In Ohio Senate Race (WP)....131
Evangelicals Fire Up The Faithful (WSJ)....133
'The Daily Show' Swinging Into Ohio (AP)....135
Judge Approves Ohio Rules On Voter Surveys (NYT/AP)....136
A Candidate's Sister Steps In To Defend Him On Stem Cell Issue (NYT)....136
Third-party Zeese Won't 'Be A Spoiler' (WT)....137
Bloomberg Sends Troops To Help Lieberman (NYT)....138
Anti-war Chafee In Tight Race In R.I. To Keep His Senate Seat (WT)....139
Wal-Mart Dismisses Adviser Who Created G.O.P. Ad (NYT) 140
In Indiana, Local Issues Take Toll (WSJ) 141
A G.O.P. Redoubt Upstate Suddenly Seems Less Sturdy (NYT) 142
This Time, Ballot Issues Could Rally Liberal Base (WP)....144
As Campaign Days Dwindle, Marriage Issue Heats Up In Va. (WP) 146
US Mid-terms: Ballot Propositions (BBC)....147
Building Better Citizens (NYT) 149
Marriage Ruling Resonates (LAT)....149
A Rising Star From Illinois Makes Some Noise In L.A. (LAT)150
Schwarzenegger, Angelides Both Profess To Lean Green (LAT)....152
Faso Plays Up The Woes Of A Spitzer Ally (NYT)....153
Ethics -- Public And Private (WSJ) 154
In Clean Politics, Flesh Is Pressed, Then Sanitized (NYT)...155
Justices To Take Up Autism-Case Dispute (NYT/AP)....156
How To Socialize With An Ex-President? Finance His Good Deeds. (NYT)....157
Unaired Ad Gets Dixie Chicks Flick A Whole Lot Of Ink (WP)158
Los Angeles Abuse Cases Are Settled For $10 Million (NYT)160
Movement Reportedly Seen At N.Korea Site (AP)....160
Gingerly, South Korea Imposes First Sanction On North (NYT)....161
Using A 2nd Network, Iran Raises Enrichment Ability (NYT) 161
Bush Says It's Unacceptable For Iran To Have Nuclear Weapon (WP) 162
Iran Doubles Nuke Enrichment Capacity (AP)....163
Enrichment Capacity Doubled, Source Says (WT/AP) 164
Iranian Nuclear Effort Defies U.N. Council Again (WP)....165
Rice Says Hezbollah Must Disarm To Be Part Of Lebanon's Political Process (USAT/AP) 166
Goodwill Ambassador? Venezuela Is Leery Of U.S. Envoy (NYT)....167
Colombia City Makes A U-turn (LAT)....169
Coca Growers Resist Bolivia Crackdown (WT) 170
American Pilots Were At Correct Altitude Over Brazil, Lawyer Says (NYT)....172
A Year After Suburban Riots, France Is Mostly Calm (WP)....172
Speeches And Arson Recall Last Year's Unrest In France (NYT)....173
French Muslims Mark Day Of Sadness To Honor Dead (LAT) 174
Men Burn Buses In Paris Suburb (WT/AP)....175
In First Month As Japan's Premier, Abe Veers To Center (NYT)....176
Sri Lanka, Tamil Tigers Ready To Meet (LAT)....177
Sri Lankan Government And Tamil Tigers To Meet (NYT)..179
Crucial Sri Lanka Peace Talks Due (BBC)....180
U.N. To Limit The Role Of Its Envoy Expelled By Sudan (NYT)....180
Misery Churns In Eastern Sudan, Away From Spotlight (NYT)181
Kidnapping And Turmoil Ahead Of Congo Vote (NYT)....183
Mobutu's Abduction Heightens Congo Election Tension (AP)184
U.N. Study: Foreign Troops In Somalia Raise War Risk (WP/AP)....184
Foreign Troops Set Stage For War (WT/AP) 185
Geostrategy: China Strengthens Its Ties To Africa (WSJ)....185
Lithuanians Are Given A Taste Of How Russia Plays The Oil Game (NYT)....186
Backsliding In Europe (WP)....188
Africa Over A Barrel (WP) 188
Stuck In The Canal (NYT) 189

DOJ_NMG_0088385

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Sets Schedule On Detainee Lawsuits (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal judge Friday set the stage for the next push by the Bush administration to get all the lawsuits by detainees at Guantanamo Bay thrown out of U.S. courts.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson laid out a five-week schedule for the Justice Department and lawyers for Salim Ahmed Hamdan to file written arguments in the detainee's challenge to his confinement.

Hundreds of other detainees also are challenging their detentions in lawsuits.

It was a challenge by lawyers for Hamdan, Osama bin-Laden's former driver, that led to the Supreme Court ruling in June striking down the Bush administration's plan for military commission trials.

The new Military Commissions Act, which President Bush signed on Oct. 17, strips U.S. courts of jurisdiction to hear the detainees' challenges to their indefinite detentions. Hamdan's lawyers say the new provision is "of doubtful constitutionality."

Ten days ago, the Justice Department filed a copy of the new law with the court in Hamdan's case. Robertson said in a one-page order the Justice Department filing "is deemed to be a motion to dismiss" Hamdan's case.

Patrick Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, has said the provision to strip detainees of access to U.S. courts would "take our civilized society back some 900 years to King John at Runnymede which led to the adoption of the Magna Carta."

Cheney Defends 'Dunk In The Water' Remark (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Addressing Alarm Over the Comment, Vice President Says He Was Not Referring to Waterboarding

Vice President Cheney said yesterday that he was not referring to an interrogation technique known as "waterboarding" when he told an interviewer this week that dunking terrorism suspects in water was a "no-brainer."

Cheney told reporters aboard Air Force Two last night that he did not talk about any specific interrogation technique during his interview Tuesday with a conservative radio host.

"I didn't say anything about waterboarding. . . . He didn't even use that phrase," Cheney said on a flight to Washington from South Carolina.

Earlier in the day, White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters that the vice president was talking literally about "a dunk in the water," though neither Snow nor Cheney explained what that meant or whether such a tactic had been used against U.S. detainees.

"A dunk in the water is a dunk in the water," Snow said.

The comments were aimed at calming a growing furor over Cheney's comments, which were taken by many human rights advocates and legal experts as an endorsement of waterboarding as a method of questioning.

Coming shortly before the midterm elections, the remarks prompted a wide range of political figures -- from Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) to Cheney's wife, Lynne -- to weigh in on the issue, providing another unexpected controversy for Republicans as they fight to keep control of Congress. Reporters peppered Snow with questions about the interview during Snow's two daily news briefings.

Waterboarding, in which a prisoner is secured with his feet above his head and has water poured on a cloth over his face, is one of several methods of simulating drowning that date at least to the Spanish Inquisition. It has been specifically prohibited by the U.S. Army and widely condemned as torture by human rights groups and international courts.

"Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" Scott Hennen of WDAY in Fargo, N.D., asked Cheney on Tuesday. "Well, it's a no-brainer for me," Cheney responded.

DOJ_NMG_0088386

Cheney also said he agreed with Hennen that the debate over interrogation techniques was "a little silly," and he praised the information obtained from U.S. terrorism suspects during questioning.

Hennen said in an interview yesterday that he did not know precisely which technique Cheney was referring to and was only passing along a question he had heard from a listener.

"It's impossible for me to say 'Did the listener mean waterboarding?' and 'Is waterboarding torture?' and that sort of thing," Hennen said. "I can't get in the vice president's head, and I can't get in the listener's head."

Many legal experts said it was reasonable to conclude that Cheney was referring to waterboarding, since it has been a widely debated U.S. interrogation technique that uses water to subject a suspect to the fear of drowning.

U.S. interrogation methods have been the focus of fierce debate since revelations of detainee abuse in Iraq and Afghanistan and the disclosure that the CIA ran a network of secret prisons outside the United States. Numerous sources have confirmed that the CIA used waterboarding in its interrogation of alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed and other "high-value" prisoners.

Some lawmakers have said that they believe waterboarding is illegal under detainee legislation approved last month, but the Bush administration has declined to say what techniques it considers off-limits.

Asked yesterday about Cheney's Tuesday remarks, President Bush did not specifically address them. But he said: "This country doesn't torture. We're not going to torture. We will interrogate people we pick up off the battlefield to determine whether or not they've got information that will be helpful to protect the country."

Human rights and legal experts said yesterday that even if Snow's version of Cheney's remarks is correct, Cheney's comments are troubling because dunking a terrorism suspect in water as part of an interrogation would actually be more physically dangerous than waterboarding. The tactic also would be illegal under U.S. and international laws, they said.

Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, noted that in the 1980s, Chadian forces led by military ruler Hissene Habre allegedly hung people upside down and dunked them in water during questioning. Habre was indicted by a Belgian court for torture and crimes against humanity and faces prosecution in Senegal.

Former CIA general counsel Jeffrey H. Smith said Cheney's comments were "irresponsible" and send a signal to U.S. interrogators that "the people at the top want you to get rough."

"It's clear that the vice president didn't mean a friendly swim at the country club," Smith said. "It would be designed to somehow frighten a prisoner and elicit information from them. Whatever it means, a dunk in the water is not harmless or innocent."

Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, issued a statement saying the comments provided another reason that voters should "change course" by voting for Democrats. "This administration's determination to assert the right to torture has undermined our moral authority, put our troops at greater risk and made our country less safe," Kerry said.

Snow and other Republicans pushed back strongly, arguing that Cheney's remarks had been misinterpreted and that the vice president had been talking about the value of interrogations in preventing terrorist attacks.

"That is a mighty house you are building on top of that molehill," Lynne Cheney said during an appearance on CNN's "The Situation Room." "A mighty mountain. This is complete distortion. He didn't say anything of the kind."

The ambiguities in the waterboarding debate were most evident during two contentious news briefings yesterday as Snow was repeatedly questioned by reporters who did not accept his explanations of Cheney's remarks. Snow repeatedly insisted that Cheney was not referring to waterboarding or any other technique, although he was at a loss to explain how being dunked in water would not also qualify as a method of interrogation.

Snow joked at several points about needing to avoid water-related metaphors in his comments, as when he accused reporters of "fishing" for answers. He declined to say what Cheney meant by dunking terrorism suspects in water but said he would get back to reporters with a fuller explanation, which did not materialize yesterday.

At one point during the first briefing, a frustrated reporter asked: "So the detainees go swimming?"

"I don't know," Snow responded. "We'll have to find out."

Staff writer Peter Baker and staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0088387

Furor Over Cheney Remark On Tactics For Terror Suspects (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — The White House found itself fending off questions on Friday about what Vice President Dick Cheney meant when he agreed with a talk-radio host that there was nothing wrong with dunking a terrorism suspect in water if it saved lives.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said Mr. Cheney was not endorsing water-boarding, a coercive interrogation technique that simulates drowning and that many have said qualifies as torture. Mr. Snow said Mr. Cheney was not, in fact, referring to any technique, whether it was torture or not, because administration officials do not discuss interrogation methods.

President Bush was also confronted by reporters about Mr. Cheney's comments as he made a joint appearance with Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, the secretary general of NATO. "This country does not torture; we're not going to torture," Mr. Bush said, without referring directly to Mr. Cheney or his comments.

The questioning was set off when Mr. Cheney was interviewed Tuesday by Scott Hennen, a conservative radio talk show host in Fargo, N.D. "Would you agree that a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" Mr. Hennen asked.

"Well, it's a no-brainer for me," Mr. Cheney replied. "But for a while there I was criticized as being the vice president for torture. We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in."

Mr. Snow, who spent much of his day dealing with questions about the comments, told reporters that none of them related to interrogation techniques, which are classified. "I'm telling you what the vice president's view is, which is it wasn't about waterboarding. Period," he said.

The exchanges grew testy at times, especially when Mr. Snow said Mr. Cheney is not someone who slips up. One reporter noted that the vice president had once used a profanity on the Senate floor, and also shot a friend in the face during a hunting accident last February.

"That's a great line," Mr. Snow said, "but it's not germane."

Waterboarding is actually not a dunk in the water, but rather, covering a subject's face with a constantly soaked cloth to make breathing difficult. It has been reported as having been used on some suspected members of Al Qaeda who were secretly held by the Central Intelligence Agency until their transfer last month to the United States detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Tom Malinowski, the Washington director of Human Rights Watch, said, "If Iran or Syria detained an American, Cheney is saying that it would be perfectly fine for them to hold that American's head under water until he nearly drowns, if that's what they need to do to save Iranian or Syrian lives."

When Mr. Cheney's wife, Lynne, was asked on CNN about the comments, she told Wolf Blitzer: "That is a mighty house you're building on top of that mole hill there, a mighty mountain. This is complete distortion. He didn't say anything of the kind."

Cheney Calls Dunking Of Terror Suspects A 'No-brainer' (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Vice president later says: 'I didn't say anything about water-boarding.'

Comments by Vice President Dick Cheney to a radio interviewer prompted questions Friday about whether he advocated torturing terrorism detainees to obtain information. Cheney denied endorsing torture, and President Bush said that the United States does not practice torture.

Cheney's remarks, in an interview Tuesday with conservative talk-radio host Scott Hennen from Fargo, N.D., stirred up fresh controversy over the interrogation technique known as "water-boarding," which experts say simulates drowning.

Human rights groups sharply criticized Cheney, who said later that he was not specifically talking about water-boarding.

The flap began when the interviewer told Cheney that some of his listeners had asked him to tell the vice president that "if it takes dunking a terrorist in water, we're all for it if it saves American lives." He continued: "This debate seems a little silly given the threat we face, would you agree?"

DOJ_NMG_0088388

Cheney replied: "I do agree. And I think the terrorist threat, for example, with respect to our ability to interrogate high-value detainees like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, that's been a very important tool that we've had to be able to secure the nation…. We need to be able to continue that."

He was referring to the man captured in Pakistan who officials widely believe masterminded the Sept. 11 attacks.

Cheney was then asked: "Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?"

The vice president responded: "It's a no-brainer for me, but for a while there, I was criticized as being the vice president 'for torture.' We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in."

Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, took issue with Cheney's remarks, issuing a statement saying: "What's really a no-brainer is that no U.S. official, much less a vice president, should champion torture. Vice President Cheney's advocacy of water-boarding sets a new human rights low at a time when human rights is already scraping the bottom of the Bush administration barrel."

Late Friday, Cheney told reporters aboard Air Force Two: "I have said that the interrogation program for a selected number of detainees is … one of the most valuable intelligence programs we have. I believe it has allowed us to prevent terrorist attacks against the United States. I did not talk about specific techniques and won't. I didn't say anything about water-boarding. [The interviewer] didn't even use that phrase."

Asked what "dunk in water" was referring to if not water-boarding, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said, "I will let you draw your own conclusions, because you clearly have."

Bush, asked Friday about Cheney's comments, told reporters: "This country doesn't torture. We're not going to torture. We will interrogate people we pick up off the battlefield to determine whether or not they've got information that will be helpful to protect the country."

james.gerstenzang@latimes.com

White House Denies Cheney Hailed "Water Boarding" (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The White House said Friday that Vice President Dick Cheney was not talking about a torture technique known as "water boarding" when he said dunking terrorism suspects in water during questioning was a "no-brainer."

Human rights groups complained that Cheney's comments amounted to an endorsement of water boarding, in which the victim believes he is about to drown.

President Bush, asked about Cheney's comments, said, "This country doesn't torture. We're not going to torture." He spoke at an Oval Office meeting Friday with NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer.

Earlier, White House press secretary Tony Snow denied that Cheney had endorsed water boarding.

"You know as a matter of common sense that the vice president of the United States is not going to be talking about water boarding. Never would, never does, never will," Snow said. "You think Dick Cheney's going to slip up on something like this? No, come on."

In an interview Tuesday with WDAY of Fargo, North Dakota, Cheney was asked if "a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives."

The vice president replied, "Well, it's a no-brainer for me, but for a while there I was criticized as being the vice president for torture. We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in."

Peppered with questions about the remarks, Snow said Cheney did not interpret the question as referring to water boarding and the vice president did not make any comments about water boarding. He said the question put to Cheney was loosely worded.

The administration has repeatedly refused to say which techniques they believe are permitted under the new law. Asked to define a dunk in water, Snow said, "It's a dunk in the water."

Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, said in a statement, "What's really a no-brainer is that no U.S. official, much less a vice president, should champion torture. Vice President Cheney's advocacy of water boarding sets a new human rights low at a time when human rights is already scraping the bottom of the Bush administration barrel."

DOJ_NMG_0088389

Human Rights Watch said Cheney's remarks were "the Bush administration's first clear endorsement" of water boarding.

Bush Enters Cheney "Torture Row" (BBC)

BBC.com, October 28, 2006

Mr Bush has repeatedly refused to specify which techniques are used US President George Bush has reiterated his position that the US administration does not condone torture, following comments by Vice President Dick Cheney.

In a radio interview, Mr Cheney said the simulated drowning of terrorism suspects during questioning in order to save American lives was a "no-brainer".

His comments have provoked outrage from anti-torture and human rights groups.

When asked about the remark, President Bush said that the United States does not use torture and was not going to.

The BBC's Matt Wells in Washington says Mr Cheney's comment was made on Tuesday but only came to light on Friday, exacerbated by a stormy and confrontational White House press briefing.

The conservative radio host, Scott Hennen, asked Mr Cheney if he agreed that "a dunk in water is a no-brainer" if it would unearth information of pending attacks and save lives.

Mr Cheney replied: "Well, it's a no-brainer for me." He went on to say that he was not condoning torture but said you can have a robust interrogation programme without torture.

'Off limits'

Evidence has emerged of the existence of secret CIA prisons

Mr Cheney is assumed by human rights groups to have been referring to "water boarding" - a technique in which suspects are made to think that they are drowning.

When asked about the vice-president's comments, Mr Bush said the administration had no intention of torturing suspects, but he has repeatedly refused to specify which techniques are being used.

The White House gave the impression that water boarding would be off limits in pushing through a controversial terror bill just a few weeks ago, our correspondent says.

The US executive director of Amnesty International said Mr Cheney's gaffe revealed the US administration's true intentions for prisoner interrogation in the future.

"What's really a no-brainer is that no US official, much less a vice president, should champion torture," said Larry Cox.

US interrogation techniques have been under the spotlight since evidence emerged of detainee abuse in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the existence of secret CIA prisons.

Informant For FBI Is Freed (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, October 28, 2006

Pakistani immigrant worked on terrorism sting case in Albany

ALBANY -- A Pakistani immigrant whose own crimes led him to serve as an FBI informant in an Albany-based counterterrorism sting walked out of federal court a free man Friday after a judge sentenced him to time served in consideration for his years of undercover work.

Shahed "Malik" Hussain, 50, emerged as the federal government's star witness last month at the trial of Yassin M. Aref and Mohammed M. Hossain, who were convicted of charges that include money laundering and conspiracy to support terrorism.

"Everything was fair and reasonable under the circumstances," said Hussain's attorney, F. Stanton Ackerman, declining further comment.

Hussain, dressed in a suit, said nothing during the brief proceeding before U.S. District Judge David N. Hurd. Hussain talked briefly outside court with his longtime FBI handler, Special Agent Timothy Coll, then quickly left the courthouse without commenting to reporters.

Hussain's own legal problems began about five years ago when he was arrested in an FBI fraud investigation that was launched shortly after the 9/11 attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0088390

The investigation targeted a ring of corrupt translators, state motor vehicle workers and nearly 100 immigrants who had illegally obtained driver's licenses with help from Hussain. At the time, Hussain owned and operated a Getty gas station on South Pearl Street, near Albany's motor vehicle office. He also worked as a translator for the state Department of Motor Vehicles, and had routinely accepted bribes of several hundred dollars each to help immigrants, who in some cases couldn't drive well, pass written exams they couldn't understand.

Following his arrest in December 2001, and while facing the prospect of a long prison term and eventual deportation to his native Pakistan, Hussain agreed to become an informant for the FBI.

Hussain, who emigrated here in 1993 and still holds a green card, has since been credited with helping the FBI arrest more than a dozen people, including the people involved in the DMV scandal and a member of an Afghani-based heroin trafficking ring.

At the time of his arrest, Hussain was about two weeks away from being sworn in as a naturalized U.S. citizen. He ran gas stations, a beverage center and a retail distribution business in Latham, and shared a modest home in Loudonville with his wife and children.

Shortly after his Loudon Road home burned in 2003, Hussain declared bankruptcy. He has left a wake of debt and disgruntled creditors, including some who have described him as an unscrupulous businessman.

That summer, Hussain was still on the hook as an FBI informant when Coll, a member of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Albany, enlisted him to help infiltrate a Central Avenue mosque that had drawn the attention of the FBI after 9/11.

The FBI's primary target was Aref, a Kurdish refugee who had been the mosque's spiritual leader and whom the FBI believes was associated with terrorist figures overseas. Aref has vehemently denied any connection to terrorists and there was no evidence presented at his trial that he'd made anti-American statements while heading the mosque for several years.

Hussain, who speaks five languages, testified last month that Coll ordered him to befriend Hossain, a Bangladeshi immigrant and pizza shop owner who was Aref's friend and a co-founder of the mosque.

Over the next year, Hossain wore a wire to dozens of meetings he had with Aref and Hossain as they discussed Islamic ideology, terrorism and a loan the informant had promised Hossain that turned out to be the foundation of the money laundering charges.

Before the trial began, Hossain's attorney, Kevin A. Luibrand, filed a motion asking the government to turn over "any evidence or information that the government has that the informant has caused another's death ... including acts alleged that he committed overseas."

Federal prosecutors did not turn over any records to defense attorneys related to that request. A federal law enforcement officials close to the case on Friday declined comment on allegations that Hussain may have been tied to a homicide in Lahore, Pakistan.

Shamshad Ahmad, president of the Central Avenue mosque, Masjid Al-Salam, where Aref and Hossain prayed, said rumors have swirled for several years in the area's Pakistani community about the mysterious slaying in Lahore.

"The murdered person belongs to a powerful family there," Ahmad said. "There are people from Pakistan in this region and they know the murder situation over there ..., but they don't want to talk and open up because they think this guy is the FBI's darling and they might be in trouble if they open their mouths."

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericak said Hussain may still face immigration problems because of his felony conviction, but that U.S. authorities would try to help him with that situation if needed. Hussain pleaded guilty in April 2003 to a single felony count to settle the charges pending against him. It was that fraud count on which he was sentenced Friday, effectively terminating his debt as an informant.

Pericak contends Hussain only faced a maximum of six months in jail under federal sentencing guidelines. However, attorneys in the case said Hussain could have faced up to 15 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 if he had been convicted on felony counts for each of the estimated 80 fraudulent licenses that he has admitted helping immigrants obtain.

Lyons can be reached at 454-5547 or by e-mail at blyons@timesunion.com.

Lodi Man Seeks New Trial In Terrorism Case (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, October 28, 2006

SACRAMENTO - Attorneys for a Lodi man convicted this spring by a federal jury of supporting terrorists have asked a judge to grant a new trail after reports of juror misconduct.

In a 106-page motion filed Friday, Hamid Hayat's lawyers said reports of "extensive misconduct" by jury foreman Joseph Cote demand court review.

"Given the reports of extensive misconduct involved here, the seriousness of such misconduct, and the credibility of the sources, only (an evidentiary) hearing will suffice to resolve the present claim," wrote Wazhma Mojaddidi and Dennis Riordan.

Hayat, 23, was convicted in April of one count of providing material support to terrorists by attending an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan, and three counts of lying about it to FBI agents.

In court papers, Hayat's attorneys cited reports by juror Alicia Lopez and Theresa Berkeley-Simmons that Cote used racial slurs during the trail, including saying that Pakistanis or Muslims all "look alike" if dressed the same. They also pointed to an Atlantic magazine interview that Cote gave after the trial where he said he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for the London subway bombings.

This indicates that Cote "flatly disregarded his assurance that he harbored no prejudices against Pakistanis or Muslims, as well as his promise to disregard whatever he had read in the media," the lawyers wrote in the motion.

In addition to complaints about jury bias, Hayat's attorneys said U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr., should have allowed a retired FBI agent to testify about the bureau's interview procedures. They said James Wedick, a 34-year veteran of the FBI, would have revealed the inappropriateness of Hayat's confession.

Hayat's attorneys said their client was worn down by the agents' interrogation and confessed to crimes he did not commit.

Hayat is a U.S. citizen of Pakistani descent. He faces up to 39 years in prison.

Prosecutors have until Dec. 15 to file a response, and a hearing is scheduled for Jan. 19.

"We will respond in court at the appropriate time," U.S. attorney McGregor Scott said Saturday.

At trial, prosecutors said Hayat returned from a two-year visit to Pakistan in May 2005 intent on attacking targets that may have included hospitals, banks and grocery stores. His videotaped confession was the heart of the government's case.

Taking Terror Fight To N. Africa Leads U.S. To Unlikely Alliances (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

ALGIERS -- Locked in a prison here, for now, is a desert bandit dubbed the "Bin Laden of the Sahara," whose capture was secretly orchestrated by U.S. forces after a long chase across some of the most forbidding terrain on Earth.

Amari Saifi, 37, a former Algerian army paratrooper, was caught in 2004 after he and a band of rebel fighters kidnapped 32 European tourists in the Algerian Sahara and ransomed them for about $6 million.

Since then, the U.S. government has cited his case as a model for terrorist-hunting operations and a justification for expanding U.S. military, diplomatic and intelligence programs in North Africa.

A close examination of how Saifi was apprehended, however, highlights the quandaries facing the United States as it extends its fight against Islamic terrorism to remote parts of the globe. In its search for allies in an unstable region, the U.S. government reached out to Libya -- then still officially designated a state sponsor of terrorism -- and to other countries it has condemned for abusing human rights.

Some security analysts and European counterterrorism officials question the U.S. strategy. They contend the Pentagon may be inflating the importance of Saifi and the terrorist threat in both the Sahara and an equally large and desolate region to the south known as the Sahel.

By sending troops and partnering with repressive governments, U.S. tactics could backfire, said Hugh Roberts, North Africa project director for the Brussels-based International Crisis Group.

"The idea that you could have major jihadi units holing up there always struck me as implausible," Roberts said. "The quickest way to generate a jihadi movement is to send some U.S. soldiers in there to swagger around. The more visible the U.S. military presence, the bigger the target."

DOJ_NMG_0088392

The hunt for Saifi lasted more than a year and nearly unraveled at the end, despite a joint operation among the U.S. military and seven countries, according to counterterrorism officials in North Africa and Europe. He was caught by happenstance, by a ragtag rebel army in Chad, as he fled his pursuers across the desert.

Although Saifi was finally transferred to Algerian custody, there are signs that he may not be in prison much longer. After giving him a life sentence last year, the Algerian government said this spring it might release him under an amnesty program, reflecting doubts as to how big a threat he posed in the first place.

Regardless of Saifi's fate, U.S. officials say they consider North Africa an increasingly strategic front. With weak governments and poorly patrolled borders, the region has already attracted Islamic radicals looking for a place to set up training camps and spread their ideology, officials say.

Together, the Defense and State departments are devoting $500 million to new counterterrorism programs in the region. Last year, the Pentagon sponsored Operation Flintlock, the largest U.S. joint military exercise in North Africa since World War II. About 700 U.S. Special Forces personnel trained troops from nine African nations, leading a war game that mirrored the effort to hunt down Saifi a year earlier.

"The threat is evolving," said Rear Adm. Richard K. Gallagher, a top commander at the U.S. European Command in Stuttgart, Germany, which is responsible for most of Africa. "Africa, for a lot of reasons, is a place that we've got to care hugely about. We ignore Africa at our peril."The Kidnappings

In February 2003, a band of Islamic extremists began scouring the desert expanse of southern Algeria for kidnap victims. The sparsely populated region's colored sand dunes and craggy mountains were a magnet for European tourists.

Soon, foreigners began to vanish, two or three at a time. Within a month, 32 Europeans -- mostly Germans, but also Austrian, Swedish, Swiss and Dutch citizens -- had been rounded up.

The kidnappers belonged to the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, a movement dedicated to overthrowing the Algerian government. Despite its local origins, the group has recently reached out to al-Qaeda and other networks in an attempt to broaden its scope.

The leader of the cell, Saifi, was a tall, bearded man who dressed in shabby robes and worn-out sneakers; often he wore black eye makeup to ward off the sun's glare. Known as Abderrazak al-Para, or "the paratrooper," he had deserted from the Algerian army in 1991.

"In the beginning, the entire group was very convinced of the plan: 'Europeans -- that'll bring us money and weapons,' " said Rainer Bracht, a German construction worker who was among the hostages. "In the beginning, they always told us, 'You will be free soon, it'll be just a couple of weeks.' But then it took longer and longer."

On May 13, 2003, Algerian troops surrounded some of the fighters on a mountain range. After a gun battle, 17 hostages were rescued and nine kidnappers were killed, according to the Algerian government. But the soldiers were unable to capture Saifi, who escaped with half of his men and 15 tourists.

As the group trekked south, they hid under rock formations to avoid detection from the skies. The trip was arduous, with temperatures climbing to 110 degrees. One German died of heat exhaustion, but Saifi otherwise took care to keep his captives alive.

"His men held him in high esteem and showed respect," recalled Martin Hainz, a Bavarian painter who was taken hostage. "He emanated a lot of authority, but his behavior was not authoritarian. He did not give orders; he listened and made remarks."

In July 2003, Saifi and his crew crossed into Mali, an impoverished and landlocked country. Hiding among desert nomads, the kidnappers negotiated through intermediaries with the German and Libyan governments, seeking cash. A month later, the rest of the hostages were released near the Algeria-Mali border. Although Germany and Libya have denied paying a ransom, other European officials said the two countries provided funds.

Flush with money, Saifi bought protection from local tribes, European counterterrorism officials said. He shopped on the black market for automatic rifles, missile launchers and 4x4 trucks. He expanded his militia to include fresh recruits from Mali, Chad and Niger.

DOJ_NMG_0088393

"At this point, he starts to become an important threat," said Louis Caprioli, former director of international counterterrorism for the DST, the French counterintelligence service, which was working with the U.S. military to track Saifi. "And the armies of Niger and Mali couldn't do anything about him."Warnings Heeded

At the time of the kidnappings, the U.S. government was starting a counterterrorism program in North Africa called the Pan-Sahel Initiative.

The program represented a response to worries that remote areas of North Africa could serve as a base for al-Qaeda or other Islamic extremists seeking to relocate after the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan in 2001. The initiative, led by the U.S. European Command, was designed to share intelligence and train ill-equipped militaries in the region.

The program had its critics, inside and outside the U.S. government, who questioned whether North African radicals had the potential to pose an external threat. They also wondered whether it made sense for the U.S. military to increase its presence in yet another predominantly Muslim part of the world.

The Sahara hostage-takings, however, gave a boost to military leaders who had been warning about the potential for trouble in North Africa. Since then, Congress has listened, budgeting $500 million over the next six years for an expanded version of the original program called the Trans-Saharan Counterterrorism Initiative.

Gallagher, of the U.S. European Command, said the military wanted to keep a light footprint in North Africa. "We want to get out in front of these problems and train these nations to deal with it," he said.

In a visit to Algiers in February to promote the program, Henry A. Crumpton, the State Department's counterterrorism coordinator, warned leaders from across North Africa that Saifi "underscored the real threat posed to the region." The Algerian Salafist group, he added, "has become a regional terrorist organization, recruiting and operating in all of your countries -- and beyond."Coordinated Pursuit

After the last hostages were freed, the U.S. military took effective control of the international hunt for Saifi, according to U.S. and European counterterrorism officials. Saifi had avoided the Algerian army by slipping past unguarded borders and vanishing into the desert. Now U.S. forces began tracking him with spy satellites and reconnaissance aircraft.

Overcoming regional hostilities, the U.S. military persuaded Mali, Niger, Algeria and Chad to cooperate on a plan to corral Saifi. U.S. Special Forces gave crash training to local soldiers. Under pressure, Saifi and his militia moved out of Mali in January 2004, crossed through Niger and entered Chad, covering about 1,000 miles of harsh terrain.

On March 9, 2004, troops from Niger and Chad caught up to Saifi in northwestern Chad. Bolstered by U.S. supplies, they killed 43 of Saifi's fighters. But once again, the desert bandit escaped.

A week later, Saifi and 16 followers were wandering through the Tibesti Mountains, short of water and food and unaware they had encroached on turf controlled by a Chadian rebel group. The rebels, known as the Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad, were enemies of the Chadian army. But they also didn't like the looks of the interlopers from Algeria and took them captive.

"We were astonished to see these people," Ousmane Hissein, a Chadian rebel leader in exile, said in an interview in Paris. "We tried to figure out who they were and where they were coming from." News reports on shortwave radio eventually revealed Saifi's identity.

Hissein said the rebels offered to turn Saifi over to Algeria, Germany, France and the United States, but all said no. Each country had been involved in chasing Saifi across the desert but did not want to risk a diplomatic rupture with the government of Chad by dealing with the rebels.

Once again, Libya agreed to serve as an intermediary. Relations between the governments in Tripoli and Washington had warmed since Moammar Gaddafi had ended his program to develop weapons of mass destruction four months earlier. But the alliance was still awkward; Libya had been branded a terrorist sponsor by the State Department since 1979, a label that would persist until June 2006.

The Chadian rebels, however, did not trust Gaddafi. They had accused him of assassinating one of their leaders years before. Negotiations stalled for months.

DOJ_NMG_0088394

Losing patience, Gaddafi threatened to send his troops into Chad to attack the rebels, Hissein said. But U.S. diplomats, worried about the risk of a regional war, intervened, persuading Gaddafi to pull back and work a deal. "The Americans played a huge role in all of this," Hissein added.

Seven months after he was captured by the rebels, Saifi was handed over at a border crossing to Libyan authorities, who extradited him to Algeria. The rebels are vague about whether they received any money in return.Eligible for Amnesty

In June 2005, Saifi was scheduled to go on trial in Algiers. For unexplained reasons, Algerian security services did not bring him to the courtroom, and he was sentenced in absentia to life in prison. Rumors spread that he was dead.

Not so, according to Abdelhaq Layada, founder of the Armed Islamic Group, which fought the Algerian government during the 1990s in a horrific civil war that killed an estimated 200,000 people. Layada, who was recently released from prison as part of an amnesty for convicted terrorists, said he hoped Saifi would soon win his freedom.

"Yes, he's still alive," Layada said during an interview outside Algiers. "He's a Muslim, and he loves Muhammad our prophet, and he loves Allah. He was doing what he thought was right."

Algerian justice officials declined requests for an interview. In March, however, Justice Minister Tayeb Belaiz said Saifi would be eligible for consideration under the amnesty. Interior Minister Noureddine Yazid Zerhouni called it "a sensitive case" but wouldn't rule out his release.

Saifi has been indicted in Germany, but Algeria generally doesn't extradite its citizens to Europe. He is not wanted on criminal charges in the United States.

A U.S. counterterrorism official said the Bush administration would be unlikely to protest publicly if Saifi is released.

"We would support the Algerians," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. The Algerian government, the official added, has made "political overtures to leaders and individuals who are willing to lay down their arms. We encourage that."

Staff writer Karen DeYoung in Washington and special correspondent Silke Lode in Berlin contributed to this report.

PATRIOT ACT:

ACLU Drops Patriot Act Challenge (AP)

By Jim Irwin, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

DETROIT — The American Civil Liberties Union on Friday dropped a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act.

The ACLU said it was withdrawing the lawsuit filed more than three years ago because of "improvements to the law." The Justice Department argued last month that amendments approved by Congress in March 2006 had corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act.

"While the reauthorized Patriot Act is far from perfect, we succeeded in stemming the damage from some of the Bush administration's most reckless policies," Ann Beeson, associate legal director of the ACLU in New York, said in a written statement.

The lawsuit, filed in July 2003 on behalf of the Muslim Community Association of Ann Arbor and five other nonprofit groups, was the first legal challenge to Section 215, the part of the Patriot Act that lets federal agents obtain such things as library records and medical information.

The ACLU said the revisions allow people receiving demands for records to consult with a lawyer and challenge the demands in court.

The Justice Department, which first asked that the lawsuit be dismissed in December 2003, said it was pleased by the ACLU's action, which was contained in a one-paragraph notice filed with U.S. District Judge Denise Page Hood in Detroit.

"We ... reiterate that the Patriot Act is a legitimate and important tool that has better helped law enforcement fight terrorism while simultaneously protecting our valued civil liberties," Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said.

DOJ_NMG_0088395

The ACLU argued that Section 215, which allows the FBI access to any "tangible things" such as books and documents through an order from a secret court, does not require investigators to show probable cause. It asked that the Justice Department be barred from using the provision.

Hood ruled on Oct. 3 that the ACLU's clients had shown they were harmed by the anti-terrorism law adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and that the lawsuit could proceed. But the ruling came after the law had been amended, prompting the ACLU to drop its case.

The ACLU said it would continue to monitor how the government applied Section 215 and would remain ready to defend any individual, business or organization receiving demands for information under the provision.

The group also said it is continuing its legal fight against a more frequently used provision of the Patriot Act that authorizes national security letters. Such letters allow the executive branch of government to obtain records about people in terrorism and espionage investigations without a judge's approval or a grand jury subpoena.

ACLU Drops Patriot Act Suit (DEN)

By Edward L. Cardenas

Detroit News, October 28, 2006

Civil liberties organization says Congress' move to check federal investigative powers prompted action.

DETROIT -- The American Civil Liberties Union on Friday withdrew a lawsuit filed three years ago in U.S. District Court in Detroit that challenged a provision in the Patriot Act.

The ACLU originally filed the suit against the government on behalf of a coalition of groups that argued that Section 215 of the Patriot Act passed in October 2001 was unconstitutional because it gave wide and secret investigative powers to federal agents to obtain books, records, papers, documents, e-mails and even a DNA sample without notifying the targeted person or group.

The suit was withdrawn on Friday after Congress revised the Patriot Act in March to allow those who receive a demand for records to consult with a lawyer and challenge the demand in court.

"While the reauthorized Patriot Act is far from perfect, we succeeded in stemming the damage from some of the Bush administration's most reckless policies," said Ann Beeson, ACLU's associate legal director, in a statement.

"The ACLU will continue to monitor how the government applies the broad Section 215 power and we will challenge unconstitutional demands on a case-by-case basis," Beeson said.

The Justice Department said it was pleased by the ACLU's action.

"We ... reiterate that the Patriot Act is a legitimate and important tool that has better helped law enforcement fight terrorism while simultaneously protecting our valued civil liberties," Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos told The Associated Press.

Imad Hamad, director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, which was one of the organizations that was included in the suit, said the "withdrawal does not mean total approval of the act or total approval of the provisions.

"We are to keep our eyes wide open as we move forward," he said.

Earlier last month U.S. District Court Judge Denise Page Hood rejected a motion by the government to dismiss the case.

In the 15-page decision issued Sept. 29 that allowed the ACLU to continue its suit, Hood said the civil liberties groups had 30 days to amend its original complaint to address the amendments made by Congress.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Lays Out Plan To Police Chiefs (GCN)

By Kerri Hostetler, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, October 28, 2006

As the United States faces threats from weapons of mass destruction—radiological, chemical, biological or nuclear—as well as high-consequence international and homegrown plots, the Homeland Security Department is working with state, local, federal and international law enforcement to defend the country from terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0088396

Homeland Security secretary Michael Chertoff said stopping domestic terrorism threats is best done through shared intelligence, starting at the local level. To ensure that this coordination and collaboration happens, DHS will establish fusion centers, stocked with experts, and will work to grant clearance of classified information more quickly.

Both initiatives are part of the department's effort to take its relationships with major city police chiefs and information sharing to the next level, Chertoff said at the annual International Association of Chiefs of Police conference in Boston last week.

The nation saw how important information sharing is two weeks ago. Chertoff cited the recent incident involving the small airplane crashing into the New York City high rise as a great example of agencies working together. It was not immediately known if the crash was a terrorist attack, but first responders were able to inform officials within DHS of what was happening on site, allowing the department to respond to the situation.

Fusion centers are a step in making this a reality around the country.

"First of all, we are going to build upon some of our early initial effort to establish fusion centers by creating a national network of intelligence fusion centers to support state and local decision-makers, chiefs of police, and state and local intelligence officials," Chertoff said.

The fusion centers will be made up of intelligence personnel from the federal intelligence community, subject matter experts and intelligence analysts and operators of local police departments, DHS officials said.

The goal is to "become more deeply embedded in one another's day-to-day intelligence analysis and operational activity," Chertoff said.

Chertoff said of the fusion centers, " it's important to recognize that these are going to be critical pathways for the sharing of information and expertise across the whole spectrum of concerns we gave in dealing with the possibility of terrorism."

DHS plans to have 20 fusion centers by the end of the fiscal year and up to 35 fusion centers by the end of the next fiscal year. They have already invested $380 million in state-run fusion centers. Some states that have fusion centers include Colorado, Illinois, Maryland and New York.

The Justice Department has issued regulations for the fusion centers.

The agency will also work toward speeding up and broadening the clearance process.

Chertoff also said, "As necessary, we're going to work to be more nimble and quicker in granting top secret and SCI [sensitive compartmented information] clearance for those who do not require that level of classified access."

Also, real-time and strategic information sharing is the thrust behind DHS encouraging state and local law enforcement agencies to provide a list of important officials and institutions in their cities that need access to critical information as quickly as federal officials do.

Chertoff assured the chiefs of police that DHS is here to help.

"We will share information. We will share training. We will share tools. And, we will work as a team to make sure that whether terrorism comes in the airplanes, from across the ocean, or whether it's born in apartment buildings in or cities and towns, we will detect it. We will prevent it. And, we will respond to it effectively in the interest of protecting our families, our friends, our loved ones, and our fellow citizens," Chertoff said.

Airlines Delay In Checking Workers (LAT)

From Newsday

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

An estimated 50,000 cargo handlers were to be screened by Dec. 1. A federal agency has extended the deadline.

The Transportation Security Administration has rolled back the deadlines for criminal-background checks for tens of thousands of airline workers who handle cargo loaded onto passenger airplanes, saying the industry cannot meet the timetables.

"TSA has concluded that the regulated community will be unable to meet some deadlines in the air cargo final rule because of the large number of employees and agents subject to the requirements," the agency said in a notice published this week.

DOJ_NMG_0088397

The rules were originally slated to go into effect from Oct . 23 to Dec. 1. They require background checks and security training for an estimated 50,000 workers employed by the airlines or by airline contractors handling cargo, said TSA spokesman Darrin Kayser.

Under the new timetables, several deadlines have been pushed back as far as mid-2007. The agency also will open the regulation to a new round of public comment, which could lead to more changes.

Air cargo has long been described as the weak underbelly of aviation security since the packages loaded into planes undergo far less scrutiny than passengers or their luggage. This week, a report card by the Council on Foreign Relations gave cargo security a D-plus.

Several security experts blasted the delays as inexcusable at a time when aviation threats remain high.

"How is it possible that we check everyone in the passenger terminal, but we don't check the people loading cargo on the plane itself?" asked Isaac Yeffet, a former security chief for El Al Israel Airlines and now a private consultant.

Yeffet criticized the TSA for what he called its lack of urgency, citing the recent leaked report that undercover agents were able to smuggle prohibited items past the agency's screeners at Newark International Airport in 20 out of 22 attempts.

"This is not the security that the American people need or deserve," he said.

But TSA officials said they were implementing other programs to beef up air cargo security, including a known-shipper program to distinguish higher-risk cargo, and canine units to sniff for explosives. They defended the changes as "a more realistic timetable" based on the 4,500 responses they received from the industry — a view seconded by air carriers.

John Meenan, executive vice president of the Air Transport Assn., said the new timetable would allow the process "to be completed in an orderly fashion with the full support of the airline industry."

Suspicious Letter Shuts Clinton's Harlem Office (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton's Harlem office was shut down yesterday afternoon after a woman in the office opened a letter and a suspicious white powder spilled out, the police said.

The substance was later found to be nontoxic, but its discovery led the authorities to evacuate two floors of the building, at 55 West 125th Street, and to decontaminate several workers in the office. Mr. Clinton was not there at the time the substance was found. The police said the letter included a "rambling diatribe."

It was the third time since 2001 that a letter containing a mysterious but nontoxic substance had been sent to Mr. Clinton's office, the police said. The previous substance was determined to be flour, but it was unclear last night what the latest substance was and whether the incident was connected to the previous two.

"Clinton is aware of the situation, but will continue his normal activities," Richard Staropoli, the assistant special agent in charge of the Secret Service in New York, said. "This has not affected the former president or Mrs. Clinton in any way."

Mr. Clinton attended a large birthday party last night at the Gramercy Park Hotel as part of a three-day celebration to raise money for charity. Police and emergency crews were called to the building about 3:45 pm. According to officials, a member of Mr. Clinton's staff called the authorities moments after she opened a package addressed to Mr. Clinton that contained a letter.

At least three people in the office came in direct contact with the powder, though no one was injured.

Substance At Clinton's Office Not Toxic (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 28, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — Police and Secret Service agents determined Friday that a suspicious substance found at former President Clinton's office in Manhattan was not toxic.

A staff member opened package delivered to the president's office that contained a white powdery substance and a letter, and called authorities, said Secret Service spokesman Richard Staropoli. He described the letter as a "rambling diatribe."

Clinton was not at the office at the time because he was attending events for his three-day birthday bash, a fundraising event for his foundation. His birthday was in August.

"The situation has not affected the president or Mrs. Clinton in any way whatsoever," Staropoli said.

DOJ_NMG_0088398

Police and emergency crews were called to the Harlem office building around 3:45 p.m. Yellow police tape blocked off the sidewalk in front of the building, but traffic was not disrupted.

Clinton spokesman Jay Carson said the building was not evacuated. He had no other details.

Secret Service spokesman Eric Zahren said a field test on the substance found it to be inert.

Clinton signed a 10-year lease for the 8,300-square-foot penthouse floor of the 14-story building in 2001.

The city's Administration for Children's Services has a field office on four lower floors of the building.

Training Gets Under Way At UCO Forensics Center (OKLA)

By Diana Baldwin, Staff Writer

The Oklahoman, October 28, 2006

EDMOND — Five dozen emergency first responders and bomb technicians throughout the state should be a little safer after learning about homemade bomb factories this week.

The course was one of the first professional continuing education classes offered by the University of Central Oklahoma's newly created Institute for Forensic Science.

Kirk Yeager, an FBI bomb expert, said, "We want to give them an understanding about what they could run across so they can assess the situation and say that something isn't right."

Homemade bombs or improvised explosives are devices made from materials available in the home or that can be easily purchased. Bomb factories are found in garages, trunks of vehicles and motel rooms.

Improvised explosives vary in size and design. They can range from the estimated 4,800-pound fertilizer bomb that resulted in the deaths of 168 people in the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing to the single chemical bomb in the backpack of a University of Oklahoma student that exploded and killed him outside a packed football stadium last fall.

Yeager, a supervisory bomb specialist and forensic examiner at FBI headquarters in Quantico, Va., was one of the instructors for the class held on the Edmond campus. He has been involved in bombing investigations as far away as in Israel, Peru and Turkey. One of his latest assignments was in Great Britain when authorities said they foiled a plot to bomb a U.S.-bound flight. Discovery of the plot caused officials to ban liquids and gels in airline passengers' carry-on bags. He also worked on the case in which three Americans were killed in the Gaza Strip.

Yeager said he shared his worldwide experiences because whatever trends are seen abroad could end up here in the United States.

Ten bomb technicians were among those attending the class also taught by Oklahoma City FBI Special Agent Barry Black. Yeager said the interaction between the first responders and bomb technicians makes for a good situation in the classroom.

"It really enriches the whole experience," Yeager said.

In the field, first responders in instances such as drug raids need to recognize the types of chemicals used to make the explosives, said Black, a bomb technician and training coordinator.

"They need to know enough to take a step back and call the bomb squad," Black said.

With today's violent drug laboratories, Yeager said, many officers are taking a bomb tech with them to the scene.

The goals of the class were to teach recognition of the bombs or chemicals and safe handling.

Training professionals, students Dwight E. Adams, retired director of the FBI lab in Quantico, became the head of the newly created Institute for Forensic Science in July.

The institute provides continuing education for professionals and enhances student education opportunities on campus. Yeager also spoke to student forensic classes this week.

The institute's first class for professionals was held earlier this month for the Oklahoma State Bureau of Investigation on human hair identification.

A recording of this week's class on bomb factories will be available on a DVD to professionals, Adams said. It also will be posted on a law enforcement Internet site. The information will not be distributed publicly because of the sensitive material used by law enforcement officers.

Other professional training sessions for law enforcement officers, forensic scientists and attorneys are planned.

DOJ_NMG_0088399

IU Student Set Up Website For Fake Boarding Passes (WISH)

By Tony Perkins

WISH-TV, October 26, 2006

An IU student's research on airport security has landed him in hot water with federal investigators. He found a way to forge boarding passes, and then put the instructions online.

The student researcher says he wanted to show the Transportation Security Agency that anyone could find their way past a key line of defense.

IU doctoral candidate Christopher Soghoian wanted to prove terrorists can get past security workers on the way to airport gates. He even manufactured a 10-step process that he says makes it "insanely easy" to board a plane.

Soghoian thought that the flaw was significant. Significant enough that he put the information on the Internet. He displayed a fake Northwest Airlines pass that features Osama Bin Laden's name.

He created a ticket in which the most-wanted terrorist suspect flies coach.

Soghoian said anyone could make up a name. He insists airport workers will simply check for ID, scan the barcode at the gate, and let the ticket holder board the plane without any questions.

Indiana Homeland Security chief Eric Dietz disagrees, "Well, I think you can find a number of small loopholes, but you have to look at what it does to the overall system. It takes a piece approach as opposed to a system approach."

Dietz says someone who actually tries to use a fake boarding pass won't get past additional levels of airport security.

"We can have college kids forging drivers licenses, we can certainly can forge a boarding pass. That's why we have defense in depth," Dietz said.

Airline passengers appreciated Soghoian's research but they wished he didn't try to made it public.

"Well, I think anytime you are talking about security, you need to take it to somebody right way. Take it to some police department or something. Never publicize it, never put it out there. If I were to see it on the Internet, that's putting somebody's life in jeopardy, and so forth," Jesus Trujillo from Hagerman, New Mexico said.

"I think they should use their abilities and work with the airlines to make sure things like this don't happen." Jeff Bruns of Hagerstown said.

24 Hour News 8 contacted Soghoian by e-mail, and he responded that he won't talk to reporters about his research until he hires a lawyer.

He says he's received at least one visit from the FBI and a congressman has called for his arrest.

In the meantime, Soghoian's research on forging an airline boarding pass has been taken off-line.

Mayor Expands Search For 9/11 Remains (NYT)

By David W. Dunlap

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

The Bloomberg administration said yesterday that it would cast a net well beyond ground zero, from Broadway to the Hudson River, from the bottom of manholes to the top of nearby skyscrapers, in its search for human remains from Sept. 11, 2001.

The chief medical examiner is to inspect the roofs of the Millenium Hotel and 1 Liberty Plaza, opposite the World Trade Center site. Tiny bone fragments may be found there, mixed in with the stone ballast, as they were atop the former Deutsche Bank building, according to a report prepared for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg.

Key downtown redevelopment agencies have headquarters in the 53-story Liberty Plaza tower. It is also where victims' family members can visit privately in a room set aside for them on the 20th floor.

The largest potential search site is the four-block-long, 60-foot-wide service road between the trade center pit and West Street. Dozens of bones and bone fragments have been found in the last week and a half in an abandoned, damaged manhole that had been buried under several feet of fill.

DOJ_NMG_0088400

A layer of trade center debris may still exist between the original roadway and the current service road, said the report by David J. Burney, the commissioner of the Department of Design and Construction, and Charles J. Maikish, the executive director of the Lower Manhattan Construction Command Center.

An expanded search may take a year or longer, Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler said. At times, it will require the overnight closing of some lanes of West Street. He said he could not estimate the cost.

"We are going to search high and low for anything we can find," Mr. Skyler said, "and if the result of all this work is only one more remain or one more piece of personal property, it will still have been worth it."

Family members said the proposed measures did not go far enough. For instance, they said workers ought to dig up the whole service road rather than conduct exploratory excavations as recommended. And they called again for the city to relinquish its role to the federal Joint P.O.W.-M.I.A. Accounting Command, which recovers and identifies service members who have been killed in action.

"Doing more of the same wrong thing in a larger area cannot serve any useful purpose," said Sally Regenhard. She has yet to recover her son, Christian, who was killed in the 2001 terrorist attack.

But Mr. Skyler said the city had the experience and the forensic anthropologists needed to do the job, including two veterans of the accounting command. "The same expertise that JPAC would bring to the table, the city has," he said.

Another site where trade center debris may be found, the report said, is the small block between Liberty and Cedar Streets. St. Nicholas Greek Orthodox Church stood there until 9/11, when it was destroyed by the collapse of 2 World Trade Center. No buildings are there now.

Inspection is also warranted, the report said, at Fiterman Hall, a badly damaged building north of ground zero that is to be demolished, and 130 Cedar Street, south of ground zero, which is to be renovated.

The report called for the visual inspection of as many as 500 subterranean structures — manholes, service boxes, valve chambers and cable-splicing chambers — between Broadway and the Hudson River and Barclay and Albany Streets. If trade center debris is found, the report said, the chief medical examiner should be called in to sift it.

Mayor Bloomberg went further and said that any extraneous material, like silt, should be removed and sifted by the medical examiner. He accepted the rest of the report.

Follow The Money (WSJ)

By Ted Frank

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

The trial lawyers have now enlisted themselves in the war against terror. One can imagine a parody -- a team of wing-tipped attorneys parachuting into the wilds of Afghanistan, armed with subpoenas forcing Osama bin Laden to produce all relevant documents and secure his attendance at a 20-day videotaped deposition (damn the Geneva Conventions against torture). The legal and photocopying bills alone crush al Qaeda.

The reality is more prosaic, and less amusing. For just as Willie Sutton legendarily said he robbed banks "because that's where the money is," plaintiffs' attorneys are weaving creative legal theories to hold legitimate third parties liable for the intentional acts of terrorists. This friendly fire could end up doing almost as much financial damage as the terrorists themselves, with the lawyers getting rich in the process.

The roots of this folly are in the 1970s, when many state courts began to decide that the intentional acts of criminals shouldn't bar plaintiffs from collecting money from others with deeper pockets. So if you are carjacked -- sue the parking- lot owner. Most legislatures have yet to reverse this radical legal change.

Thus trial lawyers, thanks to New York Supreme Court Justice Nicholas Figueroa's generous rulings and jury instructions, persuaded a jury in October last year that the terrorists who planted a truck bomb in the World Trade Center garage in 1993 were only 32% responsible, while the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey was 68% responsible -- and therefore, under New York law, wholly on the hook for $1.8 billion in damages.

After 9/11, lawsuits would have bankrupted several corporate victims of the attacks were it not for a $7 billion, taxpayer-funded bailout of potential plaintiffs. Even so, several dozen claimants opted for litigation. Naturally, their lawyers have sued everyone from the airlines to Boeing to Motorola to New York City. Many of these cases are still in pre-trial proceedings. Attorneys are asking for billions of dollars in damages.

DOJ_NMG_0088401

Banks are not immune from terrorist-related lawsuits, either. They're getting hauled into court because of who has accounts at their institutions.

Federal laws permit parties injured by an act of terrorism to recover treble damages and attorneys' fees in civil suits against terrorists. Fair enough. But an act of terrorism may also include "knowingly providing material support or resources to a foreign terrorist organization." The vagueness and breadth of this language is the source of the mischief: Following the 9/11 attacks, the U.S. started cracking down on front organizations for Islamic terror groups that posed as charities; and some of these faux-charities had accounts at international banks. Bingo. Lawsuits are pending now that claim, in effect, that the banks should have known then what the U.S. government did not decide until years later.

For example, on Aug. 22, 2003, the U.S. designated Interpal and Comité de Bienfaisance pour la Solidarité avec la Palestine (CBSP), among others, as international terrorist organizations. These two outfits channeled funds to the Orwellian-named "Union of the Good" militant group, which in turn supported Hamas. Three days before the designation, on Aug. 19, 2003, a Hamas suicide bomber, Raed Abdul Hamid Misk, blew himself up on the Egged No. 2 bus in Jerusalem, killing and wounding dozens.

The American victims and their families have sued over this and other attacks; but they have not sued Misk -- who, now beyond earthly jurisdiction, will have to answer to a higher authority -- nor Hamas, nor "Union of the Good," nor even Interpal or CBSP. Rather, the families are suing NatWest Bank,where Interpal happened to hold some of their bank accounts, and Credit Lyonnais, which once held CBSP money.

The complaint against Credit Lyonnais filed earlier this year spends most of its 79 pages listing heinous acts of Hamas and their consequences. So what does this have to do with Crédit Lyonnais? A small section of the complaint claims that Credit Lyonnais was supposed to be monitoring Al Jazeera in case an official for one of its customers, such as CBSP, said something incriminating. Perversely, the fact that Credit Lyonnais reported suspicious banking activity to regulators is supposed to be evidence that the banks "knew" that the two charities were supporting terrorism.

The plaintiffs make much of the fact that Israel designated CBSP and Interpal unlawful organizations in the late 1990s. But the U.S. did not until 2003 -- and France and Britain have yet to do so, despite extensive investigation. The banking system will grind to a halt if a bank must scrutinize every customer to the degree plaintiffs argue should have been done for CBSP and Interpal -- a degree of scrutiny greater than their own home countries have established.

France and Britain may well be wrong to assess these Hamas-affiliated organizations as "humanitarian": Money is fungible, and Hamas can readily shift its own funds from feeding constituents to making bombs. But criminal prosecutors, not contingency-fee-hunting trial lawyers, should chase terrorist financing. The latter are more interested in wealth than guilt: Trial lawyers have every motivation to attempt to attach blame to the deepest and most readily available pocket instead of the actual culpable parties. Nor do they bear the diplomatic consequences for the U.S. when they baselessly tread upon the wrong toes.

Both NatWest Bank and Credit Lyonnais filed motions before Judge Charles Sifton of the Eastern District of New York to dismiss the cases against them. In vain: The lawsuits go forward and are in the pre-trial discovery stage.

If courts are not going to apply the antiterrorism laws sensibly, Congress should amend them to make clear that civil liability is limited to those who commit criminal acts of international terrorism, and those who aid and abet with specific intent to commit terror. Otherwise, terrorists can damage the global economy simply by inducing fratricidal litigation.

Mr. Frank is a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and director of the AEI Liability Project. He blogs at PointOfLaw.com1.

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Prime Minister Criticizes U.S. Policy (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088402

Baghdad, Iraq — The Iraqi prime minister sharply criticized U.S. policy Friday during a private meeting with the U.S. ambassador, pointing to America's failure to either reduce violence or give his government authority over security matters.

The criticism in private was the latest example of tension between the two governments and stood in stark contrast with a joint public statement issued after the meeting.

In the statement, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the U.S. Embassy said they had agreed to unspecified "timelines" to make tough political and security decisions on the country's future.

Privately, however, al-Maliki criticized what he called the patronizing U.S. tone toward the Iraqi government and warned U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad to respect Iraq's sovereignty, according to two of the prime minister's advisers.

"I'm a friend to the United States, but not America's man in Iraq," al-Maliki told Khalilzad, according to Hassan al-Senaid, one of the prime minister's closest advisers.

Previously, al-Maliki had vehemently rejected the notion of deadlines for his government to achieve key goals, but the statement said "the Iraqi government has made clear the issues that must be resolved with timelines for them to take positive steps forward on behalf of the Iraqi people."

The statement said "Iraq and the United States are committed to working together to respond to the needs of the people." It affirmed that America "will continue to stand by the Iraqi government" amid rumors Washington may be seeking alternatives to Baghdad's current Shiite-led administration.

Al-Maliki's supporters downplayed the reference to timelines as insignificant, saying they were meant as rough guidelines to hand security over to Iraqis.

U.S. officials in Baghdad could not be reached for comment.

Following days of back-and-forth recriminations, the contrast between private criticism and the public statement brought into sharper focus a dispute that may have already undermined the Shiite-led government and increased friction between America and the country's majority sect.

Khalilzad is at odds with al-Maliki on how to address the Shiite militias wreaking havoc on large parts of the country. Khalilzad last year convinced Sunni Arabs now victimized by the militias to enter the government. The ambassador has insisted that the Shiite armed groups and Sunni Arab insurgents be treated similarly.

Al-Maliki draws political support from the groups backing militias. He says they should be drawn into the political process and disarmed peacefully. U.S. military and political officials have grown frustrated over perceived Iraqi government inaction on militias, now deemed by Americans as the No. 1 impetus of sectarian violence.

Khalilzad told reporters Tuesday that Iraqis must "achieve key political and security milestones" by certain deadlines, or face unspecified consequences. But he was rebuffed by both al-Maliki and U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who told critics to "back off" making unreasonable demands of the five-month-old Iraqi government.

Al-Maliki's inner circle, huddled in a late-night briefing, said the prime minister would call President Bush on Saturday to clear the air about what the government views as unproductive interference on the part of U.S. officials in Baghdad.

"Khalilzad's demand for a timetable was clear interference with the sovereignty of the Iraqi government," said Nada Sudani, a member of parliament who belongs to al-Maliki's Dawa Party. "Maliki rejects any exterior body giving a timeline for the performance of the Iraqi government."

Prickly truths underlie the squabbling and confusion: Al-Maliki's government has lost public backers over five months of car bombs, death squad slayings and economic misery, and increasingly relies for support on narrow cliques of Islamist political parties, including the radical movement of cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The U.S. government, undertaking a massive nation-building project while fighting off a ferocious insurgency, has little choice but to back al-Maliki's Iranian-influenced Shiite government. Any U.S. move against al-Maliki could spark even greater violence and anti-American animosity.

Al-Maliki has demanded that Americans let him try to politically co-opt al-Sadr, who has gone from a rabble-rousing street firebrand in the early days after the U.S. invasion to one of the most powerful figures in the country with 30 seats in parliament and control over several key ministries.

DOJ_NMG_0088403

There have been numerous signs that al-Sadr himself has tired of the most troublesome of his self-styled loyalists. During prayers Friday in the southern city of Kufa, al-Sadr's principal pulpit, his deputy denounced recent violence in Iraq caused by "people who violated and stood against the wise and honorable leadership" of the young cleric.

"If you would ever fail to comply with (his orders), then I frankly tell you that you will regret it, and you'd rather die," warned Sheik Jabir Khafaji, one of Sadr's chief advisers.

Among his followers' alleged misdeeds was the Monday night abduction of a U.S. soldier of Iraqi descent. The Iraqi family of the missing army translator issued an appeal for his release as U.S. soldiers continued a days-long crackdown on the volatile Sadr City where they suspect he's being held, according to Iraq's Al-Sharqiya television.

Witnesses said U.S. forces raided schools, mosques and homes over the last few days in search of the missing soldier.

Al-Sharqiya television said the missing soldier's name is Ahmad Qusai Tai. He was taken from a home in central Baghdad on Monday night after he left the Green Zone to spend Muslim holidays with relatives in the capital.

Tai's mother, according to an Al-Sharqiya interview, has pleaded for his captors to treat him with mercy and return him to his family.

Sadr City is a stronghold of bands of al-Sadr's self-described followers, who call themselves the al-Mahdi army. Al-Sadr launched the organization as a tool to mobilize and organize Shiites who are poor, young and pious.

But U.S. and Iraqi officials suspect splinter groups under no central authority have begun using the al-Mahdi army as a cover for various forms of criminal activity, including wanton targeting of Sunni Arab men.

Al-Sadr has ordered followers to refrain from violence during the latest U.S. raids, and for the most part Friday, the command held. "The Mahdi army members are restraining themselves," said Qahtan Sudani, a 28-year-old Sadr City resident and follower of the movement. "It's Muqtada's' orders that confrontation with the occupier will be through peaceful methods."

At least one U.S. soldier was reported killed Friday, bringing the number of American troops killed in Iraq so far this month to 97, the highest number for any single month since January 2005. The soldier, assigned to the 3rd Brigade of the 1st Cavalry Division, died of wounds sustained in combat in Diyala province Thursday.

A special correspondent in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Fighting Split, U.S. And Iraq Renew Vow To Work For Peace (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 27 — With recent events in Iraq causing growing strains between the Bush administration and the Iraqi government, the two governments issued a tautly worded statement through the American Embassy in Baghdad on Friday renewing their commitment to work together for peace and security in Iraq.

The statement, remarkable for the fact that the two governments found it necessary, followed a meeting between Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador. The three-paragraph joint statement issued afterward appeared aimed at tamping down frictions between the governments while countering a growing perception in Baghdad and Washington that the increasingly grim situation here is driving a wedge between them.

The statement said Mr. Maliki and Mr. Khalilzad — who have meet regularly during Mr. Maliki's six months in office — "were pleased to meet today to discuss our ongoing efforts to bring peace and security to Iraq and create a better future for all Iraqis." Usually, meetings between the two men, with offices close to each other in Baghdad's Green Zone government compound, are not the subject of official announcements.

"While we recognize the difficulties, we know that our continued partnership and strategic alliance will allow us to meet the challenges facing Iraq," the statement said. "The United States will continue to stand by the Iraqi government, and the Iraqi government welcomes the support of the United States as it moves forward with plans for national reconciliation, economic progress and the strengthening of the Iraqi security forces."

The statement concluded: "The government of Iraq is committed to a good and strong relationship with the U.S. government to work together toward a democratic, stable Iraq, and to confront the terrorist challenges in light of the strategic alliance between the two countries."

DOJ_NMG_0088404

The statement followed an outburst on Wednesday in which Mr. Maliki spoke out forcefully against the idea of American-imposed benchmarks or timelines for action on the most critical issues dividing the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish populations. The benchmarks have been pushed by the Bush administration as a means of pulling the country back from the brink of civil war.

But Mr. Maliki astonished American officials here by saying Wednesday that "this is an elected government and no one has the right to set a timetable for it." He spoke 24 hours after Mr. Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, had spoken of a timeline for action on the toughest issues as a centerpiece of a joint Iraqi and American strategy for winning the war.

In Washington, President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld have both sought to calm the political storm in Baghdad. At his news conference on Wednesday, Mr. Bush said American officials were "working with the Iraqi government to have certain benchmarks to meet as a way to determine whether or not they are making the hard decisions necessary to achieve peace."

But he said Mr. Maliki was right in his insistence on Iraq's right to make its own decisions. "This is a sovereign government," he said. At a Pentagon news conference on Thursday, Mr. Rumsfeld said the idea of benchmarks did not involve fixed deadlines or penalties for the Iraqis.

The issues outlined by Mr. Khalilzad and General Casey defined the struggle for political and economic power that is tearing at the fragile coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds that make up the Maliki government. They include the role of the Shiite militias, which have played a widening role in the bloodshed across the country, the division of oil revenues and the balance to be struck between holding officials of Saddam Hussein's government accountable and opening the door to rehabilitation.

Days before Mr. Maliki's outburst, American officials handed out what they described as a "notional political timetable" setting out a series of deadlines for legislative and executive actions. The timetable ran from September this year through March 2007, and Mr. Khalilzad said it had been drawn up in consultation with the Maliki government.

High on the list was the passage of laws governing the disarming of militias, an amnesty for certain fighters and a program for reintegrating militia members into civilian life.

The dispute over benchmarks reflects a deeper divide between the religious Shiite parties and the Americans, who were once seen by the Shiites as a partner in wresting power from the Sunni minority through elections. But the Americans have become increasingly unpopular with the Shiites as they have pushed plans for a reconciliation with the Sunnis, which the Americans hope would dampen the Sunni insurgency.

But Shiites have chafed at the American push for reconciliation, in particular with the role played by Mr. Khalilzad, who is a Sunni Muslim. In recent weeks, Mr. Maliki and other high-ranking Shiites have begun to chafe at American military control of the new Iraqi Army, and have grown increasingly bitter over American statements identifying Shiite militias as equally responsible with the Sunni insurgents for the violence here.

One of the most senior Shiite government officials, Adel Abdul-Mahdi, a vice president, told reporters in the southern city of Najaf on Friday that the American focus on disbanding the militias was misplaced.

"There are some attempts to advance the fight against the militias and delay the fight against terrorism and the insurgency," he said after meeting with Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. "We warn of the dangers of these attempts."

For the second time this week, American troops rolled in force into the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army on Friday in search of a missing American soldier, but this time withdrew without clashing with fighters there, authorities said.

Search For U.S. Soldier Spurs Sadr City Battles (WP)

By John Ward Anderson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Translator's Brother Was Freed, Premier Says

BAGHDAD, Oct. 27 -- U.S. and Iraqi forces returned to Sadr City on Friday to search the Shiite Muslim slum for a missing U.S. soldier, occasionally engaging in gun battles with members of local militias during their hunt.

DOJ_NMG_0088405

The soldier, an Iraqi-born translator whose name has not been released, was abducted by gunmen in Karrada, a middle-class Shiite neighborhood in central Baghdad, while visiting relatives on Monday, the start of the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Fitr, according to the U.S. military. U.S. soldiers rarely, if ever, are allowed to wander alone on the streets of Baghdad, and the visit had not been approved, military officials said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces have conducted an intense hunt across Baghdad, searching cars at checkpoints, going door to door and raiding areas where they think he might be held.

In an interview with [a] news service Thursday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said the soldier's brother was kidnapped with him but had been released.

"The brother who was released said he had been abducted by the Mahdi Army," Maliki said, referring to the militia headed by Moqtada al-Sadr, an anti-U.S. cleric. "But we don't know what the Mahdi Army means anymore."

The militia, which has clashed with U.S. troops on several occasions, is accused of being behind death squads that have slaughtered thousands of Sunni Arabs. Many analysts say they believe that rogue units of the militia may no longer be under Sadr's control, and Maliki said in the interview that some Sunnis now operate in the name of the Mahdi Army.

Sadr's political movement is a key member of Maliki's governing Shiite coalition, and U.S. officials have expressed frustration that he has not done more to disarm the group.

"We asked the Sadr movement to look" for the missing soldier, Maliki said, "and they swear they know nothing."

On Wednesday, U.S. troops launched two raids in Sadr City, a teeming Baghdad slum and home to 2.5 million Shiites, many of whom are Sadr loyalists.

Maliki said in the ... interview that the target of Wednesday's U.S. operation was Abu Deraa, who is considered a death squad leader responsible for killing scores of Sunnis. It was unclear whether Abu Deraa is a suspect in the kidnapping of the U.S. soldier, and U.S. officials declined to comment.

"We are conducting operations in search of the soldier, but there are many other operations as well, and we don't want to identify any people as targets" because it could tip them off, said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman.

On Thursday, U.S. soldiers blocked entrances to Sadr City with armored vehicles, sandbags and concertina wire. Traffic backed up in both directions for hours as soldiers waved cars through one at a time for searches.

"They turned Sadr City to hell these last three days," said Abdul Hameed Swadi, waiting in the jam of cars outside one of the bridges into Sadr City.

"Why are we waiting like this?" a woman cloaked in a black robe yelled to an Iraqi soldier standing with the Americans.

"It's an order from the Americans," the Iraqi soldier said.

"You are in the Iraqi army," she yelled back. "What kind of army are you?"

An Iraqi Interior Ministry spokesman said the Friday incursion into Sadr City targeted the Zahraa mosque and Hakim High School. He said gunfights erupted between members of the Mahdi Army and U.S. troops, and that U.S. planes targeted the two buildings and destroyed them. He said it was unclear whether there were casualties. The account could not be independently verified.

Meanwhile, in an apparent effort to tamp down reports of disagreement between the United States and Iraq over timelines and benchmarks for progress in Iraq, Maliki and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued a rare joint news release late Friday, saying they were "committed to working together to respond to the needs of the people."

"The Iraqi government has made clear the issues that must be resolved with timelines for them to take positive steps forward on behalf of the Iraqi people," the statement said, without elaborating on what issues would be subject to timelines. Maliki had previously said he did not want timelines imposed on his government by the United States.

Also Friday, the U.S. military announced that a soldier who was killed in Diyala province on Thursday was the 97th U.S. fatality of the month, making October the deadliest month for U.S. forces in Iraq since January 2005, when 106 service members died.

Correspondent Ellen Knickmeyer and Washington Post staff in Kirkuk and Baghdad contributed to this report.

U.S., Iraq Affirm 'Good, Strong' Ties (WT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0088406

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The American ambassador and Iraqi prime minister issued a rare joint statement yesterday in which Iraq reaffirmed its commitment to a "good and strong" relationship with Washington -- a bid to dampen speculation about souring ties less than two weeks before U.S. midterm elections.

The statement followed a tense week in U.S.-Iraqi relations, as Washington has stepped up pressure on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to crack down on Shi'ite militias and death squads behind a wave of sectarian killings. Mr. al-Maliki, whose political standing is beholden to the two main militias, has repeatedly said he would disband "illegal armed groups" but so far has taken little action.

On Tuesday, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad announced the centerpiece of the Bush administration's new strategy: The establishment of a timeline to curb violence and solve other Iraqi problems. He said Mr. al-Maliki had agreed to the plan.

But over the next two days, Mr. al-Maliki publicly and heatedly said that he saw imposition of timelines as an infringement on Iraqi sovereignty. Then he said that the timeline program was a product of U.S. electoral politics.

The White House on Thursday said Mr. al-Maliki's comments were taken out of context. But hours later, the Iraqi leader reissued the same complaint, unambiguously in an interview with British journalists.

Yesterday's joint statement was issued in English on a U.S. Embassy letterhead and in Arabic by the prime minister's office after Mr. Khalilzad and Mr. al-Maliki held an unannounced meeting earlier in the day.

It said the "Iraqi government has made clear the issues that must be resolved with timelines."

Language in the statement suggested a clear attempt to dampen further speculation about a fraying of ties between the two governments.

"The government of Iraq is committed to a good and strong relationship with the U.S. government to work together toward a democratic, stable Iraq, and to confront the terrorist challenges in light of the strategic alliance between the two countries," it said.

Baghdad has been awash with speculation that the Bush administration was preparing to dump Mr. al-Maliki, who was the compromise candidate for prime minister from among the dominant Shi'ite Muslims in parliament. His government has been in power five months.

In an apparent bid to squelch such talk, the statement said, "The United States will continue to stand by the Iraqi government."

The U.S. military yesterday announced the death of a soldier in combat in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, raising to 97 the number of American troops killed in Iraq during October, now the fourth-deadliest month since the war began in 2003.

The soldier, assigned to the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, was wounded in combat Thursday "and later died of wounds," the military said.

Baghdad's post-Ramadan calm held into a fifth day, as a flood of U.S. troops continued combing dangerous neighborhoods for a kidnapped American soldier, whose Iraqi family yesterday issued a plea for mercy.

There were only two reported violent deaths in the capital and eight elsewhere in the country. But authorities in Suwayrah and Kut, south of Baghdad, reported pulling nine more bodies from the Tigris River, tortured and fatally shot.

The U.S. military refused to confirm the identity of the kidnapped U.S. soldier, after the independent Sharqiyah TV channel said he was Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a naturalized American born in Iraq. The television station said his mother asked his captors to show him mercy as a fellow Muslim.

The quiet in Baghdad, which has proven illusive over the longer term, followed a day of bloody house-to-house fighting that killed 43 persons outside a chaotic city to the north.

The battle between Sunni insurgents and Iraqi police near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, killed one civilian and 24 police. U.S. troops later joined the fight, aiding in a counterattack in which 18 insurgents died, eight were wounded and 27 captured, the military said.

In Baghdad, A Sudden Chance To Play (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0088407

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Lull in Violence During Holiday Frees Families Long Confined by Fear

BAGHDAD, Oct. 27 -- Maybe it was because this week was the Islamic holiday Eid al-Fitr, and even killers have to stay home with their families once a year. Maybe it was because a massive American operation had shut down some of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods, and U.S. soldiers with M-16 rifles were opening car trunks, favorite places for killers to stash their guns, bombs and struggling kidnap victims.

For the people of Baghdad, death took something of a holiday this week. By Thursday, U.S. and Iraqi military commanders were staring at murder rates that had fallen by half since Monday. On Thursday, Baghdad logged only one man killed by one bomb, the government said. It made for marveling.

"Quietest day in months," said Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry. "Still quiet," Khalaf said Friday.

On Monday, as the week-long holiday began, Ali Rahad and his co-workers pushed open the rusty gates of the Tofaha amusement park, gingerly, as an experiment. Tofaha -- the name means "apple" -- last opened for business almost exactly a year ago, on the previous Eid holiday.

Tofaha has only aged swings, slides with the shine long worn off and heavy merry-go-rounds, on a city lot with the grass worn to dirt by children's feet. But it's one of the few places where families might conceivably go -- Baghdad has few public parks, and many of the riverbanks where people used to picnic have been blocked off by the concrete blast walls of Iraqi and U.S. military bases.

So people at the park were hopeful. On Monday, Rahad, who runs a shooting gallery at Tofaha, waited. And waited. "Nobody came," the gangly 20-year-old said. Unsure if the quiet would last, Baghdad's people were still afraid, he said.

Eid marks the end of a demanding month of dawn-to-dusk fasting for Muslims. Families normally pass the holiday boisterously, traveling to see relatives and taking to the streets to parade in newly received finery.

But since last year's holiday, the streets have been rendered largely deserted by a surge of Shiite and Sunni gunmen. The street outside the amusement park is pitted from bombs, and shops are shuttered. The neighborhood, Radill, is just outside Sadr City, a Shiite enclave where death squads hide.

"All the families are suffering," Rahad said. "The kids are small, they forget what's going on. They don't understand why there are explosions and killing, and why they have to be jailed in their houses."

By Wednesday, people were venturing out. On Thursday morning, in a neighborhood near the amusement park, shop owner Allah Abdul Hussein consulted with his wife as he looked at their cooped-up 2-year-old daughter, Nour.

Hussein and his wife considered: Tofaha traditionally had drawn both Sunni and Shiite families; maybe that would protect it from bombs by either side. By midday, Hussein and his wife dared. They put Nour in the car and went to the park.

"Because nothing happened today, I brought them here, to have fun," Hussein said. A solemn Nour, in a new dress with a ruffled heart spread across the bodice, held his hand. Cowed, she looked up at the green helium balloon tied to her other hand and looming over her, bigger than her body.

In Hilla, a city about 60 miles south of Baghdad, Mohammed Salman, a 32-year-old former government employee laid off when the war began, got word that Tofaha was open for Eid. Hilla has had so many bombs, Salman said, that there was no place left for his children to play. "They were crying in the house, begging me to take them out," he said. "It's Eid, it's Eid, we must go," his son told him. So Salman drove them to Tofaha.

At Tofaha, younger children sat stiffly on swings and on the saddles of merry-go-rounds. Play was something that had grown unfamiliar to them.

Twelve-year-old Maisa Mohammed moved among them in a holiday ensemble of heels and a blue chiffon gown, with purple sunglasses and, in her hair, an orange ostrich plume. She had come here Tuesday and Wednesday as well.

Older children like Maisa helped younger ones climb ladders to slides and taught them to pump their legs on swings. "I was dreaming to come here, to play," Maisa said. Except for school, she said, she hadn't been out since last Eid.

DOJ_NMG_0088408

Five-year-old Mutaz clung, unsmiling and unmoving, to his grandmother each time she put him on a piece of playground equipment. His mother, Dunya Abdul Rahman, 34, scrunched her face when asked the last time she had taken Mutaz outside the house. "Phoooh!" Rahman exclaimed, trying to think. "Six months."

"I am afraid someone will kidnap him, kill him," Rahman said. "He is the only son I have. I cannot even send him to school."

"Tell them in America about the children in Iraq," Rahman said, her hair awry, her eyes haunted. "Tell them about the children in prison."

The park would be open only another day, through the end of Eid on Friday. No one was counting on the decline in killing to continue. The American operation that shut down normal traffic in Shiite neighborhoods was temporary, part of a search for a kidnapped American soldier.

U.S. military officers played down the notion that their troops' increased operations and the sealing off of Sadr City had contributed to the drop in violence, saying it was a normal calm for Eid. "We can't cordon off Iraq," said Col. Nelson McCouch, a public affairs officer in Baghdad.

At Tofaha, younger children started smiling, yelling, shouting one another's names across the playground as the afternoon wore on. Rahad oversaw a line of boys at his shooting gallery, clustering for a shot at the bull's-eye with wooden-stock rifles, real military weapons stripped of their ammunition clips.

"We are having fun!" shouted Mariam and Batool, two next-door neighbors, answering questions as they soared on swings, their hair flying. "We are not afraid!"

Hussein was. He pulled Nour out of the park. "We're leaving fast, while it's still safe," he said.

At the slide, the children who remained broke into smiles each time their feet landed in the dirt at the bottom. They huddled there for a second before running off, overcome by excitement. Maisa, her orange ostrich plume still high, slid again and again. She stored up the exhilaration that would take her through to next Eid, if war didn't overtake her.

"One time, in a year," Maisa said. "Every year."

Special correspondent Naseer Nouri contributed to this report.

U.S. Citizen Won't Be Handed To Iraq, Federal Court Says (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

A U.S. citizen who was sentenced to death by an Iraqi court this month will not be handed over by the U.S. military until the Supreme Court hears his case, a federal appeals court ruled yesterday.

An Iraqi judge found Mohammad Munaf guilty of helping in the 2005 kidnapping of three Romanian journalists in Baghdad. Munaf, who was born in Iraq and became a U.S. citizen in 2000, said his trial was flawed and his confession coerced.

Since his arrest in May 2005 near Baghdad, Munaf has been held at Camp Cropper, where the U.S. military keeps high-value detainees, on behalf of Multinational Force-Iraq.

In Washington, U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth ruled that he has no authority to intervene because Munaf, 53, was being held by coalition military forces.

Yesterday, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit also declined to step in. The court said that the military must give Munaf 10 days to appeal to the Supreme Court and wait for it to rule before transferring him to Iraqi officials.

U.S. Finds Too Many KBR Reports 'Proprietary' (WP)

By Griff Witte, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

A Halliburton Co. subsidiary is abusing federal regulations by marking nearly all information it gives to the government about its operations in Iraq "proprietary," a practice that promotes unnecessary secrecy and could hurt competition, according to a report released yesterday by U.S. auditors.

Under federal law, contractors are allowed to mark some documents proprietary, especially when they are bidding on a deal. But auditors for the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction found Halliburton subsidiary KBR Inc. was using that stamp even with such basic records as daily head counts of how many people ate at the company's dining facilities. KBR is the Pentagon's largest contractor in Iraq, providing logistics support for the Army including meals, fuel, laundry service and base construction.

DOJ_NMG_0088409

Auditors concluded that the company's actions represent "an abuse" of the Federal Acquisition Regulation, the set of rules for government contracts.

In effect, the report said, KBR has turned contracting rules "designed to protect truly proprietary information and to enhance procurement competition . . . into a mechanism to prevent the government from releasing normally transparent information, thus potentially hindering competition and oversight."

In a written response, Halliburton spokeswoman Cathy Mann said that using the proprietary stamp was "not only encouraged, but required" by the Army.

"KBR has included proprietary markings on the majority of its data and property in support of its government contracts for the U.S. Army for at least the last decade," Mann said.

According to the report, Army officials are working on ways to get KBR to cut down on the practice.

KBR and the Defense Department were both criticized last year after it came to light that the company had advised Pentagon officials to heavily redact a series of unfavorable audits before they were delivered to United Nations monitors. The Pentagon complied.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), who has conducted a series of hearings on contractor abuses as chair of the Democratic Policy Committee, said yesterday that he had been denied information about KBR's operations in Iraq because it had been deemed proprietary.

"The American people don't have access to information that should be made available," Dorgan said.

But Stan Soloway, who leads a contractor trade group called the Professional Services Council, said it was not unusual for a company to want to protect information that could give it an edge over other firms. That's particularly true for KBR, which Soloway said has had proprietary information leak out. "This is a company that's been once burned and is going to be twice shy," he said. "To say this is abuse is an overreach."

Report Says Iraq Contractor Is Hiding Data From U.S. (NYT)

By James Glanz And Floyd Norris

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

A Halliburton subsidiary that has been subjected to numerous investigations for billions of dollars of contracts it has received for work in Iraq has systematically misused federal rules to withhold basic information on its practices from American officials, a federal oversight agency said yesterday.

The contracts awarded to the company, KBR, formerly named Kellogg Brown & Root, are for housing, food, fuel and other necessities to American troops and government officials in Iraq, and for restoring that country's crucial oil infrastructure. The contracts total about $20 billion.

The oversight agency, the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, said KBR refused to disclose information as basic as how many people are fed each day in its dining facilities and how many gallons of fuel are delivered to foreign embassies in Iraq, claiming that the data was proprietary, meaning it would unfairly help its business competitors.

Although KBR has been subjected to a growing number of specific investigations and paid substantial fines, this marks the first time the federal government has weighed in and accused it of systematically engaging in a practice aimed at veiling its business practices in Iraq.

The allegations come at a critical time for the company, as Halliburton is attempting to spin off the subsidiary. And in July, the Army announced that it would terminate KBR's largest contract with the government, and the company says that it will compete to regain some of that business when the government calls for new bids.

Proprietary information is protected by the so-called federal acquisition regulations, known as FAR. But the agency said KBR routinely stamped nearly all of the data it collects on its work as proprietary, impeding not only the investigations into the company's activities but also things as simple as managerial oversight of the work.

DOJ_NMG_0088410

"The use of proprietary data markings on reports and information submitted by KBR to the government is an abuse of the FAR and the procurement system," says a memo released yesterday by the special inspector general.

As a result, the memo said, "KBR is not protecting its own data, but is in many instances inappropriately restricting the government's use of information that KBR is required to gather for the government."

The specific examples cited by the inspector general are taken from an $18 billion contract called the Logistics Civil Augmentation Program, informally known as Logcap, under which KBR provides food, fuel, housing, recreational facilities and laundry and other services to American troops, government officials and other contractors in Iraq.

A spokeswoman for Halliburton, Cathy Mann, did not dispute the company's extensive use of the proprietary label but said, "KBR has included proprietary markings on the majority of its data and property in support of its government contracts for the U.S. Army for at least the last decade."

That assertion could not immediately be confirmed with the Army. But in its memo, the inspector general's office said that during the course of its investigation, both Pentagon auditors and Army contracting officers shared serious concerns about the practice.

And a statement released late yesterday by the Army Sustainment Command in Rock Island, Ill., said that it had "implemented corrective actions relative to the concerns raised" in the memo.

Ms. Mann added that KBR believed that the use of proprietary markings in work for the United States government "is not only encouraged, but required" by federal laws restricting the diffusion of American trade secrets abroad.

With the release of the new memo, that argument is unlikely to gain much traction with members of Congress, federal investigators and the numerous critics who have been calling for access to information on KBR's work in Iraq almost since the invasion ended.

"The arrogance is astounding on the part of KBR," said William L. Nash, a retired Army major general who is a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and an expert on post-conflict zones. "It's time for Congress to step in, because this has just gone too far."

Reaction to the memo on Capitol Hill also revealed that the issue of KBR's performance and investigations of its work are increasingly causing concern on both sides of the political aisle.

Henry A. Waxman, a California Democrat who is the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Government Reform and one of the earliest critics of KBR's use of the proprietary label, said the new memo showed how the company had tried to conceal "corporate profiteering during wartime."

Senator Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who is chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said, "I am concerned that the special inspector general has not always had full cooperation and access to the corporate documents that his office needs to carry out its critical mission."

Access to that information, Senator Collins said, "helps to ensure that government contractors fulfill their contractual obligations and that government gets the best value for taxpayer dollars. The improper use of proprietary claims impedes critical transparency and makes it more difficult for the inspector general's office to complete essential audits."

The Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction is Stuart W. Bowen Jr., a Republican whose investigative zeal has surprised some political analysts who believed that he would be reluctant to expose flaws in the administration's reconstruction program and companies like Halliburton. Dick Cheney was that company's chief executive until he left to run for vice president.

Halliburton has blamed KBR for holding down the company's stock performance, and is planning to sell a 20 percent stake in KBR to the public by the end of the year, and then spin off the rest of the shares in the company to Halliburton shareholders in early 2007, thus severing the corporate ties.

Halliburton, though, would retain some responsibility for dealing with continuing federal investigations of KBR's work in Iraq. Documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission as part of the public offering have revealed a wide range of investigations into KBR's work in Iraq, raising the possibilities that investors and the parent company could foot the bill for settlements against KBR.

Those documents, which must reveal potential risks to investors, indicate that continuing Justice Department investigations into KBR's work in Iraq have produced grand jury subpoenas for current and former employees.

DOJ_NMG_0088411

The company could have other liabilities. Outside Iraq, the papers say, there is a Justice Department investigation into possible overcharges in its work in the Balkans from 1996 to 2000. And the securities commission and the Justice Department are investigating payments in Nigeria that may have violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which bars the bribing of foreign officials.

There is also an antitrust investigation, and the company says investigations into the Nigerian project found information that "former employees may have engaged in coordinated bidding with one or more competitors on certain foreign construction projects and that such coordination possibly began as early as the mid-1980s."

The memo by the inspector general said that KBR would sometimes provide data to one part of the United States government, like Pentagon auditors, but with the proprietary label that would prevent its release to the public or even to other parts of the government.

In other cases that clearly irritated the inspector general's auditors, KBR would hobble their work by releasing data in the form of gigantic but indigestible tables rather than within the kind of software — like Excel spreadsheets — that would let the auditors do their calculations.

Those findings have raised suspicions that if KBR is going to such lengths to keep the data out of the hands of auditors, then the company must have something to hide, said Frederick D. Barton, a director of the Postconflict Reconstruction Project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"There's been smoke for some time," Mr. Barton said. "This seems to indicate that there was fire as well."

Halliburton stock was weak early in the Bush administration, in part because oil prices fell as the world economy weakened in 2001. But the stock bottomed out at $4.30 in early 2002 and rose sharply thereafter, eventually peaking at $41.98 this April as the oil services industry benefited from increased oil exploration and as the Iraq war got under way.

It dropped as low as $26.33 earlier this month, as oil prices fell. It closed yesterday at $32.15.

Halliburton Arm Accused Of 'abuse' In Iraq (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, October 28, 2006

A Halliburton subsidiary that has been awarded billions of dollars in federal contracts in Iraq has been accused by an independent watchdog of "abuse" of government regulations that protect US taxpayers.

Stuart Bowen, the special inspector-general for Iraq reconstruction, said in an interim audit released on Thursday that Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg, Brown and Root (KBR) had, in effect, routinely inappropriately hidden data about one of its contracts from public scrutiny by marking the information as "proprietary".

As a result of the investigation, army officials said they would prepare a modification to a multi-billion dollar Halliburton contract – known as Logcap – to "provide guidance" to KBR on the marking of proprietary data.

It is unclear how much the US military has paid for the contract, but one estimate put the figure at $7bn (€5.5bn, £3.7bn) last year. The contract gives the company the exclusive right to provide logistics support to the US military.

KBR said on Thursday it had used proprietary marking on the majority of its data in support of US army contracts for "at least the last decade" and that the practice was required under the US Trade Secrets Act. The company said the use of proprietary markings were appropriate because, as announced earlier this year, the Logcap contract is expected to be resubmitted for a competitive bid and divided among several contractors.

Questions about the transparency of data KBR provides the government were raised in July, after Mr Bowen announced his office would investigate whether services the US government was receiving under one KBR contract were "reasonable, efficient, and cost-effective".

In his probe of a KBR contract that provides support to the US embassy in Iraq – a contract that falls under the larger Logcap contract – Mr Bowen found that the company wrongly shielded from public consumption data including: daily dining facility headcount; and the number of litres of fuel issued to generators maintained by foreign embassies in Iraq.

The company also initially refused to provide Mr Bowen, a former attorney for President George W. Bush who has emerged as a tough critic of the reconstruction effort, with cost data in a format that was acceptable to his office.

By illegitimately using privacy provisions, which are in place to protect companies competing for federal contract work by allowing them to keep some data secret, the special inspector-general said KBR had prevented the government from releasing "normally transparent information, thus potentially hindering competition and oversight".

The critical audit comes on the heels of a separate report released this week that found that overhead costs had consumed between 11 per cent and 55 per cent of the cost of a handful of reconstruction projects.

Massoud Barzani Kurdistan (WSJ)

By Judith Miller

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

ERBIL, Iraq -- Unlike Baghdad, 200 miles away, the air here does not echo with the sound of gunfire, car bombs and helicopters. Residents of this city of a million people picnic by day in pristine new parks and sip tea with friends and relatives at night. American forces are not "occupiers" or the "enemy," but "liberators." Mentioning President Bush evokes smiles -- and not of derision.

American forces were "most welcome" when stationed here at the start of the invasion of Iraq, says Massoud Barzani, the president of Kurdistan in the north. Not a single U.S. soldier was killed in his region, he adds proudly, "not even in a traffic accident." Would U.S. forces be welcome back now? "Most certainly," he declared this week in an interview in his newly minted marble (and heavily chandeliered) palace. The more American soldiers the better, a top aide confirms.

The secret of Kurdistan's relative success so far -- and of America's enduring popularity here -- is the officially unacknowledged fact that the three provinces of the Kurdish north are already quasi-independent. On Oct. 11, Iraq's parliament approved a law that would allow the Sunni and Shiite provinces also to form semi-autonomous regions with the same powers that the constitution has confirmed in Kurdistan. And while Kurdish leaders pay lip-service to President Bush's stubborn insistence on the need for a unified Iraq with a strong centralized government, Kurdistan is staunchly resisting efforts to concentrate economic control in Baghdad.

The U.S., Mr. Barzani believes, should leave it to the Iraqis to decide if they want "one or two or three regions." Then, he adds: "But it already exists. The division is there as a practical matter. People are being killed on the basis of identity." As for Baghdad, "it should have a special status as the federal capital. But the rest should be regions that run their own affairs. Or they should be separate. Only a voluntary union can work. Either you have federalism with Baghdad as a federal capital with a special status, or you have separation. Those are the facts." * * *

Even the most fleeting visitor cannot but notice that Kurdistan is almost a full-fledged state. The Kurds have been running their own affairs -- badly at times -- ever since Washington created a safe area after Saddam Hussein crushed their U.S.-encouraged uprising after the 1991 Gulf war, sending much of the traumatized population into the rugged mountains separating Kurdish Iraq from Turkey. After CNN filmed Kurds dying of cold and starvation, President George H.W. Bush declared a "no fly" zone north of the 36th parallel from which Saddam's planes were barred, enabling the Kurds, at long last, to begin governing themselves. And so they have, with a determination born of historic vengeance.

Kurds no longer speak Arabic, but various dialects of Kurdish, in offices and schools throughout the 74,000 square miles that comprise their provinces. They fly their own flag, provide their own services, raise their own army -- the legendarily disciplined Pesh Merga, or "Those Who Face Death" -- and have gradually consolidated their de facto state. Divided between two parties -- Mr. Barzani's Kurdistan Democratic Party, his clan's power base in north Kurdistan, and the southern-based Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, headed by Jalal Talabani, now president of Iraq (or "President of the Green Zone" as Kurds here call the post) -- Kurdistan is booming with construction, new businesses and ambitious dreams of self-rule.

Washington's refusal to accept this self-evident political reality does not trouble Mr. Barzani. On the contrary, he insists Kurdistan will remain part of Iraq -- as long as Iraq remains federal, secular and democratic, and officially blesses the autonomy the Kurds managed to enshrine in the new Iraqi constitution. Besides, the fig-leaf of Iraq is useful: Declaring independence would risk provoking Turkey, for whom an independent Kurdish state is anathema given its own 18-million strong Kurdish population and the continued existence of the terrorist Kurdistan Workers Party -- the PKK -- on the Iraqi-Kurdish side of the border. Yet Mr. Barzani adamantly denies that his fidelity to Iraq is born of fear. "Having an independent state is the natural legitimate right of our people," he insisted. "We are not ready to say that because we fear displeasing our neighbors or because we are frightened that they may attack. That's not the case," he said. "We say that because at this stage, the parliament of Kurdistan has decided to remain within a federal, democratic Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0088413

Kurdish aspirations for autonomy, however, clearly require Turkish and Iranian acquiescence, or a persuasive reason for Turkey not to attack. Hence the desire for the redeployment of some American forces to Kurdistan. "The presence of American forces here would be a deterrent to intervention by the neighboring countries," Mr. Barzani says, with characteristic bluntness.

That is unlikely any time soon, say officials in Washington. How would the presence of American forces in what one official called a "land-locked aircraft carrier" help prevent the emergence of an Islamist entity in Iraq's Sunni-dominated center or deter Iranian control of the Shiite south? Moreover, as President Bush noted last week, dismissing proposals to carve Iraq into three virtually autonomous regions as destabilizing, such a division of Iraq would exacerbate Sunni-on-Sunni and Sunni-on-Shiite tensions. "The Kurds will then create problems for Turkey and Syria," President Bush said.

On the contrary, Mr. Barzani insists, Kurdistan seeks good relations "with all its neighbors." Indeed, Turkish-Kurdish and Kurdish-Iranian talks have been ongoing, diplomats say. As for Baghdad, Mr. Barzani adds, no one has tried harder to keep Iraq from splitting apart than the Kurds. "We worked hard with the Sunni community to bring them into the process," he says, "and also to establish Iraq's governing council, the interim and transitional government, and the drafting of the constitution. We played a leading role in the success of the process." But he was clearly annoyed by a slight: The fact that the congressionally created Iraq Study Group, headed by former Republican Secretary of State James Baker and Democratic co-chair Lee Hamilton, which is weighing policy alternatives for Iraq, has not traveled to Kurdistan -- the only successful region of postwar Iraq -- to consult with him. "It's a huge failing in their deliberations," he says. "We remain willing and ready to help whenever our assistance is needed."

Mr. Barzani is not shy about offering advice to Washington. The U.S. needs to revise its policies because "the existing strategy is not effective," he says. American forces could be reduced -- perhaps by half -- he said, but only when Iraqi forces are ready to restore order. But that will not happen, he warns, until the U.S. permits the Iraqi government to rid itself of the "terrorists, chauvinists and extremists" in its ranks who condone and "openly incite the violence on TV" that is destroying what remains of the capital and the country. He refuses to name names. But other Kurds point to such figures as Salah Mutlaq, an extremist Sunni leader, and aides to Moqtada al-Sadr, who heads a radical Shia militia.

"You have a different culture; you're a different people," Mr. Barzani said. "With America's mentality and approach and regulations, we cannot win like this. There must be decisive action so the government can enforce the law and restore its prestige." This Barzani, confident and candid, is different from the reticent figure I first interviewed 15 years ago in his mountain fastness of Barzan. Although plainspoken, "Kak Massoud" -- a respectful but affectionate "Mister" in Kurdish -- was reluctant then to offer an American journalist a frank assessment of his frustrations and aspirations. Not so the man who has evolved into "President Barzani" of Kurdistan, who, based on an informal power-sharing agreement with his rival, President Talibani of Iraq, is determined to seize this historic opportunity to advance his people's interests.

Just as "Kak" has become "president," the Kurds have gone from resistance to nation-building, with all the challenges such a transformation implies. Mr. Barzani has complained that while he and his Pesh Merga knew how to fight, it was "easier to destroy two dams than to build one power plant." Kurdistan is changing, in substance as well as style. The capital is no longer called Erbil (the Arabic), but "Howler," its Kurdish name. While Mr. Barzani, age 60, still wears the pantaloon, cummerbund, tight jacket and twirled turban favored by traditional Kurds, Western-style business suits -- expensive labels, at that -- are favored by Nechervan Barzani, his nephew and the energetic 40-year-old prime minister of the Kurdistan Regional Government.

Gone are the refugee tents -- except for the thousands of Sunni Arab refugees from Baghdad, who, along with some 7,000 Christian families, have migrated here for safety. Temporary structures are being replaced by new brick and cement houses and apartment buildings -- among them many lavish "castles," as the Kurds call these houses nestled in the hills surrounding Erbil. Expensive glass office buildings are springing up throughout the region. Apartments are priced at between $100,000 and $200,000 -- prohibitively expensive; and yet several of these are sold out.

"Kurds have money," Prime Minister Nechervan Barzani told me. "But until recently, they lacked the confidence to invest." If the junior Mr. Barzani is correct, Kurdistan is literally exploding with confidence and new projects befitting its ambitions: Almost $2 billion in Turkish trade and investment -- the result, partly, of his outreach to Ankara -- is financing the construction the Middle

DOJ_NMG_0088414

East's largest new conference center, a new international airport, hotels, parks, bridges, tunnels, overpasses, a refinery and an electrical plant. The Kurdistan Development Council is even advertising Kurdistan as a tourist destination. There are over 70 direct flights a week to the region's two airports from the Middle East and Europe. But Kurdistan's infrastructure is still woefully antiquated, a legacy of Saddam's privation and the ruinous civil war between the clans of Mr. Barzani and Mr. Talabani from 1994 to 1998. Most cities still provide only two-to-three hours of electricity a day. The rest comes from private generators, which the poor can ill afford.

Last spring, public resentment at the lack of services erupted among the frustrated residents of half a dozen Kurdish towns. Consider Halabja, which became instantly infamous in 1988 when Saddam's forces dropped nerve gas there, killing 5,000. In March, its residents trashed the expensive monument erected to commemorate their annihilation, setting the structure on fire and stripping the black marble slabs on which the names of gas attack victims had been etched in gold. On my visit last week, two Pesh Merga were playing "dama," a Kurdish version of chess, with pieces of the marble that had been torn off the wall.

Kurds are now restless after so many years of deprivation, and their expectations are high, Mr. Barzani agreed: "My main objective is to build constitutional institutions in this country, to see a Kurdistan 10 years from now in which each person is safe and free to have his own ideas." He and other government officials were determined to "put the Kurdish house in order," which means continuing to encourage the effort by Nechervan Barzani to join supporters from his and Mr. Talibani's group into one efficient administration. Although grumbling about corruption and nepotism disturbs him, security and political solidarity at home must come first. * * *

There is, of course, the explosive question of oil. While Mr. Barzani is willing to share revenues with Baghdad, the principle of control is vital to Kurdistan if it is to have an independent revenue stream. This issue, and a referendum next year on who should control the oil-rich city of Kirkuk -- which the Kurds claim as their historic capital and whose residents approved a list of Kurdish candidates for Iraq's parliament last year -- are red lines for the Kurdish government. Mr. Barzani is confident that these questions can be resolved through negotiations with Baghdad. But if they cannot, or if the fighting that has gripped much of Iraq escalates beyond the control of American and Iraqi forces, at least the Kurds will not be blamed for the dissolution or partition of Iraq. "Other people will be responsible, not us," he says. "We will never become the cause of the partition of Iraq."

As Mr. Barzani carefully stresses his devotion to Iraqiness -- all the while promoting a political and economic agenda that would reinforce Kurdish exceptionalism -- Americans struggle for an elusive solution to the violence and ethnic strife that abounds. Mr. Barzani wishes the U.S. success, he says, because so much depends on George Bush's determination not to "cut and run." His "courageous decision to liberate Iraq will not be undermined by the mistakes made after that liberation," Mr. Barzani says, although he does resort to an American cliché: "If there are people who think the solution lies in leaving this unfinished, just like Vietnam, that would be a major disaster."

But having been both saved and betrayed by previous American governments, he knows the risks of tying Kurdish fortunes too closely to an administration facing public disenchantment with its Iraq policies. "In building our new federal democratic country, our interests have not contradicted each other," he says cautiously. "They are aligned. But before I trust the United States or other people, I trust my own people."

Ms. Miller, a former New York Times reporter, is a writer in New York.

The Grand Ayatollah Behind The Curtain (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

The question directed this week to the National Security Council press office was straightforward: "Has the Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani met with any American official, either military or civilian, since the U.S. invasion in 2003?" The answer reveals the extent to which the Bush administration is now, and always has been, out of its depth in Iraq.

Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani is Iraq's most powerful figure. Under the reign of Saddam Hussein, Sistani was forced to keep a low profile, since he was part of the Shiite majority that Hussein's ruling Baath Party controlled with a heavy hand. Sistani was on the receiving end of assassination attempts by Hussein's thugs. But all that changed in the spring of 2003, when the United States toppled the Iraqi regime.

DOJ_NMG_0088415

Today, Sistani's Shiites are the major political force in Iraq. They are leaders in the new government; they run the key Interior Ministry; and one of their own, Nouri al-Maliki, serves as prime minister. Were it not for Iraq's liberation from Hussein's tyranny by U.S. troops, Sistani and his followers would still be under the thumb of Sunnis.

The average Iraqi may not be happy to see the country occupied by foreigners. But if any Iraqi should feel even a tad kindly toward his American liberators, it ought to be the grand ayatollah. After all, he is the chief beneficiary of Hussein's defeat. It's not too much to think that if the president of the United States visits Iraq, Sistani would at least meet him face to face to say thank you. Think again.

Back to the question that started this column: Has Sistani met with any American official in the past 3 1/2 years? Frederick Jones, the NSC's communications director, said yesterday that no American official has ever met Sistani.

But how, you might ask, can that be? After all, since Hussein's statue was pulled down in 2003, Iraq has been visited twice by President Bush. Vice President Cheney has been there, too. Two different secretaries of state -- Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice -- have dropped in. So have Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, countless high-ranking Pentagon brass and enough U.S. senators and members of the House of Representatives to warrant a congressional annex in the Green Zone.

How is it possible that leaders of the world's most powerful nation -- a country that has generously sent 140,000 of its finest sons and daughters to fight, suffer and die to free Iraq from the Baathist grip -- have not met the Iraqi leader with the most to gain from Hussein's defeat?

It's because the Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani has designated himself off-limits to Americans. He will not let Bush, Cheney, Rice and company in to see him because they are non-Muslims and thus he considers them to be kafir, or infidels. Sistani regards himself as too good to meet with those who freed him.

What's weird is to hear folks in Washington speak about Sistani's views as if they just got off the phone with him. "Sistani doesn't want clerics to have a role in government," one Washington foreign policy expert told me. "Sistani believes Islam should be the national religion," said another. "Sistani is a pragmatist," said a third. All this is asserted with confidence, when in reality these people know only what they have heard from someone else -- a Muslim go-between or a Sistani envoy.

Bush and his high command have never set eyes on the man. Yet Sistani controls them as if they were puppets on a string. It's like something out of "The Wizard of Oz."

Consider what happened in 2004: Barricaded in a Najaf slum miles from Baghdad, the unseen Sistani was able single-handedly to block the United States from staging a handover of power without elections. He did so by issuing a fatwa that sent thousands into the streets. The Bush people were forced to give ground. A law was drafted that led to elections in 2005.

Sistani's chief competition is not the United States but an anti-American Shiite cleric, Moqtada al-Sadr, and his Badr Organization, which has infiltrated Iraqi military and police units. The Iraqi parliament, truth be told, responds to the calls of the firebrand cleric.

What have we come to? In addition to al-Sadr, today's Iraq is under the influence of a Muslim cleric, Sistani, who, according to Newsweek, forbids music for entertainment, dancing and playing chess, and forbids women from shaking the hands of any men other than their fathers, brothers or husbands. His whole purpose is to promote Shiite theology and keep Iraq as a democratic, but decidedly Islamic, state.

Billions spent, thousands of Americans dead or maimed, U.S. armed forces exhausted, stretched thin and working around the clock -- for that? Is this what George W. Bush had in mind?

NATO Boss, Bush Condemn Taliban Atrocities (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

President Bush and NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer yesterday discussed how the Taliban has begun using Afghan civilians as human shields.

In a meeting at the White House, Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said that he was saddened by recent deaths of Afghans and that the alliance is committed to defending democracy in the nation once ruled by the repressive Taliban regime.

DOJ_NMG_0088416

The White House said the two leaders did not discuss NATO troop levels or the suspension of two German soldiers in connection with photographs of troops posing with human skulls.

"What they did talk about is that fact that the Taliban have begun using innocent civilians as human shields," White House spokesman Tony Snow said about the Oval Office meeting, which lasted about an hour.

"Secretary-General de Hoop Scheffer was really adamant about the kind of atrocities that are now being practiced by the Taliban and the importance of continued pressure on them," Mr. Snow said.

NATO expanded its mission this year from the relatively stable northern and western parts of the country to far more dangerous areas in the south, where Taliban militia have been most active since a U.S.-led coalition drove them from the seat of power, Kabul, in 2001. Some 32,000 NATO-led troops are serving in the most dangerous areas of the insurgency-wracked nation.

Yesterday, a roadside blast ripped through a pickup truck in southern Afghanistan, killing 14 villagers who were traveling to a provincial capital for holiday celebrations. Meanwhile, in the southern city of Kandahar, mourners attended a prayer ceremony in memory of civilians killed during NATO operations Tuesday in the nearby Panjwayi district.

NATO said its initial reports found that 12 civilians were killed, but Afghan officials estimated the number of civilians killed at between 30 and 80, including many women and children.

"That's a tragedy, but let me convince you to look at the broader picture," Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said. "[Members of the Taliban] are against democracy. Girls did not go to school when the Taliban was running Afghanistan. Now they go to school. Now there is a precedent. Now there is a government.

"NATO is delivering security," Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said.

Mr. Bush thanked the NATO secretary-general for leading 26 nations of NATO into Afghanistan, and for reaching out to other nations that share its values but have not been considered a part of NATO.

"You know what I know: That the real challenge for the future is to help people of moderation and young democracies succeed in the face of threats and attacks by radicals and extremists who do not share our ideology, have kind of a dark vision of the world," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. de Hoop Scheffer, fresh from a visit with Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow, is in Washington for talks about matters including the NATO chief's wish for closer relations between the alliance and Russia.

Russia signed a partnership agreement with NATO in 2002, outlining cooperation in counterterrorism, nonproliferation, peacekeeping and other fields. At the same time, Mr. Putin's government has continued to make public his opposition to the alliance's eastward expansion.

That expansion has included absorption of countries that were part of the former Soviet Union -- the Baltic states of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia and former members of NATO's Cold War nemesis, the Warsaw Pact: Bulgaria, the Czech Republic and Slovakia, Hungary, Poland and Romania.

Blast In South Afghan Suburb Kills 14 And Wounds 3 (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 27 — An explosion from a mine in a road on Friday killed 14 civilians and wounded three others in a suburb of the capital city in the southern province of Uruzgan, Afghan officials said.

The victims were a group of elderly people, youths and children who were riding in a pickup truck toward the provincial capital, Trinkot, for the celebration of Id al-Fitr, the festival at the end of Ramadan.

A spokesman for the provincial governor said that the government was investigating whether the mine had been laid recently by suspected Taliban fighters or was left over from the Soviet invasion.

Afghan officials also said Friday that they were trying to determine the death toll for civilians from an airstrike late Tuesday by NATO forces in the southern province of Kandahar.

On Thursday, President Hamid Karzai said he would ask a committee of tribal elders and governmental officials for a thorough investigation of the episode. The initial estimates of the death toll ranged from about 40 to 50.

DOJ_NMG_0088417

Mr. Karzai said Friday at a news conference that he had spoken on the phone with a 75-year-old man who lost 19 members of his extended family in the NATO bombing, late on Tuesday.

"Yesterday afternoon I talked with an elder, Haji Abdullah Shah, who lost all his family members," Mr. Karzai said, adding that just one of his sons survived.

"Three other families also lost most members on the bombardment," he said.

As the violence worsens in southern Afghanistan, Mr. Karzai again urged other countries interested in the region to "go to the root of terrorism," a phrase that Afghan officials frequently use to signal their belief that Pakistan is supporting the insurgents, who are believed to be tied to the Taliban, Afghanistan's former rulers.

Mr. Karzai said that there was a need for a "firm coordination between NATO and Afghan troops" to avoid killing civilians during operations.

Photo Scandal Raises Doubts In Germany About Deployments (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Troops in Afghanistan Played With Skulls

BERLIN, Oct. 27 -- A scandal over soldiers caught playing with human skulls has rattled the German military and prompted a reexamination of the country's growing role in global peacekeeping missions.

German military officials said Friday that they had suspended two soldiers and were investigating several others suspected of desecrating skulls while serving in Afghanistan as part of a NATO-led force in 2003 and 2004. Photos of troops mocking the freshly unearthed skulls -- including one of a uniformed soldier standing next to a human head with his genitals exposed -- have shocked many Germans since they were first published Wednesday in the tabloid newspaper Bild.

The controversy, one of several to surface recently from overseas military missions, has led officials here to question whether Germany has fully digested the political and security risks involved in such assignments. Currently, more than 9,000 German troops are posted in six hot spots around the world, a sharp reversal of the country's decades-long policy of staying out of war zones.

"The German politicians tried to sell this international cooperation and posting of German troops abroad as something good that we were doing for people, that we were bringing help to the starving masses," said Christoph Grams, a military and security analyst for the German Council on Foreign Relations in Berlin. "This shows that what we're doing is perhaps not completely clean. Now, people are paying more attention to the dangers of what we're doing."

Sensitive to its past under Nazi rule, Germany largely avoided international peacekeeping operations until 1999, when it sent troops to the Balkans to help quell the war in Kosovo. Since then, it has gradually expanded its participation in such missions and now also has forces in Afghanistan, Congo, Sudan and Djibouti.

This month, the German navy joined the U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon, but only after lawmakers held a long debate over whether the German military should be involved in the same theater of operations as Israeli forces, because of lingering sensitivities from the Holocaust.

The potential for conflict became reality on Tuesday, when six Israeli fighter jets fired warning shots over a German intelligence-gathering vessel off the coast of Lebanon, according to German military officials. Israeli officials denied opening fire but confirmed that Israeli jets approached a helicopter that had taken off from the ship -- carrying a German admiral -- because it was not authorized to fly in the area.

Both governments have played down the seriousness of the incident, but it has underlined the challenges facing the German military as it tries to avoid bloodshed even as it becomes engaged in more overseas missions.

The risks facing the 2,750 German troops in Afghanistan have grown in recent months along with the resurgence in attacks by Taliban forces. Although the Germans are assigned primarily to noncombat duties in northern Afghanistan, their actions have attracted more scrutiny of late.

This month, a Turkish citizen born and raised in Germany who was recently released from the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, said he was physically abused by a German special forces unit in Afghanistan after he was captured there in 2002. The German Defense Ministry acknowledged that the prisoner, Murat Kurnaz, had been interrogated by German soldiers and said it would open an inquiry into whether he was mistreated.

DOJ_NMG_0088418

Since then, the photos of the skulls have caused an even bigger stir. After an initial batch of pictures was published Wednesday, more have surfaced daily, including one showing a soldier smiling like a pirate at a skull perched on his shoulder.

It was unclear where, exactly, the skulls came from or how old they were. But the images of German soldiers playing with human remains has led to public revulsion and inevitable comparisons to the horrors perpetrated under Nazi rule.

So far, however, there have been few calls for Germany to curtail its participation in Afghanistan or in other missions. And on Wednesday, the German federal cabinet adopted a long-term national security policy that calls for an increased role in such missions in the future.

"It's very healthy for Germany to have an internal discussion about this," said Grams, the military analyst. "If Germany still says yes at the end of the day, it could make German participation even firmer in the future."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Orbital Finds Misdated Options (WP)

By Kim Hart, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Dulles Company Plans to Restate Past Earnings

Orbital Sciences Corp., a Dulles maker of booster rockets and space systems for the government and military, yesterday joined the parade of companies that have disclosed problems in their compensation practices, saying an internal review found some misdated stock options.

The company said the review found no fraud or intentional misconduct in connection with the errors and that it would revise past financial statements. Most of the options in question were granted more than five years ago, said David W. Thompson, Orbital's chairman and chief executive.

"Financial impacts are not material to the results for this year or for any prior period over the past five years," he told investors in a conference call yesterday.

Orbital expects to record pretax costs of about $300,000 in 2006, $2.5 million between 2001 and 2005 and $11.5 million between 1990, when the company went public, and 2001.

Orbital joins more than 100 companies nationwide that have been investigated for the practice of backdating stock options, in which options are dated to a time when the stock price is lower so the profit is higher after the options are exercised.

Last week, SafeNet Inc., a Maryland information security firm, said certain options over the past six years were accounted for using incorrect dates. Minnesota-based UnitedHealth Group Inc., one of the largest managed health-care companies, is under investigation for backdating stock options. In both cases, the inquiries prompted executives to step down.

Orbital released preliminary third-quarter financial figures yesterday that did not take into account adjustments required by the option findings. Orbital reported revenue of $197.7 million, a 24 percent increase over the comparable period a year ago. Income rose 27 percent, to $8.6 million.

The company said it plans to file its final quarterly statement by Nov. 14.

This is not the first time Orbital has revised financial statements because of accounting problems. In 2000, the firm paid $22.5 million to shareholders who accused it of using fraudulent accounting practices to artificially inflate its stock price. The suit was filed after Orbital restated three quarters of past earnings.

The company has profited from the growth in funding for the U.S. missile-defense program during the past three years. In addition to designing and launching satellites and small space systems, Orbital is working with Boeing Co. to develop systems to propel warheads that intercept hostile missiles. It also has worked with Northrop Grumman Corp. to develop target missiles.

This year, Orbital entered a project with Lockheed Martin Corp. to produce the next generation of manned spacecraft vehicles to replace the current shuttles, which will be taken out of service in 2010. Orbital is charged with developing the crew rescue vehicle.

DOJ_NMG_0088419

During the three months ended Sept. 30, Orbital carried out two space missions, including a missile defense interceptor in September and the launch of a communications satellite this month. The company plans to launch vehicles for the Air Force, the Missile Defense Agency and the Navy before the end of the year.

Legal Aid In Options Probes, Private Law Firms Play Crucial Role (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

As More Than 130 Companies Come Under Scrutiny, Government Relies on Help Questions About Fairness

With more than 130 companies under federal scrutiny, the investigation into stock-option backdating has rapidly become one of the broadest corporate scandals in decades. It is so broad, in fact, that federal authorities can't possibly do thorough examinations of every company.

Instead, they outsource a big chunk of the job.

Regulators and prosecutors are relying on suspect companies to investigate themselves by hiring outside law firms. The firms are supposed to hand over their findings to the Securities and Exchange Commission or federal prosecutors, who then use them to help decide which cases to pursue further. The feds often ask for any especially incriminating documents to be delivered in a handy folder they call a "hot binder."

That has long been a common practice for companies in potential legal trouble, partly because it can lead to leniency as reward for a self-examination well done. But not since the overseas bribery scandal of the 1970s have so many public corporations been in trouble at the same time. The federal investigation has enveloped icons of success like Apple Computer Inc., Home Depot Inc., giant insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc., and dozens of Silicon Valley companies.

"The sheer magnitude of the numbers of companies, executives and corporate boards that have disclosed options-related investigations is mind-boggling -- unequaled in recent years," says Lynn Turner, a former chief accountant for the SEC.

The mass exercise in self-policing already has produced some dramatic results. More than 40 executives or directors have resigned or been pushed out in the wake of internal probes that found options backdating problems. The most prominent is William McGuire, chief executive of UnitedHealth, who is leaving his post by Dec. 1. Outside lawyers hired by the company found evidence of rampant backdating of options that enriched him and other insiders. Dr. McGuire, who has said he did nothing improper, stands to lose more than $100 million alone after agreeing to reprice his options.

Nearly 70 companies already have said they will need to restate or otherwise reduce profits after acknowledging that faulty accounting of options had inflated the numbers, according to a tally by shareholder advisers Glass Lewis & Co. The firm put the total shaved off at $5.3 billion.

Still, the deputizing approach raises questions about how evenly justice will be applied. Such investigations are typically overseen by outside directors who may have close ties to the company's management -- and who may themselves have been involved in making the option grants at issue. The government risks focusing not on the worst offenders, critics say, but on those companies honest or frightened enough to perform scrupulous self-examinations.

In at least one case, federal officials have stepped in when they felt an internal probe wasn't getting to the bottom of the matter, according to a person familiar with the circumstances. At Affiliated Computer Services Inc., a Dallas-based technology outsourcing company, executives benefited from a tremendously unlikely pattern of timing grants. A Wall Street Journal analysis last March put the odds at 300 billion to one that the dates on which grants purportedly had been awarded to the company's former CEO were chosen randomly. The company used its longtime outside counsel to conduct the probe.

PERFECT PAYDAY

• Options Scorecard1

• Complete coverage2

In May the company announced a preliminary finding that there was no intentional backdating to enrich executives. Government officials prodded ACS to look harder, and the company hired a new team of lawyers with no connection to the firm. "From day one ACS has expected its legal counsel to leave no stone unturned and conduct a thorough, objective, and complete investigation of all the facts, and that is exactly what is occurring," said spokesman Michael Buckley.

In some cases, the outsourcing approach has allowed the government to move unusually swiftly. In August, prosecutors filed criminal charges against three former executives of Comverse Technology Inc., only five months after private lawyers had begun an internal options probe at the New York maker of telecommunications software. The outside lawyers found a key witness, obtained dramatic confessions from the three executives, unearthed a secret options "slush fund" -- and kept government officials informed every step of the way.

Federal officials say it is too early to predict how many cases they will bring. But the government has made it clear it won't pursue every backdater. With so many potential defendants, the government has decided to zero in on the most egregious, those involving self-enrichment by top executives, big sums of money, or brazen efforts to deceive directors, auditors and shareholders.

While the government has long had internal policies that permit it to reward companies for their cooperation, the expectations have been ratcheted up in recent years. Under controversial Justice Department policies in place since 2003, companies are more susceptible to criminal charges unless they are viewed as doing a good job on "cooperation and voluntary disclosure."

The threat of criminal prosecution "is a lot like the guillotine - it tends to focus the mind," says Joseph Grundfest, a former SEC commissioner and a professor of law at Stanford University. "Here you have over 140 companies spending millions each doing the equivalent of Maoist self-criticisms and turning the results over to the authorities."

Critics of the approach say using private lawyers to investigate on behalf of the government can place employees in an unfair position: talk, or you'll lose your job. When speaking to private lawyers hired by the company, employees don't have the legal protections -- against self-incrimination, for instance -- that apply in some government proceedings. The government has relied on internal probes at least since the 1970s bribery scandal, which resulted in hundreds of companies stepping forward, and led to enactment of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

The current investigations are focusing on whether executives improperly enriched themselves through surreptitious backdating of stock options. Options give their recipient the right to buy a stock at a fixed price, and typically allow the recipient to profit if the market value of the stock rises from the day the option was granted. But it turns out many companies cheated by pretending that their options were granted on earlier dates, when the stock price was much lower, a practice that gives an instant paper profit for the grant recipients.

Backdating is illegal if not properly disclosed to shareholders. It also can cause serious accounting and tax problems for companies and executives. To date, five former executives have been charged with criminal fraud violations in connection with the practice, including the three at Comverse.

The government began to cast its eye on the timing of option grants more than three years ago, when the SEC's then-enforcement director, Stephen Cutler, read a news account suggesting that executives had issued grants just prior to the release of favorable news that caused a jump in their company's share prices.

SEC officials gradually began to suspect that something more nefarious was going on. A small number of academic researchers also were suggesting that backdating might explain the happy timing of many grants. An SEC unit in Washington began a limited probe, focusing on fewer than a dozen companies. Federal prosecutors in San Francisco also started examining one case, Brocade Communications Systems Inc., assigning a single prosecutor and one FBI agent.

Last March, The Wall Street Journal reported that statistical evidence strongly suggested backdating had taken place at six companies. Among them: UnitedHealth, ACS and Comverse. The Journal article sent the federal probe into high gear, officials say. All the companies got subpoenas. It also sparked unusual territorial skirmishes between rival U.S. Attorney's offices eager to show they were cracking down on the latest corporate scandal.

An initial volley came from federal prosecutors in Brooklyn, N.Y., who moved quickly to subpoena Comverse, which until recently was headquartered in its district. That prompted the office's crosstown rival in Manhattan to follow suit. Some companies ended up receiving subpoenas from more than one U.S. Attorney looking for the same information about options. Eventually, senior Justice Department officials ruled that cases generally would be handled along geographic lines.

Prosecutors in San Francisco were initially miffed that prosecutors in New York were reaching across the country to subpoena Silicon Valley companies. "Our preference here generally is to try and create a cooperative environment with the firm and entity we're looking at so we don't have to start the relationship with grand jury subpoenas," says Kevin Ryan, U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California, who e didn't directly criticize his counterparts.

DOJ_NMG_0088421

Last spring as waves of companies began to step forward to admit options troubles, Mr. Ryan contemplated his office's response. His thinking crystallized while on a family vacation this summer in southern France. There, he sounded out his father-in-law, James Klingbeil, a prominent San Francisco real-estate investor. While the pair sipped wine under an oak tree, Mr. Klingbeil told his prosecutor son-in-law that the arguments by some companies that backdating was acceptable "didn't pass the smell test," both men recall.

While in France, Mr. Ryan fired off a series of urgent emails to his deputy, Eumi Choi, saying that the office needed to jump on the matter. Soon after, the office formed a special task force of prosecutors and agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, an idea Mr. Ryan says he'd been weighing before the France trip.

Of more than two dozen cases his office is investigating, Mr. Ryan says "15% to 20% have raised serious issues. We're going to really drill down on those." An FBI agents on his task force, Brian Wickham, says that in the case of one company he declined to identify, an executive's calendar showed him to be out of the country when other documents claimed he was at a board meeting.

Nationally, at least nine U.S. Attorneys offices are probing backdating, assisted by agents with the FBI, Internal Revenue Service and the U.S. Postal Service. The SEC, which is taking the lead on most of the investigations, has assigned more than 150 lawyers and accountants to the task.

The scandal also has been a bonanza for law firms and forensic accountants. UnitedHealth's internal probe looked at almost four million documents and included more than 80 interviews of employees and other witnesses. Another company -- Mercury Interactive Corp. -- said the cost of its internal probe amounted to about $70 million.

The internal probes appear to run the gamut from exhaustive efforts to ferret out wrongdoing to more minimal examinations aimed mostly at correcting the mess backdating makes of a company's financial statements, say lawyers involved. Federal officials say they're well aware of the varying levels of depth of the in-house probes. "We critically evaluate the quality of the investigation. We don't just take their word for it," says Walter Ricciardi, a deputy director of enforcement at the SEC.

The SEC launched a computer-tracking system this week to help it keep tabs on lawyers conducting the probes. The idea is to let government investigators share information with each other about how responsive, independent and thorough they believe private lawyers have been, so the government can judge their credibility of their findings.

At Comverse, confessions elicited by outside lawyers from three senior executives sealed their fates. The company had for many years granted options to senior executives that bore unusually beneficial dates, just ahead of sharp increases in the company's stock price. The Journal story in March said the odds of that happening randomly were one in six billion. In March, a special board committee hired Howard Schiffman, a securities lawyer with the Washington, D.C., law firm of Dickstein Shapiro LLP, to head an internal investigation.

Dickstein put eight senior lawyers on the case and brought in AlixPartners, a forensic-accounting firm. Dozens of Dickstein associates were detailed to perform electronic searches through e-mails and other records.

Within days the Dickstein lawyers began summoning senior Comverse executives to the law firm's midtown Manhattan offices for sometimes grueling interviews. The lawyers spent hours with the company's then-chief executive, Kobi Alexander. At one of these sessions, he admitted to having backdated options grants, according to the government's later criminal case against him.

The private lawyers also found a key witness in Fran Rail, a stock-option administrator, who described efforts by the chief financial officer to hide a secret slush fund from the company's outside auditor. Under sharp questioning from the Dickstein lawyers, the executive, David Kreinberg, said he'd been instructed by Mr. Alexander to keep the account secret, according to a person familiar with Mr. Kreinberg's statements. Earlier this week, he pleaded guilty to fraud charges. Ms. Rail couldn't be reached for comment.

The Dickstein lawyers held regular meetings with the SEC to keep the government briefed on their findings. There was a "daily feeding of information -- millions of documents," says one person involved in the probe. This person said that after the Dickstein lawyers interviewed a key witness, the government had the information in "real-time."

DOJ_NMG_0088422

The Dickstein probe was still going on in late July, when government investigators grew concerned that Mr. Alexander -- an Israeli citizen and U.S. resident -- would flee the country. Federal prosecutors rushed to file criminal charges before several important witnesses were called for interviews. The criminal charges rested on information from the Dickstein lawyers, including purported confessions from all three senior executives who were charged. The government hadn't yet interviewed any of them.

Mr. Alexander later was arrested in the African country of Namibia, where he is facing extradition proceedings.

--Charles Forelle contributed to this article.

Write to James Bandler at james.bandler@wsj.com3 and Kara Scannell at kara.scannell@wsj.com4

J.P. Morgan Receives SEC Inquiry Related To Bisys (WSJ)

By Tom Lauricella

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. says it received an inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission relating to the relationship between Bisys Fund Services Inc. and One Group Funds, which the bank acquired as part of its 2004 purchase of Bank One Corp.

The SEC is investigating a total of 27 mutual funds1 that it says may have accepted kickbacks totaling hundreds of millions of dollars in recent years, according to people familiar with the matter. AmSouth Bancorp of Birmingham, Ala., was the first to acknowledge possible charges last summer. The other 25 firms aren't known. J.P. Morgan acknowledged the inquiry in an interview, but declined to comment further.

The probe stems from a $21.4 million settlement the SEC reached last month with Bisys Fund Services Inc., a unit of Bisys Group Inc., which provides back-office support to financial companies.

In the wake of the settlement, the SEC sent letters to some of the funds in question, asking for details about their relationships with Bisys, as well as asking whether the funds have undertaken internal reviews of the relationship and what sorts of information had been provided to fund board of directors about the Bisys relationship, according to people with knowledge of the letters.

"The SEC has sent a letter to Banc One Investment Advisors Corporation requesting information concerning the provision of administrative services by The One Group Services Company, an affiliate of BISYS Fund Services, Inc.," the firm said in a statement. "We are moving quickly to thoroughly review the historical records in order to respond to the SEC inquiry."

At the heart of the investigation is whether fund companies accepted kickbacks from Bisys in exchange for recommending the extension of Bisys' contracts to do routine back-office work for the funds. According to the SEC settlement, Bisys and other service providers would bill fund shareholders for doing administrative work, such as preparing shareholder reports or filing prospectuses. But unbeknownst to fund investors or even independent board members, the service providers agreed to rebate a portion of that money to fund advisers, the SEC says.

The advisers then used the shareholder money to cover their marketing expenses, instead of covering the costs out of their own pockets. The SEC didn't name the 27 companies it is investigating. However, AmSouth Bancorp said last summer that the SEC had informed the bank it intended to bring civil charges against it related to its relationship with Bisys. AmSouth says it has been cooperating with the agency.

One Group Services Co., served as the administrator for One Group Funds from December 1995 through October 2000, J.P. Morgan said. At that point Bank One assumed the role of administrator for One Group Funds. J.P. Morgan mutual funds currently have $230 billion under management.

Write to Tom Lauricella at tom.lauricella@wsj.com2

Corporate Crime Sanjay Kumar Awaits His Sentence (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

As one of the last chief executives to face sentencing for crimes committed in the stock-market-bubble era, Sanjay Kumar, who orchestrated a $2.2 billion accounting fraud as CEO of Computer Associates International Inc., goes before a federal judge in Brooklyn on Thursday -- the same day his former company reports second-quarter earnings.

DOJ_NMG_0088423

Mr. Kumar, 44 years old, who resigned his job in 2004, pleaded guilty to eight counts of securities fraud and obstruction of justice in April. At the end of many quarterly financial periods in the 1990s and 2000, Mr. Kumar helped sign and backdate contracts for big sales of corporate software in order to book the revenue and meet quarterly earnings projections in what prosecutors called "35-day months." Once the Securities and Exchange Commission started investigating, Mr. Kumar lied to government agents and sent the corporate general counsel to Hawaii to bribe a potentially hostile witness, according to evidence filed in the case.

U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser has broad discretion in sentencing. Two lawyers who have followed the case, but declined to be identified, said they think the most likely term would be eight to 12 years. However, if Judge Glasser orders sequential sentencing on each charge the term could be 90 years. Eric Komitee, deputy chief of business and securities fraud in the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn, declined to comment on what sentence the government recommended. Mr. Kumar's lawyer, Jack Cooney, declined to comment.

The likely jail sentence puts a sad end to the meteoric career of Mr. Kumar, who grew up in poverty after his family emigrated from Sri Lanka, and worked his way up to the lofty position and a $300 million stock award in 1999.

But the sentencing hasn't been the end of CA's problems. Since Mr. Kumar resigned in 2004, a few months before he was indicted, the company has changed its name to CA Inc., paid the SEC $225 million in fines and replaced most of its top executives, while operating under the oversight of a government-appointed examiner.

CA has yet to prove it was the money-spinner the company purported to be when it was inflating its earnings. Even with new management, led by John Swainson, a longtime software executive at International Business Machines Corp., it has continued to announce new restatements of financial results and weaknesses in internal controls.

When it reports earnings for the second quarter ended Sept. 30, investors will be watching for signs of revenue growth from CA's older products, since most recent growth has come from acquisitions. Last summer, the stock fell below $20 a share for the first time in three years as investors fretted about slow growth and continuing management turnover and accounting problems. The stock has bounced back to more than $24 recently following an August announcement of a $2 billion stock buyback funded by debt, and the company plans to cut its 16,000-person work force by 11%.

Sinking Big Fish In Fraud Aids Small Fry (AP-YBIZ)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

The Week's Business: Helping Government Land Biggest Corporate Fish Pays Off for Smaller Fry

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Helping the government land the biggest fish has been paying off for the slightly smaller fry in the prosecution of high-profile corporate fraud by way of a yawning gap in their prison sentences.

Jeffrey Skilling, Enron Corp.'s former chief executive who became an embodiment of corporate corruption, was handed a 24-year-plus sentence on Monday. That was the toughest penalty by far in the catastrophic collapse of the energy giant. Skilling's one-time protege at the company, finance chief Andrew Fastow -- architect of the complex web of off-the-books partnerships that hid some $1 billion in debt -- received a six-year jail term in September after cooperating with the prosecutors and helping them secure Skilling's conviction.

The judge said Fastow deserved leniency because of his "exceptional" cooperation with the government.

"The lesson that comes out of the Enron sentences is that if ultimately you're facing criminal charges, it's fine to be high up in the company. Just don't be at the very top," said Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who heads the white-collar defense practice at McCarter & English in Newark, N.J.

Prosecutors like to work from the bottom up, so for CEOs caught up in scandals, he said, "There's nowhere to turn in the event of an indictment."

Washed ashore by the wave of corporate scandals in recent years have been executive flippers who have cut deals, turning against and talking about their bosses who have taken their chances at trial. Chief executives are far more likely to go to trial, partly because of ego, the conviction they did nothing wrong, or because prosecutors are far less willing to cut a deal.

DOJ_NMG_0088424

Another prominent pair, fallen WorldCom Inc. chief executive Bernard Ebbers and Scott Sullivan, the former chief financial officer, present a clear parallel. Ebbers got a 25-year sentence for orchestrating the audacious $11 billion accounting fraud that toppled the company he built from a tiny long-distance phone company into an industry titan. Sullivan, who admitted to providing investors unduly optimistic financial reports and agreed to testify against Ebbers, got five years.

It hasn't always worked out that way, though. A stunning exception came in June 2005, when Richard Scrushy, the flamboyant founder and former chief executive of HealthSouth Corp., was acquitted of all charges -- after five of his former CFOs took the stand and implicated him. It was a stinging setback for the Justice Department prosecutors, whose case against Scrushy had widely been considered among the strongest in the pack of indictments arising from the 2002 corporate scandals.

Scrushy faced what amounted to a life sentence and could have been ordered to forfeit some $278 million in assets if convicted. Seven other HealthSouth defendants -- including four of the former finance chiefs -- got prison terms.

What lessons executives take from the last round of corporate scandals may soon come into view as prosecutors sort out the financial scandal du jour: the suspicious timing of stock options grants to executives at companies around the nation. The former finance chief of Comverse Technology Inc. pleaded guilty Tuesday to conspiring with ex-chief executive Jacob "Kobi" Alexander to backdate stock options and falsify financial statements of the voicemail software maker to pocket millions of dollars and conceal the fraud from shareholders.

David Kreinberg agreed to cooperate in the case against Alexander, who has been the target of an international manhunt. After allegedly transferring $57 million overseas, Alexander was located last month in Namibia in southwest Africa, where he was briefly detained before being freed on bail pending a ruling on an extradition request by U.S. authorities.

Kreinberg faces up to 15 years in prison and could be ordered to pay tens of millions of dollars in restitution. It was not clear what penalties could be imposed on Alexander if he were convicted, though he faces similar charges.

To date in the options granting scandal, at least 149 public companies have disclosed Justice Department, Securities and Exchange Commission or internal investigations of their option awards, according to an Associated Press review.

Rolling the dice on a trial can be risky for CEOs in cases where underlings have turned against them.

"There's no alibi defense" in white-collar cases, notes Peter Henning, a professor at Wayne State University Law School in Detroit. "They're cases about intent."

That means executive defendants can be convinced that they did nothing wrong -- potentially fueling a lack of contrition that can hurt them at trial. Company employees a few rungs down can provide some clues into what was in the CEO's mind, Henning said. And, without an alibi or DNA evidence as you would have in a trial of a violent crime, if jurors believe an executive is involved he may well be found guilty and sent to jail.

Besides the "cooperation discount" for executives who help the government convict a former colleague, there's also a "lack-of-contrition multiplier" that can increase a defendant's sentence, said Henning.

At his sentencing this week, Skilling stood before the judge and said that in terms of contrition and remorse, "... I can't imagine more remorse."

But he stuck to his story. He didn't commit fraud and conspiracy, he said, didn't use shady deals and accounting tricks that contributed to Enron's collapse into bankruptcy, and wasn't responsible for the loss of thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in the value of Enron stock and over $2 billion in employee pension plans.

"I'm innocent of every one of these charges," Skilling declared.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Official In Abramoff Case Sentenced To 18 Months (WP)

By Susan Schmidt, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

A federal judge yesterday sentenced David H. Safavian, a former top Bush administration official, to 18 months in prison for lying and concealing unethical dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0088425

During an unusual hearing that lasted much of the day, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman wrestled with how to mete out justice to Safavian. He said Safavian was a man who had "pulled himself up by his bootstraps" and had been "a very good person to a lot of people." But, the judge said, Safavian also committed "an abuse of the public trust" in his relationship with the lobbyist.

"Did he believe in public service? I guess he did," Friedman said. "But he also wanted someday to join Mr. Abramoff in that lucrative lobbying business."

Friedman lamented that Washington has become "more and more corrupt," increasingly a home to greedy lobbyists and politicians on the take.

Safavian, 39, a former chief of staff for the General Services Administration, wept as he told Friedman that he knows now he never should have given Abramoff inside information about government-owned real estate that the lobbyist wanted to acquire. At the time, Safavian said, he thought what he was doing was innocuous. "I didn't see anything wrong in helping Jack," he said.

The 18-month jail sentence was about halfway between the 30 to 36 months sought by government prosecutors and the defense's proposal for alternative sentencing that would avoid any prison time at all.

Barbara Van Gelder, Safavian's attorney, urged leniency, telling Friedman that Safavian exhibited an ethical "blind spot" in his dealings with the brazen and flashy Abramoff. "He may have been blinded, dazzled," she said, but his wrongdoing with Abramoff was "isolated, not a man beginning a life of crime."

But prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg asked the judge to add a perjury conviction to Safavian's crimes for his testimony at trial. "For the two days he spent on the witness stand, Mr. Safavian lied about virtually everything," Zeidenberg said. "He testified under oath that he never lied, never concealed. . . . He even went on to say, 'I never gave Jack Abramoff favorable treatment,' " statements the jury rejected in its verdict.

Friedman said he did find some of Safavian's statements from the witness stand "incredible," including the defendant's claim that he believed his payment of $3,100 would cover the cost of a week-long luxury golfing excursion to Scotland with Abramoff. But in the end, the judge decided against the prosecutor's request for a perjury conviction.

Safavian was a lobbyist and congressional aide until 2002, when he joined the GSA, the agency that oversees the purchase and leasing of billions of dollars in federal property around the country. He later became the government's top procurement officer at the Office of Management and Budget.

He was convicted in June of concealing facts about the 2002 golf trip as well as the help he gave to Abramoff, a longtime friend, in trying to acquire two GSA-controlled properties -- one of them the Old Post Office building on Pennsylvania Avenue.

The jury found him guilty of lying to the GSA inspector general and obstructing an inquiry by that office, as well as lying to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee and to a GSA ethics officer.

Trial evidence included stacks of e-mails showing that Safavian secretly maneuvered within the GSA to obtain information for Abramoff about properties he wanted to buy or lease. The two schemed to get members of Congress to pressure the agency for the information.

Friedman said he had received 50 to 60 letters from people attesting to Safavian's good qualities, including one from his former boss Clay Johnson, the OMB's deputy director for management, from friends on Capitol Hill and from his pastor. A letter also came from his sister, who testified tearfully on his behalf yesterday. Her brother, she said, "didn't tell anyone" he was in trouble until his arrest. "He called me at work, sobbing and sobbing. He said, 'I'm so sorry for embarrassing you,' " Mehnaz Safavian said.

Safavian's lawyers said their client will appeal the conviction. Safavian is one of eight people convicted so far in the wide-ranging influence-peddling investigation into Abramoff's lobbying activities on Capitol Hill and in executive branch agencies. Earlier this month, Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) became the first lawmaker to plead guilty in the probe. Abramoff and several former congressional aides have pleaded guilty and are cooperating.

One of them, Neil G. Volz, a former Ney aide, went to work with Abramoff, went on the Scotland golf trip and was a central witness in the Safavian trial. Friedman said he was revolted by Volz's testimony that government officials prepared sworn declarations about lobbyist-paid trips based on what "would pass the smell test" -- not what was true. "I wanted to go home and take a shower," the judge said.

DOJ_NMG_0088426

Safavian Given 18 Months (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Former Bush administration official David Safavian was sentenced to 18 months in federal prison yesterday for concealing his relationship with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian wept as he asked for leniency in his obstruction of justice case, telling a judge that Abramoff manipulated him and drew him into the scandal.

Safavian was convicted in June of lying to investigators about his relationship with the lobbyist while Safavian was chief of staff in the General Services Administration. He helped provide Abramoff with details about GSA projects and offered advice on dealing with the agency.

During his sentencing, Safavian apologized for giving the appearance of impropriety but said it was not fraudulent.

"Yes, Jack Abramoff was a friend, but he wasn't my co-conspirator and I wasn't his," Safavian said. "There was no conspiracy to defraud anyone, least of all the taxpayers."

Early in the hearing, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman told defense attorneys he was leaning toward a sentence of 15 to 21 months in prison and was not convinced Safavian had accepted responsibility for his crimes.

"Get up here and tell me, 'I agree I concealed. I agree I obstructed justice,' " Judge Friedman said. "I don't believe he's done that."

Abramoff is cooperating with an FBI corruption investigation into Congress and the White House. He has admitted using gifts to influence lawmakers.

The investigation snared its first congressman this month when Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican, pleaded guilty to covering up expensive gifts and trips from Abramoff. He admitted taking trips, tickets, meals and campaign donations from Abramoff in return for official actions on behalf of his clients.

Two former aides to Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, have also pleaded guilty, as has Ney's former chief of staff.

Additionally, Roger Stillwell, a former Interior Department official, pleaded guilty in August to a misdemeanor charge for not reporting tickets he received from Abramoff.

Jail Time For Ex-official In Influence-peddling Case (LAT/AP)

From Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Former Bush administration official David H. Safavian was sentenced to 18 months in prison Friday for lying and obstructing justice in connection with the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

Safavian, the former chief of staff for the General Services Administration, was sentenced on obstruction and concealment charges for lying to investigators about his relationship with Abramoff, the once-powerful Republican lobbyist.

"There was a time when people came to Washington because they thought government could be helpful to people," said U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman. "People came to Washington asking not what government could do for them and their friends but what they could do for the public."

Safavian wept in court as he asked for leniency, but Friedman said the ex-bureaucrat had become part of Washington's culture of corruption, where congressmen listen to campaign donors and lobbyists while farming out to staff members the job of writing laws.

Abramoff shook Pennsylvania Avenue from the Capitol to the White House when he pleaded guilty to corruption in January and began cooperating with an FBI investigation.

The case has become an election-year liability for Republicans. Last month, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) pleaded guilty to taking gifts and trips from Abramoff in return for official favors.

Friedman said he believed Safavian was a good person and could not understand why he got involved with Abramoff.

"Maybe it's hard to resist. Maybe it's hanging out with the big boys," Friedman said. "I'm not sure."

Safavian, who also worked in the White House budget office, gave Abramoff details about GSA projects and offered advice on dealing with the agency. He also accepted a cut-rate golf trip to Scotland aboard a private jet.

"Rather than putting the interest of the public first, he put the interest of Jack Abramoff first," prosecutor Peter R. Zeidenberg said.

Safavian apologized Friday for giving the appearance of impropriety but said it was not fraudulent. He said the lobbyist used and manipulated him and he never meant to hurt anyone.

Safavian argued for no jail time but prosecutors asked for a three-year sentence, saying Safavian lied on the stand. Friedman called Safavian's testimony that he didn't know the value of the Scotland trip and barely read an ethics opinion "incredible" and "hard to believe" but said it wasn't perjury.

Ex-procurement Chief Gets 18 Months In Prison (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, October 28, 2006

Former federal procurement chief David Safavian was sentenced on Friday to 18 months in prison for lying and obstructing investigations into his dealings with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian was convicted in June on four of five charges of lying to General Services Administration and Senate officials about his interactions with Abramoff while serving as the chief of staff at GSA, and obstructing a GSA inspector general investigation.

The 18-month sentence fell halfway between the defense's recommendation that he serve between zero and 12 months, and a Justice Department recommendation for 30 to 37 months. D.C. District Judge Paul Friedman also declined to impose a fine along with prison time, based on a pre-sentencing report that found Safavian's finances ruined by legal fees.

"I think since Mr. Safavian is going to serve some time in prison, to impose a fine is punishing Mrs. Safavian and perhaps other relatives," Friedman said.

The sentencing was complicated by questions of what guidelines should apply to each of the counts and potential adjustments to the term. Peter Zeidenberg, the lead prosecuting attorney, argued that the sentence should be extended because Safavian perjured himself while testifying during his trial. Defense attorney Barbara Van Gelder argued that the sentence should be shortened because her client accepted responsibility for his actions.

Friedman rejected the government's argument for a longer sentence. He conceded that "it was hard to believe some of what Mr. Safavian said" during the trial, such as his statement that he had not stopped to question the inordinately low costs that Abramoff quoted to him for a lavish trip to play golf in Scotland. But Friedman said there was gray area in the subjectivity of testimony centering on what Safavian believed, which separated the case from ones in which defendants had clearly lied about basic, objective facts of the case.

Friedman also rejected Van Gelder's argument for a lighter sentence, saying Safavian showed no sign of accepting responsibility for his crimes.

"My words cannot express how sorry I am for the actions at trial here," Safavian told the judge in an appeal for leniency. "I now see that there were appearance [of conflict of interest] issues with some of those actions...I brought notoriety to a good agency, and that makes me sad."

But Friedman said Safavian's statement, his trial testimony and his defense lawyer's briefings all reflected that he continued to consider his conduct itself innocent, viewing the problem as one of others' interpretation of his actions.

Friedman showed the most sympathy at the many appeals made by Safavian's friends and family, and he condemned attacks on Safavian's wife, Jennifer, who works as an aide to Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va.

The judge said he read each of the 50 to 60 letters submitted as character references by Safavian's friends, former colleagues, former subordinates, a fellow police department volunteer, and his grandmother, among others, and he found the universally positive accounts compelling. Safavian's sister also stood before the judge to plead for leniency on her brother's behalf; he cried as she said the convictions did not reflect who her brother really was.

But Friedman ultimately concluded that despite the many accounts of Safavian's upstanding morals, the facts did not merit a lighter sentence. "Mr. Safavian wasn't duped, he isn't naïve, he's smart," Friedman said during a lengthy discussion of his reasoning. "Did he believe in public service? I guess he did. But he also talked about one day wanting to join Mr. Abramoff -- join that lucrative lobbying business."

Linking Safavian's case to the corruption cases that have recently swamped Washington, Friedman said the city has become increasingly corrupt over the years.

"There was a time when people came to Washington asking not what they could do for themselves and their friends, but what they could do for the public," he said.

Safavian plans to request assignment to a prison in Cumberland, Maryland. He also intends to appeal his conviction, and his lawyer said she will argue that he be allowed to remain free on bond until the appeal is decided.

Man Linked To Abramoff Is Sentenced To 18 Months (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — A former White House budget official who became entangled in the criminal investigation of the lobbyist Jack Abramoff was sentenced on Friday to 18 months in prison for lying about his relationship to Mr. Abramoff.

The former official, David H. Safavian, wept as he pleaded for leniency from Judge Paul L. Friedman in Federal District Court here. The judge used the sentencing hearing to speak out against what he said was a growing culture of corruption in Washington encouraged by high-priced lobbyists.

“He came to work in an environment that has become, frankly, more and more corrupt,” Judge Friedman said in announcing Mr. Safavian’s sentence, which was half of the three-year prison term sought by the Justice Department.

“It’s become corrupted by money,” Judge Friedman added. “You’ve literally got lobbyists sitting in Congressional offices writing legislation. That’s what’s going on.”

Mr. Safavian’s crimes, he said, were a “classic case of abuse of the public’s trust.”

Mr. Safavian was convicted in June of lying to federal investigators about Mr. Abramoff and the circumstances of his decision to join the lobbyist on a golfing trip to Scotland by private jet in 2002.

Mr. Safavian, a lobbying partner of Mr. Abramoff before joining the Bush administration, accepted an invitation for the trip after telling government ethics officers — falsely, the trial determined — that he faced no conflict of interest because Mr. Abramoff did no business with the executive branch.

In fact, the trial showed, Mr. Safavian had offered his services to Mr. Abramoff at the time as a middleman in acquiring government lands that were controlled by the General Services Administration, where Mr. Safavian had been chief of staff.

Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to charges of conspiring to corrupt public officials, including Mr. Safavian and Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio, who became the first member of Congress to confess to crimes in the influence-peddling inquiry. Mr. Ney pleaded guilty this month to accepting a long list of illegal gifts from the lobbyist in exchange for official acts.

Mr. Safavian, who resigned in December as head of federal procurement policies at the White House budget office, was the first person to go to trial in the investigation and, even Friday, did not concede that he had lied to investigators or obstructed justice, the crimes for which he was convicted.

Choking back tears, he stood before Judge Friedman and insisted that while his actions might have created the appearance of impropriety, “there was no conspiracy to defraud anybody, least of all taxpayers.” He said that while “Jack Abramoff was my friend, he wasn’t my co-conspirator and I wasn’t his.”

“My words cannot express how sorry I am,” Mr. Safavian said.

“I brought notoriety to a good agency, and that makes me sick,” he said, referring to the General Services Administration, which acts as the federal government’s property manager. “I shouldn’t have given Jack Abramoff any information about the agency, no matter how innocuous it seemed.”

Ethics Report On Foley Not Expected Before Elections (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0088429

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

The House ethics committee has all but wrapped up the investigative phase of its probe into the actions of former representative Mark Foley, informing key witnesses that they will not be summoned back for more questioning, lawyers in the case said yesterday.

But those lawyers indicated that the committee is unlikely to release its report on the Florida Republican -- or even an interim memo -- before the Nov. 7 elections.

The quick pace of the investigation had raised hopes among some Democrats that the committee could release its findings in the coming days, fulfilling a pledge from the committee's top Democrat, Rep. Howard L. Berman (Calif.), that the probe would be wrapped up in "weeks, not months."

The political shock of Foley's sexually explicit instant-message exchanges with former House pages has faded, but questions remain about what senior House GOP leaders knew of Foley's behavior and when they knew it. A committee report could have resurrected Democratic charges of a coverup, some Democrats hoped.

But with many hours of testimony to transcribe into thousands of pages of evidence, it is unrealistic to expect that even an interim memo can be released next week, said Timothy J. Heaphy, the attorney for Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham.

The task of sifting through evidence and reaching conclusions appears to be at hand. Aides for the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, as the ethics committee is formally known, told Heaphy that Fordham was free to leave the country yesterday on vacation. Lawyers close to the probe said another pivotal witness, former House clerk Jeff Trandahl, will not be called back for follow-up questions.

The committee has also taken testimony from House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his top staff; House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio); National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.); Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), whose former page apparently first brought Foley's e-mails to the attention of the House leadership; Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), who chairs the page board; and several other Republican aides.

The most glaring hole in the testimony is the apparent decision not to call Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who was aware of inappropriate e-mails from Foley to a page as far back as 2000 and whose conduct with former pages has also drawn scrutiny. Korenna Cline, a Kolbe spokeswoman, said the ethics committee has had no contact with the congressman or his staff. Ethics committee staff members would not comment on the course of the investigation but gave no indication that all investigative matters were closed.

Still, the committee has generally garnered praise for the diligence its members have shown. This week's appearance by Hastert was expected to be short and perfunctory. Instead, Hastert remained behind closed doors for nearly three hours with the committee's staff and the four members conducting the Foley probe. Questioning of Hastert's chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, stretched on for more than six hours and ended past midnight. Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, spent a similarly grueling stretch with the committee.

One witness said questions dwelled on meetings between Republican leadership aides, Foley and Foley's staff, and Trandahl.

Outside the committee room, House Republicans, including Hastert, have repeatedly suggested that Democrats should also be scrutinized to determine whether they were aware of Foley's sexually explicit instant messages and leaked them to the news media. But those messages were revealed by former pages only after ABC News published inappropriate but not sexual e-mails, and the committee has not pursued the matter, the witness said.

The Republican members of the investigative panel -- committee Chairman Doc Hastings (Wash.) and Rep. Judy Biggert (Ill.) -- did not dwell on the origins of the e-mails or on the leaks. Likewise, the Democratic members, Berman and Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (Ohio), did not press their party's charges that the Republicans covered up Foley's actions to protect his House seat.

"I did not get the sense that anyone was acting in a partisan way," Heaphy said, stressing that he could not divulge the specific questions asked. "They were pretty much acting as investigators. I was impressed at the level of preparation and insight they showed."

That is a far cry from the dysfunctional committee that has done virtually nothing since February 2005, when GOP leaders ousted the panel's independent-minded chairman, Rep. Joel Hefley (R-Colo.), and replaced him with Hastings, who is considered closer to the Republican leadership.

James Dyer, a former senior House Republican aide now with the lobbying firm Clark & Weinstock, said the Foley matter has shown Republican leaders that they need a strong, credible ethics committee that can take up internal scandals and show the public that House members take such matters seriously.

"If there is a silver lining in all this, it's the re-emergence of a strong ethics committee," Dyer said.

When the page scandal broke Sept. 29, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) called for the committee to deliver a preliminary report to the House within 10 days. That goal is long past, but Pelosi has not publicly pressured the committee to move faster.

"The ethics committee seems to be conducting its investigation rapidly," said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider. "We'll see how the next phase goes."

Levine Enters Guilty Plea (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Matt O'connor And Ray Long, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, October 28, 2006

2 governor allies aided scheme, U.S. says

Political insider Stuart Levine pleaded guilty Friday to scheming to squeeze millions of dollars from firms seeking state business, and authorities alleged in the clearest detail yet that he had the help of Gov. Rod Blagojevich's top campaign supporters.

The new allegations in the plea agreement of Levine, a longtime Republican fundraiser reappointed to state boards by the Democratic governor, only increased the questions about corruption swirling around the race for governor with little more than a week until the Nov. 7 election.

In the 58-page plea agreement, federal authorities spell out allegations that Blagojevich's two top fundraisers schemed almost from the beginning of the governor's administration to use their newfound influence for corrupt purposes.

The plea agreement identifies Antoin "Tony" Rezko, who has already been indicted on federal corruption charges, as one of those close advisers. The other fundraiser, who is not charged, is identified only as "Individual B." Sources identify him as Christopher Kelly, a south suburban roofing contractor who became a loyal Blagojevich confidant.

Following a fundraiser Friday night, Blagojevich said Levine's plea shows he began his misdeeds before Blagojevich became governor.

"It's my understanding the guilty pleas extend back to acts of wrongdoing that began as early as 2000 or 2001, and my sense of the guilty pleas is that it was a continuation of all of that that spilled over from one administration to the next," he said.

The campaign of Blagojevich's Republican challenger, Judy Baar Topinka, tried Friday to use Levine's guilty plea to tarnish the governor.

Topinka's running mate, Joe Birkett, noted that the plea agreement by Levine--who was a member of the state teachers pension board and state hospital construction board--tied Blagojevich's top two fundraisers to the alleged corruption scheme.

"Rod Blagojevich needs to explain to the voters why his top two fundraisers were knee-deep in corruption in this massive corruption scheme," Birkett said. "It's crystal clear that `Individual B,' Chris Kelly, was in fact part of the shakedown scheme."

Jon Bauman, executive director of the Teachers' Retirement System, confirmed that Kelly is "Individual B," based on his conversations with Levine and subsequent interviews with federal officials. Sources close to the investigation have corroborated the identification.

Kelly's attorney, Michael Monico, said his client denies any wrongdoing. Kelly has not been charged.

"To the extent the plea agreement by inference or innuendo accuses Chris of any wrongdoing, we categorically deny that," Monico said Friday evening.

The plea agreement alleges that Rezko and Kelly used Levine to play politics at the state pension board, along with two stalwarts of the old-guard Republican establishment in Springfield. Although neither was directly named, they are businessman

DOJ_NMG_0088431

William Cellini and lobbyist Robert Kjellander, now the treasurer of the Republican National Committee. Neither Cellini nor Kjellander is charged with a crime.

In his agreement, Levine places himself at the center of a plan to enrich himself, Rezko and their associates, and raise campaign cash through a series of secret, crooked deals involving firms trying to do business with the state's Teachers' Retirement System.

Prosecutors detailed Levine's efforts to solicit kickbacks of millions of dollars from nine investment firms seeking contracts with TRS, and in one case, a $1.5 million political contribution for a public official identified as Blagojevich by sources close to the investigation.

Levine pleaded guilty to one count each of mail fraud and money laundering in exchange for a sentence of about 5 1/2 years in prison and his continued cooperation in ongoing investigations of state government. If not for his cooperation, Levine faced life imprisonment, his lawyer said.

Levine's lawyer, Jeffrey Steinback, said the scope of the corruption was extensive, estimating that Levine and others schemed to steal as much as $20 million to $50 million in government and private funds.

Steinback said he expects Levine's cooperation to extend to testifying at trials and could take two years to complete.

"He is cooperating fully with the government in some very sensitive, ongoing investigations," Steinback said. "I know the government regards him as very important."

The plea agreement disclosed that Levine was reappointed to the Health Facilities Planning Board with the intervention of "Individual A"--previously identified by the Tribune as William Cellini, the Springfield power broker and Blagojevich supporter.

Neither Cellini, who has not been charged, nor his lawyer returned calls Friday seeking comment on the case.

The agreement lays out webs of connections between Levine and other power brokers.

In one key attempted deal in 2004, prosecutors allege Levine learned that the TRS staff was going to recommend that the board approve a $220 million investment with Capri Capital Advisers.

In April 2004, the agreement states, Rezko and Levine arranged to hold up the deal unless real estate investor and Capri co-chairman Thomas Rosenberg, also a Hollywood producer, paid about $2 million in fees to a consultant they chose. In lieu of that, Rosenberg--identified as "Individual J" in the agreement--could make a $1.5 million political contribution "to a certain public official."

Sources have said the money was to go to Blagojevich's campaign fund.

Rosenberg, however, refused to participate in the scheme. Days later, according to the plea agreement, Levine, Rezko, Cellini and Kelly agreed it was too risky to continue demanding money from Rosenberg's firm. The four agreed that while Rosenberg's firm would receive the $220 million allocation from TRS, it would not receive any more business from the state, the plea said.

Kelly, who once headed the governor's campaign fund, is one of Blagojevich's closest confidants, fundraisers and advisers. Kelly befriended Blagojevich years ago and the two remain close, with Kelly playing a significant role in the governor's re-election campaign.

The plea agreement demonstrates the influence the men had over the boards in question when it describes 2003 discussions surrounding the possible merging of TRS with two other state funds. Cellini approached Rezko and Kelly about defeating that plan, the agreement states, though the names of Cellini and Kelly are not used.

With Cellini's intervention, Rezko and Kelly used their influence with senior state officials to oppose a proposed consolidation of state pension funds to halt any chance of Levine losing his pivotal board post, the plea agreement said.

In return, Levine alleged, he agreed to help ensure the Teachers' Retirement System selected investment firms and lawyers favored by Rezko and Kelly.

The plea agreement also referenced Kjellander, though he is not named.

Based on matching the federal records with minutes of the Teachers' Retirement System, Bauman confirmed that Kjellander was "Individual K."

The agreement says that in early 2002, before Blagojevich was elected, Kjellander asked for help from Levine in getting business for an investment firm. The agreement alleges Levine knew Kjellander would receive a finder's fee in the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0088432

Kjellander has maintained in prior interviews that all of his dealings were aboveboard. Kjellander has not been charged with wrongdoing. He could not be reached for comment.

Governor's Campaign Donor Pleads Guilty In Kickback Case (CHIT/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

Chicago Tribune, October 28, 2006

CHICAGO -- A businessman who funneled thousands of dollars into Gov. Rod Blagojevich's campaign pleaded guilty Friday to using his seats on two state boards in a bid to collect millions of dollars in kickbacks.

Disappointing Republicans, though, Stuart Levine's 58-page plea agreement with federal prosecutors contained no allegations of wrongdoing on the part of the Democratic governor, who is waging a re-election campaign while coping with a federal corruption investigation.

All the same, the massive document was crammed with details of corruption in state government and guaranteed to fuel campaign fireworks.

Levine told how he worked closely with Blagojevich fundraiser Antoin "Tony" Rezko, now also facing federal charges, and that Rezko and others close to the governor provided him with a high degree of political clout.

Levine admitted that he and Rezko planned to demand a $2 million payoff or $1.5 million in campaign contributions to "a certain state official" from a firm that wanted to invest $220 million in pension funds.

The official was Blagojevich, according to an individual familiar with the case who spoke only on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing. But the money never was paid.

Blagojevich issued a statement saying the plea agreement "reveals a pattern of wrongdoing by Stuart Levine that betrayed the trust of Gov. (Jim) Edgar who first appointed him and to all of us here in Illinois."

Levine, 60, a suburban Highland Park millionaire, has been cooperating with federal investigators for more than six months in hopes of getting a break that would whittle down the time he will have to spend behind bars.

Under a deal worked out by defense attorney Jeffrey B. Steinback, Levine pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud and one of money laundering. He is facing a sentence of five years and seven months, about half of the bottom end of the sentencing range under federal guidelines.

Prosecutors were expected to drop 22 other counts that could have sent Levine to prison for life had he been convicted on all of them.

"Stuart was a very legitimate, hardworking and successful businessman before he got involved with all these boards and illegal business, but you can become intoxicated with the ether of power, the ether of money and the opportunity for more," Steinback told reporters.

In his plea agreement, Levine acknowledged participating in a scheme to defraud the beneficiaries of the Teachers Retirement System, which pays the pensions of downstate and suburban Chicago teachers.

Prosecutors maintain that Levine, Rezko and others schemed to get at least $20 million and perhaps as much a $50 million in assorted kickbacks.

U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve agreed to postpone the sentencing until the investigation is closed and Levine has testified, if need be, against any other defendants.

Levine admitted that the plotters sought to force nine investment firms seeking business from the state Teachers Retirement System to pay millions of dollars in kickbacks through consultants. In two cases, the scheme was hatched before Blagojevich became governor, the document said.

Levine was appointed to his seat on the Teachers Retirement System board in October 2000 by then Gov. George Ryan, now preparing to start his own 6{-year racketeering sentence.

Blagojevich in 2003 named him to a fresh term on the board that places billions of dollars in pension money with investment companies.

The fees that such firms charge can be highly lucrative.

DOJ_NMG_0088433

Levine said in his plea agreement that he found out he would be reappointed to the Teachers Retirement System board at a meeting in Rezko's office with another of the governor's fundraisers also on hand.

Rezko is facing wire fraud, mail fraud and other charges as part of the alleged scheme to pressure investment companies and others to pay kickbacks in exchange for getting money to invest for the pension fund.

When named to the pension board, Levine already had been named by former Gov. Jim Edgar to the Illinois Health Facilities Planning Board, whose decisions also involve big money. Hospitals are unable to raise the money they need for expansion projects without approval from the board.

Levine admitted that he used his position as a member of that board to pressure hospitals in a kickback plot. He admitted pressuring Edward Hospital in Naperville and Mercy Hospital when it sought to build an expansion project in Crystal Lake.

He also confirmed charges in the indictment that as a member of the board of Chicago Medical College, now known as Rosalind Franklin University of Medicine and Science, he awarded two contracts to construction magnate Jacob Kiferbaum in exchange for kickbacks of nearly $1 million on each project, paid through inflated bills from Kiferbaum.

Levine has been one of the most prolific campaign contributors in state politics, reserving most of his generosity for Republican candidates. But he switched allegiances and backed Blagojevich.

State records show he gave some $65,000, much in in-kind contributions such as airplane tickets, to the governor's 2002 campaign.

Supporters of Republican Judy Baar Topinka for governor had hoped for weeks that Levine's plea agreement when it finally came would hand Blagojevich such a black eye that Topinka would take over as frontrunner.

But many of the details had been aired in earlier court papers.

AP Writer Sophia Tareen contributed reporting for this story.

4 Men Found Guilty In Airport Fraud (HSB)

By Debra Barayuga

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, October 26, 2006

Two airport officials and two contractors defrauded the state of millions of dollars

A federal jury convicted two former airport officials and two contractors of conspiracy and mail fraud yesterday in a bid-rigging scheme at Honolulu Airport.

The jury deliberated for just more than six hours to unanimously find Dennis Hirokawa, 64, former superintendent of airport maintenance; Richard Okada, 65, former director of the Visitor Information Program; and contractors Michael Furukawa, 60, and Wes Uemura, 61, guilty of conspiracy.

In addition, Hirokawa was found guilty of 17 counts of mail fraud; Furukawa, 19 counts; and Uemura, 15 counts.

All four defendants were stoic as the court clerk read the guilty verdicts. Relatives in the audience dabbed at their eyes and wept in the courtroom.

Each of the defendants faces five years' imprisonment on the conspiracy count and five years on each of the mail fraud counts when sentenced Jan. 15. U.S. District Judge David Ezra agreed to allow the men to remain free on bail.

U.S. attorney Larry Tong and state Deputy Attorney General Larry Goya prosecuted the case. The four men were "engaged in an elaborate scheme to abuse the public contracting process and caused economic damage to taxpayers," Tong said.

The environment of "pay to play" that the defendants subscribed to "caused a loss of faith in the integrity of state government that can't be measured in dollars and cents," he said.

Dana Ishibashi, attorney for Okada, said only that they were disappointed and will be exploring their options, including whether to appeal.

Defense attorney Howard Luke declined comment.

The verdict brings to an end a joint federal-state investigation that began more than six years ago by the state Attorney General after airport auditors learned the state was billed $14,000 for constructing four 6-foot-long plywood planter boxes to hold poinsettias during the holidays.

DOJ_NMG_0088434

Prosecutors alleged that the four conspired from 1997 to 2002 to obtain $4.8 million in small-purchase contracts under $25,000, a less formal process that requires that three bids be submitted and the work awarded to the lowest bid.

The contracts were mostly awarded to six companies owned by Furukawa and Uemura, prosecutors said. A government expert who reviewed 171 of the jobs that paid contractors $1.4 million valued the work as worth only $380,000.

Tong said he is expects to ask the court to order the defendants to repay $2.5 million.

A civil proceeding is also under way in state court seeking to forfeit property owned by the defendants.

Charles Goodwin, special agent in charge of the FBI here, said he hopes the convictions serve as a deterrent. "And as time goes by and we pursue more and more corruption, more and more people will step forward because they see the government serious about taking it on at the state and federal level," he said.

Proposed Religion-Based Program For Federal Inmates Is Canceled (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — The Justice Department has canceled its proposal for a religion-based prison rehabilitation program that critics and constitutional law experts contended would have violated the separation of church and state.

On March 31, the department announced that it was seeking proposals for a "single-faith, residential re-entry program" that would be adopted initially in as many as six federal prisons and run in each by an organization of a particular denomination. The proposed program, among others, was challenged in a lawsuit filed on May 4 in the Federal District Court in Madison, Wis., by the Freedom From Religion Foundation, a watchdog group.

By May 26, the department had suspended its request for proposals for the program, and on Thursday it canceled the program "in its entirety," according to the Web site for the Office of Justice Programs of the federal Bureau of Prisons, a branch of the Justice Department.

A spokeswoman for the office did not return calls seeking comment.

Religion-based rehabilitation programs in prisons have faced several legal challenges. Civil liberties groups say federal money is being used to proselytize inmates, many of whom do not have secular alternatives for rehabilitation.

Proponents of such programs maintain that religion gives inmates a strong moral foundation to help them re-enter society.

In June, a federal judge in Iowa ruled that a state-financed evangelical Christian prison program was unconstitutional because it was "pervasively sectarian." That case is under appeal.

Robert W. Tuttle, a professor of law at George Washington University, said the proposed single-faith program "was dead in the water" upon introduction. It clearly breached the separation of church and state by financing indoctrination in a particular faith, he said.

The Disillusionment Of A Young White House Evangelical (NYT)

By Samuel G. Freedman

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

In an election season, how could an "inside story of political seduction," to quote the subtitle of David Kuo's "Tempting Faith," not be mined for every politically explosive example it offers?

And Mr. Kuo, who once wrote speeches for William J. Bennett, Pat Robertson, John Ashcroft, Bob Dole and George W. Bush and who served more than two years as second in command at the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, offers plenty.

In his tenure at that office, warm words about compassion, he argues, were belied by meager financing and bureaucratic indifference. Federally financed conferences for religious leaders, he says, were adroitly arranged to benefit threatened Republican incumbents. The conservative Christian leadership that was publicly stroked, he reports, was being privately derided by members of the White House staff.

Naturally, those skeptical of the faith-based initiative are saying, "I told you so," and stalwart defenders of the Bush administration are issuing emphatic denials or even suggesting that Mr. Kuo is either Judas or a fresh candidate for the axis of evil.

DOJ_NMG_0088435

But though "Tempting Faith" (Free Press) is a story about the Bush presidency, it is even more a story about Mr. Kuo. As much as it is a story about politics, it is also a story about faith.

"I set out to write a spiritual book," Mr. Kuo insists, and "Tempting Faith" turns out to be an engrossing piece of religious autobiography and a revealing, sometimes unnerving window into evangelical Christian culture.

There are painful remembrances, like the half-understood decision he and a girlfriend made to seek an abortion, which permanently bumped him off the path of becoming a standard-issue young liberal; and there are painfully comic ones, like the time he felt compelled by Christian faith to blurt out an apology to Hillary Rodham Clinton for all the ugly anti-Hillary jokes he had been slipping into the speeches he wrote.

There is never any suspense about whether the young Christian, lured to Washington to do good, will resist the corrupting temptation to manipulate his faith for political ends. The book's plot, after all, is a time-honored one: fall and redemption, and then fall and redemption again. It is classic testimony, and even ends with a kind of altar call summoning "we Christians" (he means evangelical Christians) to a two-year fast from all political activities besides voting.

For many readers, the real tension will arise from the question of why this obviously intelligent, alert and devoted young man did not see the train wreck coming. The political shenanigans he chronicles are hardly unprecedented, and he had repeatedly witnessed something less than enthusiasm among Republicans (in fact, among Democrats, too) for helping the needy. If the title were not in use, Mr. Kuo might well have called his book "State of Denial."

In elaborating on his case that conservative Christians, himself included, sold their birthright for a mess of pottage, Mr. Kuo mentions perks like presidential attention and conference calls with Karl Rove, symbolic gestures and promises, mostly unfulfilled, of government financing to do good works and combat evil as one sees it.

Those, of course, are the tools put to work with other groups and by every administration. But in Mr. Kuo's story, are there also not elements specific to evangelical culture at work? Is it too much to see the roots there of Mr. Kuo's startling switch from voting for Michael S. Dukakis and interning in the office of Senator Edward M. Kennedy to opposing gay rights, favoring every manner of tax cut and considering liberals the children of darkness?

"I made a seamless transition to embrace all of these positions," Mr. Kuo writes.

Such quick makeovers are not unknown on the secular left or right. But Mr. Kuo gives a strong impression that his was related to the very idea of rapid conversion, a total turning around of one's life, combined with the effect of the ideologically monolithic character of the evangelical congregation he joined in Washington.

And what of the surprisingly uncritical trust that the author, like many other conservative Christians, put in George W. Bush? "Christians trust their Christian president," Mr. Kuo writes; for many of them "George W. Bush can really do no wrong." He "loves Jesus" and is, therefore, "a good man."

In the book and in conversations on the phone and in person, Mr. Kuo is forthright about his own love of Jesus, and he never questions the president's. But he does recognize the temptation this poses for evangelicals like himself — of substituting for Jesus, whom "you can't see," someone else identified with him and ready at hand.

Mr. Kuo's religious forthrightness itself raises another intriguing question about evangelical culture. Evangelicals frequently demonstrate a verbal facility and emotional warmth in articulating their faith — in spontaneous prayer, for example, or in personal testimonies — that other believers envy. But does that put a premium on words and feelings rather than on actions and results?

In 1998, after talking at length with Mr. Bush, then governor of Texas, Mr. Kuo was overwhelmed. "Bush was the real deal," he told himself. "He loved Jesus. He wanted to help the poor." Six years and many disappointments later, Mr. Kuo listened to a speech by the president and concluded: "That same passion for the poor I first heard in Austin was in his voice and in his eyes. But the passion was a passion for talking about compassion, not fighting for compassion."

Ultimately the lesson Mr. Kuo hopes his fellow evangelicals learn goes far beyond this president and his policies. "At the end of the day," he said, "politics is easy; God is hard." Politics, by setting up very tangible enemies to be defeated, "gives the illusion of a solution," he said, while God demands personal transformation. "What," he asked, "is harder than to be transformed by unconditional love?"

This very contrast between political change and personal transformation has deep evangelical roots, of course. Secular progressives might counter with the mirror image of his formulation: God is easy; politics is hard.

DOJ_NMG_0088436

And then there is another possibility: God is hard, and so is politics — at least the politics practiced with a good deal of skepticism, with an anticipation of compromises and setbacks, and with a recognition of the pride and egoism, as the theologian Reinhold Niebuhr pointed out, that infects even (or perhaps especially) humanity's most faith-based initiatives.

High Court To Rule On Deadly Force In Police Chases (WP)

By Charles Lane, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

The Supreme Court stepped into the national debate on the risks of high-speed police car chases yesterday, announcing that it will decide whether the Constitution permits police to use deadly force against a fleeing motorist whose only suspected offense is speeding or reckless driving.

The court's decision was a victory for a Georgia police officer appealing a ruling earlier this year by the Atlanta-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit. That court had concluded that the officer acted unreasonably by ramming a fleeing speeder, causing a crash that left the driver, Victor Harris, paralyzed.

The 11th Circuit, like a Georgia federal district judge before it, ruled that the officer, Timothy Scott, had violated a clearly established constitutional rule and could personally be sued.

But Scott's appeal said that the 11th Circuit's decision clashed with rulings by other appeals courts and "will have a chilling effect on seizures of all fleeing suspects across the nation" if the Supreme Court does not reverse it.

At least four members of the court -- the minimum needed to accept a case -- found this argument persuasive enough to grant Scott a hearing.

When the court hears arguments in Scott v. Harris , No. 05-1631, early in 2007, it will be the first time the justices have reexamined the constitutional prerequisites for employing deadly force against unarmed fleeing suspects since 1985.

In that case, which involved not a speeder but a suspected burglar, the court ruled that police may use deadly force only when they have good reason to believe someone will be killed or injured if they do not.

"It is not better that all felony suspects die than that they escape," the court ruled. "A police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead."

The 11th Circuit cited that ruling to support its decision against Scott, noting that Harris was not suspected of any offense more serious than speeding, a misdemeanor, and posed little risk to the public because the streets were empty at the time.

Scott replied in his brief that the 11th Circuit's ruling puts police in "the untenable position of waiting until a fleeing suspect engaged in reckless and dangerous driving . . . actually maims or kills an innocent bystander before initiating a seizure."

Pursuits -- even of armed and dangerous suspects -- have become controversial in recent years, because of the risk they can pose to third parties and police officers themselves.

A 2004 University of Washington study found that, from 1994 to 2002, 260 to 325 people were killed annually as a result of high-speed chases.

The chase prompting the court's new case began on the night of March 29, 2001, when police tried to pull Harris over for going 73 in a 55-mph zone. Harris fled, accelerating to more than 90 mph and driving against traffic.

Harris later said he was frightened and wanted to avoid an impound fee for his car.

Scott joined the pursuit and radioed his supervisor for permission to attempt a "precision intervention technique," a maneuver in which a police car deliberately bumps a fleeing car at an angle, forcing it to spin out and stop.

Scott's supervisor authorized the maneuver. But Scott instead rammed Harris's car directly from behind, forcing it to career off the road and crash.

Now a quadriplegic, Harris sued Scott, alleging that the officer had violated the Fourth Amendment, which prohibits unreasonable seizures.

A federal district judge in Georgia upheld the suit against Scott in 2003, prompting Scott's appeal to the 11th Circuit.

A decision in the case is expected by July.

Justices To Rule On Police Ramming Car To End Chase (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0088437

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

The Supreme Court agreed Friday to decide whether police officers can be sued for intentionally ramming a fleeing car during a high-speed chase, causing the death or injury of the driver.

Eight years ago, the justices shielded police officers from being sued in federal court for deaths and injuries resulting from high-speed chases. The only exception, the court said, is when police act out of "an improper or malicious motive," such as "to terrorize, cause harm or kill" a suspect.

In the 1998 case, the parents of a teenager from Sacramento sued after their son was killed when he fell from a motorcycle being pursued by a police cruiser at 100 mph. Because the officer did not intend to harm the cyclist, he could not be held liable, the high court ruled.

In the new case, from Georgia, the justices will consider whether an officer who deliberately hits a fleeing car can be held liable for an accident that follows.

The case began on a March night in 2001 when an officer in Coweta County, Ga., saw a Cadillac going 20 miles above the speed limit. When he gave chase, it sped up, ran through a red light and reached 100 mph on a highway.

A second officer, Timothy Scott, rammed the rear of the speeding vehicle, sending it out of control and over an embankment. The driver, 19-year-old Victor Harris, survived but was rendered a quadriplegic.

He sued, and both a federal judge and the U.S. appeals court in Atlanta agreed that an officer who used "deadly force" by ramming his car into another vehicle could be held liable for the damage he caused.

Under most states' laws, including California's, police officers cannot be sued by someone injured while fleeing from law enforcement. However, police can be sued in federal court if they violate a person's constitutional rights, even if the person is a fleeing felon.

In the Georgia case, lawyers for the injured driver argued that ramming his car amounted to an "unreasonable seizure," a violation of the 4th Amendment. The courts agreed, clearing the way for the suit to go before a jury.

Lawyers for the police officer appealed directly to the Supreme Court, arguing that such a decision, if allowed to stand, endangered the public as well as police. Officers would be forced to allow speeding vehicles to escape if they could be sued for forcibly stopping them, they said.

When trying to stop a fleeing car, police officers try to drive alongside and then nudge the rear to the right so that the car spins out. This is known as PIT, for Pursuit Intervention Technique.

"When it's done right, it's a controlled maneuver, and it stops the car," said Lt. Paul Vernon of the Los Angeles Police Department.

The high court announced late Friday that it would hear the case of Scott vs. Harris.

Also Friday, the court agreed to hear an appeal from the parents of an autistic boy seeking the right to sue for a better learning program for their son. A federal judge in Ohio threw their case out because they did not have a lawyer.

Now, the Supreme Court will decide whether parents, acting without a lawyer, may appeal in court on behalf of their children to seek their rights under the federal Individuals With Disabilities Education Act. That law gives disabled children a right to a "free appropriate public education."

The law also says the school must develop an "individualized education program" for each child with a disability, and the parents are entitled to be part of the team that develops this plan. If the parents are dissatisfied with the plan, they can file a complaint and have a hearing before a local and state administrator. If they are still dissatisfied, they can go to court.

At issue is whether they can do so on their own and without a lawyer.

Jeff and Sandee Winkelman believed their 8-year-old son, Jacob, would benefit from attending a private school that specialized in autism. However, school officials in Parma, Ohio, placed him in a public elementary school, and an administrative hearing officer upheld the school district's decision.

The Winkelmans sent their son to the private school for one year, at a tuition cost of $56,000, and went to federal court to seek reimbursement from the school district.

A federal judge and the U.S. appeals court in Cincinnati ruled the parents could not sue in court without a lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0088438

Jean-Claude Andre, a Los Angeles lawyer, petitioned the Supreme Court to hear their case. He cited an Education Department study that said the nation had nearly 7 million children with a disability, and of these, about a third came from families with annual incomes of $25,000 or less.

"For the overwhelming majority of these families, like the Winkelmans, the cost of retaining a lawyer is prohibitive," he said. U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement also urged the justices to take up the case of Winkelman vs. Parma City School District and to rule for the family.

Both cases will be argued before the high court early next year and decided by June.

david.savage@latimes.com

Convicted Killers See New Trial Over Court Chaos (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

The crime scene was the courthouse, and the witnesses were lawyers, court officers, a court reporter and a judge. The indictment described the momentary chaos of an afternoon last winter.

"It happened right here," said the prosecutor, Robert J. Walsh, addressing the jury and motioning toward the defendants. "They tried to escape."

But when testimony began this week, witnesses offered all the complexity of the world outside the courthouse.

Had one of the men signaled to start the attack? Had the other said his intent was suicide? Were the makeshift knives found in their clothing or on the floor? Where had the armed court sergeant and the unarmed judge been standing?

The men at the defense table in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn last January, Kayson Pearson, 24, and Troy Hendrix, 22, had been on trial for kidnapping, raping and killing Romona Moore, a third-year psychology student at Hunter College. She was savagely tortured. The maximum penalty was life. On Jan. 19, the trial ended abruptly.

Courthouse disturbances do not make for predictable cases. Some defendants who live to tell about them are acquitted, like Angela Davis in California in 1972 and Jose Dominguez in the Bronx in 1991. In Missouri, a man convicted in the courthouse where he had killed his wife in 1992 awaits a new trial on account of the venue. In Atlanta, defense lawyers have asked to move the trial of a man who escaped the courthouse in March 2005.

Mr. Pearson and Mr. Hendrix never did stand much of a chance to escape. The court clerk behind his desk could push a button to summon backup. His hand gripped the holster of a handgun. The holster he had unclipped.

The court sergeant's holster was made to lock if you fought him for the 9-millimeter Glock loaded with 16 hollow point bullets. The sergeant was 58 years old and 5 feet 10 inches tall, and he would swear that he still had it in him to body slam a young man with his off hand. Next door, a trial for the killing of two police detectives had attracted idle, displeased police detectives.

But timing for a getaway did not look to improve. For three years, hearings had convened high up in the 32-story courthouse, where the elevators were the only way out.

On the second day of the trial, proceedings moved to a room equipped to seat two juries, beside an escalator and a wide staircase. By 4 p.m. the building was clearing. Mr. Pearson was dressed in white from jacket to shoes. Romona Moore's mother gave her testimony, the last of the day. Justice Albert Tomei dismissed the jury. Then everybody moved.

"It was the scariest thing I've ever experienced," said Anna-Sigga Nicolazzi, the prosecutor on the case, speaking from the witness stand this week. "There were so many people screaming and saying different things."

In minutes, Mr. Hendrix was lying on the floor, court officers on him. His eyes were red, and mucus ran from his face. His footprint was on the defense table. The sergeant, James A. Gorra, was cut in three places. A court officer had banged his knee, another was wounded in the neck. Somebody was handcuffing Mr. Pearson. A defense lawyer, Mitchell Dinnerstein, was cut in the face and his shirt was full of blood. Around the room, officers found two sharpened ends of plexiglass and a strange weapon that looked like a pair of eyeglass frames with a masonry nail attached.

A mistrial was declared, new lawyers were appointed and the men watched their trial by video from Rikers Island. When it was done, Justice Tomei gave them life sentences. Mr. Pearson was sent to the Upstate Correctional Facility in Malone, and Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0088439

Hendrix to the Downstate Correctional Facility in Fishkill, 230 miles away. Prison records list their parole eligibility dates as 99/99/9999.

But the Brooklyn district attorney, Charles J. Hynes, who had instructed Ms. Nicolazzi at Brooklyn Law School, did not wait to hear the sentences. On April 4, prosecutors filed a 39-count indictment addressing that January afternoon.

"The courts have to be secured," Mr. Hynes said in an interview. "It's an important thing for the morale of the staff that we don't trivialize the kind of behavior that we allege these guys committed."

The case was assigned to Mr. Walsh, a colleague of Ms. Nicolazzi in the Homicide Bureau. At a plea bargain hearing in June, the defense lawyers, John B. Stella and Philip J. Smallman, requested a trial.

Last week, court officers draped a defense table with black bunting to conceal leg shackles and fitted a prosecution table the same way. Sweatshirts were obtained to replace prison jumpsuits.

The judge, James G. Starkey, betrayed little patience. He ordered jury selection to begin despite his own minor surgery and a funeral Mr. Smallman wanted to attend.

The defendants entered in their new sweatshirts and leather restraining belts. They sat side by side. Mr. Pearson seemed alert and reacted to the proceedings, sometimes whispering to Mr. Hendrix.

Jury selection took three days. The lawyers described the nature of the murder trial, but not its outcome.

"Is this case to try whether they're guilty of trying to escape?" asked one woman, who was eliminated. "If they tried to escape in front of everybody, it's there for everybody to see."

Other candidates made the opposite assumption. One man said: "I would figure the rape and the murder would be more of an issue than them trying to run. I feel like they don't have enough evidence on that case, so you're trying to get them on this."

With 11 jurors sworn in, Justice Starkey asked whether the defense would challenge the next candidate, a woman who appeared fit from summers as a lifeguard. The defendants were giggling. Mr. Stella stood in front of his client and put his hands on the table. "This is the 12th juror," he said. Then he turned and told the judge Mr. Pearson had overruled his legal advice. The prosecutor consented without hesitation, and the woman became Juror No. 12. She looked to be about Ms. Moore's age.

As the trial began, Mr. Walsh told jurors the facts were simple. "This is not a case," he said, "where a crime was committed on the street, the defendants were arrested two weeks later and the jury is left to wonder whether they got the right guy."

Several witnesses said Mr. Hendrix had jumped the table and wrestled Sergeant Gorra for his gun. Sergeant Gorra testified to stiff-arming him airborne and slamming him down. But Court Officer Dennis Cherry recounted applying a neckhold while Court Officer Joseph Dentici swept his legs.

The defense lawyer who had been stabbed, Mr. Dinnerstein, said he had received no stitches, though others said his shirt was soaked with blood. The law defines injury, and serious injury, too. Mr. Walsh submitted hospital records, photographs and weapons as evidence.

And the defense lawyers tested memories. Mr. Stella, who paces the gallery during cross-examination, and Mr. Smallman, who wears an American flag lapel pin, asked each witness about positioning and timing.

Ms. Nicolazzi, the prosecutor from the murder case, gave lawyerly yeses and noes, then described her observations. During her testimony, a public-address system announced the lights would flicker for generator tests. Some jurors shifted in their seats.

From the courtroom next door, Justice Tomei came and gave his account.

"I heard gun, gun, gun, that's all I heard," he testified. "As soon as I heard that, I said, 'I'm out of here.' "

A police detective demonstrated efforts to handcuff Mr. Pearson but said finding the weapon was a blur.

"It was all kind of like one motion," said the detective, Timothy O'Brien. "It's kind of hard to pinpoint A and B and C happened."

Then the prosecutor rested his case. Mr. Pearson and Mr. Hendrix were taken to the Manhattan Detention Complex, where they have the weekend to decide whether they want to testify. It promises to be among the last free choices anybody asks them to make. The year 9999 is not coming soon.

Baby Girl's Death In Brooklyn Is Ruled A Homicide By Officials (NYT)

By Cara Buckley And Daryl Khan

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

A 13-month-old girl died early yesterday after being found unconscious in her Brooklyn home, and her death has been declared a homicide by the medical examiner's office. The police have not identified any suspects.

A spokeswoman for the medical examiner's office said the baby had skull fractures and other injuries, and the police said her body was bruised.

The police said that the baby's mother, whom they identified as Antigua Lucas, 19, told them that she had found the baby, Teira Lewis, not breathing around 2:15 a.m. Ms. Lucas said that Teira had been sick at 11:30 p.m., but that she managed to soothe the baby to sleep, according to the police.

After finding the baby unresponsive, Ms. Lucas said, she rushed out of her second-floor apartment at 270 Glenmore Avenue in East New York, the police said, frantic and looking for help. She flagged down a private sanitation company worker, who called 911, the authorities said.

The baby was taken to Brookdale University Hospital and Medical Center and declared dead at 3 a.m., the police said. The Administration for Children's Services was investigating the death.

Neighbors at Ms. Lucas's building, which sits on a desolate stretch of road lined with industrial warehouses and boarded-up homes, said a worker from the child welfare agency had inquired about the baby's well being about four months ago. The agency would not confirm that claim. But, according to neighbors and the building's landlord, Teira had always appeared to be well kept and happy.

The landlord, who would not give his name, said Ms. Lucas and Teira were the only people listed on the apartment's lease, though one neighbor said she saw Ms. Lucas's male companion with the baby around 6 p.m. Thursday. But, according to the police, Ms. Lucas said she was alone in the apartment when she discovered that Teira could not be woken.

Police Say Malvo Confessed To Killing Arizona Golfer (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 28, 2006

TUCSON (AP) — Convicted Washington-area sniper Lee Boyd Malvo confessed to police that he and cohort John Allen Muhammad were responsible for the 2002 killing of a 60-year-old man on a Tucson golf course, Tucson authorities said Friday.

Malvo said he was sorry for the family of Jerry Taylor, said Detective Benjamin Jimenez of the Tucson Police Department.

"He welled up a few times in tears during the interview," Jimenez said.

Malvo spoke to police in Maryland for two hours Thursday after he received immunity from prosecution, Tucson Capt. Bill Richards said. Malvo said the shooting took place while he and Muhammad were in the area visiting Muhammad's older sister, Richards said.

Tucson police had long sought to speak with Malvo about the March 19, 2002, death of Taylor, 60, who died from a single gunshot fired from long range as he practiced chip shots at the golf course. The case had never been conclusively tied to Muhammad and Malvo.

Jimenez said Malvo lay in the bushes and shot Taylor as he was retrieving a golf ball. According to Malvo, the two decided to shoot someone on the golf course after conducting surveillance in the desert, Jimenez said.

Taylor's daughter, Cheryll Witz, said Malvo's confession brings closure for her and will allow her to move forward. She said she wrote Malvo a five-page letter in June imploring him to talk to Tucson detectives.

"I needed to know. I really need to forgive him. I do believe that he was brainwashed and I do truly believe that he was made to kill my father," she said.

Tucson police Chief Richard Miranda said Tucson detectives were participating in the Washington-area sniper investigation and noticed similarities between those cases and Taylor's.

Richards said Malvo agreed to testify against Muhammad if Arizona authorities bring charges. He said police are still investigating and have not submitted the case to prosecutors.

Muhammad and Malvo were arrested for 10 killings and three woundings in the Washington, D.C., area during three weeks in October 2002. They were accused of roaming the area with a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle that they fired from the trunk of a Chevrolet Caprice at random victims.

DOJ_NMG_0088441

Malvo is serving a life term in Virginia for sniper shootings. He is in Maryland awaiting sentencing for six sniper killings in Montgomery County.

The two are suspects in earlier shootings that year in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland and Washington state, and news reports have linked them to shootings in Florida, Texas and California.

Both were convicted of separate Virginia killings in 2003. Muhammad was sentenced to death while Malvo was given a life term.

They were sent to Maryland last year to stand trial for six killings in Montgomery County. Muhammad was convicted in May. Malvo, who pleaded guilty, is to be sentenced Nov. 9.

Professor Accused Of Spying For Cuba Won't Be Released Before Trial (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, October 28, 2006

A Florida International University professor charged with being an unregistered agent of Cuba's communist government won't be released before trial, a Miami federal judge ruled Friday.

Carlos Alvarez, 61, who is accused of informing on the exile community for Cuban leader Fidel Castro's intelligence arm, could flee to Cuba if he's freed before the January trial, U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said. He denied Alvarez's bid for bond.

The father of five has been detained at the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami since January, when he was arrested along with his wife, who faces the same charge but is free on bond.

"The evidence has shown that the government of the Republic of Cuba appreciates the work that [Alvarez] has performed for it and has acknowledged his efforts with commendations," Moore wrote. ``It is, therefore, a substantial likelihood that defendant would choose to flee."

Alvarez's lawyer, Steve Chaykin, said he could not comment because he was out of town and had not read the ruling.

In the decision, Moore takes a harsh view of Alvarez, a longtime FIU psychology professor, who was charged along with his wife, Elsa, an FIU counselor. After her initial detention, she was released in June.

Moore noted then that the ``weight of the evidence against defendant Elsa Alvarez was substantially different than that against Defendant Carlos Alvarez."

He gave self-incriminating statements to FBI agents in the summer of 2005 because he believed they would not charge him if he cooperated with them. His lawyer has asked the judge to suppress that evidence, the core of the U.S. attorney's case against him.

Prosecutors say Carlos Alvarez allegedly operated as an agent of Cuba from 1978 to July 2005, traveled to Cuba at least 12 times during that period, and met with Castro agents in New York and Mexico. In 2002-04, he also "persisted in maintaining contact with the Cuban Intelligence Service over the objections of his wife," according to court records.

In the 14-page ruling, Moore said Alvarez ``was willing to divulge private information about persons in the community and conceal his efforts to do so by using encryption [on computer disks] and other evasive strategies."

Moore stopped short of saying Alvarez was a danger to the community, another factor considered for bond.

The judge said Alvarez might pose a ``hypothetical danger."

The Alvarez couple, if convicted, face up to 10 years in prison.

Feds In Wyo. Take Over Colorado Ad Probe (WP/AP)

By Steven K. Paulson, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

DENVER -- The FBI said Friday that Wyoming officials would take over an investigation into a Colorado gubernatorial candidate's campaign ad to avoid potential conflicts of interest after authorities learned a Denver-area federal agent may have been involved.

The investigation is examining whether GOP Rep. Bob Beauprez accessed a restricted federal database for information used in a television ad to attack his Democratic challenger, Bill Ritter.

DOJ_NMG_0088442

Beauprez has denied any wrongdoing and has refused to disclose the name of the person who gave his campaign the information.

"It's important this thing comes to a close quickly. Right now, we have no indication we are even the subject of an inquiry," Beauprez spokesman John Marshall said.

FBI spokeswoman Rene VonderHaar said the U.S. attorney's office in Denver recused itself from the case when it learned of the possible involvement of a Denver-based federal agent. The Department of Justice transferred control of the investigation to its Cheyenne, Wyo., office, she said.

Cory Voorhis, a federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent and registered Colorado Republican, provided the information, a person in government who was briefed on the investigation told The Associated Press last week. The person spoke on condition of anonymity because of the investigation.

Voorhis has not publicly commented.

Spokesmen for the U.S. attorneys in both states refused to comment. ICE officials have not returned calls.

The ad suggested Ritter, a former Denver district attorney, was soft on illegal immigration, saying he accepted a plea bargain with an illegal immigrant arrested in Colorado who was later accused of sexually assaulting a child in California. The ad said the plea bargain didn't require deportation.

State investigators, acting on accusations of wrongdoing by Ritter's campaign, concluded the information came from the National Crime Information Center, a federal database that is supposed to be limited to law-enforcement use. The FBI has launched its own investigation.

Using the database for any purpose other than law enforcement is a federal crime punishable by up to a year in prison.

Pataki Picks Ex-Prosecutor To Weigh In On Hevesi Case (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

ALBANY, Oct. 27 — Gov. George E. Pataki appointed a former federal prosecutor on Friday to determine whether the ethics case against Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi for using a state worker to chauffeur his wife was strong enough to seek his removal from office.

Mr. Pataki, who cut short a trip to Hungary to deal with the Hevesi affair, had been expected to announce his decision on whether to invoke a little-known law to call the State Senate into special session to consider removing Mr. Hevesi. But Mr. Pataki, a Republican who leaves office at the end of the year, said he wanted to take the extra step of having an outside expert review the case before calling for the removal of Mr. Hevesi, a Democrat who is seeking re-election, less than two weeks before the election.

“This is a provision of the law that, to the best of our knowledge, has never been used,” Mr. Pataki said. “And it is an extraordinary act for officials to overturn an election of a statewide elected official after a vote by the people of New York, and obviously it’s something that, if it’s used at all, has to be used cautiously and with great, great care.”

So Mr. Pataki appointed David N. Kelley, a former United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, to review the case. Mr. Kelley — who has prosecuted terrorism cases and who won high-profile convictions against Martha Stewart and Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom — is a registered Democrat who won the praise of people within his party for his work as a prosecutor.

The governor said he expected Mr. Kelley to report back to him “within the week,” which could lead Mr. Pataki to announce his intentions shortly before the Nov. 7 elections.

Mr. Hevesi, who unexpectedly finds himself fighting for his political life, reacted to the governor’s announcement by saying, “As a result of this decision, five million voters will choose their next comptroller, and that’s as it should be.”

On Thursday, Eliot Spitzer, the state attorney general and the Democratic nominee for governor, withdrew his support of Mr. Hevesi, and several Democrats running in close local elections have followed suit, distancing themselves from the scandal. Most newspaper editorials in the state have backed J. Christopher Callaghan, the largely unknown Republican who is running to unseat Mr. Hevesi.

DOJ_NMG_0088443

Republicans are pouncing on the Hevesi case to energize their base in an election season that many Republicans had privately feared would be a rout.

On Friday John Faso, the Republican candidate for governor, and Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican candidate for attorney general, both released television ads seeking to tie their opponents to Mr. Hevesi. And the state Republican Party released an ad on behalf of Mr. Callaghan, whose campaign has so far lacked the money to broadcast its own ads.

By taking even an incremental step that could lead to removal proceedings, Mr. Pataki was steering the state into uncharted waters. Pataki administration officials said they did not believe any statewide elected official in New York had been removed from office since 1913, when Gov. William Sulzer was impeached.

There are two tracks for removing an official. The Democratic-led Assembly can begin impeachment proceedings, but given Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver's support for Mr. Hevesi, that is considered unlikely. Or the governor can call the Republican-led Senate into session for a trial to remove Mr. Hevesi, which would require the votes of two-thirds of the 62-member Senate, and therefore 7 Democrats among them.

But the way forward is far from clear. The governor said that the law allowing him to seek the removal of an official by the Senate did not appear to have ever been used, and that it gave little guidance in what such a trial might look like, saying only that the Senate shall have the power to make such rules "as it may see fit."

If the governor decides to proceed, Mr. Kelley is likely to present the case against Mr. Hevesi to the Senate, much like a prosecutor. Mr. Hevesi would then have an opportunity to be heard.

Aides to the governor said that if Mr. Hevesi is removed from office, the governor can probably pick a replacement to serve out his term. If Mr. Hevesi resigns, the Legislature as a whole will get to choose a successor, giving the choice to the Democrats.

Blair Horner, the legislative director of the New York Public Interest Research Group, said that it was important for the Senate to establish fair rules, and raised concerns that several senators, including Joseph L. Bruno, the Republican majority leader, had already called for Mr. Hevesi to resign or made statements implying that they thought Mr. Hevesi was guilty. "How can they say they are impartial at trial?" he asked.

A spokesman for the Senate said that the senators would be able to have an open mind when they heard the case.

Mr. Hevesi made it clear in an interview taped Friday with Gabe Pressman for WNBC's "New Forum" that he was still running.

"What I'm doing now, which is a little short of two weeks before an election, is saying to the citizens of New York State: I made a mistake, I really did, a beaut," he said in the interview. "And it's caused me a lot of grief, and I deserve it. But I would like you to analyze that in the context of a 35-year career of service."

New York's Pataki Calls For Review Of Hevesi Findings (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Michael Quint And Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, October 28, 2006

Oct. 27 (Bloomberg) -- New York Governor George Pataki today named a former U.S. attorney to review ethics charges against Alan Hevesi, a step that may lead him to recommend that the State Senate remove the comptroller from office.

The governor, a Republican, said he named David Kelley to review the findings to determine ``whether a strong legal case for removal exists." Pataki said he hoped he could have a report from Kelley, who served as U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, within a week.

``I don't want to proceed until I am 100 percent confident that a strong case exists that Mr. Hevesi should be removed," Pataki told reporters at his Manhattan office. ``And if in fact that's Mr. Kelley's determination, I will then make the recommendation that the Senate conduct its trial."

Pataki, who leaves office Dec. 31, acted after the state Ethics Commission this week said Hevesi improperly used staffers as his wife's chauffeur and didn't show any intention of repaying the state until his opponent in the Nov. 7 election exposed the practice. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat who is leading in the race for governor, yesterday withdrew his endorsement of Hevesi, also a Democrat, for re-election as the state's fiscal watchdog.

Criminal Probe

Hevesi's once-commanding lead over Republican J. Christopher Callaghan is evaporating, according to a WNBC/Marist poll.

Hevesi's actions are also under criminal investigation by Albany County District Attorney David Soares, who has been conducting interviews and issuing subpoenas. Spitzer's office is looking into whether Hevesi's payment of nearly $83,000 was adequate.

Speaking to reporters after Pataki's news conference, Hevesi said, ``As a result of this decision, five million voters will decide who the next comptroller will be, and that's as it should be." He declined to answer questions.

Pataki, asked if Hevesi should resign, said, ``I think he should take a hard look at where he stands right now. You know, his own running mate, Eliot Spitzer, said that he's compromised his ability to fulfill his responsibilities."

The governor said, `This is a sad day for New Yorkers. We have to have confidence in not just our electoral process but also our elected officials, and I will do everything in my power to make sure that continues to be the case for the people of New York."

Prosecutor Background

Pataki said Kelley would get more than a week if needed it, and probably would present the case to the Senate if there is a decision to proceed with it. Kelley served in the U.S. attorney's office in New York from 1988 to 2005 before joining law firm Cahill, Gordon & Reindel in September 2005.

Prior to his appointment as U.S. attorney in 2003, he was named co-chair of the Justice Department's investigation into the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He personally prosecuted John Walker Lindh, dubbed the ``American Taliban." As a U.S. attorney, he also served as a member of President George W. Bush's Corporate Fraud Task Force and the Attorney General's Advisory Committee for White Collar Crime.

``It is an extraordinary act for officials to overturn an election of a statewide elected official after a vote by the people of New York, and obviously it's something that if it's used at all has to be used cautiously and with great, great care," said Pataki, who cut short a trip to Hungary to deal with the Hevesi case.

Won't Quit

Should the governor recommend that Hevesi be removed from office, the 62-member Republican-controlled Senate would meet jointly with the seven judges on the Court of Appeals to hear evidence and Hevesi's defense. A two-thirds vote is required to oust Hevesi, who oversees the state's $142.6 billion retirement system, the second-biggest public pension in the U.S.

Hevesi, 65, in a televised debate with Callaghan earlier this week, said he wouldn't resign and refused to comment on what he would do if indicted.

State Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno told reporters in Troy today that if Hevesi is re-elected and the Senate acted to remove him before the end of this year, ``after Jan. 1 we have to go through it all again." Bruno is the leader of the 35 Republican senators who are a majority in the Senate.

``I don't believe he will be re-elected," Bruno said. He said Hevesi ``has lost all credibility as a fiscal watchdog."

Poll Plunge

The ethics scandal has drawn attention to a contest that until recently has been overshadowed by the governor's race, U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton's bid for a second term and the battle between Republican Jeanine Pirro and Democrat Andrew Cuomo to succeed Spitzer as attorney general. The scandal has cost Hevesi, who as comptroller oversees the second-largest U.S. public pension, a once-commanding lead.

A WNBC/Marist Poll conducted yesterday found 50 percent of likely supporters supporting Hevesi and 38 percent for Callaghan, a former treasurer of Saratoga County. The 12 percentage point margin was down from 40 points just six days earlier. When voters were told Spitzer withdrew his endorsement of Hevesi, the race became a virtual tie: 44 percent for Hevesi and 43 percent for Callaghan.

Doolittle Legal Fate Uncertain (SACBEE)

By David Whitney, Bee Washington Bureau

The Sacramento Bee, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088445

Voters go to polls not knowing if he'll face Abramoff case charges.

Voters in the 4th Congressional District will go to the polls Nov. 7 to decide whether Rep. John Doolittle deserves an eighth term without knowing whether he will face federal prosecution in connection with the ongoing investigation of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Roseville Republican, who once called Abramoff a good friend, has not been called before a grand jury or otherwise been publicly identified by the Justice Department as being under investigation.

"We are not going to confirm or deny investigations into any individuals," said Brian Sierra, spokesman for the Justice Department's criminal section.

The only congressman to have pleaded guilty in connection with Abramoff is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who pleaded Oct. 14 to conspiracy and making false statements and is awaiting sentencing.

Doolittle's long relationship with Abramoff, however, included elements of the kind that contributed to the legal troubles of many of the eight people, including congressional aides and lobbyists, who already have pleaded guilty.

Doolittle has insisted he's done no wrong and is paying a prominent criminal attorney in Virginia to clear his name. The legal tab so far is about $50,000.

The attorney, David Barger, stressed that he had been told by the Justice Department last week that "Congressman Doolittle is not a target of its investigation."

But other criminal defense attorneys said the fact that the Justice Department has not identified Doolittle as a target means little because that typically doesn't happen until all the evidence is gathered and charges are imminent.

"Saying that someone is not a target doesn't really tell you much," said Lawrence Barcella Jr., a former deputy chief of the Justice Department's major crimes division who has extensive experience defending prominent officials charged with political corruption and other white-collar crimes.

"All it means is that the Justice Department is not ready to charge you immediately," Barcella said. "It doesn't necessarily mean you don't have potential jeopardy."

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee isn't waiting for official confirmation.

"Do we really want to elect a congressman who might be on his way to jail?" says a mailer the committee sent to voters last week.

"Eight people have been convicted in the Jack Abramoff bribery scandal," it says. "The facts say John Doolittle is likely to be next."

Charlie Brown, Doolittle's Democratic opponent, has tried to paint the Roseville Republican as part of the "culture of corruption" in Washington and has suggested on the stump that Doolittle will be indicted after the election.

Speaking at a fundraiser in Davis earlier this month, Brown said of Doolittle: "First we'll vote him out of office, then we will wait for the indictments."

Doolittle's campaign spokesman, Richard Robinson, called Brown's statement an act of desperation.

The most concrete piece of independent evidence that Doolittle was at least looked at by the Justice Department is in the records of the clerk of the House.

A woman named Tonya Walker, describing herself as a "secretary on behalf of work" but identified elsewhere as working for the Justice Department, went to the clerk's office in August 2005 and registered to review financial disclosure reports Doolittle filed for 2002 and 2003.

Walker also looked at records of other House and Senate members who had been linked to Abramoff, including six years of filings for Doolittle's former chief of staff, David Lopez.

Doolittle's office dismissed this as meaningless.

"No one knows what the Justice Department was looking for considering it pulled records from all sorts of people who had no relationship whatsoever to Mr. Abramoff," said Laura Blackann, the congressman's spokeswoman.

In Abramoff's signed factual basis for his plea to corruption of public officials, he admits to offering "things of value to public officials in exchange for a series of official acts and influence and agreements to provide official action and influence."

Among these "things of value" were election support, employment for relatives and campaign contributions, all of which Doolittle received.

Doolittle accepted $14,000 in direct campaign contributions from Abramoff and $130,000 more from the lobbyist's clients and associates. Doolittle also used Abramoff's skybox at the MCI Center for a 1999 fundraiser in conjunction with a Washington-Sacramento NBA game.

Additionally, the company of Doolittle's wife, Julie, was hired by Abramoff's law firm from September 2002 to February 2004, receiving more than $66,600.

Her company was initially hired to raise money for a fundraiser for an Abramoff charity; she stayed on the payroll for months after that event was canceled.

A federal grand jury investigating Abramoff subpoenaed records related to her work for Doolittle. But John Doolittle said in February that federal investigators later asked for information about his wife's other clients, which would have included him since his campaign pays her a commission for fundraising work.

Doolittle may have been trying to get his wife on Abramoff's payroll as early as 2000, according to a recently disclosed e-mail written by Kevin Ring, a former Doolittle staffer who later was hired by Abramoff.

In the e-mail to Abramoff, Ring quotes Lopez as saying the congressman was excited about the possibility of his wife taking a job for an Abramoff charity and was eager to talk to the lobbyist. The Doolittles say they have no recollection of that.

In addition, Doolittle assisted Abramoff's efforts to win renewal of a contract in 2000 representing the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.

Abramoff admitted in his plea deal that he had provided travel for senior members of Ney's staff to go to the Northern Mariana Islands in January 2000 to help him "in obtaining and maintaining lobbying clients."

But three months earlier, in October 1999, Doolittle had publicly worked to elect the commonwealth politician responsible for helping Abramoff get the $100,000-a-month lobbying contract.

In his defense, Blackann said that "the congressman has long been a supporter of the CNMI regardless of whether it was being represented by Mr. Abramoff."

In an interview with The Bee in February, Doolittle said he didn't think anything he did in connection with Abramoff and his clients was wrong, but he acknowledged Abramoff might have a different recollection when, as part of his plea deal, he sat down to tell all to federal prosecutors.

" ... I certainly don't think what he has pled guilty to was part of our relationship, at least not on my end it wasn't, I can say with a certainty," Doolittle said of Abramoff. "But, uh, I don't know what he is saying on his end." About the writer:

The Bee's David Whitney can be reached at (202) 383-0004 or dwhitney@mcclatchydc.com.

BX. PIMP COPS A PLEA (AP)

By Ap

AP, October 28, 2006

October 28, 2006 -- A Bronx man admitted yesterday that for six years he managed a multi-city prostitution ring that included underage girls.

In pleading guilty to two federal charges in Trenton, Matthew Thompkins, 38, said the ring ran from 1999 to December 2005 in Atlantic City, Boston, Las Vegas, Miami and New York. He is the seventh member to plead guilty in the case, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Thompkins pleaded guilty to conspiracy to transport minors to engage in prostitution, which carries a sentence of five to 30 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000, and conspiracy to engage in money laundering, punishable by up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 or twice the loss to victims. Sentencing is to be March 2.

The ring took in at least $800,000, officials said. Members would convert the proceeds into money orders of less than $3,000, the legal reporting limit.

A woman who pleaded guilty in June to conspiracy to transport minors for prostitution said she was 16 when she met Thompkins in New York in 1999 and joined the ring. She said she earned him $222,188 in 2004 - yet was paid only $20 a day.

DOJ_NMG_0088447

Thompkins agreed to forfeit $748,243, one New Jersey and three New York properties, and eight vehicles belonging to the ring, authorities said.

Mailman Pimp Awaits Delivery To Jail (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 28, 2006

New Yorker admits to raking in millions with nationwide ring

A New York mailman admitted yesterday that he ran a sprawling multimillion-dollar network that shuttled prostitutes as young as 13 from Atlantic City to Las Vegas and cities in between.

Standing in a federal courtroom in Trenton, Matthew Thompkins acknowledged building and training a "stable" of young prostitutes, housing them in apartments and homes in New York and New Jersey, and hiding millions of dollars in illegal sex proceeds in their names.

His arrest last December by the FBI followed an unusual foray by federal investigators into a crime typically left to local police.

But prosecutors said Thompkins, for years known only by his nickname, "Knowledge," wasn't the typical pimp. He ran his operation so proficiently that his counterparts in the sex-trade industry gave him the ultimate honor three years ago: a 4-foot-high trophy declaring him "International Pimp of the Year."

"He was the master pimp," Assistant U.S. Attorney Jason Richardson said.

Thompkins, 37, pleaded guilty to conspiring to launder money and transport minors across state lines for prostitution. His plea agreement calls for between 10 and 24 years in prison. U.S. District Judge Freda Wolfson set sentencing for March 2.

The plea followed similar admissions from six other defendants. Some cooperated with the FBI; none has been sentenced.

The Justice Department highlighted Thompkins' arrest in December as part of Operation Innocence Lost, a national crackdown on underage prostitution. The year-long probe involved investigators from the FBI, New Jersey State Police, the U.S. Postal Service Inspector General's office, and officers in Atlantic City, Pleasantville and Egg Harbor.

Once an imposing 350 pounds, Thompkins had shed nearly a third of his weight when he was led into court yesterday wearing a brown prison jumpsuit, handcuffs and ankle shackles. He waved briefly at more than a dozen relatives who filled three courtroom benches.

"Between 1999 and December 2005, were you a pimp, that is, did you run a prostitution enterprise business?" the judge asked, one of more than 40 questions to spell out the crime.

"Yes," Thompkins replied.

Investigators said Thompkins counted as many as 60 women in his "stable" over the years, sometimes trading them with pimps in other cities. He required each to keep meticulous records, gave them rooms and $30 a day and demanded receipts to track their spending.

Thompkins wasn't accused of using violence against the women, but agents said some of the women were threatened, especially after they began cooperating with authorities. Many said they had been eased, not pushed, into the world of prostitution by Thompkins or others.

"Smooth talk: These guys had the gift of gab," FBI Special Agent Daniel Garrabrant said.

Once in the ring, few managed to get out, he said. The women charged up to $1,000 a night for sex, and passed it all to Thompkins. One prostitute earned $222,000 in a year, prosecutors said.

With the proceeds, Thompkins lived large. He had a fleet of luxury cars, including a Mercedes-Benz and Cadillac Escalade, that were seized in the ring. He agreed to forfeit eight cars, $748,000 and four properties, including a three-story home in Galloway Township, eight miles outside Atlantic City.

Some of the money he hid in bank accounts under the prostitutes' names or in his fledgling New York recording studio, Hoodlum Records.

DOJ_NMG_0088448

Thompkins, who has been held without bail, did not explain his actions but will get a chance to address the judge at sentencing. His defense attorney, Mitchell Elman, declined to comment.

An employee of the Postal Service since 1994, Thompkins agreed to resign as part of his plea. He was promoted to letter carrier about six years ago, though it was not clear when he stopped delivering the mail.

